

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. SUPPLEMENT

TO THE

C Y C L O P Æ D I A

OF

BIBLICAL, THEOLOGICAL, AND ECCLESIASTICAL LITERATURE.

A.

Aa (old), in ancient Egyptian mythology, was one of the dæmons who accuse the soul of the deceased in the Hall of the Two Truths; also a deity worshipped in the town of Aat.

Aa, CHRISTIAN CHARLES HENRY (in Dutch, Christiaan Karel Hendrik) VAN DER, a learned Lutheran divine, was born at Zwolle, in Overijssel, Netherlands, Aug. 25, 1718. He studied theology at Leyden and Jena in 1737, and was the first secretary-perpetual of the Society of Sciences in Holland, which he assisted in founding at Haarlem in 1752. For fifty-one years he performed the pastoral functions of the Lutheran Church of that place; and died there in 1793. He published several sermons. His writings on the natural sciences are printed in a collection of Dutch periodicals, entitled Algemeene Vaderlandsche Letteroefeningen, published in 1793. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Aacs (or Acs), Mihály (Michael) (1), a Hungarian philosopher and theologian, was born at Szent Martony (or Martonhegy), in Transylvania, July 9, 1631. He finished his studies in Germany, and filled the office of pastor at Hemegges Ala, at Raab, and at Roenau. He died at Roenau Dec. 23, 1708. He wrote in Latin and Hungarian, Fontes Calvinismi Obstructi (Tubingen, 1669):—Boldag Halálnak Szekere (Strasb. 1700). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aacs, Mihály (2), a Hungarian theologian, was born at Raab, Feb. 28, 1672. He studied theology at Wittenberg and Tübingen, and became chaplain of a Hungarian regiment. He died at Bartfeld, Feb. 2, 1711. He wrote in Latin and Hungarian, Dissertatio Historico-theologica de Catechumenis (Strasb. 1700):—Magyar Theologia (Bartfeld, 1709):—Currus Mortis ex Pestilentia, in quo Hominibus Salutarem Mortem Cupientibus Gratiam ipsemet Dominus Jesus Præparet (Strasb. 1702). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aæde, one of the original three muses of the ancient Egyptians; the other two were Melete and Mneme.

Aggaard, Christian, a Danish poet and theologian, was born at Viborg in 1616. He was professor of poetry at Sörøe, and afterwards lecturer in theology at Ripen, Jutland. He died in February, 1664. Among his poems are, De Homaggio Frederici III, Danicæ et Norvæ Regis (Hafnia, 1660, fol.):—Threni Hyperboræi, on the death of Christian IV. All his pieces are inserted in Rostgaard's Deliciæ quorundam Poetarum Danorum (Leyden, 1695, 2 vols. 12mo). See Moréri, Diet. Hist. 1810.

Aggaard, Nicholas (Niels), brother of the above, was librarian in the University of Sörøe, Denmark, where he died, Jan. 22, 1657, aged forty-five years. He and his brother were both Lutherans. Among other works, he wrote, A Disputation on the Style of the New Testament (Sörøe, 1655, 4to).

Aah (the Moon), the ancient Egyptian name of the god who was called by the Romans Lunus. He was represented as an ibis-headed man, with the lunar horns and disk upon his head; or else as a man kneeling on one knee and supporting a disk above his head with both hands.

Aaheru (the Chief of Terrors), one of the mystical deities of the Egyptian hell.

Aahlu (Aaluna, Aahenru, or Aahnaru), the ancient Egyptian name for the plains of Elysium, of which the valley of Balot formed a part.

Aare, DIEDERIK (Dirk or Thierry) VAN DER, was bishop of Utrecht in the 13th century. He seems to have attended more to the temporalities of his see than to his spiritual duties, and was involved in frequent warfare with William, count of Holland. He governed Utrecht for fourteen years, and died at Deventer, Dec. 5, 1212. See Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v.

Aaron. The following description of the ascent to his reputed tomb on Mount Hor is taken from Porter's Handbook for Syria (p. 91). See HOR.

"Ascending the ravine from the south-eastern angle of the valley, we reach in about half an hour the plain called Sútûh Harûn, which skirts the base of Mount Hor. Crossing this towards the south-east side of the peak, we find a path winding up to the summit. The ascent from the plain must be made on foot, and occupies about an hour. It is neither difficult nor dangerous if the proper track be followed, for in the steeper portions rude steps aid the pilgrim. Not far from the summit is a little platform, from which the central and culminating peak rises in broken masses, giving a peculiar character to the mountain, like—

A deep cleft in the rock opens a way to the top. A little way up are the openings to subterraneous vaults with rounded arches, nearly similar to those in front of the tomb in the eastern cliff of Petra. From hence a staircase leads to the narrow platform on which the tomb stands.

"The tomb, as it now stands, is comparatively modern; but it is composed of the ruins of a more ancient and imposing structure. Some small columns are built up in the walls, and fragments of marble and granite lie scattered around. The door is in the south-west corner. An ordinary cenotaph, such as is met with in every part of the East—a patchwork of stone and marble—is the only thing in the interior. It is covered with a ragged pall, and garnished with the usual accompaniments—old shawls, ostrich-eggs, and a few beads. Near the north-west angle a staircase leads down to a dark vault, partly hewn in the rock. Visitors desirous of exploring this grotto would do well to have lights in readiness. The real tomb of the high-priest is here shown at the far end of the vault. It was formerly guarded by an iron grating. The date of the building is at least prior to the time of the Crusades; for the author of the Gesta Francorum mentions that in the time of Baldwin (A.D. 1100) an expedition was made in vallem Moysi, 'to Wady Mûsa;' and that there, on the summit of a mountain, was an oratory. Fulcher of Chartres, who also gives an account of the expedition, says he saw the chapel. It is highly probable that the spot was held sacred by the Christians before the Mohammedan conquest.¹⁾

Aaron is commemorated as a Christian saint in the Ethiopic calendar on March 27; and his deposition on Mount Hor is assigned in early Roman martyrologies to July 1.

Aaron, Sr. (1), was a Briton who suffered martyrdom with St. Julius in Britain, during the persecution under Diocletian, in 303. We are not informed as to the British name of Aaron; but he and Julius had each a church erected to his memory in the city of Caerleon, the ancient metropolis of Wales. Their festival is placed in the Roman martyrology on July 1.

Aaron, Sr. (2), is said to have been the founder of the first monastery in Brittany. He flourished in the 6th century, and was eminent for his piety. When St. Malo fled from Britain into Gaul, he was received and hospitably entertained by Aaron, then residing on a little island not far from the present town of Saint-Malo. Together with St. Malo, he labored for the conversion of the heathen, and was induced to erect a monastery, over which he presided till his death, in 580. See Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v.

Aaron ABIOS (or AVIOB), a rabbi of Thessalonica who lived near the close of the 16th century. He wrote a literal commentary on the book of Esther, in Hebrew, entitled שֵׁן הַמֶּלֶךְ—i. e. Oleum Myrrhae, ex Rabinorum Commentariis, etc. (Thessalonica, 1601). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aaron, a presbyter of ALEXANDRIA, was the author of thirty books on physic, in the Syrian tongue, which he called the Pundects. They were supposed to have been written before 620, and were translated into Arabic by Maserjwalh, a Syrian Jew, about 683. The original Pandects and their translations are now lost, and we have nothing of them remaining but what Mohammed Rhazis collected from them and has left us in his Continens.

Aaron of BISTRITZ, Peter Paul, was a friar of the Order of St. Basil, and bishop of Fogaras, in Transylvania. He died in 1760. He wrote Definitio et Exordium Sanctæ Ecumenicæ Synodi (Florence, 1762). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aaron BEN-ELIA, a Karaite of Nicomedia, lived in the 14th century. He wrote a work in imitation of the Moreh of Maimonides, entitled The Tree of Life, which is a presentation, on a philosophical basis, of the dogmas of Mosaism; and contains, also, detailed accounts respecting the religious and philosophical schools among the Arabs. See Ueberweg, Hist. of Philos. i, 428.

Aaron BEN-JOSEF BEN-BENVENISTE BEN-JOSEF BEN-SERACHJA BEN-SHEM-TOB, HA-LEVI, a Jewish writer of Barcelona, was born about 1235, and died after 1300. He was a great authority and rabbi at Toledo. Being a good Talmudist, he wrote some novellus on Talmudical treatises. He also wrote בְּרֵךְ הַבַּיִת, The Fixture of the House, a criticism on the תוֹרַת הַבַּיִת of Ben-Adrat, and the שֵׁן הַמֶּלֶךְ, an exposition of the six hundred and thirteen precepts. It has, however, been questioned whether he is the author of the latter work. See Grätz, Gesch. vii, 161 sq.; Rosin, Compendium der jüd. Gesetzkunde aus dem XIV. Jahrhdt. (Breslau, 1871); Neubauer, in Frankel-Grätz, Monatsschr. 1872, p. 179 sq., 184 sq.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 24 sq.; Finn, Sephardim, p. 300. (B. P.)

Aaron BERECHJA BEN-MOSE BEN-NECHEMJA, of Modena, who flourished in the 17th century, and died in 1639, is the author of an ascetic work entitled מִצְבֵּר יַבֹּב, Maubâr Yabbók, "The Ford Jabbok" (Mantua, 1626), which has also been translated into Judæo-German. This book, divided into five parts, treats of deeds of charity, the fasting of the Israelites, of their manner of enshrouding the dead, etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 22; Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. u. s. Sekten, iii, 150; Delitzsch, Gesch. d. jüd. Poesie, p. 108; Zunz, Literatur-Gesch. d. jüd. Poesie, p. 424; id. Zur Literatur u. Geschichte, p. 260. (B. P.)

Aaron HA-KOHEN (i. e. "the priest"), an Italian rabbi (sometimes confounded with Aaron of Pesaro) who lived about the middle of the 14th century. He composed a book entitled Archoth Rhagin Heruk, which is a collection of moral sentences. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aaron, Samuel, a Baptist minister, was born in New Britain, Pa., Oct. 19, 1800. His ancestors were Welsh-Irish. His father dying when he was but six years of age, he was placed under the care of an uncle, working upon his farm for several years, and studying a few weeks in the winter. His later studies were pursued at the Doylestown Academy and at Burlington, N. J. Subsequently he became the principal of an academy at Doylestown. His ordination occurred in 1829, at which time he became pastor of the Baptist Church in his native place. Here he remained not far from four years, and then removed to Burlington, where he became principal of the high-school, and, at the same time, pastor of the Baptist Church. In 1841 he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Church in Norristown, Pa. In 1844 he established a literary institution of a high order in the vicinity of Norristown, which met with great success. In 1857, on account of financial troubles caused by his endorsement of the paper of a friend, he was obliged to dispose of his school-buildings and give up the school. He then removed to Mount Holly, N. J., where he became pastor of the Church and was associated with his son in carrying on the Mount Holly Institute, which offices he sustained until his death, April 11, 1865. As an educator, Mr. Aaron acquired a good reputation, and he introduced many improvements into text-books used in schools. See Annual Cyclop. v, 638. (J. C. S.)

Aas (or Aash), a mystical deity of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead. Another deity was called Aam.

Aau (Old One), an epithet of Osiris, in ch. lxxviii of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Ababil, in Arabian mythology, was a fabulous bird mentioned in the Koran, concerning the nature and qualities of which Mohammedan doctors greatly differ.

Abacuc (or Abachum), a martyr commemorated by the Western Church Jan. 19 (or 20), together with Maris (or Mauri), his father; Martha, his mother; and Audifax, his brother. They are said to have come from the confines of Persia, in the time of Claudius II, to Rome, where, after rendering many services to the faithful, they were put to death under Aurelian or Diocletian, about A.D. 270. Their bodies, buried at some distance from Rome, were brought to that city about 820 by pope Pascal I and interred in the Church of St. Adrian, where they were found in 1590 at a place now called Santa Ninfa.

Abācus (Lat. from ābaġ, a board). This name is applied in architecture to the uppermost member or division of a capital.

1. In the Grecian and Roman orders it is a very essential feature.

In the Grecian Doric the abacus has simply the form of a square tile without either chamfer or moulding.

Grecian Doric.

In the Roman Doric it has the addition of an ogee and fillet round the upper edge.

Roman Doric.

In the Tuscan a plain fillet with a simple cavetto under it is used instead of the ogee and fillet. In all these orders the abacus is of considerable thickness, and the moulding round the upper edge is called the cimatium of the abacus.

Tuscan.

In the Grecian Ionic it is worked very much thinner, consisting of an ovolo or ogee, generally without any fillet above it, and is sometimes sculptured.

Grecian Ionic.

In the Roman Ionic it consists of an ogee or ovolo with a fillet above it.

In all the preceding orders the abacus is worked square, but in the modern Ionic, the Corinthian, and the Composite, the sides are hollowed, and the angles, with some few exceptions in the Corinthian order, truncated.

Corinthian.

The mouldings used on the modern Ionic vary, but an ogee and fillet like the Roman are the most common. In the Corinthian and Composite orders the mouldings consist of an ovolo on the upper edge, with a fillet and cavetto beneath.

Composite.

2. In the architecture of the Middle Ages, the abacus still remains an important feature, although its form and proportions are not regulated by the same arbitrary laws as in the classical orders: in the earlier styles there is almost invariably a clear line of separation to mark the abacus as a distinct division of the capital; but as Gothic architecture advanced with its accompanying variety of mouldings, the abacus was subject to the same capricious changes as all the other features of the successive styles, and there is often no really distinguishable line of separation between it and the rest of the capital.

It not unfrequently happens that the abacus is nearly or quite the only part of a capital on which mouldings can be found to show its date; it is therefore deserving of close attention.

In early buildings of the style spoken of as being, perhaps, Saxon, that is, belonging to the 11th century, the abacus is, in general, merely a long, flat stone without chamfer or moulding; but it sometimes varies, and occasionally bears some resemblance to the Norman form.

Jarrow, Durham.

The Norman abacus is flat on the top and generally square in the earlier part of the style, with a plain chamfer on the lower edge, or a hollow is used instead. As the style advanced, other mouldings were introduced, and in rich buildings occasionally several are found combined; it is very usual to find the hollow on the lower edge of the abacus surmounted by a small channel or a bead.

Whitby Church, cir. 1110.

If the top of the abacus is not flat, it is a sign that it is verging to the succeeding style.

In the Early English style the abacus is most commonly circular; it is, however, sometimes octagonal, and occasionally square, but not frequently in England, except early in this style. The most characteristic mouldings are deep hollows and overhanging rounds; in general, the mouldings in this style have considerable projections with deep and distinct hollows between them.

Paul's Cray, Kent, cir. 1220.

In the Decorated style, the form of the abacus is either circular or polygonal, very frequently octagonal. The circular abacus is especially an English feature; the octagonal abacus being most common on the Continent, especially in France. Hollows are not so frequently to be found, nor are they in general, when used, so deeply cut; the mouldings and the modes of combining them vary considerably, but rounds are common, particularly a roll or scroll-moulding, the upper half of which projects and overlaps the lower, as in Merton College Chapel; this moulding may be considered as characteristic of the Decorated style, although it is to be met with in late Early English work. The round mouldings often have fillets worked on them, and these again are also found in Early English work.

In the Perpendicular style the abacus is sometimes circular, but generally octagonal, even when the shaft and lower part of the capital are circular; when octagonal, particularly in work of late date, the sides are often slightly hollowed: in this style the mouldings are not generally much undercut, nor are they so much varied as in the Decorated. A very usual form for the abacus consists of a waved moulding (of rounds and hollows united without forming angles) with a bead under it, as at Croydon, Surrey. The most prominent part of this moulding is sometimes worked flat, as a fillet, which then divides it into two ogees, the upper being reversed: the ogee may be considered as characteristic of the Perpendicular capital. The top of the abacus is sometimes splayed and occasionally hollowed out.

Abadir, in Phœnician mythology, was a name given to cone-formed stones, which were the oldest symbols of the deities.

Abailard, PIERRE. See ABELARD, PIERRE.

Abaji BEN-CAJILIL, surnamed Nachmani, belonged to that class of Jewish teachers who were styled Amoraim, and occupied the presidency at the school of Pumbeditha from 333 to 338. He is said to have been tolerant of the heathen, and defended the book of Ben Sira, i. e. Ecclesiasticus, against his colleague Rab Joseph, who regarded it as heretical. In the exposition of the Scriptures, he adopted the simple against the customary artificial mode. His maxim was, "One and the same verse may be explained in a different sense, but the same sense cannot refer to different verses." See Hamburger, Real-Encyclopädie für Bibel und Talmud, s. v.; Bacher, Die Agada der babylonischen Amoraim (Strasburg, 1878), p. 107 sq. (B. P.)

Abamūrus, a term used in mediæval Latin signifying buttress.

Aban, in Persian mythology, was a genius of water.

Abarbarea, in Greek mythology, was a nymph whose affections Bucolion, son of Laomedon, according to Homer (Iliad, vi, 22), won, and by him became mother of Æsepus and Pedasus. Both were slain before Troy by the hand of Euryalus.

Abarca, Don Joaquin, bishop of Leon, was born in 1780 in Aragon, Spain. He was one of the chief adherents of the faction of Don Carlos in Spain. In 1836 he was arrested near Bordeaux by the French government and banished to Frankfort, whence he went to rejoin the Pretender in the Basque provinces, with a quantity of silver which the Tory party had advanced to him. He, however, fell into disgrace, and died in 1844 in a convent of Carmelite friars at Lanzo, near Turin. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abarca, Pedro, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Jaca, in Aragon, in 1619. He entered the Society of Jesuits in 1641, and, after teaching theology at Salamanca for more than twenty-five years, died at Valencia, Oct. 1, 1693. He wrote, A History of the Kings of Aragon (1682-84), in Spanish:—and treatises on The Knowledge and Will of God, Predestination, The Trinity, and The Incarnation and Perfection of Jesus Christ, all in Latin. See Biblioth. Hisp. ii, 130; Journal des Savans, 1774, p. 324.

Abāris (Ἀβάρης), in Greek legend, was (1) a priest of Apollo, whom the latter presented with a golden arrow, by which he was able to fly around the earth. It is related of him (Herod. iv, 36) that he came from the Hyperboreans, about the time of Croesus, to Greece, in order to deliver that country from a frightful plague. He built a temple to Proserpina at Sparta (Strabo, viii, 301; Pausan. iii, 13, 2). He is said by Iamblicus, in his Life of Pythagoras, to have performed wonders by means of an arrow which he had received from Apollo. Brucker relates that, in the time of a general plague, Abaris was sent by the Scythians on an embassy to the Athenians. This plague happened in the third Olympiad. There seems little reason to doubt that Abaris went from place to place imposing upon the vulgar by false pretensions to supernatural powers. He passed through Greece, Italy, and many other countries, giving forth oracular predictions, pretending to heal diseases by incantation, and practicing other acts of imposture. Some of the later Platonists, in their zeal against Christianity, collected the many fabulous tales reported of Abaris, and exhibited them in opposition to the miracles of Christ. (2.) A table companion or a friend of king Turnus. (3.) An inhabitant of Caucasus who was slain by the hand of Perseus on the occasion of his marriage with Andromeda. See Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.

Abārus, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Apollo, after Abas, a city in Phocis, where he had a temple. This temple was prized so highly, because of its ancient statues, that, after being destroyed twice, in the Persian and the Holy War, it was rebuilt.

Abas, in Greek legend, was (1) a king of Argos, renowned mainly through his great-grandson Perseus. His father was Lynceus, his mother Hypermnestra, and the fierce and cruel Danaus was his grandfather. Abas brought Lynceus the news of Danaus's death, for which he was presented with a costly shield which Danaus had consecrated to Juno. (2.) A son of Neptune and Arethusa, a river nymph. This nymph had appealed to Diana for protection from the persecution of Alpheus. She was therefore changed into a cloud and then into water. (3.) A son of Melampus and Iphianassa, a daughter of Protus. (4.) An associate of Diomedes, who was transformed into a stormy petrel by Venus. (5.) One of the Centaurs who opposed the Lapithæ.

Abaskanton was an amulet worn by the Greeks as a preventive against becoming bewitched.

Abassines, a sect of the Greek Church, inhabiting an extended and wooded region along the coast of the Black Sea. They are a rough variety of the Circassians, and support themselves chiefly by plunder and piracy. From their isolated position they have fallen away from many of the doctrines and practices of the Eastern Church, to which they nominally belong. They observe several feasts, and believe in the seven sacraments, holding confession to be one of them; but they neither confess the number nor the particular species of their sins, exclaiming only in general, "I have sinned, I have sinned." On the repetition of this declaration, the offenders are absolved in a few words accompanied with some gentle stripes upon the side with an olive twig. But in the case of heinous crimes, such as homicide, adultery, and theft, they are often severely scourged. Their funeral rites are ushered in by cries, sighs, and groans. The relations of the deceased lash themselves, and the women disfigure their faces while the priest says a requiem over the deceased and perfumes the corpse. They put their dead into coffins constructed out of the hollowed trunks of trees, and bound round with the sprigs or branches of vines. After the performance of the funeral obsequies they bring out provisions and lay them upon the sepulchres of their deceased friends.

Abāta (Ἀβάτα, inaccessible), a name given in early times to the altar, on account of the exclusion of the laity therefrom. The Council of Trullo (q. v.), canon 69, decreed "that no layman whatsoever should come into the altar part, except only the emperor, when he had made his oblation to the Creator, according to ancient custom." It was called adyta by the Latins. See Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. viii, ch. vi, § 7.

Abati, Erocle, grandson of the following, was born at Modena in 1563. He was a talented genius, but disgraced himself by intemperance. He dashed off his work with negligence and haste, but with such ingenuity of composition as to make us lament his idleness and dissipation. In the Gallery of Florence there is a fine picture of his—the Marriage at Cana. In connection with Schidone, he painted some pictures in the Council Hall at Florence. He died in 1613.

Abati, Niccolò, an eminent historical painter, was born at Modena in 1512. He was a scholar of Antonio Begarelli, an old designer and sculptor, and probably received instruction from Correggio. At the age of thirty-five he painted his celebrated work, the Martyrdom of St. Peter, for the Church of the Benedictines, now in the Dresden Gallery, which brought him into immediate notice. He afterwards painted, in the Candiano Palace, twelve pictures illustrating scenes from the twelve books of the Æneid, which were highly praised by Lanzi. These pictures are now in the Florentine Gallery. In the prime of life he went to Bologna, where he executed, in the Palazzo Leoni, in fresco, a Nativity, and at the Institute four subjects in a frieze representing musical assemblies and conversations; they were composed with such fine taste and elegance that they became the models of the Caracci, in proof of which Agostino Caracci wrote a sonnet in his praise, in which he attributed to him the symmetry of Raphael, the sublimity of Michael Angelo, the truth of Titian, the greatness of Correggio, and the grace of Parmigiano. His practice was so excellent that it is said he never had occasion to retouch his work when dry. When Primaticcio was invited to the court of France by Francis I, to decorate the royal galleries, he selected Abati to assist him in the great work, esteeming him the most efficient. Abati died in Paris in 1571. Of his numerous fresco paintings, but four remain, and his oil paintings are very rare. His great works at Modena and Bologna have been engraved by Domenico Cuneo.

Abatini, GUIDO UBALDO, a distinguished painter of history in fresco, was born probably in 1600, and was early admitted into the Academy at Rome. He was a disciple of Cavaliere Giuseppe Cesari. One of his principal works is on the ceiling of the Chapel of St. Theresa, in the Church of Santa Maria della Vittoria at Rome. He died in 1656.

Abaur (Great Third) is a mystical spirit mentioned in chapter xlii of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Abbacy, the office of abbot (q. v.).

Abbadion (ἀββαδίων), a Greek term for an obscure monk.

Abbadopresbutēros (ἀββαδοπρεσβύτερος), a Greek term for a monk who is in priest's orders.

Abbahu, a Jewish teacher of the 4th century (279–320), is well known for his proficiency in Greek, and even instructed his daughter in that language. He is also known for his polemics and attacks against the Trinity and the ascension of Christ (Jerus. Taanith, ii, 656; Genesis Rabba, c. 29; Exodus Rabba, c. 29). Of this Abbahu we read (Abodah Sarah, fol. 4 a) that he recommended a certain rabbi Saphra to a noble Christian. At this recommendation the Christian exempted rabbi Saphra from taxation for thirteen years. When the Christian asked rabbi Saphra about the meaning of the passage in Amos iii, 2, and perceived his ignorance, he asked rabbi Abbahu about its meaning. Having received a satisfactory answer, the Christian asked, "Why is rabbi Saphra, whom you recommended to me as a great man, so ignorant in the Scriptures, which thou didst explain immediately?" To this rabbi Abbahu answered, "We who come in contact with you Christians are obliged for our self-preservation to study the Scriptures, because you dispute so often with us from the Scriptures; but the other Jews who live among Gentiles have no use of that, since they do not dispute with them concerning the Scriptures." The Samaritans he regarded as heathen, and forbade the use of their wine (Cholin, fol. 6 b). Of his maxims we mention, "Be always of the persecuted, but not of the persecutors" (Baba Kamma, fol. 93); "Better to commit a sin secretly than to profane the name of God openly" (Pesachim, fol. 56); "In the place where the penitent stands, not even the righteous can stand" (Sanhedrin, fol. 99). When he died, it was hyperbolically said that "the columns of Cæsarea shed tears" (Moed Katan, fol. 25 a). See Hamburger, Real-Encyklopädie, ii, 4 sq. (B. P.)

Abbandus (or Abandus), a priest and theologian of the 12th century, was a contemporary of Bérenger and Abelard. We have nothing accurate concerning his life. He was the author of Tractatus de Fractione Corporis Christi in Eucharistia, inserted in the third volume of the Analectica of Mabillon. This is a treatise against those who claim that the breaking of the body of Jesus Christ in the eucharist is only such in appearance, and not in reality. After the condemnation of Bérenger, many questions arose as to the sense of certain articles in the Confession which had been proposed to him for signature in the Synod of Rome. Among other things, it was said by some that the breaking of the body of Christ was only made in the species of bread; others maintained that it was the actual body which was broken. The former held that after the change of the bread and wine into the substance of the body and blood of Jesus Christ, the species of bread and wine remained, and that the breaking was made only in them. The second party held a change in the species as well as in the substance. Abbandus supported the latter view. He is said to have died about 1142. See Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs Sacr. et Eccl. xii, 197.

Abbanus, Sr., the name of two Irish abbots. (1.) Of Cill-Abbain, in Ui-Muireadhaigh, County Meath, is probably identical with St. Abban of Cill-Abbain. He was originally named Blath, and was a son of the sister of St. Ibar, the contemporary of St. Patrick, in the 5th century. Of him nothing certain is known. He is commemorated in the calendars March 16. (2.) Of Magh-Arnuidhe, in Ui-Ceinsellaigh, County Wexford, the son of the sister of St. Coemgen, in the 6th century, is commemorated Oct. 27. Twenty monasteries are mentioned as having been founded by this saint, almost all in the southern half of Ireland. See O'Cleary, Martyrol. Dungall.; Colgan, Acta SS. Hiberniæ; Acta SS. Octobris, xii, 270.

Abbas (Ἀββᾶς), a Greek term for (1) father, (2) a monk, and (3) an abbot.

Abbas (properly Abd-el-Mottalib), the paternal uncle of Mohammed and progenitor of the Mohammedan dynasty of the Abbassides (q. v.), was born at Mecca about A.D. 566. He was but four years the senior of Mohammed, and was still a pagan when the prophet began his public career, and long remained his open enemy. He fought against Mohammed in the battle of Bedr, and was taken prisoner; but as soon as the cause of the prophet seemed to succeed, he gave in his adhesion to the new faith, and defended it zealously. When Mecca surrendered to Mohammed, the holy well Zemzem was retained, although a monument of paganism, in deference to Abbas, its keeper. He was the chief mourner at Mohammed's funeral, and his presence and memory were treated with great respect by the caliphs.

Abbassides, a name given to the third Mohammedan dynasty, the caliphs of Bagdad, which was founded by Abul Abbas, who claimed the caliphate as lineal descendant of Mohammed's uncle, Abbas (q. v.), from whom the name is derived. The Abbassides were the successors of the Ommiads, the caliphs of Damascus. Early in the 8th century the family of Abbas had acquired great influence; and Ibrahim, the fourth in descent from Abbas, obtained several successes over the Ommiads, but was captured and put to death in 747. Ibrahim's brother, Abul Abbas, whom he had named his heir, assumed the title of caliph, and, by a decisive victory near the river Zab in 750, effected the overthrow of the Ommiad dynasty. The vanquished family was treated with such severity that Abul Abbas gained the surname of Al-Saffah, the Bloody. On the death of Abul Abbas, Al-Mansur succeeded to the throne, and founded Bagdad as the seat of the empire. The descendants of Abul Abbas to the number of thirty-six, the last of whom was Mostasem, reigned until 1258, when the dynasty was expelled by Hulaku Khan. The line includes the illustrious names of Al-Mansur, Haroun al-Rashid, and Al-Mamûn, but from the 10th century they sank to mere spiritual chiefs of Islam. After their deposition at Bagdad, in 1258, a member of the family, named Ahmed, fled to Egypt, where he was recognised as caliph, and his descendants reigned there, under the protection of the Mamelukes, until Egypt was conquered by the Turks, in 1517. Motawakkel III, the last caliph, was taken by Sultan Selim I, the conqueror of Egypt, to Constantinople, and detained there some time as a prisoner. He afterwards returned to Egypt, and died at Cairo, a pensionary of the Ottoman government, in 1538.

Abbat, the same as abbot (q. v.).

Abbati, the name of a sect of the Vaudois, which was spread over Italy towards the end of the 14th century, and are charged with having indulged in every kind of brutality. They lasted, however, but a short time.

Abbatia (ἀββατεία), a Greek term for an abbey or monastery.

Abbatissa. See ABBESS.

Abbes, Guillaume, a French theologian and native of Bédarieux, lived in the first half of the 17th century. He was at first canon of St. Sebastian's at Narbonne, then of the Church of St. Paul, and pronounced the funeral oration of Claude de Rebé, archbishop of Narbonne. He wrote Le Parfait Orateur (Narbonne, 1648), a rare book. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abbes, James, an English martyr of the 16th century, was a Christian who, because of his devotion to God and his fellow-men, was compelled to travel from place to place to avoid the peril of being apprehended. He was finally caught by some wicked men, and taken before the bishop of Norwich and examined. They threatened him in order to make him desist from his pious labors, until he yielded to their wishes against his conscience. The bishop gave him a piece of money; but poor James had scarcely left the house when his conscience troubled him so that he went immediately to the bishop again, and threw the money which he had given him into his lap, saying, "I am sorry that I consented to your wicked persuasions." The bishop began anew some scheme by which to win him over, but all was in vain. He was therefore taken to Bury, Aug. 2, 1555, and burned. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 328.

Abbess, the female superior of a body of nuns. The office of abbess was elective and for life (triennial abbesses, however, are mentioned belonging to years so late as 1565, 1583). An abbess was restricted to one monastery; was bound to render obedience to the bishop in all things; and was subject to be deprived for misconduct, but only upon report of the bishop to the king. She was bound, also, to give account of monastic property to both king and bishop; was entitled to absolute obedience, possessing ample powers of discipline, even to expulsion, but could not excommunicate; neither could she give the veil or ordain. In France an abbess was not to leave her monastery, save once a year if summoned by the king, with the bishop's consent, to his presence upon monastic business. Neither was she to speak to any man except upon necessary business, and then before witnesses, and between the first hour of the day and evening. Abbesses had no power to choose confessors for themselves or for their nuns without the sanction of the ordinary. There have been instances of abbesses attending provincial synods, when they were distinguished by the pastoral staff and veil of prelacy (conferred at sixty years of age). The dress of an abbess in the 12th century consisted only of a long white tunic with close sleeves, probably of linen, and a black surtout of equal length with sleeves large and loose, and a hood drawn up so as to cover the head completely.

Ab-beth-din (אב בתי דין, i. e. the father or head of the house of judgment, or juridical college) is a term used in the Talmud to denote the vice-president of the Sanhedrim, who sat at the right of the nasi, or president, while at the left sat the chacham, i. e. the wise man. These three persons were called "the ancient," or זקנים, also "the judges," or דיינים. In the absence of the nasi, the ab-beth-din presided. The other members of the Sanhedrim occupied places according to their rank in the college. At a late period a certain punctilious etiquette prevailed. Thus, when the nasi entered, all the members were expected to rise and remain standing till he had invited them to resume their places. When the ab-beth-din entered, all were expected to rise, but allowed again to sit down without intimation to that effect; while the chacham was only saluted by each individual member rising as he passed, and immediately sitting down again. Only the ab-beth-din was initiated into the mysteries of the law (Chagiga, fol. 13 b); and when he died, the lectures in the schools of his place were suspended. (B. P.)

Abbey, DAVID A., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ulster County, N. Y., April 6, 1813. He was converted in 1830 and united with the Reformed (Dutch) Church. In 1838 he graduated at Yale College; in 1839 he entered the Theological Seminary at Auburn, N. Y., finished his course in 1841, and was licensed by the Cayuga Presbytery. He was a man of great accuracy, both in literary composition and in business. He died of typhoid fever at Apalachin, N. Y., Dec. 6, 1865. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 271.

Abbo, surnamed CERNUS (the crooked), a French monk, who was also called Abbo Parisiensis because he was of the monastery of Saint-Germain-des-Prés, is said to have died in 923. He was present at the siege of Paris by the Normans in 887. Of this siege he wrote the history in a poem in three books, which has been admitted into Pithou's and Duchesne's collections. A more correct edition, with notes and a French translation, may be seen in the Nouvelles Annales de Paris (1753, 4to). There are also Five Select Sermons under his name in D'Achery's Spicilegium (vol. ix); and in Bibl. PP. (Colon, 1618), vol. v, is Abbonis Epistola ad Desiderium Episc. The third book of the Siege, addressed "to the clergy," has been omitted by his editors, as having no connection with the history. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abbo, bishop of NEVERS, lived contemporaneously with the emperor Charles the Bald. He subscribed the third Council of Soissons in 868, as also those held at Troyes in 867 and 878, and the one held at Poictou in 876.

Abbo, a bishop of SOISSONS and a successor of Rhodoin, who subscribed the Council of Troisi in 921, and the one of Rheims in 923. He held the position of chancellor of St. Medard Rudolph, the successor of Charles the Simple, and died in 937.

Abbot (sometimes written abbat), the head or superior of an abbey or monastery, corresponding to abbeas for a house of nuns.

1. Different Kinds.—Abbots were distinguished by the epithets commendatory, crossed, field, lay, mitred, acumenical (i. e. general), according to circumstances. See ABBOT (in vol. i).

2. The Election of Abbots.—Thomassin (Discipline de l'Église) states that after A.D. 500 the bishops were the ordinary and universal collators to all benefices, and that the privilege of electing abbots was granted subsequently to monasteries, and by its general use became at last a common right. But he does not well prove his statement; and, on the other hand, it is certain that bishops in the time of St. Benedict had little to do with the election of abbots. The rule of that saint, A.D. 526, expressly enacts that the abbot shall be chosen by the whole community. Upon the occasion of an election, leave was sought, first of all from the prince, and in certain cases the consent of the bishop of the diocese was required; after this, a day was fixed for the election, and all absent electors notified by letter; the latter, however, having the privilege of voting by proxy if necessarily absent. The three days previous having been passed in fasting, on the day of election, the mass of the Holy Spirit being ended, all the brethren assembled in the chapter-house, and the chapter De Ordinando Abbate and the constitution of the Lateran De Electione Facienda per Scrutinium, etc., were read. The election was then made in one of three ways: 1. Per inspirationem, i. e. the whole fraternity with one voice required the same man for abbot. 2. Per scrutinium, i. e. by electing three members of the fraternity to receive secretly the votes of the others. 3. Per compromissum, i. e. when certain members of the fraternity were appointed to elect an abbot. The election having been pronounced, the abbot elect was led into the abbey church, and, receiving from the altar the pastoral staff, was conducted to the abbot's seat in the choir. In the chapter-house he took the oath upon the gospels to preserve the liberties and privileges of the house; after which the members of the fraternity were introduced to him, kissed him, and promised obedience.

3. Confirmation and Benediction.—After election, the assent of the prince having been obtained, the confirmation of the election was required. This originally belonged to the bishop of the diocese, but afterwards passed into the hands of the pope, who appointed a person to see whether the election had been proper, and, if so, to confirm it. Subsequently the different orders obtained of the pope the privilege of electing one of their number a local prelate, i. e. a person who, having received the confirmation of his own election from the pope, had the power to confirm the elections of the abbots of the order to which he belonged. The benediction was received from the bishop three days after the confirmation in the presence of two other abbots. The benediction of an abbot was not absolutely essential, and yet without it an abbot could not confer orders nor exercise many other privileges.

4. Duties, Power, etc.—The duties of abbots (according to the rule of St. Benedict) were to instruct by their conversation and to edify by their example; to care for the spiritual and temporal affairs of their abbey; to act as fathers to all, without respect of persons; etc. Novices received the tonsure from the abbot upon entering the monastic state. It was the duty of the abbot to proceed to Rome every three years, unless excused by the pope; to administer the eucharist on Holy Thursday; to feed twelve poor persons during Lent; to clean the sanctum sanctorum on Easter-eve; to perform the office of cook on Christmas-day and at Easter; to give the blessing at table; to keep the keys of the abbey at night, etc. (Martène, De Ant. Monach. Rit.). The power of the abbot was almost absolute. In spiritual matters he could excommunicate and grant dispensations to his monks; he could, either in person or by deputy, absolve them; he could reserve certain cases (specified in the bull of Clement VIII., 1598) to himself. He could not, however, without the consent of the community, profess novices, nor nominate to the abbey benefices, nor depose the conventual priors elected canonically by the chapters. He could bless the ornaments of the church and the altar of his monastery, but not the chalices, nor anything that required unction, without the pope's leave. He could give the tonsure and the four lowest orders in cases where he possessed episcopal jurisdiction or had papal authority to do so. In temporal matters the abbot could buy, sell, bargain, exchange, etc., but could not alienate the goods or property of the monastery, nor give up any of its privileges, nor dispose of the savings which he might have made.

5. Rights, Prerogatives, etc.—(1.) Abbots took rank immediately after the bishop, and with them had the title of prelate. (2.) Many abbots had the privilege granted them by the pope of wearing within their own churches the gloves, mitre, and pastoral staff in common with the bishops. (3.) Abbots had the right of giving the benediction within their own churches after vespers, mass, and matins, but could not do so without special permission when a bishop was present. (4.) Certain abbots had the privilege of wearing the episcopal vestments, such as the rochet, but only of the color of their order. (5.) According to the reply of Gregory XIII. to questions put to him by the Council of Rouen in 1581, the following is the order of precedence observed in synods: [1] Abbots who have received the benediction and who are privileged to use the mitre; [2] abbots commendatory; [3] dignitaries of cathedrals; [4] proctors.

6. Deposition.—Abbots immediately subject to the holy see could be deposed by the pope alone; those not exempt, by their bishops, or by their superiors, or the general chapter. The crimes specially punished with deposition were incontinence or extravagance. See Gilbert, Inst. Eccles. p. 368; Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. vii, ch. iii, § 12 sq.

Abbot, Benjamin, LL.D., a Unitarian minister, was a native of Andover, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1788, and immediately afterwards took charge of the academy in Exeter. This position he held, with the highest reputation, until 1838, when he resigned. He spent the remainder of his days in Exeter, and died in 1811. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 466.

Abbot, George (known as "The Puritan"), son (or grandson) of Sir Thomas Abbot, was born at Easington, East Yorkshire, in 1603 or 1604. He was elected probationer fellow of Merton College, Oxford, in 1624; and admitted LL.B. in 1630. He held Caldecote, Warwickshire, against prince Rupert and Maurice during the Civil War. Mr. Abbot was a member of the Long Parliament for Tamworth. He was not a clergyman, as has been said by some, nor yet a nephew of the archbishop of the same name; but he was a theologian and scholar of rare ability. He died Feb. 2 (or 4), 1648. He was the author of, The Whole Book of Job Paraphrased, or Made Easy for Any to Understand (1640):—Vindicia Sabbathi (1641):—Brief Notes upon the Whole Book of Psalms (1651). See Wood (Bliss's), Athenæ Oxonienses, s. v.; Cox, Literature of the Sabbath.

Abbot, Gorham Dummer, LL.D., an American minister, teacher, and writer, was born at Brunswick, Me., Sept. 3, 1807. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1826; and, after taking part of the theological course at Andover, he made the tour of the United States and several visits to Europe, in order to study the various systems of public education. In 1837 he became pastor of the Presbyterian Church at New Rochelle, N. Y.; in 1841 he became travelling agent for the American Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge; in 1843 he organized the Abbot Collegiate Institute, for young ladies, in New York, which was afterwards called the Spingler Institute. He retired from public life in 1866, and died July 31, 1874. He published, Pleasure and Profit:—Prayer-book for the Young:—The Family at Home:—Nathan Dickerman:—Mexico and the United States: their Mutual Relations and Common Interests (1869):—and other works.

Abbott, Hull, a Congregational minister, was born in Boston, Mass., June 15, 1702. He graduated at Harvard College in 1720; and died April 9, 1774, after a ministry of more than fifty years. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 241.

Abbott, Jacob, a Unitarian minister, was born at Wilton, N. H., Jan. 7, 1768. He prosecuted his studies, in preparation for college, under a Mr. Birge, who had opened a school in Wilton. He graduated at Harvard College in 1792, and immediately began teaching school in Billerica, Mass. Whatever of leisure he could command he devoted to the study of theology, under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Cumming, the Congregational minister of that place. He continued teaching but one year, when he returned to Cambridge and continued his theological studies under the direction of Dr. Tappan. He commenced preaching in 1795. After preaching in various places until 1797, he went to Coventry, Conn., and was shortly afterwards engaged to preach in the neighboring parish of Gilead. In 1798 he went to Hampton Falls, and commenced preaching there as a candidate. In due time a call was presented him, which he accepted, and was constituted their pastor in August of the same year. He was for many years a useful member of the Board of Trustees of the Exeter Phillips Academy; and also, for some years, a trustee of the Female Academy at Derry. He resigned his charge at Hampton Falls in April, 1826, and removed to a farm in Windham, N. H., where he preached occasionally in neighboring parishes. During the winter of 1827–28 he supplied Dr. Abiel Abbot's pulpit in Beverly, Mass. At Windham he preached, after a Unitarian society was formed there, and also superintended the schools of the town. On Nov. 2, 1834, as he was crossing a pond on his return from meeting, the boat was upset and he was drowned. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 320.

Abbott, John Emery, a Unitarian minister, was born at Exeter, N. H., in 1793. He graduated at Bowdoin College, Me., in 1810. Shortly after leaving college he began his theological studies, and prosecuted them partly at the university in Cambridge, and partly under the direction of the Rev. Dr. Channing in Boston. In 1815 he was employed as a candidate, received and accepted a call, and was ordained and installed pastor of the North Church in Salem. About this time he began to discover symptoms of pulmonary disease, and took a short journey South, from which he received injury rather than relief. Later he sailed for Havana; for some reason he was worse on his arrival than when he started. He grew rapidly worse while there, and soon found it necessary to return to Exeter. He died Oct. 6, 1819. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 466.

Abbott, John Lovejoy, a Unitarian minister, was born at Andover, Mass., Nov. 29, 1783. He prepared for college at Phillips Academy, Andover; entered Harvard in 1801; and graduated in 1805. He then returned to his father's, and commenced the study of theology under the Rev. Jonathan French, the minister of the congregation in that place. In a short time, however, he went back to Cambridge, and was employed as a subordinate officer of the college, at the same time pursuing his theological studies under Dr. Ware, professor of theology. In 1811 he was appointed librarian of the college, and held the office two years. He was licensed to preach in 1808; and, during his residence at Cambridge, preached at various places in the neighboring parishes. He was ordained and installed pastor of the First Church in Boston July 14, 1813. His health began to fail him while here, and he was obliged to take a voyage for his recovery. He passed the following summer in Brighton, near Boston; from there he went to Medford; and, finally, in reduced health, returned to his father's in Andover, where he died, Oct. 17, 1814. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 420.

Abbott, Robert, a noted English Puritan divine, but not a Nonconformist, was born about 1589. He was educated at Cambridge, where he proceeded A.M., and was afterwards incorporated at Oxford. In 1616 he was presented to the vicarage of Cranbrook, Kent, by archbishop George Abbot. His ministry at this place was very effective; "his parishioners were as his own sons and daughters to him; and by day and by night he thought and felt, wept and prayed, for them and with them." In 1643 he was transferred to the living of Southwick, Hants; and subsequently he became pastor of St. Augustine, London, where he continued to a good old age. He disappears from history some time previous to 1662. He wrote several works, which are distinguished for their terseness and variety. The principal of these are, A Hand of Fellowship to Helpe Keepe Out Sinne and Antichrist (1623):—Bee Thankfull London and her Sisters (1626):—Triall of our Church-forsakers (1639). See Brook, Puritans, iii, 182, 183; Wood (Bliss's), Athenæ Oxonienses.

Abbotts, ARCH, COMMENDATORY, CROSIERED, FIELD, LAY, ECUMENICAL, REGULAR, SECULAR. See ABBOT.

Abbott, Alfred Freeman, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Lowestoft, July 8, 1816. Piously trained, he early entered upon Christian work, and in 1839 was accepted as a candidate for the ministry. His sympathy for the poor and afflicted, the simplicity of his trust in Christ, the singleness of his aim, and the cheerfulness of his disposition greatly endeared him to the people. Trials subdued and chastened his spirit. At the Conference of 1879 he was appointed to Watford, Herts, where he died, Dec. 4, 1879. See Minutes of Wesleyan Conference, 1880, p. 20.

Abbott, Charles F., a Congregational minister, was born at Levington, Vt., Nov. 27, 1831. He was converted when nineteen years of age; fitted for college at Chester; graduated at Middlebury College in 1854, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1861. He offered himself as a missionary to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, and was assigned work in Persia. The war, however, interfered with his going abroad at that time, and he was ordained at Bristol, N. H., in 1862, where he labored until his death, Sept. 20, 1866. "Mr. Abbott was universally beloved; frank, generous, and noble; much disciplined in the school of sorrow, but cheerful; and, although anxious to live, cheered by the thought of rest." See Cong. Quar. 1867, p. 204.

Abbott, Elisha L., a Baptist missionary to Burmah and Aracan, was born at Cazenovia, N. Y., Oct. 23, 1809, and received his education at the Hamilton Literary and Theological Institution. He left this country for the field of his labors Sept. 23, 1835. In 1840 he established a mission in Sandoway, one of the districts of Aracan, confining his labors chiefly to the Karens from Burmah. In 1841 he reported 193 baptisms at this station. Mr. Abbott returned to the United States, on account of ill-health, in 1845, and remained here not far from two years. He resumed his work in Sandoway in 1848, and the most marked success followed his labors, hundreds of persons giving evidence of conversion and being baptized by him. In 1852 Mr. Abbott, with Mr. Van Meter, went to Basseni, where the divine blessing still attended his labors. His constant application to his missionary toil at last broke down his health, and he was compelled once more to return to the United States. He died at Fulton, N. Y., Dec. 3, 1843. Few missionaries in any denomination have had the privilege of welcoming a larger number of converts in Christian churches than Mr. Abbott. See Gammell, Hist. of Amer. Baptist Missions, p. 155-160, 181, 182. (J. C. S.)

Abbott, George, commenced his ministry among the Bible Christians in 1834. He labored with acceptability on eight different appointments in Somersetshire, Devonshire, and Cornwall, England. At South Netherton he was appointed twice. In his ministerial duties he was diligent and faithful, and his liberality was praiseworthy. After months of sickness, he died rather suddenly at Middle Chinnock, in the South Netherton Circuit, Sept. 25, 1878. See Minutes of 61st Annual Conference, 1879.

Abbott, Jacob, D.D., a Congregational minister and writer, elder brother of John S. C., was born at Hallowell, Me., Nov. 14, 1803. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1820, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1824. He was (for one year) tutor, and then professor of mathematics, in Amherst College (1825-29), and afterwards took charge of Mount Vernon school for girls in Boston. Sept. 18, 1834, he was ordained pastor of a new Congregational Church in Roxbury, Mass., but in 1836 he removed to Farmington, Me., and devoted himself to literary pursuits. He died at the latter place Oct. 31, 1879. He was the author of a very large number of popular and instructive works, especially for young persons, of which the most decidedly religious was the Young Christian series (N. Y. 1832 sq. 5 vols.). See Cong. Year-book, 1880, p. 9.

Abbott, Jacob Jackson, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Groton, Vt., July 17, 1813. He was prepared for college at Peacham Academy, and in 1835 entered Dartmouth College, where he graduated in 1839. In 1841 he returned to Dartmouth College as a tutor, remaining there two years, until 1843, at which time he entered the Union Theological Seminary, and, after spending two years in study, graduated in 1845. His first pastorate was at Bennington, Vt., where he was ordained Aug. 27, 1845, and remained two years, when he was dismissed (Aug. 17, 1847). He then went South, and became agent for the Tract Society, which position he retained one year. April 8, 1850, he was installed at Uxbridge, Mass., and in 1861 offered his resignation, but continued to supply the pulpit until Oct. 30, 1862, when he was dismissed. He was installed at Yarmouth, Me., Oct. 19, 1865, and was dismissed Oct. 14, 1875. He also served on the Christian Commission during 1864-65. From Yarmouth he went to Danville, N. Y., where he acted as a supply until 1877. From thence he went to New Haven, Conn., in September, 1877, where he remained until his death, which occurred Dec. 3, 1878. He published articles in the Biblioth. Sac. See Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 36. (W. P. S.)

Abbott, John Stephens Cabot, D.D., a Congregational minister and writer, was born in Brunswick, Me., Sept. 18, 1805. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1825, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1829. He was ordained in 1830, and settled as pastor of churches successively at Worcester, Roxbury, and Nantucket, Mass., and New Haven, Conn. In 1844 he relinquished the pastorate and devoted himself exclusively to literature, except as he supplied some pulpit occasionally. He died at Fair Haven, Conn., June 17, 1877. He published numerous interesting works, chiefly on historical subjects, besides several of a directly religious character, especially Christian Duty:—Practical Christianity, etc. See Harper's Weekly for July 7, 1877.

Abbott, Joseph, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born in Philadelphia, Aug. 16, 1808. At the age of sixteen he entered the sophomore class in the University of Pennsylvania, and left that institution at the close of his junior year, completing his course at Union College, N. Y. During the greater part of the two years following he studied medicine, and soon after became a member of the First Presbyterian Church. His attention having been directed to the ministry, he entered the Andover Theological Seminary, where, after graduating, he devoted a year to the exclusive study of the Hebrew language. During the autumn and winter of 1830-31 he supplied the pulpit of the First Presbyterian Church in Newburyport, Mass. The next two years were passed in leisurely study; and then he was ordained pastor of the Dane Street Church, Beverly, Mass., Oct. 23, 1834, and continued in this pastorate more than thirty years. He resigned in March, 1865, and thereafter continued to reside in Beverly until his death, which occurred April 9, 1867. He acquired an excellent reputation as a scholar, and was an impressive preacher and an admirable pastor. See Cong. Quar. 1870, p. 333.

Abbott, Pitson Joseph, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Cobleskill, N. Y., Aug. 11, 1838. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Albany May 3, 1864. He graduated at Union College, N. Y., in 1861, and afterwards entered Princeton Seminary, N. J., and graduated in 1864. He began his labors at Sydney Plains, Delaware Co., N. Y., in September, 1864; but left this field and accepted a call to the Church at Chazy, Clinton Co., May 1, 1868. In 1871 he went to Jefferson; next to Cannonsville, where he continued until 1875, in which year he died, May 11. Mr. Abbott was an earnest, indefatigable worker in the ministry, and held the respect and esteem of all his fellow-laborers. In all the relations of life he was faithful and true. See Necrological Report of Princeton Theolog. Seminary, April 25, 1876.

Abbott, Samuel, a wealthy philanthropist, who died Andover, Mass., April 30, 1812, at the age of eighty years, was a merchant of Boston; and on the establishment of the Andover Theological Seminary, in 1807, he gave $20,000, and in his will bequeathed it $100,000 more. See Drake, Dict. of Amer. Biog. s. v.

Abbott, Thomas J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hartley, Canada, July 5, 1831. He experienced religion early in life; studied for the ministry in the Concord Theological School; received license to preach in 1853; and in 1858 was admitted into the New England Conference. In 1873 he was transferred to the South Carolina Conference, and for three years served the Centenary Church, Charleston. He then returned to the New England Conference, and labored zealously until his death, March 7, 1878. Mr. Abbott was a conscientious, outspoken man, an intense hater of caste, and heroic in all things relating to human freedom. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 47.

Abbott, William Penn, D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Wilkesbarre, Pa., Dec. 31, 1838. His paternal great-grandfather died defending his home against the Indians in the famed Wyoming Valley; his maternal grandfather, the Hon. Charles Miner, was the historian of Wyoming; and his cousin, Mrs. Anna Wentworth, was one of our earliest missionaries to China. When but a lad his father died, leaving him to the teachings and influences of his devoted Christian mother. From a child he knew the Scriptures. His education was limited to an academical course at West Chester, Pa., and a short time under the late Dr. Nelson at Kingston. In 1859 he professed conversion, in 1860 was licensed to preach and labored within the limits of the Wyoming Conference, and in 1863 entered that conference on trial. In 1866 he was transferred to the Troy Conference, and in 1869 to the New York Conference, and he was stationed successively at Trinity Church, Newburgh; Washington Square, St. Luke's, and Thirtieth Street, New York city, where he died Dec. 22, 1878. From the opening of his ministry Mr. Abbott attracted attention, and received the conversion of souls as God's seals to his ministry. He had no barren year in all the sixteen, and was never more successful than on his last charge. He was a diligent student, gifted with a prodigious memory, a well-balanced mind, quick perception, and boundless tact. His presence was commanding and prepossessing; his sermons short, practical, methodical, climactic, and piercing. He excelled as a pastor, and was best known as a great-hearted Christian friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 27.

Abbt, THOMAS, a German theological writer, was born at Ulm, Nov. 25, 1738. He received his education in his native place, and in 1756 went to the University of Halle, where he was invited by Prof. Baumgarten to live in his house. In 1760 he was appointed professor extraordinary of philosophy in the University of Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. He passed six months of the following year at Berlin, and left that city to fill the mathematical chair in the University of Rinteln, Westphalia. Wearying of academical life, he entered the profession of law, and in 1765 was presented by the reigning prince of Schaumburg-Lippe to the office of councillor of the court, regency, and consistory of Bückeburg. He died Nov. 27, 1766. Besides other publications (in German or Latin), he wrote early paradoxical essays on The Burial of Moses (Halle, 1757, 4to):—Confusion of Tongues Not a Punishment (ibid. 4to):—Search of Truth (ibid. 1759, 4to). See Nicolai, Ehrengedächtniss d. Abbt (Berlin, 1767, 4to).

Abbuna. See ARUNA.

Abbuto, a Japanese idol, invoked for curing disease, and for procuring favorable winds for sailing.

Abdal, a name given to a peculiar class of Moham-medan devotees. They go bareheaded and with naked legs, half covered with the skin of some wild beast, having a leathern girdle about the waist, from which hangs a bag. Some of them have about the middle of their bodies a copper serpent, bestowed upon them by their doctors as a mark of learning. Their doctrines are totally subversive of good order in society, since they hold that all actions are indifferent, and that God is served in the haunts of the profligate as much as in the mosques. They carry in their hands a kind of club, which they use as a magic wand. They chiefly employ themselves in wandering about, selling relics, and obtaining charity. They are also called Santons and Calenders.

Abdallah ben-Al-Phadeli, a Melchitic deacon in Syria, who died in 1044, was the author of the following works in Syriac or Arabic: The Paradise of Christians:—A Commentary on the Pentateuch and other Books of the Holy Scripture:—A Treatise on Fasting, Almsgiving, and Prayer:—Answers to the Questions of the Nestorian Patriarch. He is chiefly known as the translator of the Psalms from the Sept. into Arabic. They were published at Aleppo in 1706, at the expense of the Greek patriarch Athanasius of Antioch, and in 1735 in the Monastery of St. John at Kesroan, on Mount Lebanon. Abdallah also translated some of Chrysostom's writings into Arabic. See Gori Catal. Manuscript. Bibl. Med. p. 64, 130; Catal. Manuscript. Bibl. Reg. i, 105; Le Long-Masch, Bibl. Sacra, ii, 124. (B.P.)

Abdallah Ibn-Taïb Abul-Faraj was a native of Irak, and a Christian physician of the sect of Nestorians, who died about 1043. He wrote commentaries upon Aristotle and Galen. He also wrote a large number of works upon medicine and theology, which have never been published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abdecalis (Abdechalis, or Abdella), a martyr, vicar of Simeon, bishop of Seleucia. He died near the middle of the 4th century, during the persecution of the Christians in Persia under the reign of Sapor II. His memory is celebrated April 21.

Abdelmesias, an Egyptian who became a Coptic monk and priest of the Monastery of St. Macarius in the desert. He was procurator and orator of Gabriel, patriarch of Alexandria. His publications are, A Deputation of the Patriarch to Pope Clement VIII.:—and a Profession of Faith (made at Rome, Jan. 14, 1595), given in Baronius, vol. vi, at the end. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Abdêrus, in Greek mythology, was a son of Mercury or of Thromius, a favorite of Hercules. According to others, he was the servant of Diomedes, king of the Bistones of Thrace, all slain by Hercules.

Abdiânus, a Christian martyr of Africa, commemorated as a saint in the Hieronymian martyrology on April 24.

Abdias BEN-SHALOM, a celebrated rabbi of the 7th century. He sent a number of Jewish doctors, it is said, to Arabia, to discuss with Mohammed the laws of Moses. The result of this discussion, which is of great authority to Mussulmans, is found at the end of the Koran printed at Zurich in 1543. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abdiesus (Ebed-Jesu; i. e. servant of Jesus), a martyr, who died near the middle of the 4th century, during the persecution of the Christians in Persia under the reign of Sapor II. His memory is celebrated April 22. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abdiassi (Abdisu, Abd-jesu, or Hebed-gesu), a monk of the Order of St. Pachomius, and afterwards patriarch of Mosul, a city of Asiatic Turkey. He went to Rome between 1550 and 1555, and abjured Nestorianism; and after the death of Simon Sulacha he was made Latin patriarch of Mosul, which election was confirmed by Pius IV, who conferred on him the pallium, March 7, 1562. Thomassin relates that he was present at the Council of Trent; Sarpi, that he wrote an epistle to the synod, but was not present. Abdiassi was perfect master of Chaldee, Arabic, and Syriac; he maintained that his ancestors had received their doctrine from Sts. Thomas and Thaddæus, and that their faith was in all respects conformable to that of the Roman Church. Before he abjured Nestorianism, Abdiassi wrote various works in Syriac, in defence of his original faith, which are mentioned by Abraham Ecchellensis, Catalogue of Syriac Writers (Rome, 1653). See Thomassin, pt. i, bk. i, c. xxiv, p. 9; Sarpi, Istoria del Concilio Tridentino.

Abdon. The modern Abdeh was examined by Tristram carefully, who "found traces of a very extensive town, with sculptures of the Greek period, and a solitary column standing out in the plain at no great distance" (Bible Places, p. 292).

Abdon (Abdo, or Abdus) and Sennen (Sennes, or Sennis) are said to have suffered martyrdom under Decius. They were Persian princes who, because they had buried the bodies of martyrs, were brought in chains to Rome, and beheaded with some other martyrs, Saints Abdon and Sennen. (From a fresco in the Pontian Cemetery at Rome. The Lord is represented emerging from a cloud and crowning the saints, who are dressed in Persian costume. See Lami, De Eruditione Apostolorum, p. 121.)

July 30, 250. Their bodies, having been concealed in the house of a subdeacon named Avirinus, were, at the time of Constantine the Great, discovered, and were interred in the Pontian Cemetery, on the Porto road, ad Ursum Pileatum, which has since been called by their name. At a very early time a basilica was dedicated in their honor, which was renovated by pope Adrian I towards the end of the 8th century. The greater part of their relics is still at Rome; another part was brought to the monastery of the Benedictines at Arles-sur-Tech, in the diocese of Perpignan, whose patrons the two martyrs were. The Roman Church commemorates them on the day of their martyrdom. According to some, their remains are said to have been transported to the Abbey of St. Médard at Soissons in 828, where they remained until it was destroyed by the Huguenots. St. Sennen in Cornwall is dedicated to their honor. See Baillet, Vies des Saints, ii, 426; Bartolini, Actes du Martyre de S. Agnès et des Abdon et Sennen (Paris, 1864); Chapeau, Vie des BB. Martyrs Abd. et Senn. (Perpignan, 1848); Tolrade Bordas, Histoire du Martyre des St. Abdon et Sennen (ibid. 1869); Wetzler u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon (2d ed. Freiburg, 1880), s. v. (B. P.)

Abbecket, THOMAS. See BECKET, THOMAS A.

Abegg, JOHANN FRIEDRICH, a Protestant divine of Germany, was born at Roxheim, near Kreuznach, Nov. 30, 1765; and died at Heidelberg, Dec. 16, 1840, where he had been actively engaged as professor of theology since 1819. In the same year the Heidelberg University had created him doctor of divinity. Although he lectured for about twenty years, yet he wrote very little. With the exception of a few printed sermons and recensions, he has left nothing behind. See Ullmann, in Theolog. Stud. u. Krit. 1841, p. 515 sq.; Holtzmann, in Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Abel (אָבֶל). Philo, De Sacrif. Ab. et Cain, § 1 (Richter's ed.; p. 164 of Mangey's), explains "Αβελ by ἀναφέρων ἐπὶ θεῷν," "referring to God," and more fully in Quod Det. Pot. Insid. § 10 (ibid. p. 197), ὁ μὲν γὰρ "Αβελ ἀναφέρων ἐπὶ θεῷν πάντα φιλοῦσεν δόγμα, i. e. "for Abel, who refers everything to God, is the God-loving opinion." Accordingly, Philo read אָבֶל, and dividing it into אָב and אֶל, אֶל=θεός, and אָב=ἀναφέρειν, like אָבֶה, אֶה, "to desire," because he regards Abel as φιλόθεος, in opposition to Cain, whom he calls φιλαντρός, "self-loving." This explanation we also find in Ambrose, De Cain et Ab. i, 1: "Abel (dictus) qui omnia refert ad Deum pia devotus mentis attentione nihil sibi arrogans ut superior frater, sed totum tribuens conditori quod accepisset ab eo." In De Migr. Abr. § 13 (ibid. p. 447), Philo writes: ὄνομα δὲ ἐστὶ τοῦ τὰ θνητὰ πυνθύνοντος καὶ ἀδανάτα εὐδαιμονίζοντος. According to this explanation, "Αβελ=אָבֶל, "the sorrowing" (comp. Josephus, Ant. i, 2, 1, "Αβελος σημαίνει δὲ πένθος τοῦτο). This second explanation of Philo we find in Theodoret, εἰς τὰ ἀπορ. τῆς Σείας γρ. Erot. ξ; and Euseb. Præp. Ev. (ed. Viger. Col. 1668), xi, 518. Jerome, in De Nom. Hebr., gives two explanations: luctus and "vapor," "vanitas," the latter referring to אָבֶל. Between these two explanations Cyprian, Tract. de Sina et Sion, seems to vacillate, for he says, "Abel filius Adæ nomen accepit Hebraicum signans fratris interfectionem (הַבֵּל) et parentum luctum (אָבֶל)." (B. P.)

Abel, Sr., an Irish abbot of Imleach-flach (now Emlagh, County Meath), is recorded to have died in 742. See O'Donovan, Annals of the Four Masters.

Abel, David, an English Congregational minister, was born at Llanybri, near Carmarthen, March 1, 1789. At the age of eighteen he was admitted into the college at Carmarthen as a student for the ministry. On leaving college, Mr. Abel preached at Gower for six months, and then removed to Bardons Park Chapel, Leicestershire, where he was ordained, and continued to be pastor for fifty-eight years. In March, 1870, he removed to Rugby, and there died, Aug. 18, 1871. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1872, p. 304.

Abel, Ephraim, a Baptist minister, was born in Orange County, Va., about the middle of the last century. He became a hopeful Christian under the preaching of the celebrated John Leland, by whom he was baptized, not far from the year 1788. Soon after he was ordained; and, after being publicly set apart to the work of the ministry, he removed to Fauquier County, where he preached much as an itinerant minister. Subsequently he had the pastoral charge of the Church at Hartwood, Stafford Co., and the Church at Brentsville, Prince William Co. He died about the year 1809, universally lamented in the large section of country in which he was for many years the only minister of his denomination. See Lives of Virginian Baptist Ministers, ii, 192-194. (J. C. S.)

Abel, Jacob Friedrich von, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Vaihingen, May 9, 1751. In 1790 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Tübingen; in 1811 he was made general superintendent at Öhringen, in 1823 at Urach; and died at Tübingen, July 7, 1829. He wrote, Philosophische Untersuchung über die letzten Gründe unseres Glaubens an Gott (Heilbronn, 1818):—Philosophische Untersuchung über die Verbindung der Menschen mit höheren Geistern (Stuttg. 1791):—Ausführliche Darstellung des Grundes unseres Glaubens an Unsterblichkeit (Frankf. 1828). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 413, 428, 471; Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 776 sq. (B. P.)

Abel, Kaspar, a German preacher, was born at Hindenburg, July 14, 1676. He finished his studies at the University of Halberstadt, and became, first, rector at Osterburg, then at Halberstadt. He died at Westdorf, near Aschersleben, Jan. 10, 1763. He wrote some dissertations on theology, and made a translation into German verse of the Heroides of Ovid and the Satires of Boileau. He also wrote, Historia Monarchiarum Orbis Antiqui (Leips. 1718):—Preussische und brandenburgische Staatshistorie (ibid. 1710, 1735):—Preussische und brandenburgische Staatsgeographie (ibid. 1711, 1735, 1747):—Deutsche Alterthümer (Brunswick, 1729):—Sächsische Alterthümer (ibid. 1730):—Hebräische Alterthümer (ibid. eod.):—Griechische Alterthümer (ibid. 1738). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abell, Alfred W., was a minister in the Free Methodist Church for a brief period before his decease. For several years he was a member of the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1861 he requested, and received, a location, and soon afterwards cast in his lot with the Free Methodist Church. From this event till near the close of his life, he had pastoral oversight of the West Sweden Society. He died June 7, 1868. See Minutes of the Fourth Session of the Genesee Annual Convention of the Free Meth. Church, p. 6.

Abell, Asa, a distinguished minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and then in the Free Methodist Church, was born in Cheshire County, N. H., Nov. 19, 1796. He was converted at a camp-meeting held near Canandaigua Lake in June, 1815. In 1816 he attended for one term the academy at Onondaga Valley; in 1821 he was admitted to the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was appointed presiding elder of the Genesee District in 1827. For eighteen years he was a presiding elder in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was elected a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of 1832, and of the three following General Conferences. Soon after the organization of the Free Methodist Church, he with others withdrew, joined the new denomination, and did effective work in this his new relationship for several years. About three years before his death he had a stroke of paralysis, which affects his powers of utterance. He died triumphantly in the faith of the Gospel, Nov. 9, 1879. Through life he was a man of unswerving integrity; as a preacher, he was clear, lively, forcible, and convincing. He frequently wrote for the periodicals, also composed several hymns. See the Chicago Free Methodist, Oct. 13, 1880.

Abell, James, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Norwich, Conn., in 1792. He entered college from Lisbon, Conn., where his preparatory studies had been pursued. After leaving Yale he studied theology at the Seminary in Andover, Mass., graduating in 1822. He was ordained and installed, Jan. 18, 1825, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Oswego, where he remained five years. He was then installed over the Presbyterian Church in Oxford, N. Y., Sept. 14, 1830, was settled there seven years, and was then called to the pastorate of the Reformed (Dutch) Church in Chittenango, N. Y., where he continued nearly nineteen years, and resigned in 1857. This was his last charge. He was fourteen years a member of the board of trustees of Hamilton College. He died May 7, 1868. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1868; Presbyterianism in Central New York, p. 685.

Abelli, Antoine, a French theologian, was born in Paris in 1527. He became a Dominican, or Frère Prêcheur, and commendatory abbot of Notre Dame-de-Livry, in the Aunoy (a district in the Île de France). For three years he was vicar-general of his congregation, and was also preacher and confessor to the queen Catherine de Médicis. He signed the act of the University of Paris by which he took the oath of fidelity to Henry IV, April 22, 1594. According to Quétil and Échard, he was a man of integrity and learning. He died about 1600. He wrote, La Manière de bien Prier, avec la Vertu et Efficace de l'Oraison Prouvée par l'Exemple des Anciens, etc. (Paris, 1564, 8vo):—Sermon sur les Lamentations du Saint Prophète Jérémie (Paris, 1582):—Lettre à la Reine Catherine de Médicis (1564).

Abelli, Louis, a French theologian, was born in 1603 in the Vexin. He was first rector of St. Josse at Paris, then bishop of Rhodes. In 1664 he resigned his bishopric, and went to Paris to live in retirement. He was a strong adversary of Port-Royal. He died at Paris, Oct. 4, 1691. He wrote, Medulla Theologica (1650):—Tradition de l'Église touchant la Dévotion des Chrétiens envers la Sainte Vierge (1652-72):—La Vie du Vénérable Serviteur de Dieu, Vincent de Paul (1664):—La Couronne de l'Âme Chrétienne, ou Méditations sur les plus Importantes Vérités de l'Évangile (translated by him into Latin in 1732):—Considérations sur l'Éternité:—La Vie de Sainte Josse de Bretagne (Abbeville):—Défense de la Hiérarchie de l'Église et de l'Autorité du Pape (Paris, 1659):—Traité des Hérésies (1661). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abellio (or Abellis) was a deity of the ancient Gauls. Mention is made of him on a few Gallic altars found near Comminges, in France. Sometimes he is compared to Mars, at other times to Apollo of the Romans. The word has been derived by some from Bel, the Baal of the Old Test.

Abel-meholah. Tristram conjectures this to be "a spot now called Sher-habiel, a trace of the name lingering in the neighboring Wady Maleh" (Bible Places, p. 229); while Lieut. Conder locates it at "a place now called Ain Helweh, in the Jordan valley, to which the direct road led past Shunem down the valley of Jezreel" (Tent Work, i, 124).

Abelonii (or Abelonites), also Abenonitæ. See ABELITÆ.

Abeōna, in Roman mythology, was a goddess to whose care parting friends were intrusted.

Abercius, bishop of HIERAPOLIS, in Phrygia, was raised to that see about A.D. 164, upon the martyrdom of St. Papias. He suffered great torments from the heathen under Marcus Aurelius, but died in peace during the reign of that emperor. Neither Eusebius nor any other ancient writer makes mention of Abercius, who, according to Baronius, wrote an excellent Book of Discipline, to be observed by priests and deacons, and an apology to Marcus Aurelius, the emperor; both of which the cardinal promised to give entire in his Annales, but it was not done. The Greeks, who give him the title of ἱσαπόστολος, commemorate him on Oct. 22. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 66; Baronius, Annales, A.D. 163, No. 15.

Abercius OF JERUSALEM, a noted miracle-worker (ἱσαπόστολος θαυματουργός) of the early Church, is commemorated in the Byzantine calendar on Oct. 22.

Aberīdes, in Greek and Roman mythology, was the son of Cælus and Vesta; the same with Saturn.

Aberle, MORITZ VON, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born April 15, 1819, at Rottum, near Biberach. In 1842 he received holy orders, and in 1850 he was called to Tübingen as professor of ethics and New-Test. exegesis. In 1866 he was ennobled, and died Nov. 3, 1875. Aberle was one of the brightest lights of the Catholic faculty at Tübingen, and a very learned scholar. He was always a hard student, and found no time for producing large publications, although he contributed extensively to the Tübingen Theologische Quartalschrift. He left in manuscript Einleitung in das Neue Testament, which was edited by Paul Schanz (Freiburg, 1877). See Literarischer Handweiser, 1875, p. 433 sq.; Himpel, in the Theologische Quartalschrift, lviii, 2. (B. P.)

Abernathy, Burwell, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Giles County, Tenn. As to the date of his birth we have no source of knowledge. He embraced religion in early life, and in 1842 joined the Tennessee Annual Conference. In 1849 he studied for a better ministerial preparation, and re-entered the Conference in the following year, and continued faithful, and with great usefulness, until his death, in 1848. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1848, p. 174.

Abernathy, Joseph T., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Macon County, Ala., July 4, 1823. He spent his early life in wayward thoughtlessness, but experienced religion when about twenty; and in 1855 was admitted into the Alabama Conference, and continued to labor with fidelity and much success until his death, Sept. 18, 1859. Mr. Abernathy began his ministry uncultured, but by diligent study became an acceptable and useful preacher. His piety was deep, and his life zealous. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1859, p. 161.

Abez. Lieut. Conder (Tent Work, ii, 334) thinks this is the ruined site Khurbet el-Beida, marked on the Ordnance Map eight miles west of Nazareth and two south-west of Beit-Lahm, remarking (Quar. Report of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1881, p. 49) that "the Arabic exactly corresponds [?] to the Hebrew, with the same meaning, 'white';" but this seems doubtful.

Abgar [see ABGARUS, in vol. i, p. 14] is the name of several kings of Edessa, who reigned, according to the chronicle of that city, at various periods from B.C. 99 to A.D. 217. Of the ten kings who are said to have borne the name of Abgar, we have only to do with the last six. The first of the name was Abgar Phika "the Dumb," who reigned with Bacro two years and four months, and by himself twenty-three years and five months (B.C. 93-67). His son Abgar reigned fifteen years (67-52), and is mentioned by Dion Cassius as having made a treaty with the Romans in the time of Pompey. He is the same who treacherously deceived Crassus in his expedition against the Parthians (B.C. 53), and is called by Appian

(De Bello Parth. p. 140) φύλαρχος τῶν Ἀράβων. In Plutarch his name is written Ἀριάμνης. The eleventh and twelfth kings of Edessa bore the same name, according to Dionysius; but nothing is recorded of them except that the latter was surnamed Sumoko, "the Red."

We now come to the one with whom the name is most conspicuously associated—the fifteenth king—Abgar surnamed Ucomo, "the Black," who reigned, according to the chronology of Dionysius of Telmahar, A.D. 9-46, but according to the rectification of Gutschmid, A.D. 13-50. Moses of Chorene traces his descent from the Parthian king Arsaces. Procopius has a story of the romantic attachment which he excited in Augustus when on a visit to Rome, and of the device he was obliged to employ before the emperor would allow him to return to Edessa. The narrative of Eusebius we have already given. The Syriac version of the story given in Cureton's Ancient Syriac Documents is obviously an elaborate expansion of Eusebius. In all probability, the only fact in connection with Abgar which has come down to us is to be found in Tacitus (Annals, xii, 12-14), where he appears in a not very creditable light—first seducing the young Parthian king Meherdates to waste precious days in luxurious indulgence at Edessa, and then treacherously abandoning him on the battle-field (A.D. 49).

Abgar VI bar-Ma'nū, according to Dionysius, reigned for twenty years (A.D. 65-85), which Gutschmid reckons from 69 to 89. The dynasty now seems to have changed; and the next king, Abgar VII bar-ġzat, who purchased the kingdom from the Parthians, and reigned A. D. 108-115, was of the royal race of Adiabene. It was this Abgar, in all probability, who behaved with such caution when Trajan made his expedition to the East. According to Dion Cassius, he did not go in person to meet the emperor at Antioch, but sent him gifts and friendly messages. He was afraid of Trajan, on the one hand, and of the Parthians, on the other; and therefore deferred his meeting with Trajan until he came to Edessa, where he entertained him at a banquet, at which he introduced his son Arbandes dancing some of his native dances. The emperor was greatly captivated with the young Arbandes. The Abgar of the time of Antoninus Pius must be Ma'nū bar-Ma'nū, as Assemani suggests.

ABGAR, BAR-MAANU, a descendant of Abgarus (q. v.), who reigned in Edessa about the year 200, was a Christian and friend of Bardesanes (see Euseb. Chron. ad Olymp. 149, 1; and Epiphani. Hæc. 56, 1). That he did not believe in the gnosticism of his friend may be seen from the fact that the orthodox Epiphanius styles him ἀνὴρ οὐμώτατος; while Eusebius, in his Chronicon, calls him ιερόν ἀνδρα. In the year 216, Abgar was deposed by the emperor Caracalla, and Edessa became a Roman colony. (B. P.)

ABGARUS, the reputed king of Edessa, is commemorated as a saint in the Armenian calendar on Dec. 21.

ABHASSARA, in the Buddhist religion, a superior celestial world. Previous to the creation of the present world there were several successive systems of worlds, which were destroyed by fire. On the destruction of the former worlds, the beings that inhabited them, and were meritorious, received birth in the celestial world Abhassara; and when their proper age was expired, or their merit was no longer such as to preserve them in a celestial world, they again came to inhabit the earth. Their bodies, however, still retained many of the attributes of the world from which they had come, as they had subsisted without food, and could soar through the air at will; and the glory proceeding from their persons was so great that there was no necessity for a sun or moon. Thus no change of seasons was known; there was no difference between night and day; and there was no diversity of sex. For many ages the inhabitants of the earth thus lived, previous to the creation of the sun and moon, in happiness and mutual peace.

See Gardner, Faiths of the World, v. v. See also BUDDHISM; BUDDHISTS.

Abhidharma, the third class of the Buddhist sacred books, called Pitakali, or Pitakattayan (q. v.). The Abhidharma contain instructions which are supposed to be addressed to the inhabitants of the celestial worlds. This is accordingly accounted the highest class of sacred books; and the expounders of it are to be held in the highest honor, for it declares pre-eminent truths, as the word itself implies. The books of which it consists contain terms and doctrines with definitions and explanations. The text consists of 96,250 stanzas, and the commentaries of 30,000; so that in the whole, including text and commentary, there are 126,250 stanzas. Early in the present century there arose a class of metaphysicians in Ava called Paramats, who respected only the Abhidharma, and rejected the other books that the Buddhists considered as sacred, saying that they were only a compilation of fables and allegories. The founder of the sect, Kosan, with about fifty of his followers, was put to death by order of the king.

Abhijit, in Hindū religion, is one of the sacrifices to be brought by a king, or rajah, as a propitiation for unpremeditatingly killing a priest.

Abia, in Greek mythology, was a nurse of Hyllus, who built for the father of her charge, Hercules, a temple at Ira, in Messenia, in remembrance of whom Presphontes called this city Abia.

Abibas (or Abibba), a younger son of the Gamaliel mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles, and Ethna, his wife. He is said to have been early baptized and brought up as a Christian; to have spent his life in good works; and to have been buried in the tomb of St. Stephen at Caphargamalia, about twenty miles from Jerusalem. His body is supposed to have been found with those of his father, of Nicodemus, and of St. Stephen, Aug. 3. See Baillet, Vies des Saints, ii, 88.

Abibas, a martyr of Edessa, is commemorated as a saint in the Byzantine calendar on Nov. 15.

Abibo, or Abibon. See ABIBAS.

Abicht, JOHANN GEORG, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Königsee, March 10, 1672. In 1702 he was appointed professor of Hebrew at Leipsic; in 1717 he was called to Dantzic as professor and pastor; in 1730 he went to Wittenberg as professor of theology and general superintendent; and died there, June 5, 1740. He wrote, Diss. de Confessione Privata (Gedani, 1723):—Exercitatio de Servorum Hebræorum Acquisitione et Servituti (Lips. 1704):—Diss. de Hebr. Accentuum Genuino Officio (ibid. 1709):—Ars Distincte Legendi et Interpret. V. T. (ibid. 1710). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 144, 459; Steinschneider, Bibliog. Handbuch, p. 1. (B. P.)

Abida, in Mongolian mythology, was a deity of the Kalmucks, that had much resemblance to Siva of India. Abida rules over the spirits of the dead, admits the virtuous into Paradise, and sends the bad back to the earth with other bodies. This deity lives in heaven, to which leads a path all of silver.

Abilius, Sr. (variously written Αἰμίλιος, Ἀμίλιος, Melias, etc., and perhaps the Latin Avilius), was the second bishop of Alexandria (after St. Mark), A.D. 86-96. According to one tradition, he was ordained presbyter, together with his successor Cerdon, by Mark himself. According to another tradition, he was appointed bishop by Luke. Abilius is commemorated in the Roman martyrology on Feb. 22; in the Ethiopic on Aug. 29.

Abillon, André d', a French theologian who lived in the first half of the 17th century. He wrote, La Morale des Bons Esprits (Paris, 1643):—Nouveau Cours de Philosophie (ibid. 1633):—Le Concile de la Grâce ou Réflexions Théologiques sur le Deuxième Concile d'Orange (ibid. 1645):—La Métaphysique des Bons Esprits (ibid. 1642). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abimurgan, in Persian mythology, is a miraculous spring in Kohistan, about which a species of bird called samarmar is constantly flying. If any part of the country is troubled with locusts, it is only necessary to carry some of this water into that region, and the birds will follow and destroy the locusts.

Abington, William N., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Patrick County, Va., Sept. 30, 1798. He experienced religion in 1823; and in 1827 joined the Virginia Conference, in which he worked diligently until his death, Sept. 14, 1829. Mr. Abington was energetic, faithful, successful, and much beloved. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1830, p. 76.

Abiob, Aaron. See AARON ABIOR.

Abios ('Αβιος), a Greek term for a monk.

Abia Goni, in Hindû mythology, was a name given to Brahma as the creator of clouds and of the moon.

Ablabius, or Ablavius ('Αβλάβιος), a famous orator who lived in the time of Theodosius the younger, and whom Chrysanthus (q. v.) admitted to priest's orders. Ablabius eventually became bishop of the Novatians at Nicea, where he also taught rhetoric. He wrote some sermons, which are lost.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

In A.D. 314 Constantine wrote to one Ablabius, who held a command in Africa, and was apparently a Christian, summoning the disputants in the Donatist controversy to a council at Arles (August. Op. ix, App. p. 21). This Ablabius is supposed to be the same with the præfect of the prætorium (A.D. 326-337), who was deposed and put to death by Constantius.

Ablutis (or Abluvius), Geoffroy de, a native of Abliuis (now Abliis), between Paris and Chartres, France. He became a Dominican, and received the appointment of inquisitor-general of Carcassonne; and sustained with firmness the persecution raised against him, as an inquisitor, by the Franciscan Bernard Deliciosi, in 1301. His death is said to have occurred at Lyons, about 1318. His works are, Short Commentaries on the Four Books of the Master of the Sentences:—Acts in Quality of Inquisitor.

Ablution is a name for the wine and water used by the priest after communion to cleanse the chalice and his fingers. At one time the priest was required to drink it. The water-drain was always erected near the altar to receive the ablution.

ABLUTION OF THE FEET. See FOOT-WASHING; PEDILAVIUM.

ABLUTION OF HANDS is the washing of the priest's hands with water (1) before his assumption of the sacred vestments, preparatory to celebrating the Christian communion. The Roman Preparatio ad Missam contains the following prayer: "Cum lavat manus dicat; Da, Domine, virtutem manibus meis ad abstergendam omnem maculam, ut sine pollutione mentis et corporis valeam tibi servire." (2.) The washing of the priest's hands during the celebration of the divine mysteries. See LAVABO; HANDS, WASHING OF THE.

ABLUTION OF THE HEAD (capitilavium) was a Spanish rite adopted in France. It took place on Palm-Sunday, the Sunday of Indulgence, out of respect to the sacred chrism with which the catechumens were anointed on the solemn day of baptism. At the Council of Mayence, in 813, the practice was abolished, and baptism was required to be celebrated after the Roman manner.

ABLUTION OF THE SACRED VESSELS is the washing of the chalice and paten by the priest after celebrating the Christian eucharist. Two of the ancient English rites ordered (1) wine to be poured into the chalice, (2) wine and water over the celebrant's fingers, and (3) water only, in each of which cases the rinsings were partaken of by the priest. An almost similar rule is observed in the Latin communion, as may be seen from the concluding portion of the Canon Missæ.

Abner. "In the town [of Hebron] the tomb of Abner and Ishbosheth is shown within the court of a Turkish house, but is not worth visiting" (Bädeker, Palestine, p. 281).

Abner, a Jewish rabbi, was born at Burgos about 1270. He was converted to Christianity at Valladolid, where he practiced the profession of medicine. From that time he assumed the name of Alphonsus of Burgos, and he distinguished himself by his zeal for the Christian religion. He died in 1346. He wrote a Treatise on the Plague, in Spanish (Cordova, 1551). Before his conversion he had published a work on the agreement of laws, and accompanied his comments with the Commentary of Aben-Ezra upon the ten precepts of the law. After having renounced Judaism, he wrote, in Hebrew, a refutation of the book of rabbi Kimchi against Christians. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aboab, Emanuel, a Jewish writer of Italy, who flourished in the beginning of the 17th century, was born at Oporto. On account of the Inquisition, he left for Italy, resided at Venice, and subsequently at Amsterdam. In 1625 he finished his Nomologia, or Discursus Legales, an elaborate defence of oral tradition, published afterwards at Amsterdam. He died in 1629. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 4; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 12 sq.; Lindo, Hist. of the Jews in Spain, p. 364; Etheridge, Introd. to Jewish Literature, p. 548; Kayserling, Gesch. d. Juden in Portugal, p. 265, 271 sq.; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, x, 132 sq. (B. P.)

Aboab, Isaac, of CASTILE, a Jewish philosopher, jurist, and theologian, was born in 1432. His profound learning procured him the esteem of king John II of Portugal, to which kingdom he retired at the expulsion of the Jews from Spain. He died in 1493. He wrote a highly moral work entitled מנורת המאור, The Candlestick of Light, in seven parts (Venice, 1544 and later), which has been translated into Spanish, German, and Judæo-German. In the latter translation it has been published with the commentary Nephesh Jehuda (Berlin, 1872-73). Zunz, in his Die Ritus (ibid. 1859), p. 204 sq., tries to demonstrate that this Aboab is not the author of this work, but that it had been written two hundred years before by an author of the same name. Aboab also wrote, נהר פישון, The River Pishon, homilies (Constantinople, 1538):—פירוש על הרמב"ם (Venice, 1548 and later), a commentary to Nachmani's Commentary on the Pentateuch. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 4 sq.; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, viii, 225, 341, 374, 377; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 13; Lindo, Hist. of the Jews in Spain, p. 263; Etheridge, Introd. to Hebrew Literature, p. 267; Kayserling, *Gesch. d. Aboab, Isaac, of SAN JUAN DE LUZ, in Portugal, a Jewish writer, was born in 1609, and died at Amsterdam in 1693. He wrote a copious Spanish commentary on the Pentateuch, Paráfrasi Comentado sobre el Pentateuco (Amst. 1681, fol.):—La Filosofia Legal (Philosophy of the Law) (ibid.):—Triumph of Moses, a poem:—Porta del Cielo (השער השמימי), i. e. "gate of heaven", a Hebrew translation of Herera's work against Spinozism (ibid. 1655):—and many Sermons (about 886 in number). See Fürst, *Bibl. Abresi, GIACOMO, a Bolognese painter, was born in 1632, and became a scholar of Agostino Metelli. He worked mostly in fresco, and he also painted history, but was more distinguished for views of architecture. He painted some perspective pieces in the Church of San Giacomo Maggiore in his native city. He died in 1667.

Abortion. The crime of procuring abortion is little noticed in the earliest laws. It is a crime of civilization; in a barbarous state of society the parallel crime is infanticide. The practice was horribly prevalent among the Romans of the empire, although punishable with banishment and sometimes with death, and was a ground of accusation by the early Christians against the heathen. Tertullian denounces the practice as homicidal, declaring it to be but the anticipation or hastening of murder. "Prevention of birth is the precipitation of murder." Minucius Felix declares it to be parricide. The Council of Ancyra (A.D. 314) limited its punishment to ten years' penance. The Council of Lerida (324) classes the crime with infanticide, but allows the mother to be received to communion after seven years' penance, even when her sin was complicated with adultery. The Council of Trullo classes it with homicide. Pope Gregory III, in the next century, reverts to the ten years' penance, but modifies the sentence to a single year in cases where the child has not been formed in the womb: this is based on Exod. xxi. By the Visigothic law, the person who administered a draught for the purpose was punished with death. See Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. xvi, ch. x, § 4.

Abra de Raconis, CHARLES FRANÇOIS, a French bishop, was born in 1580 at Castle Raconis, in the diocese of Chartres. In 1592 he joined the Church of Rome; in 1609 was appointed professor of philosophy at Paris; in 1615 was made professor of theology; and in 1618 royal court-preacher. In 1637 he was appointed bishop of Lavaur, and retired in 1643 to Paris, where he died, July 16, 1646. He wrote, Examen et Jugement du Livre de la Fréquente Communion (Paris, 1644), directed against the Jansenist Anton Arnauld. In 1645 he published Briève Anatomie du Libelle Anonyme Intitulé Réponse au Livre de M. l'Évq. de Lavaur. His works are characterized by Arnauld, who only scorned him, in the words "dont les ouvrages ont été méprisés de tous les honnêtes gens." See Räss, Convertiten, iii, 445 sq.; Wetzer u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon (2d ed.), s. v. (B. P.)

Abraham, the Hebrew patriarch, is commemorated as a Christian saint in the old Roman martyrology on Oct. 9; in the Ethiopic calendar on Aug. 19; and, in conjunction with Isaac and Jacob, on the 28th of every month.

ABRAHAM, APOCALYPSE OF, a book "full of all manner of wickedness," was current among the Sethian Ophites (Epiph. Her. 286 c). It is probably the Apocryphal work under Abraham's name condemned by Nicephorus (Cræmer, Zur Gesch. d. Kanons, p. 121, 145). The length is rather over that assigned to Canticles. A Greek Testament of Abraham, extant in MS. at Vienna, appears to be of a much later date.

ABRAHAM'S SACRIFICE (of Isaac), FEAST OF, is celebrated in Constantinople, under the name Behul Briran ("the Great Festival"), by a procession, headed by the Sultan, through the city. The Mohammedans substitute Ishmael for Isaac in their version of the narrative.

Abraham, St., a title applied to three men.

1. Abrames, of the diocese of Cyrus in Euphratesia, who, after leading a solitary life for some years, went to preach the Gospel in the regions east of Mount Libanus. Returning to his solitude, he was, contrary to his own will, elevated to the see of Charræ, in Osrhene, or Lower Mesopotamia. Here he practiced great mortification and self-denial until his fame reached the ears of Theodosius the Younger, who called him to his court, receiving him with great honor. He died at Constantinople in 348, and his remains were carried back to Charræ. No mention is made of him in the Latin martyrologies, but the Greek commemorate him on Feb. 14.

2. This saint was born about the end of the 4th century in Upper Syria. While still young, he went to visit the anchorites of Egypt, but was captured by the Saracens and cruelly maltreated. Eventually he escaped from them, and towards the close of the reign of Valentinian III came to Gaul, and, settling at Auvergne, built a monastery there. He died in 472, and was buried in the Church of St. Cirgues (Cyriacus), now a parish in the city of Clermont. His festival is marked in the Roman martyrology June 15. See Gregory of Tours, ii, 21; Baillet, Vies des Saints, June 15, vol. ii.

3. This person was a hermit and priest, and was born in the 4th century at Chidna, Syria (or Mesopotamia). He permitted the celebration of his marriage to the person to whom his parents had early engaged him, but on the same day retired to a cell, and, stopping up the entrance, gave himself up to devotion and prayer. The report of his sanctity getting abroad, the bishop forcibly ordained him priest, and sent him to preach the Gospel to the infidel inhabitants of a neighboring town. After suffering much at their hands, his patience and resolution were rewarded by their conversion. His festival is celebrated with that of St. Mary, his niece, by the Greek Church, Oct. 29, and by the Roman on March 16. See Baillet, March 16, vol. i; Butler, March 15.

Abraham (or Ephrem), the sixty-second Coptic patriarch of Alexandria (after St. Mark), was the son of Zera (or Zarsaat), and succeeded Minas (or Mennas) II in 977, and was poisoned after filling the see four years. He is commemorated as a saint and martyr by the Alexandrian Church on Dec. 2. His life is written in Syriac and Arabic, and is to be found joined to that of Barsuma in the National Library at Paris, No. 795.

Abraham (or Ibrahim), a native of Antioch, was, in the 9th century, the chief of the heretical Abrahamites (q. v.), a branch of the sect of the Paulinists. He denied the divinity of Jesus Christ. Cyriacus, patriarch of Antioch, opposed him powerfully, but was not able to restore him to orthodoxy. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abraham, a Scottish bishop, was promoted to the see of Dunblane in 1220, and was bishop there in the fourth or fifth year of pope Honorius, being contemporary with William, bishop of St. Andrews. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 172.

Abraham (or Seba [SABAA]), a Portuguese rabbi who lived at Lisbon in 1499, the date at which the Jews were banished from Portugal. He died, according to Nicolas Antonio, in 1509. We have from him a commentary on the Pentateuch, very highly esteemed, which was published under the title Tseror Hammor (Venice, 1523; 2d ed. 1546). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abraham BEN-CHAILA or HAJA, was a Spanish rabbi of the 12th century. In a book on astrology he foretold the coming of the Messiah as to occur in 1158. He died in 1105. He wrote, Tractatus de Nativitate bus (Rome, 1545):—Sphæra Mundi (Baale, 1546), Hebrew and Latin. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abraham BEN-CHAYIM, a Jew of Bologna, deserves our attention because he printed the first complete Hebrew Bible, which appeared at Soncino in 1488. This edition is now very rare; only nine copies are known to be extant—viz. one at Exeter College, Oxford, two at Rome, two at Florence, two at Parma, one at Vienna, and one in the Baden-Durlach Library. The Pentateuch is followed by the five Megilloth in the same order as they stand in Van der Hooght's edition; Nehemiah and Ezra form one book, and Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles are not divided into two books. Each page has two columns, and the Psalms are divided into five books. The text has no Masoretic signs, no majuscular and minuscular letters. The text is, according to Bruns (Dissert. General. in V. Test. p. 442 sq.), full of blunders, and Kennicott asserts that it contains more than twelve thousand variations. How carelessly the printing was executed may be seen from the fact that ver. 16 of Psa. lxxiv was interpolated after ver. 12 of Psa. lxxxix. (B. P.)

Abraham BEN-DAVID, a Jewish philosopher and theologian of the 12th century, flourished at Toledo, Spain. He attempted a reconciliation of Jewish theology with Aristotelian philosophy, and in 1160 he wrote, in the Arabic language, a work called The Sublime Faith, in which he defends the philosophy of Aristotle, but strongly combats Neo-Platonism. See Ueberweg, Hist. of Philos. i, 419, 427.

Abraham BEN-ISAAC, a Jewish writer of Granada, is the author of a Cabalistic work entitled The Covenant of Peace (ברית שלום), written between 1391 and 1409, wherein he "discusses the mysteries of the names of God and the angels; of permutations, commutations, the vowel-points, and accents; and declares that he who does not acknowledge God in the manner of the Cabala sins unwittingly, is not regarded by God, has not his special providence, and, like the abandoned and the wicked, is left to fate." This work was published in Amsterdam, 1648. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 8; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, viii, 105 sq.; Ginsburg, The Kabbalah, (Lond. 1865), p. 121 sq. (B. P.)

Abraham, Andrew, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Florida, N. Y., Oct. 12, 1818. After receiving a preparatory literary education, having graduated at Union College in 1844, he entered Union Theological Seminary and completed the course of study. He was ordained Oct. 13, 1848, and in the same year received a commission from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions to labor among the Zulus in South Africa, at Mapumulo, where he spent his entire ministerial life, with the exception of one year on a visit to his native country. One who was for many years his yoke-fellow in the Zulu mission says of him, "He was a practical man in every sense of the word. While he attended to the spiritual wants of the people and instructed them thoroughly in the doctrines and principles of religion, he taught them how to carry out those principles in active daily business life. He labored faithfully and patiently to instruct the ignorant and lead them out of their darkness and superstition to a hope in Christ, and he instructed them how to build their houses with a view to convenience and health." A native chief said, after his death, "I never heard our teacher speak an unkind word." He was true to his convictions, and carried them out faithfully. He was an excellent scholar, and, in the judgment of his brethren, the best translator in the mission. It is thought that overwork in preparing the Old-Test. translation for the press had an influence in causing the disease which brought him to sudden death. He was found dead in his bed on the morning of Sept. 12, 1878, having been apparently stricken with apoplexy. (W. P. S.)

Abraham, Nicolas, a learned Roman Catholic writer, was born in the diocese of Toul, in Lorraine, in 1589. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1609, and took the fourth oath in 1623. After teaching belles-lettres, he was (in 1653) made divinity professor in the University of Pont-à-Mousson, which position he retained until his death, Sept. 7, 1655. He wrote, Pharus Veteris Testamenti, sive Sacrarum Questionum Libri XV (Paris, 1648):—Epitome Rudimentorum Lingue Hebraicae, Versibus Latinis Breviter et Dilucide Comprehensa (Pont-à-Mousson, 1645; Dijon, 1651). He also edited Nonni Panopolit. Paraphrasis in Evangel. Johannis (Paris, 1623). He composed many other works, a list of which may be found in Sotwell, Bibliotheca Script. Soc. Jes.; in Bayle; and in the large Bibliothèque Ecclésiastique, i, 33. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Wiener, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 195, 898. (B. P.)

Abraham Ostroh BEN-DAVID, a Jewish writer who flourished in the beginning of the 17th century, is the author of כור לזר, or a commentary on the Chaldee paraphrase of the Pentateuch (Hanau, 1614; Frankfort-on-the-Oder, 1681):—באור כל יד מדרות, a commentary on the thirteen hermeneutical rules. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 9; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Abraham Shalom BEN-ISAAC BEN-SAMUEL, a Jew of Catalonia, born about 1430, wrote a dogmatical work connecting the divine with the human under the title of נתיב שלום, The Habitation of Peace (Constantinople, 1538). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 10; Lindo, History of the Jews, p. 263; Finn, Sephardim, p. 415. (B. P.)

Abram, ROBERT, an English Congregational minister, was born at Little London, a village near Southport, Lancashire, June 2, 1805. His early as well as his religious associations were among the Wesleyan Methodists, by whom he was, at the age of twenty, made a local preacher. In 1832 he joined the Independent Church at Southport, under the pastorate of Rev. George Greatbotch. He was now engaged as an itinerant preacher and Scripture-reader, and became an agent of the County Union in 1834. He removed to Martin Top in the latter part of the summer of 1837, and shortly afterwards was ordained. Here and in the surrounding district he labored with great success, preaching at nine out-stations besides his own chapel. He accepted a call to be pastor of the Church at Marsden, near Burnley, in 1843. Here he labored with great earnestness, preaching on Sabbath and week-day at home and outside places, many of which now sustain independent churches through his labors. About 1849 he resigned his charge at Marsden and removed to Tockholes, where he labored with his characteristic earnestness, and with comparative success. In the early part of the summer of 1852 he began to feel ill, and so continued till he died, peacefully and happily, July 30, 1852. He was a good and modest man, and a plain but faithful preacher. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1853, p. 204.

Abra sax. See ABRAXAS.

Abren, Peter, was a Spanish monk of the Strict Observance of St. Francis, in the province of Andalusia, who flourished about 1620. Among other works, he published an Explication of the Sayings of the Blessed Virgin, etc., and Explications of the Magnificat and Benedicticite.

Abren, Sebastian, a Jesuit, was born at Alemtejo, Portugal, in 1573, and entered the Jesuit College at Evora in 1610. In 1633 he took the degree of doctor of theology. The date of his death is not recorded. His works are, Parocho Perfecto, vida do P. João Cardim (Evora, 1651):—Theology (in MS., 7 vols.).—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Abrenunciation. See BAPTISM.

Abres, bishop of Seleucia and patriarch, was ordained at Antioch. He was a pupil of Mares, and succeeded him. Bar-Hebræus relates that he was a descendant of Joseph the carpenter, the father of James and Josea. According to Amru, Abres was ordained at Jerusalem by St. Simeon, the successor of St. James the Great.

Abresch, PETER, who died as professor of theology at Groningen in the year 1812, is the author of Specimen Philologicum in Obadia ver. 1-8 (Ultrajecti, 1757), and Paraphrasis et Annotationes in Epistolam ad Hebræos (Leyden, 1786-87). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 227, 267. (B. P.)

Abretia, in Greek mythology, was a nymph after whom the province of Abrette, in Mysia, was named. From this province, Jupiter, who was worshipped there, received the name Abretteus.

Abriani, PAOLO, a priest of the Carmelite Order, was a native of Vincenza, Italy. He was a professor at Genoa, Verona, Padua, and Vincenza. In 1654 he was obliged to quit the religious habit, and died at Venice in 1699, in his ninety-second year. He published academical discourses, entitled Funghi, because they grew, he said, like mushrooms:—Il Vaglio (Venice, 1663, 1687):—Poetry, Sonnets, etc. (ibid. 1663-64, 12mo):—L'Arte Poetica di Orazio, Tradotta in Versi Sciolti (ibid. 1663, 12mo):—Ode di Orazio Tradotte (ibid. 1680, 12mo):—A Translation of Lucan (ibid. 1668, 8vo).

Abrizeykan, in Persian mythology, is a festival of the Chaldeans, Armenians, and Persians. It is the anniversary of a treaty of peace between Manutsheher and Afrasiab. An arrow sent by the archer Aresh, under divine guidance, defined the limits of each kingdom. The river Oxus or Amu, near which it fell, became the dividing line.

Abrunculus (or Aprunculus), ST., the twenty-fourth bishop of Treves, is mentioned by Gregory of Tours. His death is placed in 557, and his burial in the Church of St. Paulinus. His relics were transferred to the Monastery of Sprinkirsbach. He is commemorated on April 22, and is probably the same with Apunculus, bishop of Treves.

Abruz, in the Persian religion, is the holy mountain in Persia upon which the gods kept the fire. There are yet many temple-ruins upon it, and in former times the whole region was inhabited by Parsees.

Abruzanum, in Persian mythology, is a certain plant which the Persians believe to be inhabited by a spirit of love.

Abzalom, a regular canon of the Order of St. Augustine, in the Abbey of St. Victor-lez-Paris, who flourished about 1210. He was afterwards abbot of Sprinkirsbach, in the diocese of Treves. He wrote, Sermones Festivales (Cologne, 1534, fol.).

Abardon (father of Sardon) was a Phœnician deity, the local god of Wara, on the western coast of Sardinia.

Absconce (Lat. abecondere), a dark lantern holding a wax light, used in the choir to read the absolutions and benedictions at matins, and the chapter and prayer at lauds.

Abseilius, WILLIAM, of Breda, was a Carthusian, and prior of the order at Bruges. He died in 1471, having composed several devotional and other pious works, among them Tractatus ad semper Candidam Cœli Reginam:—The Lord's Prayer in Verse:—Vita D. Egidii Rythmo:—several Letters:—and De Vera Pace.

Absence. In the matter of absence from official duties, the Council of Basle ordered that a certain part of the fruits of the Church should be given only to those canons who reside. The Council of Trent permits canons to be absent three months in each year without incurring the penalty of absence. Bishops are supposed always to have a lawful cause for absence, and have the privilege of taking with them two dignitaries, or canons, who shall not be liable to the penalties of absence. See RESIDENCE.

Abseus, in Greek mythology, was a giant, the son of Tartarus and Gaia.

Absis. See APSE.

Absolution, as a liturgical term for a form of public service, has several applications.

1. A short deprecation which follows the Psalms of each Nocturn in the ordinary offices for the Hours. In this usage, the word perhaps denotes simply "ending" or "completion," because the monks, when the nocturns were said at the proper hours of the night, broke off the chant at this point and went to rest. Of the "Absolutions" in the present Roman Breviary, only one (that "in tertio nocturno, et pro feria iv et Sabbato") contains a prayer for a setting free from sin.

2. For the absolution which follows the introductory Confession in most liturgies and offices, see CONFESION.

3. The prayer for absolution at the beginning of the Office is, in Oriental liturgies, addressed to the Son; but many of these contain a second, at some point between Consecration and Communion, which is addressed to the Father.

4. The word is also applied to those prayers said over a corpse or a tomb in which remission of the sins of the departed is entreated from the Almighty.

Absolutism, a theory of God's plan in regard to the world held by Leibnitz (q. v.) and others. The system holds that the final aim of all things is exclusively the glorifying of God, especially of his sovereignty. They thus run the risk of bringing this sovereignty of God into opposition with his wisdom and love; for while insisting merely on the fact creavit sibi, they seem to overlook the equally important fact creavit nobis. The tendency of such a theory is to fatalism and quietism. See Van Oosterzee, Christian Dogmatics, i, 297.

Absolve te (I absolve thee), the form used in the Roman Church in the remission of sins after private confession. Its English equivalent, "I absolve thee from all thy sins," is found in the "Order for the Visitation of the Sick" in the Book of Common Prayer. See ABSOLUTION.

Absorption, one of the great leading principles of Brahmanism. It is claimed that the last and highest kind of future after which every good man ought to aim is that his soul may be absorbed in the essence of Brahm, the supreme spirit. For a full discussion of this subject, see NIRVANA.

Abtalon, BEN-SALOMON, an Italian rabbi, native of Modena, lived about the middle of the 16th century. He was a member of the academy of Spanish rabbis, at Ferrara. He wrote, Responses to the Epistles of Rabbi Simon (Venice, 1608). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abtu was the name of one of the mythological fishes of the Egyptian mysteries.

Abu (Horus) was the name of a mystical deity in ch. lxiv of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Abu-Bekr ("father of the virgin"), a caliph, the first successor of Mohammed, was born about A.D. 570. His original name was Abd-el-Caaba, which was changed for his well-known title when his daughter Ayesha became the favorite wife of the prophet. He began to reign in A.D. 632, and died in 634. See MOHAMMEDANISM.

Abucara, THEODORE, according to Cave (Hist. Lit. V, ii, 54), was archbishop of Caria, about A.D. 867 (others say of Haran, about A.D. 770), and was either actually, or about to be, translated to the see of Laodicea by the patriarch Photius. By the latter he was sent, together with Zachary, bishop of Chalcedon, to the emperor Louis to convey to him the book which he had written against pope Nicholas. His progress, however, was arrested by the emperor Basil, who ordered Abucara to remain at home. In the Synod of Constantinople in A.D. 869, in favor of the patriarch Ignatius and against Photius, Abucara presented a petition, in which he complained of the conduct of the latter towards him, and prayed for the pardon of the steps he had taken against Ignatius. Upon this he was admitted to communion with Ignatius, and to a seat in the council. Lequien states that Abucara was bishop of Charran, in Phœnicia. Among his works are, Dialogue concerning the Five Enemies from which Christ delivered us:—Dialogue Proving Logically the Existence of God:—An Epistle Containing the Orthodox Faith as Defined at Chalcedon:—Of the Sin of Adam:—Of the Temptation of Christ:—Various Treatises against the Jews, Mohammedans, etc.:—De Pane Mystico et Corpore Christi:—De Christo Vere Deo:—De Una Uzore:—De Filio ὁποῦσι, contra Saracenos, etc. (Ingolstadt, 1606), all edited in Greek and Latin by J. Gretser. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Abudacnus, JOSEPH, a learned Orientalist, was born at Cairo, in Egypt, in the 17th century. For some time he was professor of Arabic at Oxford. He then went to Louvain, where he instructed in the Oriental languages. He is the author of Historia Jacobitarum seu Coptorum in Aegypto, Libya, etc., Habitantium, published at Oxford in 1675, and translated into German by C. H. Trommler with the title Abbildung der jacobitischen oder koptischen Kirche, with a preface by J. G. Walch (Jena, 1749). Whether this translation was made from the edition published in 1675, or from Seelen's (published at Lubeck in 1733), we do not know. See Mosheim, Dissertatio ad Hist. Ecclesiast. Pertinent. ii, 226; Seelen's preface to his edition of the Historia; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v., and in the Supplement, s. v. (B. P.)

Abudād, in Persian mythology, was the bull which Ormuzd first created, and in which lay the germ of all life. Ahriman sent out two evil genii to kill the bull, which in dying prophesied the final overthrow of evil. Out of his right fore-part sprang the first man, out of his left fore-part sprang the germ of all animals, and out of the other parts of his body came various plants. The genii took two-thirds of the seed and gave it to the moon, and left one-third to the earth. Ahriman did not attain his object, and was compelled to create evil beings to fight against the beings created by Ormuzd, and thus the great battle between right and wrong was begun, which is to continue throughout all ages.

Abudiente, MOSES BEN-GIDEON, a Jewish native of Lisbon, in the early part of the 17th century, is the author of Grammatica Hebraica (Hamb. 1633), Hebrew and Portuguese:—also Fin de los Dias, which treats of the end of time, as foretold by the prophets. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 15; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 24; Lindo, History of the Jews in Spain, p. 366; Kayserling, Gesch. der Juden in Portugal, p. 300; id. Analekten, in Frankel, Monatsschrift, 1860, p. 69 sq.; and Sephardim, p. 176; Delitzsch, Zur Gesch. der jüd. Poesie, p. 7, 82, 173; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuch, No. 11; id. Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibl. Bodl. p. 1763. (B. P.)

Abu-Hanifah (or Aboanifa), surnamed Alhumam, perhaps the most famous of all the doctors of orthodox Mussulmans, was the son of Thabet, and was born at Cusa, A.D. 700. He was especially distinguished in matters of the law, and held the first place among the four chiefs of particular sects, who may be followed implicitly in their decisions upon points of right. The caliph Almanaur had him imprisoned at Bagdad for refusing to subscribe to the opinion of absolute and determined predestination, which the Mussulmans term cadha. Abu-Joseph, sovereign judge and chancellor of the empire under caliph Hadi, brought the doctrine of Abu-Hanifah into such reputation that, in order to be a good Mussulman, it was necessary to be a Hanifite. He died, nevertheless, in prison at Bagdad. His principal writings are, The Mesnad (i. e. The Support), in which he establishes all the points of Mussulmanism on the authority of the Koran and of tradition: Fikkelam, a treatise on scholastic theology:—and Moallem (i. e. Master), a catechism.

Abu-Isaac BEN-ASSAL, a learned Maronite, who flourished about the year 1240, is said to be the author of An Exposition of the Apocalypse, written in Arabic; An Exposition of the Four Gospels; An Exposition of the Gospel of St. John; An Exposition of the Lord's Prayer; An Exposition of the Nicene Creed; and Magma Osuteldin, or on the Christian faith. Nothing has as yet been published from the Arabic manuscript found in the National Library at Paris. The first of these works is often quoted by Abraham Eccheleusis, and a copy of the same is said to be in the library of the Maronite College at Rome. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v., and Supplement, s. v. (B. P.)

Abujahja is, according to the teachings of Islam, the angel of death, who separates the soul from the body.

Abulafia, ABRAHAM BEN-SAMUEL, the founder of a Cabalistic school called the school of Abulafia, was born at Saragossa in 1240, and died about 1292. For thirty years he devoted himself to the study of the Bible, the Talmud, philology, philosophy, and medicine, making himself master of the then existing philosophical writings. Finding no comfort in philosophy, he gave himself entirely to the mysteries of the Cabala in their most fantastic extremes. At Urbino, he published in 1279 a prophecy, in which he records his conversations with the Deity, calling himself Raziel and Zechariah, because their names were numerically the same as his own name (Abraham=248), and preached the doctrines of the Cabala. In 1281 he undertook to convert the pope, Martin IV, to Judaism, for which he was thrown into prison, and narrowly escaped a martyr's death by fire. Seeing that his holiness refused to embrace Judaism, Abulafia went to Sicily, accompanied by several of his disciples. In Messina he imagined that it was revealed to him that he was the Messiah, a belief which he published in 1284, together with the announcement that the restoration of Israel would take place in 1296, and so great was the faith which the people reposed in it that thousands prepared themselves for returning to Palestine. Those, however, who did not believe in him raised such a violent storm of opposition against him that he had to escape to the island of Comino, near Malta (cir. 1288), where he remained for some time, and wrote sundry Cabalistic works. Of his many works only the Seven Paths of the Law (שבע נתיבות הדרך) has as yet been published, namely, by A. Jellinek, in his Auswahl kabbalistischer Mystik (Leips. 1853), pt. i, p. 13, etc. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 16; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 25; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 208-213; Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. u. s. Sekten, iii, 75; Ginsburg, The Kabbalah, p. 114 sq.; Landauer, in the Literaturblatt d. Or. 1845, No. 24, 27; Steinschneider, Jewish Literature, p. 111, 112. (B. P.)

Abulis is the Arabian name for evil dæmons.

Abundantia (also called Ubertas) was, in Roman mythology, the deity of plenty. Her image was like that of Ceres, which appeared on Roman coins.

Abundantius of Alexandria is commemorated in the Hieronymian martyrology as a saint on Feb. 26.

Abundius. Two martyrs of this name are commemorated as saints—one as having suffered at Rome, under Decius, Aug. 23 (early Roman martyrology) or 26 (Hieronymian martyrology); the other a deacon at Spoleto, under Diocletian, Dec. 10 (old Roman martyrology).

Abundius, the fourth bishop of Como, who flourished from A.D. 450 to 469, was a native of Thessalonica. He was present at the Council of Constantinople in 450, and took an active part against the Eutychian heresy at the Council of Chalcedon, where he represented pope Leo. He was afterwards present at a Council of Milan (452) held to refute the same heresy. The authorship of the Te Deum is ascribed in some MSS. to him.

Aburza SUBURGAN, in the Kalmuck religion, is the name for the sacred shrine in which the Kalmucks place the images of their deities.

Abu-Saïd of Egypt is known as the author of an Arabic version of the Samaritan Pentateuch, which he made about 1070, on the basis of the Arabic translation of Saadiah. Like the original Samaritan, it avoids anthropomorphisms and anthropopathisms, replacing the latter by euphemisms, besides occasionally making some slight alterations, more especially in proper names. It is written in the common language of the Arabs, and abounds in Samaritanisms. An edition of this version was commenced by Kuenen at Leyden. Genesis was published in 1851, and Exodus and Leviticus in 1854. See Juynboll, Orientalia, ii, 115 sq.; Eichhorn, Einleitung zum Alten Testament, vol. ii. A description of a MS. of Abu-Saïd's in the University of Leyden was given by Van Vloten in 1803. See also Davidson, Treatise on Bibl. Criticism, i, 258 sq. (B. P.)

Abuse, in ecclesiastical law, is applied to a permutation of benefices without the consent of the bishop, which is consequently null.

Abuskhān is a mythical personage mentioned in ch. xxxi of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Abutment is the solid part of a pier or wall, etc., against which an arch abuts, or from which it immediately springs, acting as a support to the thrust or lateral pressure. The abutments of a bridge are the walls adjoining to the land which support the ends of the roadway or the arches at the extremities; also the basement projecting to resist the force of the stream and on which the piers rest.

Abutto, in Japanese mythology, is the god of health. The sick implore his help. He is ranked in the second class of great gods. He is very mighty, and is often prayed to for fair winds by sailors. They throw a few pieces of silver into the water which they wish to navigate, after having fastened the silver to a piece of wood in order to keep it afloat, as a present to this god. They believe that the money comes directly into the hands of the god, whom they worship.

Abydōnus ('Αβυδώνος) was a Greek historian who wrote a history of Assyria ('Ασσυριακά), of which some fragments are preserved by Eusebius, Cyril, Syncellus, and Moses of Chorene. His work was valuable for chronology, and a fragment found in the Armenian translation of the Chronicon of Eusebius settles some difficulties in Assyrian history. The time at which he lived is not certain; he must, however, belong to a later period than Berosus, one of his authorities, who lived about B.C. 250. The fragments of his history are collected in Scaliger's work De Emendatione Temporum, and more completely in Richter's Berosi Chaldaei Historia quæ Supersunt, etc. (Leips. 1825).

Abzendrykani was the spring of eternal youth, the object of Alexander's fruitless search. According to an old tradition, it lies in a rough, desolate region, and immortalizes him who drinks its waters. The Mohammedans have accepted this fable in their religious belief.

Acacallis, in Greek mythology, was a daughter of Minos and Pasiphæ, loved by Mercury and Apollo. By the former she became mother of Lydon, by the latter of Miletus, whom she exposed, out of fear of her father, and whom Apollo nourished and protected by wolves.

Acacesius, in Greek mythology, is a surname of Mercury, who, according to an old saying, was reared by king Acacus in Arcadia, in the city of Acacesium.

Acacestes (one who averts evil), a surname often given to Mercury.

Acacius, bishop of AMIDA, in Mesopotamia, lived about A.D. 421. Varannes V, king of Persia, having, at the instigation of the magi, commenced a persecution of the Christians, war followed between the Romans and Persians, in which the former made about 10,000 prisoners, who were left by their captors in a most miserable condition. These men found in the bishop an unlooked-for friend, who sold all the gold and silver vessels and ornaments of his Church in order to purchase their liberty, and sent them back to their country. The Persian monarch, struck by this act of Acacius, sent for him, and the interview ended in the restoration of peace between the two nations. The Roman Church celebrates his festival April 9. See Socrates, Hist. Eccles. vii, 21, Baillet, Vies des Saints, vol. 1, April 9.

Acacius (or Achates), Sr., bishop of ANTIOCH (prob. in the province of Caria), was cited, together with bishop Pison of Troy (in Phrygia) and a priest, Menander, to appear before the tribunal of Marcianus, the governor of the province, March 29, 251. Although strictly interrogated, he continued firm in the faith, whereupon the governor forwarded the articles of examination to the emperor Decius, who was so pleased with the answer of Acacius that he set him at liberty. Hence there is no reason to suppose that he suffered a violent death, or that it occurred on March 31, two days after his confession. May 7, however, is the day on which the Greeks celebrate his festival. The Acts of St. Acacius are considered authentic. See Ruinart, p. 139; Baillet, vol. 1, March 31; Butler, March 31.

Acacius, a presbyter of BERCEA who visited St. Basil about A.D. 375, taking with him a favorable report of the monastic life at Bercea. Basil wrote to him and others, condoling with them on the loss of their monastery, which had been burned by the heretics (Epist. 256). This is doubtless the same Acacius who, in conjunction with Paulus, wrote to Epiphanius urging him to compose a work on heresies; for the two are described as presbyters and archimandrites of monasteries in the regions of Chalcis and Bercea, in Coele-Syria.

Acacius, patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE, was originally administrator of the College of Orphans in that city, and was made patriarch in A.D. 471. He nobly defended the Catholic faith upon the publication of the memorable edict of the emperor Basiliscus against the Council of Chalcedon, called the Henoticon, and which had been subscribed by more than five hundred bishops, mostly Asiatic. Acacius opposed this decree with all his might, and compelled the emperor to revoke his edict and confirm the Council of Chalcedon. He also induced the prelates who had signed it to declare that they had done so only through fear and a desire to please the emperor. Acacius maintained that his see ought to have the pre-eminence over those of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem. In a council held at Rome in 483, pope Felix condemned him as an abettor of heresy, and either in that or in a council held the following year deposed him. Acacius paid but little attention to the sentence, only erasing the pope's name from the sacred diplomas (q. v.) of the Church of Constantinople. He enjoyed his bishopric quietly until his death, in 488. His extant writings are, Two Epistles to Peter Fullo, in the collections of councils:—Epistle to Pope Simplicius on the State of the Church of Alexandria. See Cave, Hist. Lit. vi, 452.

Acacius, bishop of MELITENE, in Armenia Secunda, was a firm friend of Cyril of Alexandria, and in 431 published a writing against Nestorius and in defence of the twelve anathemas of Cyril. He was, however, friendly to Nestorius, and strove, before the first session of the Council of Ephesus, to convince him of his errors. The Homily which he delivered before the council is still extant, and acquits him of the charge, brought against him by Alexander of Hierapolis in his letter to Acacius of Beroea, of maintaining that the Deity was passible. In 457 he united himself with Rabbulas, bishop of Edessa, in an endeavor to hinder the circulation of the works of Theodore of Mopsuestia and Diodorus of Tarsus. The two bishops wrote a joint letter to the bishops of Armenia warning them not to receive the books of Theodore. Acacius also addressed a letter to Cyril congratulating him on the fact of the tribute Aristolaus having received orders (A.D. 432) to enforce peace and to compel every bishop to anathematize the dogmas of Nestorius and Theodore. In this letter he states that he considers it to be an error on the part of those who deny that there are two Sons to say, nevertheless, that He had two natures after the union; and, further, that he considers the opinion that each nature possesses the operations proper to it, so that while one nature suffered the other remained impassible, to be tantamount to an opinion that there are two Sons. In the Greek Church he is reckoned among the saints, and his memory is celebrated on April 17. His extant works are, A Homily, delivered in the Synod of Ephesus, in the collections of councils:—Epistle to St. Cyril, in the Epistolæ Ephesinæ (ed. by Lupus). See Cave, Hist. Lit. V, i, 417.

Acacius, bishop of SELEUCIA and catholicus of Persia, is said to have been the first Nestorian patriarch. He is called the Assyrian, and was educated at Edessa. Thence he was summoned to Seleucia by his kinsman Babuëus, bishop of that Church, upon whose death (A.D. 485) he was raised to the vacant see. After this, he is said to have been driven by the threats or induced by the wiles of Barsumas, bishop of Nisibis, to embrace Nestorianism. If this was so, he was at least no blind partisan, as the following incident will show. Having been thrown into prison by the Magians, he was released by the Persian king and sent as ambassador to the emperor Zeno. Questioned by the Western bishops about his Nestorianism, and urged to dissociate himself from the scandalous doings of Barsumas, he replied that he knew nothing about Nestorius or Nestorianism, and determined to excommunicate Barsumas, but on his return found that prelate no longer living. He is said to have held a council at Seleucia which allowed and even encouraged the marriage of the clergy. The date of his death is differently given by different authorities; but it must have taken place before the close of the century. Acacius wrote several orations, On Fasting, On the Faith, in the latter of which "he exposed the errors of those who believe one substance in Christ."

Acadinus, in Greek legend, is a well in Sicily. Persons who had taken an oath the truth of which was doubted had to write the oath upon a board and cast it into the well; if the board sank, the oath was a false one.

Acasoth is a peculiar ceremony observed by some of the modern Jews on the continent of Europe. When a Jew has died and the coffin has been nailed down, ten chosen persons of the chief relatives and friends of the deceased turn seven times round the coffin, offering up all the while their prayers to God for his departed soul.

Acalanthia, in Greek legend, was one of the children of Pierus, king of Emathia, who engaged in a singing-match with the Muses, for which boldness the latter transformed them into various birds.

Acale. See ACACALLIS.

Acamarchia, in Greek mythology, was a nymph, daughter of the Ocean.

Acami, GIACOMO, an Italian count of the last century, was the author of several works, among them Dell' Antiquità, Autore, e Pregi del Sacramentario Veronese (Rome, 1748, 4to). It is an apologetical dissertation in three parts. Part first is designed to show that this sacramentary was composed in the first ages of the Church. The following facts are cited in proof, viz. the extracts from Holy Scripture contained in it are taken from the Old Italic version, and not the Vulgate; that at the time when it was composed it was the custom to make use at the sacrifice of the mass of the bread and wine offered by the fideles; that the subdiaconate was not one of the holy orders; and that the feast of the accession of Peter to the episcopal chair of Rome was still celebrated April 25. In part second he endeavors to prove that St. Leo was the compiler of the sacramentary. In part third he infers from certain prayers used in the book a belief in the dogmas attacked by the heretics of the 14th, 15th, and 16th centuries. A reply to this work by an Anabaptist in London elicited from the count a rejoinder, Jacobi, Comitiss Acami, de Padobaptismo, etc., sive de Perpetuo Ecclesiæ Ritu ac Dogmate Baptisandorum, etc. (Rome, 1755).

Acanthis, in Greek legend, was a daughter of Autonous and Hippodamia. With her parents and three brothers she was transformed into a bird because of her deep sorrow at the death of her fourth brother.

Acantho, the mother of the fourth sun in pagan theology, which admitted five different suns.

Acanthus (Lat. from ἀκανθός, a thorn), a plant the leaves of which are imitated in the capitals of the Corinthian and Composite orders.

Acanthus.

Acarnan, in Greek mythology, was a son of Alcæon and Callirhoe, a youth whom the gods suddenly changed into a man in order that he might avenge the murder of his father. After this, he journeyed with his brother Amphoterus and his mother to Epirus, which afterwards received the name of Acarnania.

Acash, in Hindû mythology, is the name given to the substance called ether, which fills all space and forms other substances, such as air, fire, water, and earth. According to this theory, the bones of man are earth, his flesh and blood are water, his animal heat is fire, his breath and his soul or the sphere he occupies is the acash, or ether.

Acaste, in Greek mythology, was a daughter of Oceanus and of Tethys, one of the Oceanides.

Acathistus (ἀκάθιστος, not-seated), a hymn of the Greek Church sung on the eve of the fifth Sunday in Lent in honor of the Blessed Virgin; so called because during the singing of it the whole congregation stood, while during the singing of other hymns of the same kind they occasionally sat. Its origin has been assigned more especially to the deliverance of Constantinople from Chosroes, king of the Persians, in the reign of the emperor Heraclius, A. D. 626.

Acatius. See ACACIUS.

Acca. See ACCHO.

Acca (or Accar), the fifth bishop of Hexham (A.D. 709-732), was a native of Northumbria, had his education under Bosa, bishop of York, and was taken under the patronage of Wilfrid, whom he accompanied to Rome in 704. Succeeding Wilfrid in the see of Hexham, he devoted himself to the completion of that prelate's designs respecting the cathedral, and to the maintenance of the religious education and art of the North on the Roman model. His skill in ecclesiastical music and architecture is mentioned by Bede with especial praise. His greatest work was the library of Hexham, which he furnished with a great number of Lives of the Saints and other ecclesiastical books. In 732 Acca was driven from his see (according to Bede, 731; Simeon of Durham, 732) for reasons unknown. He died Oct. 20, 740, and was buried outside of the east end of the church at Hexham. His relics were translated in the 11th century, and again in 1154. He was commemorated in the calendar on Feb. 19. Bale and Pits mention several of his writings: De Vitis et Passonibus Sanctorum quorum Reliquie in Ecclesia sua Recondebantur; — De Ecclesiasticis sui Chori Officiis; — Curmina Varia; — Epistolæ ad Diversos. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 619; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Acca LARENTIA (OF LAURENTIA), in Roman legend, was the wife of the shepherd Faustulus, who is mentioned in the mythical story of Romulus and Remus, whose first nurse she was, and to whose remembrance Romulus instituted the Larentalia, a feast of mourning. It is related of her, or one of like name, that when she was in the Temple of Hercules he advised her to give her hand in marriage to the first man who met her on going out of the temple. This was a certain Carutius or Farutius, a man of immense wealth, whom she married, and who left her all his riches, which she bequeathed to the Roman people, and for this she was deified.

Accalu (the Devourer) was one of the dogs of Marduk, which was deified by the Assyrians.

Accaphōri. A sect of heretics which used water instead of wine for the eucharist had this name given to it by Timotheus Presbyter, who traces the sect's origin to the followers of Tatian, or the Encratites (q. v.). But he adds that the Accaphori were called Hydroparastutæ (q. v.), and hence the name is supposed to be merely a misreading for Sacrophori (q. v.).

Accarisi (or Accarisio), GIACOMO, S. T. P., professor of rhetoric at Mantua, was a native of Bologna, Italy. He became professor in 1627, and died bishop of Vesta in 1654. When lecturing in Rome in 1636 on Aristotle's book on the heavens he maintained that the sun moved round the earth, and published his opinion (1637, 4to). Among his many works yet remaining in MS. are, De Natalibus Virgilii; — Historia Rerum Gestarum a Sacra Congregatione de Fide Propaganda, etc. (1630-31); — Epistolæ Lutinæ; — also a published volume of Sermons.

Accendite (light ye), a liturgical term signifying the ceremony observed in many churches in lighting the candles on solemn festivals. The Accendite is usually sung by the deacon, acolytes, or singers; but at Angers by a musical choir in these words, "Accendite faces lampadarum; eia; psallite, fratres, hora est; can-tate Deo; eia, eia, eia." See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Accentuation, a term used in ecclesiastical music to indicate the pitch and modulation of the voice. The accentuation is either (1) simple, (2) moderate, or (3) strong. Some writers use other terms, but the division in most of them is threefold.

Accentus Ecclesiasticus (called also mode of reading chorally) is the result of successive attempts to insure in public worship uniformity of delivery consistent with uniformity of matter delivered, so as to hide individual peculiarities. It presents a sort of mean between speech and song, continually inclining towards the latter, never altogether leaving its hold on the former. It is speech, though always attuned speech, in passages of average interest and importance; it is song, though always distinct and articulate song, in passages demanding more fervid utterance. Though actually musical only in concluding or culminating phrases, the accentus ecclesiasticus always admits of being expressed in musical characters. Accentus is probably the oldest, and certainly the simplest, form of cantus ecclesiasticus, and probably grew out of the limited capacity of the so-called "natural," or speaking, voice.

Accentus ecclesiasticus must have been for many ages perpetuated by tradition only. That the rules of its application have been reduced to writing only in comparatively modern times does not invalidate its claim to a high antiquity, for it is only when traditions are dying out that they begin to be put on record. Lucas Lossius (A.D. 1590) gave six forms of cadence or close, i. e. modes of bringing to an end a phrase, the earlier portion of which had been recited in monotone. The accent is (1) immutabilis, when a phrase is concluded without any change of pitch; (2) medius, when the voice, on the last syllable, falls from the reciting (or dominant) note a third; (3) gravis, when on the last syllable it falls a fifth; (4) acutus, when the dominant note, after the interposition of a few notes at a lower pitch, is resumed; (5) moderatus, when the monotone is interrupted by an ascent, on the penultimate, of a second; (6) interrogativus, when the voice, after a slight descent, rises scalewise on the last syllable; (7) finalis, when the voice, after rising a second above the dominant, falls scalewise to the fourth below it, on which the last syllable is sounded. The choice of these accents or cadences is regulated by the punctuation of the passage recited; each particular stop having its particular cadence or cadences. Thus the comma was indicated and accompanied by (1), (4), and (5); the colon by (2); and the full stop by (3).

To the accentus belong the following portions of offices of the Latin Church: (1) Intoning of the collects or prayers; (2) of the epistles and gospels; (3) of solemn and dolorous lessons; (4) various forms of intonation, benediction, and absolution used in the liturgy; (5) single verses; (6) the exclamations and admonitions of the assistants at the altar; (7) the prefaces; the Pater Noster, with its prefaces; the benediction Pax Domini sit semper vobiscum.

Acceptus was a bishop in Frinault towards the close of the 4th century. He disclosed some of his own misdeeds in order to prevent his being made bishop, on account of which the Council of Valence, in 374, established a canon that thereafter those who disclosed their own misdemeanors should suffer suitable punishment.

Access, the name given to the prayer, in the Communion office, beginning with the words "We do not presume to come to this thy table."

Accessus, a term in canon law, signifying the right which a clerk might have at some future time in a benefice. The pope occasionally gave the right of accessus to a grantee affected by some temporary personal incapacity, such as defect in age. In such a case the pope commits the benefice to a third party to hold until the person, cum jure accessus, arrived at the proper age. The accessus was abolished by the Council of Trent.

Accetti, GERONIMO, was a Dominican of the Convent of Brescia, in Italy, assistant commissioner of the Inquisition at Rome, and afterwards inquisitor-general of Cremona. He was appointed bishop of Fondi, but died in 1670, before he was consecrated. He left a work entitled Tractatus de Theologia Symbolica, Scholastica, et Mystica.

Accetto, REGINALDO, of Sicily, was a Dominican of the Convent of St. Peter the Martyr at Naples. He died in 1590, leaving several works in Italian, among which are, Trattato dell' Anno Santo: — Trattato del Celibato: — Trattato delle Ricchezze Spirituali della Chiesa: — Salutationes ad Sanctiss. Nomen Dei Dicenda a Confratribus Soc. ejus. (Naples, 1561).

Acccho (now Acre). The latest description of this formerly memorable place is given by Lieut. Conder (Tent Work in Palestine, i, 188 sq.), from which we extract the following particulars: "Acre is a walled town with a single gate on the south-east. Its trade is now much reduced, and the bazaars are deserted; the richest inhabitant is not worth £1000. . . . The appearance of the town outside is picturesque; with brown walls, a tower on the rock in the sea (called El-Manâra), yellow stone houses, with two higher buildings, roofed with red tiles and green shutters; above all, the huge white mosque of Jezzar Pasha, a square building, with a dome and a graceful minaret, surrounded by palms, and with chambers for the students, covered by rows of little round domes; behind this, the modern fortress, on the site of the old crusading castle."

Acciaioli, a name common to three cardinals, viz.:

1. ANGELOS, born in 1340 at Florence, and died at Pisa in 1407. He was known for his learning, experience, and integrity. In 1383 he was made archbishop of Florence, and in 1385 cardinal by pope Urban VI. He resisted all endeavors to bring him on the side of the antipope Clement VII, and defended in words and deeds the regularity of the election of pope Urban VI. After the death of this pope, half of the votes were given in the conclave in favor of Acciaioli; but, to end the schism, he directed the election towards Boniface IX. The new pope made him cardinal-bishop of Ostia, and sent him to Germany, Slavonia, and Bulgaria to settle pending difficulties. He afterwards became governor of Naples and guardian of the young king Ladislaus, whom he brought to Naples, and accompanied, some time after, on his march to Hungary; reconciled, after his return, the pope with Orsini; and reformed the Monastery of St. Paul, at Rome. He died on his way to Pisa, and was buried at Florence. See EGGS, Purp. Doctu, ii, 88.

2. NICCOLO, born at Florence, and died at Rome, Feb. 23, 1719, as cardinal-bishop of Ostia.

3. FILIPPO, who belonged to the same family, was born at Rome, March 12, 1700. He was nuncio at Portugal, but, on account of his interference in behalf of the Jesuits, he was sent away by Pombal with military force. Clement XIII made him cardinal in 1759, and he died at Ancona, July 4, 1766. See WETZER u. WELTE, Kirchen-Lex. s. v. (B. P.)

Acciaioli (Acciaiuoli, or Acciajoli), ZENOBUS, a Dominican, was born at Florence, Italy, in 1461. Banished in his infancy by his relations, he was recalled when about sixteen years of age by Lorenzo the Magnificent, and educated, by his direction, with Lorenzo, the son of Pier-Francesco de' Medici. He became eminent as a Greek and Latin scholar, and was intimate with many of the Florentine litterati; but after the death of Lorenzo the Magnificent he became disgusted with the commotions in his native place, and, devoting himself to monastic life, he received from Savonarola, about 1494, the habit of a Dominican. On the elevation of Leo X he went to Rome, and was enrolled among his constant attendants. In 1518 Leo appointed him librarian of the Vatican, but, laboring too assiduously, he hastened his death, which occurred at Rome, July 27, 1519. He formed an Index of the ancient public documents in the Vatican (pub-ished by Montfaucon in his Bibl. Bibliothecarum MSS. i, 202). He is supposed to have been the translator of the greater part of the works of Justin Martyr and other fathers. We have also some Poems, Sermons, and A Chronicle of the Convent of St. Mark at Florence.

Accipacio, NICCOLÒ, an Italian prelate, was born at Sorrento in the latter part of the 14th century. Having acquired the distinction of doctor, he was made bishop of Tropea, afterwards archbishop of Sorrento, and finally of Capua. After having been employed in various achievements by the Roman see, Eugenius IV, in 1439, gave him the cardinal's hat. In the confusion of the Neapolitan kingdom, he sided first with the House of Anjou, but afterwards with the party of king Alfonso. He died in 1447.

Acclamation is a term applied (1) to certain short inscriptions expressed in the second person, and containing a wish or injunction, as Vivas in Deo. By far the greater part are sepulchral, but similar sentences are also seen on amulets (q. v.), on the bottom of cups, and on gems. (2.) To the responsive cry or chant of the congregation in antiphonal singing. See ANTIPHON.

Accolti, Benedetto (1), an eminent Italian lawyer and historian, was born at Arezzo in 1415. After studying civil law, he was made professor at Florence. The Florentines conferred on him the rights of citizenship, and chose him, in 1459, to be secretary of the republic, which office he retained until his death, in 1466. He wrote, De Bello a Christianis contra Barbaros Gesto, pro Christi Sepulchro et Judæa Recuperandis (Venice, 1582, 4to; reprinted at Basle, Venice, Paris, and Florence, the latter edition with Notes by Th. Dempster [1623, 4to], and at Groningen, by Henry Hoffmiller [1731, 8vo]); — and De Præstantia Vivorum sui Ævi (Parma, 1689 or 1692), to prove that the moderns are not inferior to the ancients.

Accolti, Benedetto (2), a Florentine prelate, called from his knowledge of Latin “the Cicero of his time,” was raised by the interest of his uncle, cardinal Peter Accolti, to the see of Cadiz. After the death of the cardinal he succeeded to the archbishopric of Ravenna, and in 1527 was created cardinal by Clement VII. He died at Florence in 1549. Besides other works, he wrote, at the instigation of Clement VII, a Treatise on the Papal Rights over the Kingdom of Naples.

Accolti, Francesco (also called Aretinus, from his native place, Arezzo), an Italian philologist, was born in 1418. He was a famous jurist, and, like many savants of that time, he led an unsteady life. He lectured at Bologna, Ferrara, Sienna, and from 1461 to 1466 he occupied a position under Francis Sforza of Milan. When pope Sixtus IV was elevated to the see of St. Peter, Accolti went to Rome with the hope of being made cardinal. His hopes not being realized, he opposed the pope. The last years of his life he lived at Pisa, where he died, between November, 1485, and March 1486. He was regarded as the princeps jurisconsultorum of his time, and was well versed in philosophy, music, poetry, and theology. Of his works there were published, Commentarius Super Lib. II Decretalium (Bononie, 1481); — Supra Titulum de Signific. Verborum (Ticin. 1493); — Consilia et Responsa (Gissæ, 1481; Lugd. 1582). See Savigny, Geschichte des römischen Rechts im Mittelalter, 1831, vol. vi; Saveri, Memoria intorno al Giureconsulto Franc. Accolti Aretino (Pisa, 1835); Becker, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lex. s. v. (B. P.)

Accra Version. This language is spoken by a trading people on the Gold Coast of Africa. The Rev. A. Hanson, a native of Accra, translated the gospels of St. Matthew and St. John into this language, which were printed in 1843 at London, by the British and Foreign Bible Society, in Roman letters. A revised edition of these gospels, together with the gospels of St. Mark and St. Luke, as prepared by the Rev. J. Zimmermann, of the Basle Missionary Society, were completed in 1855, and in 1860 the whole of the New Test. was printed. The Old Test. was completed in 1865. This entire work was done by the Rev. Mr. Zimmermann. The translator, being aware that a first translation made by a foreigner must be very defective, and can only be tentative in its nature, has ever since devoted his time to a revision of his work. The New Test. he completed in 1870, and with the Old Test. he had proceeded as far as 1 Kings x when death called him away, in 1876. The remaining part was left to the Rev. G. Christaller, also of the Basle Missionary Society, who completed the work. Mr. Zimmermann has also published a grammar of the Gâ language, viz. A Grammatical Sketch of the Akra or Gâ Language, with an Appendix on the Adanne Dialect (Stuttg. 1856). (B. P.)

Accused. By the ancient canons, a priest charged with any crime was interdicted the exercise of his sacerdotal functions (Can. xi, xiii, causa. 2, qu. 5). By the law of the decretals, those who were accused of any crime could not, before their absolution, accuse another, give evidence in a court of law, nor be promoted to any order (De Testib. et Attest. c. lvi). The chapter Omnipotens de Accus. decides, in like manner, that no one accused of a crime ought to be elevated to any honor or dignity.

Accusers, FALSE, were punished ecclesiastically in the early Christian Church as follows: (1.) In Spain, the Council of Elvira (A.D. 305 or 306) refused communion even at the hour of death to any person who should falsely accuse any bishop, priest, or deacon. (2.) In France, by the first Council of Arles (314), those who falsely accused their brethren were excommunicated for life. This was re-enacted at the second council (443), but permission was given for the restoration of those who should do penance and give satisfaction commensurate with their offence.

Acadah, a name given by the idolatrous Arabs to a species of arrows without iron and feathers, which were used for purposes of divination. “The ancient idolatrous Arabs used a sort of lots, which were called lots by arrows. They were three in number. Upon one of them was written ‘Command me, Lord;’ upon the second, ‘Forbid or prevent, Lord;’ while the third was blank. When any one wished to determine on a course of action, he went with a present to the diviner (the chief priest of the temple), who drew one of his arrows from his bag, and if the arrow of command appeared, he immediately set about the affair; if that of prohibition appeared, he deferred the execution of his enterprise for a whole year; but if the blank arrow came out, he was to draw again. The Arabs consulted these arrows in all their affairs, particularly their warlike expeditions.”

Acembes, of Carystus, in Eubœa, is named by Hippolytus (Hæc. iv, 2; v, 13; x, 10), with Euphrates the “Peratic,” as a chief of the Ophite sect called Peratæ. Probably the true form of the name may be Acelmes.

Acapsimus was a bishop and martyr in Persia, under Sapor. He is commemorated as a saint by the Greek calendar on Nov. 3, in the Armenian on Nov. 5, and in the Roman on April 22. See Fox, Book of Martyrs, i, 283.

Acerbi, EMILIO, an Italian philosopher and theologian, was born at Bergamo in 1562. He was a member of the Brotherhood of Vallombrosa, and controlled a number of priories and abbeys. He died in 1625. He wrote, Logicarum Questionum Libri IV (Venetiis, 1596); — Peripateticarum Questionum Libri V (ibid. 1598, 1602):—De Vita D. Joan. Gualberti Panegyricus, in Latin verse (Florentiae, 1599). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Génér., s. v.

Acerra (or Acerna), in Roman antiquity, was a little box or pot in which were put the incense and perfumes to be burned on the altars of the gods and before the dead. It appears to have been the same with what was otherwise called thuribulum and pyxis. The censers of the Jews were acerræ, and the Romanists still retain the use of acerræ under the name of incense-pots.

The name acerra was also applied to an altar erected, among the Romans, near the bed of a person recently deceased, on which his friends offered incense daily until his burial. The real intention probably was to fumigate the apartment. The Chinese have still a somewhat similar custom.

Acersecōmes, a name given to Apollo by the Greeks, equivalent to the intonsus, or uncut, of the Romans, and applied to the hair of that god.

Acesamēnus (poet. Acessamēnus), in Greek mythology, was the father of Peribœa, who was the loved one of Arius, god of a Macedonian river, by whom she became mother of Pelagon. A son of the latter, Asteropæus, led the tribes of Pæonia to Priam.

Acesius, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Apollo, by which the people of Elis worshipped him as the healer of disease.

Acestes, in Roman mythology, was the son of the Sicilian god of the river Crimissus, who, being transformed into a dog, begot this his first son by Segesta. As Segesta was the daughter of a Trojan, Hippotas, the Trojans who came with Æneas to Sicily were received with great hospitality.

Acestor (the Savior), in Greek mythology, was (1) a surname of Apollo. (2.) Son of the Grecian king Exhippus of Tanagra, who was slain by Achilles.

Acestorides was a class of females in Argos from whom the maiden priestesses of Minerva were chosen.

Achæa, in Greek and Roman mythology, was a name given to Ceres by the Boeotians, because of her complaints and despondency after the loss by death of her daughter Proserpina. Under the same name Minerva had a temple in Apulia.

Achaia, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Achaicum). Two synods of Achaia, in Greece, are recorded: one in A.D. 250, against the Valerians; the other, in A.D. 359, against the Aetians.

Achairius (or Aicharius), St., was brought up in the monastery of Luxeuil, in Burgundy, about the middle of the 7th century. His reputation for holiness caused him to be chosen to succeed Euraldis, bishop of Noyon and Tournai, which sees had been permanently united since A.D. 582. Achairius died Nov. 27, 639, and was buried in the Church of St. Peter and Paul at Noyon, where his festival is celebrated. He is not found in the martyrologies of the 9th century, nor in the modern Roman. See Baillet, Vies des Saints, vol. iii, Nov. 27.

Achard (or Aigard), usually surnamed of St. Victor, also of St. Clairvaux, bishop of Avranches, in Normandy, flourished in the 12th century. By some he is supposed to have been born at Bridlington, England, while others say that he was of Normandy. He was a regular canon of St. Augustine, and second abbot of St. Victor-les-Prés; and was raised to the bishopric of Avranches in 1162. Achard was a great favorite with Henry II of England, who made him godfather to Eleanor, his daughter. His death occurred March 29, 1172 (or March 27, 1171); he was buried in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Abbey of Lucerne. His works are, De Tentatione Christi (a MS. in the Library of St. Victor at Paris):—De Divisione Animæ et Spiritus (in the same library); both these works are, according to Hook (Eccles. Biog.), also in the Library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge:—Sermons (preserved at Clairvaux):—and Life of St. Geselin (Douay, 1626, 12mo). Cave (Hist. Lit.), Ducaze, and Dupin attribute these works to Achardus, a Cistercian monk.

Achard, ANTOINE, a Swiss Protestant divine, was born at Geneva in 1696, took orders in 1722, and in 1724 was promoted to the church of Werder, in Berlin. He enjoyed the protection of the prince royal of Prussia, and, being in Geneva in 1730, was admitted into the society of pastors. Eight years after, the king of Prussia appointed him counsellor of the supreme consistory, and in 1740 a member of the French directory, with the title of privy-councillor. He was received into the Academy of Berlin in 1743, and was also appointed inspector of the French college, and director of the Charity-house. He died in 1772. His powers of oratory were very great, although he was of a very feeble constitution, subsisting for twenty years entirely on milk diet. In the Memoirs of the Academy of Berlin for 1745, there is an outline of a very considerable work, in which he proves the liberty of the human mind against Spinoza, Bayle, and Collins. Two volumes of Sermons sur Divers Textes de l'Écriture Sainte were published at Berlin after his death.

Achards, ÉLÉAZAR FRANCIS DE LA BAUME DE, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Avignon, Jan. 29, 1679. Entering into orders, he distinguished himself by his zeal in behalf of the poor, particularly during the plague at Marseilles in 1721. Pope Clement III appointed him apostolic vicar, with the title of bishop of Halicarnassus, to settle the disputes among the missionaries of China. His labors were unsuccessful, and he died at Cochín, April 2, 1741. The abbé Fabre, his secretary, published an account of his mission, and a funeral sermon by a Chinese priest (1746, 4to). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v.

Achart (or Aicard), St., was sprung from a noble family in Poitou about 624. Placed, in his youth, in the Abbey of St. Hilary of Poitiers, he embraced the monastic life in the Abbey of St. Tottin in Poitou. The reputation of St. Filbert, abbot of Jumièges, who had just founded the monastery of Quincay, induced him to leave St. Tottin, and place himself under his discipline at Quincay, which abbey he endowed with certain lands his parents had given him. After a time he was made abbot of Quincay, and eventually of Jumièges, where he died, in 687. He is commemorated Sept. 15, which is thought to be the day of his death; and his relics are preserved in the Abbey of St. Vast at Arras. See Baillet, Vies des Saints, vol. iii, Sept. 15; Butler, Sept. 15.

Achâtes, in Roman legend, was a hero who accompanied Æneas as a true friend on all his voyages. His name has become proverbial for true friendship.

Achates, St. See ACACIUS.

Achatius. See ACACIUS.

Achatius, St. (surnamed Agathangelos), bishop of Melitene, in Armenia, exhorted the people of his diocese to keep steadfast to their faith during the persecution under Decius. Being brought before the consul Martian (March 29, 250 or 251), he expounded to him with as much wisdom as power the vanity of idolatry, and the purity of the Christian religion. Martian sent the acts to the emperor for further decision. Decius admired the orations of the confessor and set him free. In the Eastern Church, his anniversary is commemorated on March 31. (B. P.)

Achea, St., of Killglaish, near Ardagh, Ireland, was the daughter of St. Darerca, sister of St. Patrick, in the 5th century. She is commemorated Aug. 5. Her name is also written Echea and Echi. See O'Clery, Martyrol. Dungall. (ed. Todd and Reeves); Colgan, Acta SS. Hiberniæ, p. 718.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Achechu, one of the mystical deities of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Acheiropoiētus (ἀχειροποίητος, not made by hand). So the image of our Lord is styled, which is shown in the Church of St. John of Lateran, Rome, and which, according to tradition, is said to have been roughly cut out by St. Luke, and finished by angels.

Acheirotônētus (ἀχειροτόνητος), a term applied by St. Basil to the inferior ministry, because they were ordained without the imposition of hands.—Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. iii, ch. i, § 6.

Achelōides, in Greek mythology, were the Sirens, as daughters of Achelous, the river-god.

Achelōus, in Greek mythology, was the son of Oceanus and Terra. He wrestled with Hercules in contest for Deianira, daughter of king Ceneus, who was betrothed to both. He first turned himself into a serpent, then into a bull, when Hercules plucked off one of his horns and forced him to submit. Achelous purchased his horn by giving in exchange the horn of Amalthea, daughter of Harmodius, which became the cornucopia, or horn of plenty, and which Hercules filled with a variety of fruits and consecrated to Jupiter. This fable is thus explained: Achelous is a river in Greece, whose course winds like a serpent, and its stream roars like the bellowing of a bull. This river divided itself into two channels, but Hercules, by confining the water of one, broke off one of the horns; the circumjacent lands, thus being drained, became fertile, so that Hercules is said to have received the horn of plenty.

Achem, an Egyptian deity worshipped in Sept-hor.

Achemon (or Achmon), son of Senonis, an enchantress in Greek mythology.

Achen (or Ach), JOHANN VAN, an eminent historical and portrait painter, was born at Cologne in 1552. He studied six years with Jerrigh, a reputable portrait-painter of Cologne. He next applied himself to study the works of Bartholomew Spranger. When twenty-two years old he went to Italy, and first stopped at Venice, where he stayed long enough to get a thorough knowledge of the great works of art in that famous school. He then went to Rome, where his first performance was an altar-piece of the Nativity, for one of the chapels of the Jesuits. Here he introduced other fine portraits. From Rome he went to Florence, where he painted the portrait of the famous poetess Madonna Laura. He was invited by the elector of Bavaria to Munich, where he executed his most excellent work, The Resurrection, also The Finding of the True Cross. He painted the portraits of the electoral family with so much satisfaction that his employer presented him with a gold chain and medal, in token of his esteem. By the invitation of the emperor Rodolph, he went to Prague, where he executed several compositions, particularly a picture of Venus and Adonis, designed with a taste then unknown in Germany. He captivated Germany by the introduction of a new style, compounded of the principles of the Venetian and Florentine schools. He was one of the first German artists who attempted to reform the stiff and Gothic taste of his country. He died at Prague in 1615.

Acheri (Enemy), the name of a mystical animal which was symbolical of evil in the Egyptian mythology.

Acheri. See ACHERY.

Achēron, in Greek mythology, was (1) a son of the Sun and the Earth; he furnished water for the Titans when they fought against Jupiter, and was therefore converted into a river whose water was impure, and afterwards condemned to Hades. Others make him the son of Ceres, born in Crete; and that because he could not endure daylight, he entered Hades of his own accord. The souls of the dead were ferried across this river by Charon. Proverbially, dying is called crossing the Acheron, as the souls who cross this river have no hope of ever returning. (2.) A river in Thesprotia, a country in Epirus, which flows through the Acherusia swamp, whose water is bitter, and from which arise poisonous odors. (3.) A river in the country of the Bruttians in Lower Italy. Here Alexander, king of Epirus, became the victim of an oracle which he misunderstood. He was told to beware of this river, but thinking the oracle meant the river in Epirus, he went to Italy and was killed at the hands of a Lucanian on the banks of the Acheron. (4.) A river near Elis, in Peloponnesia, which combines with the Alpheus.

Acherusia, in Greek mythology, is (1) the name of the sea, which is the source of the Acheron river in Epirus. (2.) A sea near Cumæ, in Italy. (3.) A cave in the vicinity of the city of Heraclea in Bithynia, by which Hercules is said to have entered the lower regions. (4.) A sea near Memphis across which the Egyptians ferried their dead, either to bury them on the other shore or to cast them into the water.

Achigian, ANDREW, an Asiatic Monophysite sectary who induced a party of his sect to forsake their religion for a time and unite themselves with the Romanists. He had been educated at Rome, and was appointed patriarch of Antioch by the Roman pontiff. He assumed the title of Ignatius XXIV. See Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iv, cent. xvii, pt. i, ch. ii, § 2.

Achillas (or Achilleas) (1), patriarch of Alexandria (A.D. 311-312), was ordained presbyter during the episcopate of Thomas (A.D. 283-301), and placed over the catechetical school. On the martyrdom of Peter I, he was raised to the patriarchal throne, but died apparently in about a year. The only act recorded of his episcopate is the restoration of Arius to the diaconate, and his promotion to the priesthood (Sozomen, i, 15). This act is supposed to have been dictated by excess of zeal against the Meletians, who had malignantly attacked him. His festival is set down in the Roman martyrology on November 4.

Achillas (2), one of the Alexandrian clergy, a friend and partisan of Arius, with whom he was excommunicated, about 319. Contemporaries speak of him as a prime mover of Arianism. Jerome (Adv. Lucif. XX, ii, 193) calls him a "lector;" while others speak of him as deacon and presbyter.

Achilleas. See ACHILLAS.

Achilleus, the eunuch and martyr at Rome A.D. 96, is commemorated as a saint in the Roman calendar on May 12.

Achinaon is the god of winds among the Caribbeans.

Achlys, in Greek mythology, is the name of the night which preceded the chaotic state of the world, and out of which the deities sprang. The ancients had other ideas connected with this word—hunger, want, tears, etc.

Acholius, bishop of Thessalonica (Ambrose, Epist. xv, 12), baptized Theodosius, A.D. 380, before his Gothic war, and died in 383. Ambrose (ibid.) wrote an epistle to the Church at Thessalonica in which he compares his life and gifts with those of Elisha. Acholius was present at the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 381.

Acholōe, in Greek mythology, was one of the Harpies, who were driven from the feast of king Phineus by the sons of Boreas, when these travelled with the Argonauts to Pontus.

Achor, in Greek mythology, was a god of flies. According to Pliny, the inhabitants of Cyrene worshipped him by prayers and sacrifices, in order to be delivered from the plague of flies, which not only tormented men, but also occasioned infectious diseases.

Achshaph. Tristram identifies this town with the modern Khatfa, at the mouth of the Kisbon, north of Carmel (Bible Places, p. 215); but with little probability, as Khaifa, seems to be the חֵיפָה, chôph (cove), or "haven" of Asher and Zebulon (Gen. xlix, 13; "sea-side," Deut. i, 7; "shore," Judg. v, 17; Jer. xlvii, 7; "coast," Josh. ix, 1; Ezek. xxv, 16).

Achuf, one of the mystical deities in the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Achtiariel, one of the three ministering angels, alleged by the Rabbinical traditions to be engaged in heaven in weaving or making garlands out of the prayers of the Israelites in the Hebrew tongue. The other two are Matatron and Sandalphon.

Achterfeld, Jodocus, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Wesel in 1827. In 1850 he received holy orders; lectured for some time at Münster; and died at Anholt, Aug. 19, 1874, where he had labored since 1863. (B. P.)

Achugulap, in the mythology of the Mongolians, was the first period of the earth's creation, in which all people were good and virtuous, and lived to be eighty thousand years old. Thousands of these saints were carried to heaven alive. But when the fall of man took place, this holiness departed, and the length of a human life did not exceed twenty thousand years. Because they had eaten the food of the gods, men lost their holy state. This food began to diminish now, and men were obliged to eat the fruits of the field. From that time all virtues began to disappear, vice reigned, and the length of life fell to one hundred years; and the length of life will continue falling as low as ten years.

Achynayarax is the supreme being worshipped by the first inhabitants of Teneriffe. Only when great droughts threatened the country, sacrifices and prayers were offered. The sacrifices consisted of lambs and young goats.

Achzib of Judah (Josh. xv, 44) is regarded by Tristram as the present Ain Kezbeh, near Beit-Nettif (Bible Places, p. 43), not meaning, as proposed by Keil (Comment. ad loc.), the "place of springs called Kussâbeh with ruins in the neighborhood" (Robinson, Bibl. Res. ii, 48), which may, perhaps, be included in the group of towns in which Achzib is mentioned (Nezib, Keilah, Mareshah, etc.), although very much south of them; but the spot marked on the Ordnance Map as Ain Kezbeh at the fork of the road five eighths of a mile south-east of Beit-Nettif, which, however, is too far north, being in a different group (Jarmuth, Socoh, etc.). See JUDAH, TRIBE OF.

Acidalia, in Greek mythology, is a spring near Orchomenus, in Boeotia, so inviting that Venus bathed in it, and hence was surnamed Acidalia.

Acindynus, a Christian martyr, who, with his companions in persecution (A.D. 346), is commemorated Nov. 2 in the Byzantine calendar.

Acindynus, Gregory, a Greek monk who flourished at Constantinople in the 14th century, was united with Barlaam in his hostility against Gregory Palamas and the Hesychastæ, or Quietists. Palamas believed that the light which encircled Christ during his transfiguration was uncreated, essential to, and coeternal with, the Godhead. Acindynus and Barlaam maintained that the light could not emanate from the Godhead, and that no mortal eye could by any possibility see the Divinity. A synod of Constantinople in 1337 rebuked both parties, and ordered them to be quiet. But in his retirement in Greece Acindynus advocated his view, and it was supported by patriarch John XIV, who even convened a council in 1347, in which the opinion of Palamas was condemned. Among the works of Acindynus there are a treatise, De Essentia et Operatione Dei (Ingolst. 1616, 4to):—an Iambic Poem (Allatius [Leo], Græc. Ortod. i, 756-770), concerning the views of Palamas:—and fragments of two other treatises, also against Palamas. See Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii, App. p. 39; Dupin, Bibl. des Aut. Ecclési. 14ème Siècle, c. 6; Landon, Ecclési. Dict. s. v.

Acis, in Greek mythology, was (1) the son of Faunus and of Symæthis. Galathea, the fairest of the nymphs, was his beloved. She was also loved by the giant Polyphemus, and he followed her wherever she went. One day Polyphemus espied the pair sitting in the shade of a large tree. Full of anger and jealousy, he threw a large stone upon the two lovers. The beautiful young goddess made a hair-breadth escape; but Acis was crushed by the huge rock. He was afterwards converted into a river springing out from under this rock. (2.) A river-god, the tutelary deity of the town of Acium, in Sicily.

Aciscles, a Christian martyr of Cordova, Spain, who suffered death during the Diocletian persecution. The ancient martyrologies, and that of St. Jerome, mark his festival on November 18: Ado and Usuardus on the 17th.

Acisterium, one of the numerous appellations of monasteries. The Latin word is aceterium (q. v.). The following forms are probably corruptions of the same word: archisterium, archilerium, arcisterium, architrium, assisterium, acistarium, aceterium, and asceterium.

Acker, JOHANN HEINRICH, a Protestant writer of Germany, was born at Naumburg, Aug. 12, 1647. He was prepared at Naumburg and Schulpforta for the University of Jena, which he entered in 1669. In 1678 he was appointed adjunctus and pastor in Hausen, near Gotha; and advanced in 1689 as superintendent and court-preacher in Blankenhain. In 1717 he retired from his office on account of bodily infirmities, and went to Gotha, where he died Sept. 21, 1719. His main work is Historia Reformationis Ecclesiastica Tempore Primitiva Ecclesiæ (Jena, 1685, 1715). (B. P.)

Ackeret, JOHN, a German Reformed minister, was born Feb. 22, 1824, in the canton of Thurgau, Switzerland. He was licensed to preach by the Columbiana Classis, Synod of Ohio, in 1849, and began the work of the ministry the following year at Mt. Eaton, Ohio. He was an active and efficient worker in the German Reformed Church of America up to the time of his death, Sept. 13, 1869. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 404.

Ackermann, GEORG CHRISTIAN BENEDICT, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born March 3, 1763, and died Oct. 5, 1877, as general superintendent at Meiningen. He was an excellent pulpit orator and a very learned theologian. He wrote, Das Christliche in Plato und in der platonischen Philosophie (Hamburg, 1835; Engl. transl. by S. A. Asbury, The Christian Element in Plato and Platonic Philosophy Unfolded and Set Forth, Edinburgh, 1861):—Rathgeber für Prediger (Schwerin, 1847):—Die Glaubenssätze von Christi Höllenfahrt und von der Auferstehung des Fleisches, etc. (Hamburg, 1845):—Die Beichte, besonders die Privatbeichte (Gotha, 1853):—Handbuch zu Luther's Katechismus mit Bibelstellen (Meiningen, 1857):—Luther, seinem vollen Werth und Wesen nach, dargestellt aus seinen Schriften (Jena, 1871). He published, besides, a number of Sermons, for which see Zuchold, Biblioth. Theol. i, 4 sq. (B. P.)

Ackerslooth, THEODOR, a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church, who lived in Holland towards the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th century, is the author of, D'eerste Zendbrief van Paullus aan die van Korinthen (Leyden, 1707):—De Zendbrief van Paullus aan de Galaten (ibid. 1695; translated into German by C. Bruensen, and published at Bremen, 1699):—Vytlegginge over den Zendbrief aan de Ebreë (Leyden, 1693, 1702; translated into German by A. Plesken, and published at Bremen, 1714). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Walch, Bibl. Theol. (B. P.)

Ackworth, GEORGE, LL.D., an English divine and civilian, of whose family and birth we have no account. He travelled in France and Italy, where he studied civil law; was public orator at Cambridge; and in the following year was made Doctor of Laws. In 1562 he was admitted an advocate in the Court of Arches, and afterwards lived in the family of archbishop Parker, who gave him a prebend. He was vicar-general in 1567 to Horne, bishop of Winchester; and in 1575 the archbishop of Canterbury permitted him to hold the rectory of Elington, alias Wroughton. In 1576 he was appointed master of the faculties, and judge of the Prerogative Court in Ireland, having been turned out of all his situations in the last-named country because of his dissolute conduct. Besides one or two other works, he wrote De Visibili Romanarchia, contra Nic. Sanderi Monarchiam (Lond. 1622, 4to).

Aclea, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Acleense), so called from "the Field of the Oak," supposed to have been in Aycliffe, Durham, England. Synods were held under this name in A. D. 781, 787, 788, 789, 804, and 810; but nothing is recorded of their doings except certain grants of land.

Aclejam, in the Conflict of Adam and Eve (p. 68, ed. Dillmann), is the twin sister of Abel and wife of Seth; further on she appears as Lea. In the Ethiopic "Clementinum" she is called Aclenja (Dillmann, p. 139), and by other late writers, Greek, Syriac, and Hebrew (all of whom interchange her with her equally legendary sister Luva), Chimia, Chalmana, Calemora; and Caomena (ibid.; and Fabr. Cod. Pseudep. V. T. ii, 44).

Acmenes, in Greek mythology, were certain nymphs of the woods and rivers near Elis.

Acmom, in Greek legend, was (1) a companion of Diomedes, who boldly ventured to disgrace Venus, because of which he and his companions, who had taken part in the crime, were transformed into birds. (2) A son of Clytius of Lyrnessus, in Phrygia, a companion of Aeneas.

Aconoides, in Roman mythology, was a Cyclops and an assistant of Vulcan.

Acemetæ (ἀκομήται, sleepless), a name given to certain monks who, divided into three classes, sang the Holy Office in turns, so that it continued day and night without intermission. The order was probably founded by an officer of the imperial household at Constantinople, named Alexander (q. v.), about the middle of the 5th century. The first monastery which he established was on the borders of the Euphrates, after which he returned to Constantinople, and founded one on the Dardenelles, where he died, about A. D. 430 (or 450). After his departure from the monastery on the Euphrates, the Acemetæ had for their abbot John, who was succeeded by Marcellus. Among the distinguished persons who supported the order was Studius (q. v.), a Roman nobleman, who built a monastery for their use at Constantinople. This was called, after him, Studium, and the monks of it Studita. There was another monastery, founded by St. Dios, which also became theirs. Their "hegumen" (or president), Cyril, made complaints at Rome against Acacius (q. v.), which resulted in his excommunication. Meanwhile Peter the Fuller, who had been expelled from their order, had become schismatic patriarch of Antioch, and made common cause with their opponents. In the following century they became entangled in the Nestorian heresy, and the emperor Justinian caused them to be condemned at Constantinople. In 534, in a synod held in Rome, pope John II excommunicated them for denying the proposition Unus e Trinitate passus est carne, and maintaining that the Virgin was not the Mother of God. This monastic institution soon passed into the West, was established in the Abbey of St. Maurice of Agaune, in Valais, by Sigismund of Burgundy, and was confirmed by a council, A. D. 523. It was also established in the monasteries of St. Martin at Tours, Luxeuil, St. Riquier, and others. The perpetual service of the Acemetæ was called by the Latins Laus perennis. See Evagrius, iii, 13, 21; Moréri, Hist. des Ordres Monast. (preface, p. 238); Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. vii, ch. ii, § 10.

Acemetōna (ἀκομήτονα, sleepless), a Greek term for the light which burns continually before the reserved emblems of the sacrament.

Acetes, in Greek mythology, was (1) the pilot on a Tyrrhenian ship which landed on Naxos. The ship hands brought a beautiful child to him, which he was requested to take along with him. When he beheld its perfect form, he saw that it was the child of some deity, and would not give his consent to its abduction. But the rest forced him to sail away, and the sleeping child remained in the ship. Soon after, it awoke, and, finding itself in strange society, wished to return to Naxos. The sailors made a promise to fulfil this wish, but did not keep it. Suddenly the ship made a halt, as vine-branches grew out of the water around it. Bacchus appeared riding on a tiger and surrounded by lions. He transformed the abductors, all save Acetes, into dolphins, who plunged into the sea, and the pilot brought the god back to Naxos. Some time later Acetes related this adventure to king Pentheus of Thebes, who had the pilot imprisoned. Bacchus, however, liberated him; the doors of the prison flew open of themselves, and Acetes departed unhindered. (2) The father of Laocoon. (3) The armor-bearer of king Evander.

Acoluthus, ANDREAS, one of the most famous Orientalists of his age, was born at Bernstadt, March 16, 1654. After due preparation at the Elizabeth Gymnasium in Breslau, he was instructed in the Rabbinic, Syriac, Chaldee, Arabic, Persian, and Ethiopic languages by A. Pfeiffer. With these he combined the study of Mauretanian, Turkish, Coptic, Armenian, and even the Chinese language. In 1674 he went to Wittenberg, and thence to Leipsic, where he lectured on Oriental languages. Having secured an Armenian Bible, he edited the prophet Obadiah in Armenian, with observations, in 1680. This was the first Armenian publication printed in Germany. In 1682 he published De Aquis Zelotypia A maris Numb. v, 11 sq. In the following year he returned to Breslau, where he was induced to accept an office in the Church. In 1689 he was appointed professor of Hebrew at the Gymnasium of St. Elizabeth, and in the following year he was called as senior of St. Bernhardin's. His Oriental studies he continued, and the possession of an Arabic manuscript of the Koran with a Persian and Turkish version induced him to make the Koran known in Germany by publishing this triglot manuscript with a Latin translation, since the Arabic edition of the Koran which had been published at Venice in 1530 had been burned by command of the pope. King Frederick of Prussia favored his undertaking, and allowed him an annual pension. Acoluthus died at Breslau, Nov. 4, 1704. His Specimen Alcorani Quadrilinguis, for which he was made a member of the Royal Academy of Sciences of Berlin, was published in 1701. See Schmid, Leichen-Predigt auf M. Andreas Acoluthus nebst angefügtem Lebenslauf (Breslau); Mart. Hankii Monumenta pie Defunctis olim Erecta (ed. G. Hankio, 1718); Schimmelpennig, in Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Acominatus. See NICETAS.

Acominatus, MICHAEL (surnamed Choniata, or Chonites, from the place of his birth in Phrygia), was older than his brother Nicetas. He was archbishop of Athens about 1204, but was at that period far advanced in years. His Funeral Oration (Paris, 1566; Frankf. 1568) on the death of his brother Nicetas is still extant in the collected works of the latter, and in Biblioth. Patrum, vol. xxv. Some MS. works and sermons of Acominatus are preserved in the Royal Library at Paris, and in the Bodleian Library, Oxford.

Acontes, in Greek mythology, was the son of Lycaon, the cruel king of Arcadia, whom angry Jupiter transformed into a wolf, and whose sons, with the exception of the youngest, Nyctimus, Jupiter killed by lightning.

Aconteus, in Greek mythology, was a companion of Perseus at the latter's marriage with Andromeda, and became a pillar of stone at the sight of the head of Gorgon.

Acontius, in Greek mythology, was a beautiful but poor youth on the island of Ceos, renowned for the stratagem by which he won his loved one, Cydippe of Athens, a maiden of high parentage and great wealth. He wrote the following words on a large Cydonian apple: "I vow by Diana that I will take Acontius as my husband." The apple rolled to the feet of Cydippe's accompanying slave, who, not being able to read the inscription, handed it to her mistress, who read it aloud, and thus uttered the mysterious vow. Her father, being ignorant of the circumstance, promised her to another; but Cydippe became very sick, and did not recover until she was willing to fulfil her vow.

Acontius, of Rome, is commemorated as a saint in the Hieronymian martyrology on July 25.

Acosta, Emmanuel, a Portuguese Jesuit of the 16th century, published in Portuguese a work which G. P. Maffei translated into Latin under the title Rerum a Societate Jesu in Oriente Gestarum ad Annum 1568. This book contained the letters of the author upon the missions in Japan. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Acosta, Gabriel, a Roman Catholic divine of the latter part of the 16th century, was born at Torres-Vedras. He was educated at Coimbra; succeeded Luis Sotomayor as professor of theology, and was shortly after made a canon. He died in 1616. He left Commentaries on Genesis xlix, Ruth, Lamentations, Jonah, and Malachi (Lyons, 1641). — Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Acosta, Isaac de, a Jewish rabbi of Amsterdam, who lived in the beginning of the 18th century, is the author of Conjecturas Sagradas sobre los Profetas Primeros, i. e., "Sacred Conjectures on the First Prophets," containing a new translation and a paraphrase of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings. It was published at Leyden (1712). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 17; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 29. (B. P.)

Acquaviva. See AQUAVIVA.

Acqui, Jacopo d', a Dominican monk of Piedmont, lived in the first half of the 14th century. He wrote in Latin a Chronicle, unpublished, from the creation of the world to the time of pope Boniface VIII. Manuscript copies are in the libraries of Milan and Turin. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Acrabbattine, the northern district so called. Its ruined capital, now Akrâbeh, is described in considerable detail by Lieut. Conder in the Quar. Statement of the "Palest. Explor. Fund" for July, 1874, p. 190.

Acrabbim. This ascent is by some late writers identified with the pass of Sufah, leading from the desert et-Tih to the Negeb, or "South" of Judah; and to this view Tristram lends his adhesion (Bible Places, p. 9). But in this they are actuated by a desire to locate Kadesh-barnea (q. v.) at Ain-Gadis, instead of one of the springs on the western edge of the Arabah.

Acraea, in Greek mythology, was (1) a surname of those goddesses whose temples were built upon high rocks. (2.) A daughter of the god of the river Asterion, near Mycene.

Acraeus, in Greek mythology, is the same for gōia as Acraea (q. v.) is for goddesses.

Acratoprōtes, in Greek mythology, was a local god who had his temple in Munychia.

Acrātus, in Greek mythology, was a companion of Bacchus who was worshipped in Athens. As the name signifies unmixed, this mystical person is probably only another personification of Bacchus himself.

Acrelius, ISRAEL, a Swedish clergyman, was born at Ostaker, Dec. 25, 1714. He was educated at Upsala, and ordained in 1743. In 1749 he was appointed provost to take charge of the Swedish congregations on the Delaware, and pastor of Raccoon and Pensneck. Christiana was subsequently added to his charge. He remained in America until 1756, when ill-health compelled him to return to Sweden. He was rewarded by the king, for his faithful services, with a large pension and the lucrative living of Fellingsbrö. He died April 25, 1800. Acrelius wrote some articles on American affairs, which were printed in the Swedish journals, several religious works, and a description of the Swedish colonies in America (1759).

Acronius (Akron), Johannes, a Reformed theologian of Holland, who died in 1627, is known by the active part which he took in the controversy between the Remonstrants and the Contraremonstrants. In 1584 he was preacher at Eilsun: in East Frisia, and a few years later at Groningen and Wesel. Having declined a call as preacher to Deventer and Amsterdam, he was appointed in 1617 professor of theology at Franeker. In the following year he was called again as pastor to Kampen, for the purpose of opposing his colleagues there, who were in favor of the Arminian party. As a delegate to the Synod of Dort, 1618-19, he accused his colleagues of Arminianism, and some of them were deposed from their office. In 1619 he went to Haarlem, where he remained till his death. Of his writings we mention, Elenchus Orthodoxus Pseudo-relig. Romano-Cathol. (Deventer, 1615):—Synagma Theologicæ (Groningen, 1605):—Uytmonsteringe van verscheyden Dolingen . . . der genoemde Lutherachen (Arnhem, 1625). See Van der Aa, Biog. Woordenb.; Glasius, Godgel. Nederl.; Vos, in the Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Acronius, Ruard, a Reformed theologian of Holland, is said by some to have been a brother of Johannes, while others maintain that he was originally a Roman Catholic priest. In 1672 he was Reformed preacher at Franeker. After having labored for some years at Alkmaar and Bolsward, he went in 1599 to Schiedam, where he probably died in 1612. He was a learned man for his time, but intolerant. Thus, he challenged the Mennonites to a public disputation, which took place in 1596 between him and Pieter van Ceulen. They held one hundred and fifty-five sessions, and, as is generally the case, both parties claimed the victory. In the controversy between the Arminians and Gomarus he took such an active part that Gomarus asked for his assistance in defending the Calvinistic doctrine, in a meeting which was held at the Hague in 1609. Against the Arminian Uytenbogaert he wrote Noodwendig Verhoog (1610). When, in 1610, the Remonstrants presented their views to the States-General of Holland, Acronius was one of the six Calvinistic delegates who spoke against them. He also published, Onderregtinge over 't Onderhold der Dienaren der waren ghemeynten Christi (Franeker, 1590):—Enarrationes Catecheticæ (Schiedam, 1606):—Onderweyzinge over de Christ. Catechism. (ibid. 1608). See Van der Aa, Biog. Woordenb. s. v.; Vos, in the Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Acroōmēni (ἀκροόμενοι, hearers), a class of penitents in the Church. The arrangement of penitents in different classes took place at the end of the 8d century, or in the beginning of the 4th. They were generally arranged in four classes: προσκαίοντες, mourners;

ἀκροώμενοι, hearers; ὑποπίπτοντες, kneelers; συνιστάμενοι, bystanders. The hearers were permitted to enter within the doors, and to take their station in the narthex, or lowest part of the building, where they were allowed to hear the Scriptures read and expounded; but they were denied the privilege of joining in the prayers of the Church. Three years was the term of their continuance in this order. They were regarded as sustaining the same relation to the Church as the first class of catechumens, who were also called audientes. They were distinguished from the catechumens by not being permitted to receive the imposition of hands.

Acropolita, Constantine (surnamed νέος Μεταφράστης, the Young Metaphrastes), the son of George Acropolita, was grand logothete, or chamberlain, under Michael Palæologus and Andronicus about 1270. We are informed by George Pachymeres that the emperor Michael was so irritated by the zeal with which Acropolita maintained the cause of the Greek Church against Rome, that towards the end of his reign he banished him from court. On the accession of Andronicus, Acropolita soon recovered his lost influence, and in 1294 was restored to his former office. He wrote several works on the subjects in dispute between the churches, especially on the procession of the Holy Spirit, fragments of two of which were seen by Leo Allatius:—An Oration on the Holy Martyr Theodosia (Allatius, De Script. Simeon, p. 84):—Upon the Martyr St. Neophytus:—Upon St. Theodorus Tyro:—Upon St. John Damascenus. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 314; Chaufepié, Nouv. Dict. Crit. i, 130.

Acropolita, George, one of the writers of Byzantine history, was born at Constantinople in 1220, and was brought up at the court of the emperor. John Ducas, at Nice. At the age of seventeen years he became a pupil of Theodorus Exopterygus in mathematics, poetry, and rhetoric; and at twenty-one held a learned discussion, before the emperor, with Nicholas the physician concerning solar eclipses, being made at length grand logothete. John Ducas sent him as ambassador to Larissa, to establish peace with Michael of Epirus. He was also constituted judge by the emperor to try Michael Comnenus. The emperor's son, Theodorus Lascaris, a pupil of Acropolita, appointed him governor of all the western provinces of his empire. About 1255 he made war upon Michael Angelus and was taken prisoner, but was liberated by the intervention of Michael Palæologus, who sent him as his ambassador to Constantine, prince of Bulgaria. After his return, he devoted himself wholly to the instruction of youth intended for orders, but resigned the charge in 1267 to Holobolus. In 1272 he was appointed one of the judges in the cause of John Vecchus, patriarch of Constantinople; and in 1273 was sent to pope Gregory to treat of a union between the two churches. The following year he attended, with others of the Eastern Church, the Council of Lyons; and at the fourth session, July 6, he, in the name of the emperor, took an oath abjuring the so-called schism, receiving the Roman faith, and recognising the primacy of the papal chair. In 1282 he was sent as ambassador to John, prince of Bulgaria, and died immediately upon his return home, in the same year. His principal work is Historia Byzantina (Paris, 1651, fol.), in Greek and Latin. He also wrote, Treatise concerning Faith, Virtue, and the Soul:—Thirteen Prayers, used after the recapture of Constantinople by the Greeks:—Exposition of the Orations of Greg. Nazianzen, etc. See Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. vi, 448; Ward, Gresham Professors.

Acrorites (inhabitant of a mountain-summit), in Greek mythology, was a name by which Bucchus was worshipped in Sicily, from the high mountain upon which his temple was built.

Acrostic hymns were in use in the ancient Church; and specimens remain in Greek, but especially in Latin. The term was also applied to the Christian formula ιχθῦς. See ICHTHYS. A peculiar use of the term occurs in the Greek office-books, in which the successive canons begin with the several letters of the alphabet.

Acroteria (Gr.), pedestals for statues and other ornaments placed on the apex and lower angles of a pediment. They are also sometimes placed upon the gables in Gothic architecture, especially in canopy-work.

Acroteria on Pediment and Eaves.

Act, RESCISSORY. See RESCISSORY ACT.

ACT OF UNIFORMITY. See UNIFORMITY.

Actæon, in Greek mythology, was the son of Aristeus and Atonoe, a daughter of Cadmus, and was one of the most famous heroes of Thebes, trained in the school of Chiron. The death of this famous hunter has furnished to poetry matter for many beautiful works. The myth runs as follows: Diana was bathing in the Gargaphian valley just at the time when Actæon was hunting. When he saw the goddess, he remained standing there, which so vexed Diana that she transformed him into a reindeer, with nothing human left him but consciousness. Actæon fled. However, his own nimble-footed dogs gave chase, and, overtaking him, tore him to pieces. His dogs then sought for their master, and not finding him, Chiron erected a statue of him, which they constantly guarded. Another story is somewhat different—that Diana transformed him because of his boldness in attempting violence upon her person. Others, again, relate that she vexed him to death in order that he might not marry Semele, whom he loved.

Actian Games. On the promontory of Actium, in Acarnania, Apollo had an ancient temple, where, every three years, a feast was held with games and fights. At the opening of this feast an ox was killed and given to the flies to feast upon, so that they might not trouble those participating in the feast. Augustus celebrated this feast upon the occasion of his victory over Antony, near Actium.

Actio, a word frequently used to designate the canon of the mass. Taken from the word agere, which bears in classical writers the special sense of performing a sacrificial act, the word actio is applied to that which was regarded as the essential portion of the eucharistic sacrifice. Whatever is included in the canon is said to be infra actionem. Hence, when any words are to be added within the canon, as at great festivals, they bear in the liturgies the title, or rubric, infra actionem; and in printed missals these words are frequently placed before the prayer Communicantes.

Actis, in Greek mythology, was the son of the god of the sun and a brother of Electryone. He was famous for his knowledge of astronomy, which he formed into a science, and taught this science to the priests in Egypt. The Egyptians were, in consequence, looked upon as the discoverers of the science of astronomy.

Actistetes (from ἀκτιστος, not created), a sect of the Julianists, who took this name from their dogma, that after the incarnation Christ ought not to be spoken of as a created being, even in respect to his human nature; thus contradicting the words of the Nicene Creed, "And was made man." This was, in reality, a form of the older heresy of the Docetæ (q. v.); for since a being wholly uncreated must be wholly God, the reality of our Lord's human nature was a doctrine as incompatible with the belief of one sect as it was with that of the other. See Dörner, Person of Christ (Clark's ed.), II, i, 131.

Actius, in Greek mythology, was a name of Apollo, from his being worshipped on the promontory of Actium.

Acton. See ATTO.

Acton, an English monk of the Dominican Order, who lived about 1410; and, according to Leland, was a learned theologian. He wrote a treatise, De Pace Ecclesie:—Sermons:—and other works. See Pitseus, De Script. Angliæ.

Acton, Ralph, an English Roman Catholic priest, who flourished about 1820. He wrote commentaries upon the epistles of St. Paul and upon the Master of the Sentences, some homilies, and other theological works. See Pitseus, De Script. Angliæ.

Actors. The early Church protested against the life of actors on the ground (1) of general immorality, and (2) of theatricals being so closely associated with idolatry. These were comprised in the pomp and service of the devil, which every Christian renounced at his baptism; and, therefore, when any one returned to them he was charged as a renouncer of his baptismal covenant. He was thereupon discarded as an apostate and relapsor from Christian communion. We give the deliverances of some of the councils and early fathers upon the subject. Cyprian (Epist. 61, al. 2) says that "it is neither agreeable to the majesty of God nor the discipline of the Gospel that the modesty and honor of the Church should be defiled with so base and infamous a contagion." Tertullian wrote a treatise (De Spectac. cap. 4) against these public shows, and dwells on the inconsistency of uttering from the same lips the amen of Christian worship and the praises of the gladiator or the mime. Clement of Alexandria reckons the arts of actors as among the things forbidden by divine authority. The Council of Eliberis (can. 62) allowed stage-players to be baptized only on the condition that they renounced their arts; and if, after baptism, they returned to them again, they were to be cast out of the Church. The first Council of Arles (can. 5) decreed that all public actors belonging to the theatre were to be denied communion so long as they continued to act. The third Council of Carthage (iii, can. 35) supposes excommunication to pass upon all such when it says that actors and stage-players, and all apostates of that kind, shall not be denied pardon and reconciliation if they return unto the Lord. With one consent the moral sense of Christians condemned what seemed so incurable an evil. See Bingham, Christian Antiquities, bk. xvi, ch. iv, § 10.

Acts, SPURIOUS, or APOCRYPHAL (Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha). The recent discoveries of Tischendorf, as published by him under the title Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha (Lips. 1851)—with which comp. his Additamenta ad Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, in the prolegomena to his Apocalypses Apocr. p. xlvii, etc.—have brought to light an extensive collection of such spurious acts, viz.:

1. Acta Andrææ (given by Tischendorf, Acta Apostolorum Apocrypha, p. 105-131; comp. also p. xli sq.).
2. Acta Andrææ et Matthiæ in Urbe Anthrophagorum (ibid. p. 132-166; comp. p. xlvii sq. and Apocal. Apocr. p. 139-141).

Actual Grace is distinguished from habitual grace as that which God gives to Christians for the purpose of doing some action acceptable to him. See GRACE.

Actual Sin. See SIN, ACTUAL.

Acuanitæ. See ACUAS.

Acuſas ('Ακούσας), an early teacher of Manichæism, who is said to have come from Mesopotamia and introduced the heresy into Eleutheropolis. The Manichæans were sometimes called, after him, Acuanitæ. Epiphanius (Adv. Her. lxi, 1) calls him veteranus, and places the rise of his followers in the fourth year of the reign of the emperor Aurelian, A.D. 273.

Acuff, Francis, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Culpepper County, Tenn., about 1770. His early life is unrecorded. He was three years a travelling preacher in the Tennessee Conference, and died in August, 1795, in the midst of great usefulness and promise. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1796, p. 67.

Acuña, Cristóval de, a Spanish Jesuit missionary, was born at Burgos in 1597. He was admitted into the society in 1612, and, after some years spent in study, was sent as a missionary to Chili and Peru, and became rector of the College of Cuenca. In 1639 he was appointed by the Jesuits to accompany Pedro Texeira in his second exploration of the Amazon in order to take scientific observations and draw up a report that might be sent to Spain. He published a narrative of this expedition under the title Nuevo Descubrimiento del Gran Río de las Amazonas, etc. (Madrid, 1641); but he was coldly received by the king of Spain, and nothing was done to improve the country thus opened up. After occupying the positions of procurator of the Jesuits at Rome and calificador (censor) of the Inquisition at Madrid, Acuña returned to South America, and died on a journey from Panama to Lima, soon after the year 1675.

Acus. See PIN.

Acus, in Grecian mythology, was a son of Vulcan by Aglaia.

Ada was a Syrian goddess of the moon, the same with Myllitta.

Adab is an Arabic term for whatever Mohammed has done once or twice, which is on that account lawful to be done by any of his followers.

Adadah. The English engineers found a ruined town, Adadah, near Tuweirah el-Foka, in the neighborhood indicated by De Saulcy (see Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1875, p. 27).

Adalard (or Adelard), a monk, was born about 753, and was the son of Count Bernard and cousin-german of Charlemagne. Invited to court, and fearing the infection of such a life, he, at the age of twenty, became a monk of Corbie, in Picardy, and was at length chosen abbot of the monastery. Forced by his imperial relations to attend court, he still preserved the disposition of a recluse. He was banished, on unjust suspicions, by Louis the Meek to a monastery on the isle of Here, on the coast of Aquitaine. Five years after, Louis recalled him and heaped upon him the highest honors; but, being still inclined to the life of a recluse, he obtained leave to return to Corbie. Here, and at another monastery called New Corbie, he devoted himself to the spiritual and intellectual welfare of the monks. He died in 827. His principal work was a Treatise on the French Monarchy; but only fragments of any of his works have come down to us. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Milner, Church Hist. iii, 257; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Adalardus, a monk of Blandenburg, at Ghent, flourished at the beginning of the 11th century. At the request of St. Elphegus, archbishop of Canterbury, he composed an Office for the Festival of St. Dunstan. As this work is dedicated to St. Elphegus, it was probably written before 1012, the year of his martyrdom. This work is found in many MSS., and bears sometimes the title of The Life of St. Dunstan. The epistle dedicatory is contained in Wharton's Anglia Sacra, ii, 148.

Adalarius (Athalarius, or Adelherius), a priest who accompanied St. Boniface to Frisia in 754 and shared with him the glory of martyrdom. His body was translated from Utrecht to Erfurt with that of St. Eoban, and buried in the Monastery of St. Mary. In the Breviary of Erfurt he is commemorated with a double rite, April 20, as episcopus et martyr. It is supposed that the title of bishop was a baseless assumption, but probably gave rise to Baillet's statement, which rests apparently on no historical foundation, that Adalarius was the first and only bishop of Erfurt, the see after his death being united to that of Mentz. See Henschen, Analecta Bonifaciana; Baillet, Vies des Saints, vol. ii. June 58, and vol. iv; Acta SS. Boll. Jan. i, 471.

Adalbald, saint and confessor, was grandson of P. Gertrude, and his mother's name was Gerberta. He married St. Rictrudis, by whom he had St. Maurontus, his eldest son, who afterwards became abbot, and three virgin saintly daughters, Clotsendis, Euselia, and Adalsendis. On his way to Gascony, Adalbald was waylaid and murdered by persons unknown. His relics are at St. Amand, Flanders. He is mentioned in the Belgian martyrology, and in Saussaye's supplement to the Gallican. His day is Feb. 2, and he died about 652. See Bering-Gould, Lives of the Saints, ii, 41.

Adalbero (or Adalbert), bishop of AUGSBURG (887-909), was descended from a noble family. In 850 he entered the monastery of the Benedictines at Ellwangen, and in 887 he was made bishop of Augsburg. The German king, Arnulph, committed to his care the education of his son, Louis the Child. He exercised a great influence upon the ecclesiastical history of Germany, and largely promoted the moral and financial welfare of the churches and monasteries within his diocese. He died Oct. 9, 909, his remains being deposited in the Church of Sts. Ulrich and Afra at Augsburg. See Vita S. Adalberonis Episc. August. Auctore Oudalscalco (ed. Jaffé, in Steichele, Archiv für Geschichte des Bisthums Augsburg, iii, 1860); Braun, Geschichte der Bischöfe von Augsburg, i, 151. (B. P.)

Adalbero, the twentieth bishop of WÜRZBURG (1045-1090), was born about the year 1010. He was educated at Würzburg, and succeeded his uncle in 1045. In the struggle of the papal see with Henry IV he sided with the former, and on that account was often obliged to leave the country. He richly endowed the monastery at Lambach, which had been founded by his father, and died there Oct. 6, 1090. In the 12th century many miracles were ascribed to him. See Himmelstein, Reihenfolge der Bischöfe von Würzburg (1843), p. 61-66; Archiv des historischen Vereins für Unterfranken, 1861, xv, 179-259; Schmielter, Breue Chronicon Monasterii B. M. V. Lambacensis O. S. B. (Lentii, 1865); Argumenta Cultus B. Adalberonis (Viennæ, 1868); Hergenröther, in Wetzlar u. Welte, Kirchen-Lex. s.v. (B. P.)

Adalberon (ASCELINUS, or AGELIN), bishop of LEON, was consecrated in 977. He was an ambitious prelate and a servile courtier, and was base enough to deliver up to Hugh Capet Arnoul, archbishop of Rheims, and Charles, duke of Lorraine, Hugh's competitor, to whom he had given an asylum in his episcopal city. He died July 19, 1030. He left a satirical poem in 430 stanzas dedicated to king Robert (ed. by Adrian Valois, 1663, 8vo, at the end of the panegyric on the emperor Berenger). In the library of the abbey of Laubes is a manuscript poem by Adalberon on The Holy Trinity. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Adalberon OF LIEGE. See ALBERON.

Adalberon, archbishop of RHEIMS, was one of the most learned prelates of the 10th century. Having obtained the archbishopric in 969, he called several councils for the establishment of ecclesiastical discipline. He also induced men of learning to resort to Rheims, and gave a high renown to the schools there. He was the son of Geoffrey, count of Ardenna, and distinguished himself as prelate and as minister under Lothaire and Louis V. In 987 he consecrated Hugh Capet, who succeeded him in the office of grand-chancellor of France. He died Jan. 5, 988. The cathedral of Rheims is indebted to him for most of its sumptuous furniture. Several of his letters are among those of Gerbert, afterwards Sylvester II; and two of his discourses are in Moissac's Chronicle. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adalbert, St., a deacon, who is commemorated June 25. The Bollandists give his acts written by the monks of Egmond and Mettoch. According to these he was a disciple of St. Egbert, by whom he was sent, with St. Willebrord and ten others, into Germany in 690. He died in Frisia, whither he had accompanied Willebrord, and his body was taken to Egmond, where a church was founded in his honor by Theodorik II. According to Le Cointe (iv, 392-394), he was present at the Synod of Utrecht, in 702, and died in 705. See Acta SS. Boll. Jun. v, 94-110; Mabillon, Annal. Ord. Bened. i, 631-646.

Adalbert, a monk of FLEURY, who died Dec. 23, 853, wrote an account of the Translation of St. Benedict from Monte-Casino to France, and an abridged History of the Foundation of the Monastery of Fleury (Lyons, 1604, 8vo; also in the collection of Bollandists, March 21, p. 300-305). Mabillon has given a new edition in Annal. Ord. Bened. ii, 337, 339.

Adalbert, St., count of L'OSTREVENT, who is commemorated on April 22, married Regina, niece of king Pepin, with whom he dedicated himself to a life of devotion, almsgiving, and good works. According to the documents of the Church of Denain, we learn that they founded the monastery in that place, and that they were buried above the high-altar there. The exact date of their death is unknown, but they flourished about the middle of the 8th century.

Adalbert, a prince of the royal race of NORTHUMBERLAND, who devoted himself, about 740, to missionary labor in Holland. He selected the neighborhood of Egmond, and devoted himself with much zeal to the conversion of the heathen Frisians. He was long held in veneration by them as their spiritual father. An imperfect Life of him is given in Mabillon's Annal. Ord. Bened. iii, 586.

Adalbert, first bishop of POMERANIA, was ordained during the first half of the 12th century. See Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iii, cent. xii, pt. i, ch. i.

Adalgudis, co-founder with her husband, Grimo, in 697, of a nunnery at Limours, diocese of Paris (see the charter of foundation, with her subscription, in Mabillon, Ann. i, 704). A placitum of Chaldebart III, in 703, vindicating the property of this convent, of which Adalgudis, then a widow, was an inmate, may be seen in Gall. Chr. vol. vii, instr. p. 4.

Adalongus (or Adalonus) was bishop of Marsailles when that city was betrayed to the Saracens by Maurontus in 739. He was inserted among the saints of March 1 by Molanus in his additions to Usuardus's Martyrology, but is not recognised by the modern breviaries or by the Rollandists. See Gall. Chr. i, 640; Le Cointe, v, 17.

Adalwin (Teut. noble friend) was an abbot of St. Haimeranus, and fourth (or, according to an ancient rhyme in Mabillon, Ann. ii, 160, the fifth) bishop of Ratisbon. This happened in 790, and two years after he presided at a council which Charlemagne summoned for the condemnation of the Felician heresy. Hund argues the probability that the transfer of the cathedral from the Monastery of St. Haimeranus to the Church of St. Stephen, Ratisbon, was made under pressure from Charlemagne and against the judgment of Adalwin, who at his death, in 814, preferred to be laid among his predecessors in the old cathedral. See Metrop. Salisb. i, 188; Mabillon, Ann. ii, 203.

Adam, in Oriental mythology. The Scripture history of this progenitor of the human race is well known; less known, however, is what the histories of the Persians, Turks, Arabs, etc., relate of him. According to the myths of these nations, God took all the dust of the earth and formed a man-woman with a double face—the same as the Persians represent in one of their idols—with both sexes combined in one body, until he separated them. Adam's height was immense; his head reached to the firmament of heaven; and when he lay down his body reached from the rising to the setting sun. His face shone more brilliantly than the sun; the angels prostrated themselves before him; and all created things of the earth looked to him as their creator, and would have worshipped him as such, had not Adam taught them that he was a creature as well as they, and came from the hands of the Almighty. He prostrated himself before God, who convinced the angels of Adam's weakness and dependence; for when the latter was asleep God took the respective members from his body, so that he lost his giant appearance. On awaking, he commanded Adam to distribute his members all over the earth, in order that they might become fruitful. Thus only his wisdom was left to Adam, which was increased by the presentation of a book through the angel Raphael, in which every question was propounded and answered. Then God made him a wife from the earth, Lilith; but as she was formed of the same material as Adam himself, she refused to be dominated over by Adam, and then vanished in the air. Adam complained to God, who sent the angels after the fugitive, and, as she still refused to return, God inflicted her with the punishment that daily three hundred of her children should die. God now formed for Adam a wife from one of Adam's ribs, very beautiful and fair, and brought her to Adam, blessed both, and invited them to a feast, at which the angelic choirs sang. Then the evil spirits, through envy, planned Adam's fall. The seraph Sammael beheld Adam's splendor, and, with the help of others, he sought to mislead him. He himself came from heaven, rode upon a snake, and sought to persuade the beautiful Eve to partake of the fruit of the forbidden tree. As a proof that death should not follow, he laid his hand on the tree, and Eve did the same, which she had no sooner done than she saw the angel of death approaching her. Love for Adam moved her to tempt him to a like transgression, so that they might not be separated from each other by death. God banished Sammael from heaven; the snake he divested of its limbs; and Adam and Eve were driven out of Paradise upon the lowest of the seven earths, where they lived in gross darkness and lost the wonderful book of wisdom. Then Adam came to the second earth, Adamah, where, separated from Eve, he lived with Lilith one hundred and thirty years. She bore him giants and evil spirits against his will, just as Eve did to Sammael. After this Eve bore Adam three sons—Cain, Abel, and Seth. Then Adam was allowed to go through all the other earths, until he came to the seventh, Tebel, which we inhabit; but he was still comfortless because of the loss of his wonderful book. He went to the river Gihon to drown himself, but to no avail. God saw his sorrow, had mercy upon him, and led him in the way of the recovery of his book again. Whatever man knows and has known originates from this book. The book became lost again. The inhabitants of India, however, claim to be in possession of it in the form of the holy books, which Brahma brought to man from heaven.

The tradition of the Mohammedans is quite similar to this. The creation of Adam is more or less exaggerated according as this or that nation is fantastically inclined. The Assyrian legends of the fall of man are much more sober and brief (Smith, Chaldean Genesis, p. 15 sq.).

Adam and Eve are commemorated as Christian saints in the Ethiopic calendar on April 1; Adam and Abel in the Armenian on July 25.

ADAM, BOOK OF, is the title, more or less definitely cited, of several apocryphal works, an account of which we abstract from Smith's Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v. See APOCRYPHA.

1. "The Conflict of Adam and Eve."—This is a pseudepigraphical treatise brought by Krapf from Abyssinia, in an Ethiopic MS., and published in a German dress, by Dillmann, in Ewald's Jahrbücher d. bibl. Wissenschaft in 1853 (also separately, Gött. 1853). It is a story, partly historical, partly romantic, of the adventures of our first parents after their expulsion from Eden, followed by an account of the fortunes of the succeeding patriarchs. It thus consists of two parts, evidently by different authors, the later imitating the style of the earlier.

After the Fall, which is not itself described, the exiles are represented as permitted to dwell in the "Cave of Treasures," under the western boundary of the Garden. There they are subjected to a series of trials, through Satanic influence as well as natural causes, but are comforted by divine intercourse and promises, culminating in a not obscure intimation of the great atonement. As tokens of these assurances, angels bring to Adam "treasures" in the cave, where Adam's body is finally embalmed by Seth. After the catastrophe of the intercourse between the Cainites and the Sethites, Melchizedek opens the ark in which Adam's body had been deposited to preserve it from the Flood; and the true priesthood is thus continued through him.

The second part of the book is a peculiar travesty of the events of the Old Test., with remarkable incidents interpolated, including a genealogy of the Virgin Mary. This portion, even more plainly than the preceding, betrays a Christian origin.

The early date of the book in question is evinced by its reflection in the legends of Mohammedanism, and the allusions to the "Word of God." At the same time, the author, or authors, skillfully conceal their heretical views under a dramatic form, of which the doctrine of redemption is the basal idea. The work is singularly independent of the other and somewhat parallel Apocrypha known as the Book of Enoch and the Book of Jubilees. The original appears to have been written in Arabic, probably not later than the 7th century. It seems to have formed the basis of the Arabic Apocalypse of Peter, preserved at Oxford and Rome, and the Syriac Case of Treasures noticed by Cureton; possibly, also, of D'Abadie's Ethiopic MS. 125, entitled a Life of Adam.

2. "The Testament of Adam."—This is a remarkable group of fragmentary MSS., extant only in Syriac and Arabic. It was published by Renan (in the Journal Asiatique, 1858, ii, 427-470), with a translation, introduction, and notes; and the Syriac text is likewise printed in Wright's Syriac Apocrypha, p. 61 sq. Parts i and ii are a horarium of the universe for day and night, distinguishing at each of the twenty-four hours the adoration paid by some order of created beings, as angels and demons, men, animals, abysses, etc. Part iii, headed "More of Adam our father," contains short prophecies by Adam to Seth, relating to the Incarnation, the restoration of Adam, the making of the cross (from the fig-tree identified with the tree of knowledge), and the Deluge. Part iv, entitled "More of the Testament of our father Adam," is a short account of the "heavenly powers," i. e. angels, archangels, principalities, etc.

These fragments evidently represent a work current under different titles in the early ages, such as the Revelations of Adam, noticed by Epiphanius (Hær. 89 b), and the Repentance of Adam, condemned by Gelasius (Decret. vi, 30). Syncellus, Cedrenus, and the Apostolical Constitutions (especially in the Coptic recension) likewise allude to such prophecies attributed to Adam.

The Hours and the Prophecy have every appearance of forming part of the same work. In each Adam speaks to Seth, and refers to his past sin; and there is considerable similarity of tone. They are probably, however, mere extracts; the several passages are disconnected, and the dramatic framework is perceptible only at the end. If it be the book meant by Epiphanius, it cannot be later than the 4th century, and nothing decisive can be urged against this date, although it is impossible to speak with confidence.

The Testament, as it stands, is short and unpretending; yet a lofty spirit pervades a great part of it. No distinctive doctrine is to be found in it. It appears to lie outside of Greek and Latin Christianity, and is thus an interesting monument of an almost unknown world of ancient creeds.

3. "The Book of the Daughters of Adam."—This is a work condemned in the Gelasian decree as apocryphal. Another title appears to be "Leptogenesis," i. e. the Book of Jubilees; but, as the account of the daughters of Adam in the latter work occupies only six lines of ch. iv, some other writing is perhaps meant.

4. "The Story and Conversation of Adam."—This is the title of a Greek work which purports to be "revealed by God to Moses [read Seth] his servant, taught by the archangel Michael." It begins, after the few introductory lines, with the murder of Abel, in place of whom another son is promised. This marks Seth as the organ of revelation, and he is distinguished throughout by special prerogatives. The true subject of the book, however, is the death of Adam, and his giving place to Seth. In his mortal sickness, Adam collects his sons around him. Afflicted at his groans, Eve and Seth approach the Garden to pray for the oil of mercy from the tree, but in vain; he will die, Michael tells them, within three days. Eve then describes the circumstances of the Fall at great length (ch. xiv-xx), the embellishments of the Biblical account having at times some imaginative beauty. She goes out to pray, but is raised up by an angel to see Adam (his spirit) borne up in a chariot of light. He is washed in the Acherusian lake, and committed by "the Father of the universe" to Michael to be placed in the third heaven. God himself descends to give promises of restoration and resurrection to the body. It is buried by angels, and Abel's body with it. Within a week Eve is laid in the same grave, and Michael returns to heaven singing hallelujah.

Various echoes of New-Test. language indicate that the book is of Christian origin, though there is no quotation and no distinct Christian doctrine. Besides the borrowing of the framework and various details from Jewish tradition, there are points of connection with other extant apocryphal books. The original language appears to have been Greek, traces of the Sept. being evident. Grammar, however, and inflections are of a debased type, and the tone is that of an Oriental population, such as might have been found in Palestine or Western Syria. It seems impossible, at present, to find evidence as to the date; but any early century from the second onwards is not inappropriate.

The work was first published in 1866 by Tischendorf, in his Apocalypses Apocrypha, under the fictitious title "Apocalypsis Mosii." A better text is reproduced in full in Cerrani's Monumenta Sacra et Profana (Milan, 1868, i, 21 sq.). No one of the MSS., however, is complete; and the text is in a bad state in all. An English version of Tischendorf's text is given in the Anticene Christian Library.

5. "Liber Adami," also known as the Codex Nasareus, properly The Great Book or Treasure of the Mendæans (q. v.).

Adam (the city). A trace of this name and locality appears to linger in the present Tell Damieh, at the modern ferry of the same name across the Jordan, near Kurn Surtabeh (Bädeker, Handb. for Palest. p. 266).

Adam, a monk of ALDERSPACH, Bavaria, and a Cistercian, lived about 1250. He wrote A Treatise on Moral Theology, in verse.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Adam of ARRAS, called after his native place, was bishop of Terouenne in 1213. In 1229 he became a monk at Clairvaux, where he died. He left a history of that order.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Adam of BARKING, a Cistercian monk and a doctor of Oxford, who lived in the beginning of the 13th century, wrote Commentaries on the Old and New Testaments.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Adam, a Scottish bishop, was promoted to the see of BRECHIN in 1328, and was employed in several embassies to England towards the facilitating of king David's redemption, who had been taken prisoner at the unfortunate battle of Durham in 1346. He probably died in the beginning of the year 1351. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 161.

Adam, a Scottish bishop, was abbot of Melrose, and was elected in 1213, and consecrated bishop of CAITHNESS in May, 1214, by William Malvoisine, bishop of St. Andrews. While he was abbot he was sent as ambassador to king John of England. He went—in company with Walter, bishop of Glasgow, and Bricius, bishop of Moray—to Rome in 1218, to crave absolution from the pope; and they returned in 1219. Adam is supposed to have been cruelly murdered by the earl of Caithness in 1222. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 206.

Adam THE CARTHUSIAN. See ADAM OF LONDON.

Adam OF CHAMILLUS, a Cistercian monk, was created bishop of Senlis in France, and attended several councils. He died in 1250. He wrote Opus Sermonum, which is yet in MS.

Adam OF CORLANDON, a Roman Catholic divine who lived in the beginning of the 13th century, was made dean of Laon about 1196, and retained that dignity till 1223. He died in 1226. He composed, for the use of his Church at Laon, Ordinarius Ecclesie, sive Ordo Divini Officii in Eccl. Laudunensi (Paris, 1662):—also a Book of Solutions of Various Passages in Holy Scripture (extant in 3 vols. MS.). See Oudin, De Script. Eccles. ii, 1702.

Adam OF DOMERHAM was so called from his native place, Domerham, in Wilts. He was a monk of Glastonbury, and flourished about 1272. He wrote, Historia Controversiæ inter Epis. Bathoniensis et Monachos Glastonienses, given in Wharton, Anglia Sacra, i, 578. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 319. Historia de Rebus Gestis Glastoniensibus was published by Thomas Hearne, from a MS. in the college of Cambridge (Oxonii, Sheldon, 1727). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adam, abbot of EVESHAM, lived about the middle of the 12th century, and was, according to Pitseus, a Benedictine monk; or, according to Possevino, a Cistercian. Of his works there are left a volume of Sermons:—another of Epistles:—and a book on The Holy Eucharist.

Adam, a learned Carthusian of LONDON, who lived in the first half of the 14th century, wrote a Life of St. Hugh of Lincoln (published, with notes by D. Bernard, in the Biblioth. Ascetica, vol. x):—On the Advantages of Tribulation (Lond. 1530):—also treatises, entitled Scala Cæli; De Sumptione Eucharistiæ; Speculum Spiritualium, which are unpublished. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adam of MARISCO was an English Franciscan of Oxford, known as Doctor Illustratus. He flourished in the 13th century, and wrote on the Song of Solomon, St. Dionysius the Areopagite, and on the Master of the Sentences.

Adam of MIRIMOUTH (MUREMATHENSIS), a canon of St. Paul's, London, was still living in 1342. He composed a History of his own times, as well as two Chronicles—one from 1302 to 1343, and the other carrying it on to 1380. It is doubted, however, whether he is the author of the latter. Neither of the Chronicles has been printed. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, App. p. 42.

Adam of ORLETON was a native of Hereford, England. He was consecrated bishop of Hereford in 1317, and translated to Winchester in 1327. See Twysden, Hist. p. 2764; Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. s. v.

Adam of PARIS, so called because born in that city, flourished in the last half of the 11th century. Thoroughly educated in the liberal arts of his own country, he passed into Greece, and was received with much honor at Spalatro, in Dalmatia, by the archbishop Laurentius, who induced him to undertake the emendation of the Acts of the Martyrs Dominus and Anastasius. The latter part of the work is lost; but the former is given by Henschenius (April 11). Adam also composed some hymns, and put into verse such parts of the Office of St. Dominus as were chanted to music.

Adam, first a monk, and afterwards abbot, of the monastery of PERSEIGNE, in the diocese of Mans, flourished at the end of the 12th century. He had a reputation for holiness, eloquence, and learning. Among his works are, Opus Sermonum ad suos Fratres, etc. (Rome, 1652):—Epistola ad Osmundum Abbatem Mortuimaris in Normanniam Monachum:—Epistola ad Blancum Comitem Campaniæ (given by Martène, Vet. Script. et Mon. Nov. Coll. i, 1023, besides several other letters). See De Wisch, Bibl. Cisterc. p. 4; Magn. Bibl. Eccles. p. 109.

Adam du PETIT PONT, a Roman Catholic divine, was born in England in the 12th century, and was sent in his youth to Paris. He studied under Mathieu d'Angers and Peter Lombard, and was a zealous partisan of Aristotle. He became a distinguished professor, teaching a school near the Petit Pont, from which he received his name. He lectured there on grammar, rhetoric, and dialectics; and was afterwards (about 1145) made a canon of Notre Dame and professor of theology in the episcopal school of the diocese. In 1175 (or 1176) he was called home, and was consecrated bishop of St. Asaph. In 1179 he took part in the Council of Lateran, where he was obliged to condemn certain propositions made by Peter Lombard. He died in England in 1180. He wrote a treatise entitled Art de Bien Parler. He was sometimes called, by his contemporaries, Peripateticus, on account of his attachment to the philosophy of Aristotle; and sometimes Scholasticus. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v.

Adam the PREMONSTRANT, or SCOTUS, a historian of the 12th century, was born in Scotland, and educated in the Monastery of Lindisfarne; from whence he went to Paris, and became a member of the Sorbonne. He became in 1158 a regular canon of St. Augustine, of the Order of Premonstratensians; and upon his return to his native country was a monk, first at Melrose and lastly at Durham. He is also said to have been bishop of Withem. He died in 1180. His writings are, Commentarius in Regulam D. Augustini:—Tractatus de Triplici Tabernaculo Moysis:—Liber de Triplici Genere Contemplationis:—Sermones XLVII (Antw. 1659, fol.), before which there had been published (at Paris, 1518), some Treatises, and fourteen Sermons on the Order and Habit of the Premonstratensians of Paris. Oudin, of the same order, states that he had seen fifty-three Sermons by Adam Scotus, and A Soliloquy concerning the Soul, in MS., in the library of the Celestines of Mantes. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 235, 12; Dupin, Bibl. des Antiq. Eccles. (English transl. Dublin, 1723), ii, 368; Landon, Eccles. Hist. s. v.

Adam of SAINT VICTOR. Very little is known of the life of this most fertile of the Latin hymnologists of the Middle Ages. Whether he was born in Great Britain or Brittany is uncertain. About the year 1130 he entered the religious foundation near Paris, named after St. Victor of Marseilles; hence his name. He died in 1177, and was interred in the cloister of that abbey, where, before the Revolution of 1789, his epitaph might have been seen in fourteen verses, one of which was as follows:

“Unde sperabit homo? cuius conceptio culpa,
Nasci pœna, labor vita, necesse mori.”

He wrote some treatises on devotion; among others, one in honor of the Virgin Mary. His poetical works, which M. Gautier published in 1858, speak for him. As to the merits of Adam, dean Trench speaks as follows: “His profound acquaintance with the whole circle of the theology of his time, and eminently with its exposition of Scripture; the abundant and admirable use which he makes of it, delivering, as he thus does, his poems from the merely subjective cast of those, beautiful as they are, of St. Bernard; the exquisite art and variety with which, for the most part, his verse is managed and his rhymes disposed; their rich melody multiplying and ever deepening at the close; the strength which he often concentrates into a single line; his skill in conducting a narration; and, most of all, the evident nearness of the things which he celebrates to his own heart of hearts—all these, and other excellences, render him, as far as my judgment goes, the foremost among the sacred Latin poets of the Middle Ages.” Some of Adam's hymns have been translated into English and German. For the English, see Neale, Mediæval Hymns and Sequences (Lond. 1867), p. 107–153; Lyra Mystica (ibid. 1869), p. 1, 170, 376; Lyra Messianica (ibid. ed.), p. 79, 116, 211, 305, 340, 343, 389, 414; and Trench, Sacred Latin Poetry, p. 53 sq. For the German, see Simrock, Lauda Sion, p. 180, 208; Bässler, Auswahl altchristl. Lieder, p. 109 sq.; Königsfeld, Lateinische Hymnen und Gesänge, i, 134; ii, 181; Rambach, Anthologie christlicher Gesänge, i, 284 sq.; Fortlage, Gesänge christl. Vorzeit, p. 400 sq. Adam of TEROUENNE. See ADAM of ARRAS.

Adam of WITHEM. See ADAM SCOTUS.

Adam, Jean, a French preacher, was born at Limoges in 1608. He was superior of the House of the Jesuits at Bordeaux. He distinguished himself by his ridiculous zeal against the new disciples of St. Augustine. He called the bishop of Hippo “L'Africain échauffé et le Docteur Bouillant;” but to make amends, he compared cardinal Mazarin to John the Baptist, and Anne of Austria to the Holy Virgin. He died May 12, 1684. Among his works are, Le Triomphe de l'Eucharistie contre le Ministre Claude (Sedan, 1671):—La Vie de Saint François de Borgia, in which he is not sparing of miracles:—Traduction de l'Office de l'Eglise:—Réponse à l'Écrit de Daillé contre la Conversion du Ministre Cottibgy. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adam Kadmon is the name of a primitive emanation in the Cabalistic philosophy of the Jews, which is regarded as at once the image of God and the type of man, and from which proceed decreasing stages of emanations called Sephiroth.

Adamæus, THEODORIC, a German philologist, was born about 1470 in Lippe. He wrote, De Christiani Orbis Concordia (Paris, 1532), a discourse which was addressed to Charles V and to Francis I:—De Insula Rhodo et Militarium Ordinum Institutione (ibid. 1536):—and edited several Greek and Latin classical works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adamah, in Persian mythology, was the place of detention for Adam after his banishment from Paradise—the second of the seven earths, where eternal darkness reigns.

Adamantea (also Amalthea, Egea, and Adrastea), in Greek mythology, was the nurse of Jupiter. She hid the young god in a cradle among the thick leaves of a tree from the search of Saturn, who would have destroyed him.

Adamantus. See ADANTUS.

Adamas. See OPHITES.

Adamastus, in Greek mythology, was (1) a surname of Mars as well as of Hercules. (2.) The father of Achemenides.

Adami, Adam, a Benedictine friar, was born about 1590. He was bishop of Hieropolis and suffragan of Hildesheim. He was appointed to represent the prelates of the dukedom of Wurtemberg in the Assembly at Westphalia. He died about 1670. Adami wrote, Arzana Pacis Westphalicæ (Frankf. 1698; Leips. 1787, by Mayern, who was accused of being inexact in this work). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adami, Andrea, an Italian musician, director of the Pontifical Chapel at the commencement of the 18th century. He published a volume of musical biographies entitled Osservazioni per ben Regolare il Caso dei Cantori della Cappella Pontificia tanto nelle Funzioni Ordinarie che Straordinarie (1771). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adami, Annibale, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Fermo in 1626. He became a Jesuit in 1641, and was professor of belles-lettres at Rome, where he died, in 1706, leaving, besides many other works, Seminarij Romani Pallas Purpurata sive S. R. E. Cardinales qui e Seminario Romano Prodiere (Rome, 1659, fol.):—Episcopus: Opus Tripartitum Ethico-politico-sacrum, etc. (transl. from the Italian of Sperella, ibid. 1671):—Life of the Protomartyr of Denmark, St. Canute (in Italian, ibid. 1682, 4to):—and a translation of the Sermons of Father Antonio Vieyra (1683, 4to), etc.

Adami, Francesco, canon of Fermo, who lived near the middle of the 16th century, wrote a history of his native country, which was published after his death by Cæsar Ottinelli, under the title De Rebus in Civitate Firmana Gestis, Fragmentarum Libri Duo (Rome, 1591). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adami, Johann Christian, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 13, 1662, at Luckau, in Lower Lusatia. He studied at Wittenberg; was in 1684 appointed deacon in his native place; advanced in 1687 as archdeacon; and in 1691 as pastor there. In 1694 he became a licentiate of theology at Wittenberg; in 1700 he was made doctor of theology; and in 1711 he was appointed general superintendent and first preacher at Lübben, where he died, May 12, 1715. He is the author of hymns and a number of ascetical works. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Ranft, Leben der chursächsischen Gottesgelehrten, s. v. (B. P.)

Adamiani (or Adamitæ). See ADAMITES.

Adamnan, an Irish name (the diminutive of Adam) borne by three men.

1. A Scot of Irish extraction mentioned by Bede (Hist. Eccles. iv, 25) in connection with Coludi-urbs (Coldingham), a mixed monastery, situated on the borders, in the modern Berwickshire. Having, when a young man, committed an offence, a penitential course of life was prescribed, which Adamnan resolved to observe until the end of his days. He continued in Coldingham, from about 670, in the practice of the utmost self-denial, tasting meat and drink only on Sundays and Thursdays. He observed with sorrow the laxity of discipline in the monastery, and is said to have had a revelation of its approaching destruction, which came to pass about 679. He is commemorated in the English martyrology of Wilson Jan. 31, at which day his festival is found in Colgan (Acta SS. Hib. p. 224). See Bollandus, Acta SS. Jan. vol. iii; Mabillon, Annal. Ord. Bened. i, 510.

2. See ADAMANNUS.

3. An Irish bishop, whose Church of Rath-maigh-eaonagh is now known as the parish Church of Raymoghly, near Raphoe, County Donegal. Adamnan's obit as episcopus sapiens is all that is recorded of him, which appears in the Irish annals under the year 781.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Adams, Aaron, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Steuben, N. Y., June 22, 1796. He spent his early life on his father's farm; was converted in 1824, and soon after licensed to preach; entered the Oneida Conference in 1830, and on its division became a member of the Black River Conference. His appointments were Russia, New York Mills, Stockbridge, Little Falls, Fairfield, and Rome; in 1841 he was presiding elder of Herkimer District; in 1845 of Potsdam District; and was afterwards stationed successively at Pulaski, Vienna, Fairfield, Trenton, Marcy, Oriskany, and Floyd. In 1867 he superannuated, and sustained that relation to the close of his life, making his home first at Floyd, then at Steuben, and finally at Rome, N. Y., where he died, May 9, 1879. Mr. Adams's Christian life was without a blot, having always been earnest, active, and steadfast. He was a symmetrical and complete man in 1854. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 79.

Adams, A. L., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born of pious parents at Amenia, N. Y. We have no means of ascertaining the date. He was trained from childhood in ways of righteousness and devotion. At the age of fifteen he experienced conversion, afterwards received a medical education, was licensed to preach in 1842, and in 1851 united with the Rock River Conference. In 1857 his health gave way, and obliged him to retire from active service. He died in Channahon, Ill., Sept. 11, 1859. Mr. Adams possessed a vigorous mind, reasoned clearly, and presented the truth forcibly and convincingly. As a man, his life was above reproach. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1859, p. 304.

Adams, Alexander, Jr., a missionary of the Church of England, was licensed to preach by the bishop of London, Dec. 21, 1748, and was sent to St. James's Parish, in Ann Arundel Co., Md., where he died, Oct. 20, 1767. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 35.

Adams, Alfred S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Union, Me., in December, 1824. He was converted when about twelve years of age through the influence of parental instruction, and in 1850 was admitted into the East Maine Conference. In 1854-55 he located and studied at the East Maine Conference Seminary, and in 1856 re-entered the Conference and continued faithful until the close of 1863, when he enlisted as a private in the Eighteenth Regiment of Maine Volunteers. One year later he was appointed chaplain of the regiment. In 1865 he was readmitted into his Conference, but before reaching his first charge he died at Waldoborough, Me., July 24, 1865. Mr. Adams was a brave Christian soldier. He was small in stature, but of a wiry constitution. His sensibilities were quick; his sermons clear, forcible, and efficient. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1866, p. 111.

Adams, Amos, a Unitarian minister, was born at Medfield, Mass., Sept. 1, 1728. He graduated at Harvard College in 1752, and was ordained and installed pastor of the First Church in Roxbury, Mass., Sept. 12, 1753. He died Oct. 5, 1775. He published a number of single Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 158.

Adams, Charles R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born May 20, 1816. His early history is unrecorded. In 1842 he was admitted into the New York Conference. A persistent bronchial irritation soon obliged him to superannuate, yet he continued to preach as his health would permit until the close of his life. On the division of the New York Conference he became a member of the New York East Conference. The last ten years of his life were spent in Chicago. He died Feb. 28, 1865. Mr. Adams was eminently a man of prayer. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 81.

Adams, Cornelius, a Congregational minister, was born at Canterbury, Conn., Nov. 9, 1776. He graduated at Yale College in 1803, and was ordained at Scotland, Conn., in 1805. He followed Dr. Cogswell in the pastorate of the Church in the last-named place, and died Nov. 28, 1807. The sermon he preached the Sabbath after his ordination was published. See Cong. Quar. 1861, p. 154.

Adams, Daniel S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Unionville, N. J., in 1828. He was early led to Christ; received very limited educational advantages in his youth; entered Charlotteville Seminary in his twenty-fourth year for a ministerial preparation; received license to exhort in 1853; and in 1854 united with the New Jersey Conference. In his second year, failing health obliged him to superannuate. He died May 21, 1873. Mr. Adams was a devoted, useful, much-loved pastor, and a laborious, instructive, successful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 36.

Adams, David, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born about 1796, probably in Tennessee. He was converted in Sullivan County, Tenn., in 1815; received license to preach in 1818; soon after was admitted into the Holston Conference, and in it served diligently until his death, at his residence in Knox County, April 15, 1853. Mr. Adams was one of nature's gifted sons. He possessed rich and varied talents for the pulpit, a commanding voice, fine delivery, and sympathetic temperament. As a field preacher he scarcely had an equal. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1853, p. 434.

Adams, Ezra, a Congregational minister, was born at West Medway, Mass., Aug. 28, 1808. He united with the Church under the pastoral care of Rev. Dr. Ide, graduated at Amherst College in 1835, and, after teaching for a season, entered the East Windsor (Conn.) Theological Seminary, and, having finished its curriculum, was ordained pastor of the Church in Surrey, N. H., in 1839. From Surrey he went, in 1842, to Roxbury, N. H., where he continued seven years. He was installed pastor at Gilsun in 1856. He died March 20, 1864. Mr. Adams was a faithful pastor and minister, distinguished for his self-sacrifice, and took deep interest in the education of the young. He wrote for the Massachusetts Sabbath-school Society a little volume entitled Advice to an Inquirer, or Children Led to Christ. See Cong. Quarterly, 1864, p. 208.

Adams, Ezra E., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Concord, N. H., and graduated at Dartmouth College. Early in his ministry he became a chaplain to the seamen at Havre, France, remaining in that position about ten years. He visited England, Scotland, Denmark, and other countries of Northern Europe, going as far as St. Petersburg. Returning to America, he was chosen pastor of the Pearl Street Congregational Church, Nashua, N. H. Here he spent six years. He next entered the service of the Foreign Evangelical Society and went to Philadelphia, where he soon became known among the Presbyterian churches as an attractive and eloquent preacher. He then founded the Church of the Spring Garden Hall congregation, which, under his eloquent and earnest preaching, became very strong and active. His health failed, and he went to Switzerland and Italy and came back much improved, but soon had to leave his duties. In a short time he was elected professor of rhetoric and kindred subjects in Lincoln University, Oxford, Pa. He became one of the editors of the Presbyterian in 1870, retaining at the same time his professorship in the university. He died Nov. 3, 1871. Dr. Adams was a thoroughly noble man, with large intelligence. See Presbyterian, Nov. 11, 1871.

Adams, Fitzherbert, D.D., an English divine, was born in 1651, and was educated at Lincoln College, where he took his M.A. June 4, 1675. He was inducted into the rectory of Waddington, Sept. 29, 1683; and elected rector of Lincoln College in May, 1685. The same year he became prebendary of the sixth stall, Durham; was removed to the tenth in 1695, and to the eleventh in 1711. He was vice-chancellor in 1695, and died June 17, 1719. As rector of Lincoln he held the living of Twiford, and, having received fifteen hundred pounds for renewing the lease, he expended it upon the college chapel and rector's lodging. He bequeathed his library to the college, and was a benefactor to All-Saints' Church, Oxford.

Adams, George Eliashib, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Worthington, Mass., Oct. 27, 1801. He prepared for college at Phillips Academy, graduated at Yale College in 1821, and at the Andover Theological Seminary in 1826. From 1826 to 1829 he was professor of sacred literature in the Bangor Theological Seminary. In the latter year he was ordained at Bangor and installed pastor at Brunswick, Me. He resigned in the following year, and was acting pastor of Trinity Congregational Church, Orange, N. J., from March, 1870, to March, 1875, and died there Dec. 25, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 418.

Adams, George Washington, a Congregational minister, was born at Limerick, Me., May 16, 1808. When fourteen years of age, he was apprenticed to a tanner, and worked at that trade until he was of age. He then commenced his preparatory studies for the ministry. Having graduated at Bowdoin College, he spent two years at Bangor Theological Seminary, and was ordained at Brooksville, Me., in 1837, commencing his ministry there in the midst of a powerful revival. He remained here two years, after which he was pastor successively in Hillsborough, N. H.; Dracut, Mass.; Shirley and Jaffrey, N. H.; and Riverpoint, R. I., where he died Dec. 9, 1862, after five years of labor there. "Mr. Adams was a man of Puritan energy, earnestness, and simplicity, and his preaching was doctrinal, pungent, and uncompromising. Several revivals attended his ministry." See Cong. Quarterly, 1863, p. 192.

Adams, Ira, a Universalist minister, was born at Newtonville, Mass., April 5, 1841. He removed with his parents to Frewsburg, Chautauqua Co., N. Y., in 1847; studied for the ministry at Dunkirk, N. Y., and Canton Theological School, and in 1867 began preaching. He was ordained to the work of the ministry at Stockton, N. Y., where he labored faithfully and successfully two years, when ill-health obliged him to relinquish the regular ministry and enter secular business. He died Dec. 21, 1869. Mr. Adams was characterized by fidelity, modesty, purity of life, consecration, and geniality. See Universalist Register, 1871, p. 99.

Adams, James (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born Sept. 12, 1772. He studied in his early days under Rev. James Hall, D.D., of North Carolina, and studied theology under the Rev. James M'Fee, D.D., of the same state; was licensed to preach by the Oregon Presbytery in 1795; was employed by the Congregational Church of Dorchester, S. C., where he was ordained in 1799. He died Aug. 18, 1843. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 321.

Adams, James (2), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Beaufort County, N. C., in 1800. He graduated at Princeton College, and also at the Theological Seminary. After entering the ministry, he labored as a missionary in destitute portions of Pennsylvania. A call was sent to him from Monticello, Sullivan Co., N. Y., which he accepted, and he was ordained and installed pastor of the same. He was a ripe scholar and an eloquent preacher. As a pastor, the twenty-one years of service in this Church bear testimony to his fidelity. His health failing, he entered upon the duties of a large school in Jefferson County, N. Y., but he was obliged to relinquish it after six months. He died Feb. 7, 1857. (W. P. S.)

Adams, James (3), a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born at Franklin, Mass. He was ordained in 1839, and his ministry of nearly thirty years was almost entirely devoted to building up feeble parishes in New Jersey and Connecticut. He died at Poquetanoc, Conn., Oct. 29, 1868, as rector of St. James's Church in that place. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. Jan. 1869, p. 640.

Adams, James M'Ewen Hall, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Lincoln County, N. C., Dec. 25, 1810. He received a classical education at Georgia University; a theological education at the Theological Seminary of Columbia, S. C.; joined the Presbyterian Church, and was ordained by the Bethel Presbytery in 1834 as an evangelist. He died at Yorkville, S. C., March 31, 1862. Possessed of fine intellectual gifts, well disciplined by education, and a heart full of noble and generous zeal, Mr. Adams was eminently qualified for the work of the ministry. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 422.

Adams, John (1), D.D., an English divine, was born in London, and educated at Cambridge, being admitted to King's College in 1678, and receiving the degree of A.B. in 1682, and of A.M. in 1686. In 1687 he was presented by the lord-chancellor Jeffreys to the living of Hickham, in Leicestershire. In London he was lecturer of St. Clement's; rector of St. Alban's, Wood Street, and of St. Bartholomew's. He was also a prebendary of Canterbury, chaplain in ordinary to queen Anne, and in 1708 canon of Windsor. He was presented in 1711 to the living of Hornsey, and in the following year was elected provost of King's College, which position he held until his death, in 1719. Fifteen of his sermons were printed (1695-1712). See Alumni Etonenses, p. 48; Cook, Preacher's Assistant.

Adams, John (2), a Congregational minister, was the son of Matthew Adams, whose literary tastes, although he was a mechanic, led him to collect a fine library, for the use of which Dr. Franklin acknowledges his obligations. His son John was a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1745. For thirty years (1748-78) he was minister of Durham, N. H. From Durham he removed to Newfield, York Co., Me., where he preached and practiced medicine till his death, June 4, 1792. He is said to have been subject at times to great depression of spirits, and at other times was unduly excited. When in this latter state he was unusually animated in his preaching. See Allen, American Biog. Dict. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Adams, John (3), LL.D., an American teacher and philanthropist, was born at Canterbury, Conn., in 1772. He graduated at Yale College in 1795, and taught the academy in his native town until 1798. He became rector of Plainfield Academy in 1800; principal of Bacon Academy, Colchester, Conn., in 1803; and principal of Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass., in 1810, which position he held until 1833. During this period, he was one of the founders of several benevolent societies. At the close of the period of his labors at Andover, he removed to Illinois, where he gave much attention to improving the school laws of that state, and organized several hundred Sunday-schools. His death occurred at Jacksonville, April 24, 1863. He wrote several works on the training of the young, a part of which were published and others left in manuscript.

Adams, John (4), a Bible Christian minister, was born in the parish of Kirkhampton, Cornwall, England, in 1784. He was converted when young, entered the itinerancy in 1825, and was superannuated in 1848. He died May 7, 1863.

Adams, John (5), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland, March 7, 1785. He was educated at the University of Glasgow, and studied theology privately. He emigrated to the United States in 1832, joined the Associate Presbyterian Church, and was appointed to preach at Guinston, York Co., Pa. He died Jan. 14, 1862. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 355.

Adams, John (6), an English Congregational minister, was born at Linton, Cambridgeshire, in 1787. Here he was surrounded by good religious influences from his infancy. He was educated at Wymondley College, near Hitchin; was ordained at Market-Deeping, June 17, 1813; and soon afterwards went to Redhill, near Royston, where he labored until 1864. He died Jan. 14, 1866. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 267.

Adams, John (7), a Congregational minister, was born at Salem, Mass., Nov. 30, 1813. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1837; entered the Andover Theological Seminary, but did not remain long; preached in Warren, Vt., six months; was acting pastor at Cambridge, Mass., in 1839, and at Essex in 1840; was ordained July 21, 1841, at Underhill North, Vt.; dismissed in October, 1843; installed at Sharon June 26, 1844; dismissed May 1, 1857. He was acting pastor at Hanover Centre, N. H., from 1857 to 1861; and at Hillsborough Centre from that time until his death, May 19, 1879. See Statistics of Cong. Ministers, 1879.

Adams, John Dietrich, a German Reformed minister, was a native of Hesse, in Germany. He emigrated to America in 1808, and accepted a call from the churches at Sunbury, Pa., and a few neighboring places. He was received as a member of the Synod in 1809, and on account of using strong drink was expelled in 1813. He died soon after. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iii, 470.

Adams, John H., an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Worcester, Jan. 29, 1788. He was piously trained, converted under J. McByron in 1811, and entered the ministry in 1815. He became a supernumerary in 1846, after having labored in various parts of England and several years in France, and died Dec. 15, 1846. Mr. Adams stood high in the esteem of his brethren, and his private and ministerial character was irreproachable. His sermons were instructive and convincing. See Minutes of the Brit. Conference, 1847.

Adams, John M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was admitted into the Virginia Conference in 1866, and in it labored until the close of his life, July 9, 1879. As to Mr. Adams's birth and early life, we have no means of information. Through his instrumentality many were added to the Church. He was an affectionate father, a devoted Christian, and a clear, pointed, soul-stirring preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 20.

Adams, John Ripley, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Plainfield, Conn., March 20, 1802. He was a graduate of Yale College in the class of 1821. He entered the Andover Theological Seminary, Mass., in 1823, and was licensed as a Congregational minister in 1826. Though he labored in churches known as Congregational, he was a member of the Londonderry Presbytery. He died at Northampton, Mass., April 25, 1866. He was an eminent scholar and a successful teacher. For many years he was principal of Phillips's Academy at Andover. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1867, p. 119.

Adams, John Watson, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Simsbury, Conn., Dec. 6, 1796. He was converted in 1816, graduated at Hamilton College in 1822, and afterwards studied in the Auburn Theological Seminary. In 1826 he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church in Syracuse, N. Y., where he remained until his death, April 6, 1850. After his death there was published a duodecimo volume of his Discourses, in connection with a Memoir of his life and character, by the Rev. Joel Parker, D.D. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 688.

Adams, Joseph (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Braintree, Mass., Jan. 1, 1689. He graduated at Harvard College in 1710; was ordained at Newington, N. H., Nov. 16, 1715; and died May 26, 1783. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 456.

Adams, Joseph (2), a Unitarian minister, was a native of Newbury, Mass.; graduated at Harvard College in 1742; was ordained at Stratham, N. H., June 24, 1756; and died Feb. 24, 1785. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 14.

Adams, Joseph (3), a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1780. He made a profession of his faith in Christ in the Methodist Church, but subsequently a change of sentiments led him to join a Baptist Church. He was ordained pastor of a church in Jay, Me., where he remained for fourteen years. After ten years, spent chiefly in labors as an itinerant minister, he returned in 1828 to the church of which he had been pastor in Jay, and continued in office for three years (1828-31). Resigning a second time, he gave himself more or less to itinerant work so long as he was able to preach. He died in 1844. See Millett, Hist. of the Baptists in Maine, p. 433. (J. C. S.)

Adams, Joseph (4), a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1809. He was dismissed from the Palestine to the Wisconsin Presbytery Sept. 13, 1850. In 1871 he was a member of the Dubuque Presbytery, but was at Frankville, Ia., without charge. He died March 6, 1871. See Norton, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Illinois.

Adams, Joseph Augustus, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at South New Market, N. H., March 17, 1818. He was converted while attending the Wesleyan University, where he graduated in 1842. The two following years he was employed as principal of an academy at Norwich, Conn.; the next year as theological teacher at Andover; and then as teacher in the New Hampshire Conference Seminary. In 1846 he entered the New England Conference. In 1859 he travelled for his health, and died in San Francisco, Aug. 27, 1860. Mr. Adams was modest, cheerful, cultured in mind and spirit, and devout. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1861, p. 54.

Adams, Joseph B., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Chester County, Pa., in 1801. He made a profession of religion in 1819; graduated at Jefferson College in 1820 and Princeton Seminary in 1826; and entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church in 1827. In 1828 he was employed by the American Sunday-school Union for the purpose of establishing Sabbath schools through the states of New York and Pennsylvania. He labored in Georgia as a missionary for nearly three years, when he removed to Alabama and joined the Tuscaloosa Presbytery. He died at Easton, Pa., July 5, 1865. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 89.

Adams, Joseph D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Williamsburg District, S. C., Dec. 26, 1820. He joined the Church in 1831, though he did not profess religion until 1837; removed to Georgia in 1835; became class leader in 1838; was licensed to exhort in 1841; and in 1846 united with the Georgia Conference. In 1858 he removed to Louisiana, and joined the Louisiana Conference, in which he labored until his death, July 26, 1873. Mr. Adams, as a preacher, was richly instructive, apt in illustration, and his sermons were always delivered with much unction. In exhortation and prayer he had few equals as to pathos and fervor; as a pastor he excelled. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1874, p. 383.

Adams, Josiah (1), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Woodsfield, O., July 25, 1818. He experienced religion in his eighth year; received license to exhort in his sixteenth year; soon after became a local preacher; and in 1841 was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference, in which he served the Church faithfully until his death, April 10, 1851. Mr. Adams was a self-made man of refinement, accuracy, and breadth of knowledge. He possessed excellent natural ministerial gifts. His preaching was attended with unusual power, and everywhere he was highly honored. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1851, p. 603.

Adams, Josiah (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at West Haddon, Northamptonshire, England, in 1821, of pious Wesleyan parents. He experienced religion at the age of sixteen; was soon licensed to preach; emigrated to America in 1853; and in 1857 was admitted into the Central Ohio Conference, wherein he labored with great acceptability and usefulness until his death, Oct. 14, 1866. Mr. Adams, as a preacher, was earnest, practical, and pointed; as a Christian, upright and honorable in all his deportment. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 163.

Adams, Lucius, a Canadian Methodist minister, was born at Esqueving, Ont., in 1830. He was converted in childhood, and was educated at the Albion Institute, Mich., and the Victoria College, Ont., where he was distinguished by his assiduity and proficiency. In 1854 he was received by the Conference, having been previously sent to Mitchell, Ont., where a revival crowned his labors. He died in the midst of his success at Mitchell, Aug. 29, 1855. See Carroll, Case and his Contemporaries, v, 151.

Adams, Moses (1), a Unitarian minister, was born at Framingham, Mass., Oct. 16, 1749. He graduated at Harvard College in 1771; was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Acton, June 25, 1777; and died Oct. 13, 1819. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 115.

Adams, Moses (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Jefferson County, N. Y., Jan. 11, 1806. He joined the Church in his youth, and in 1830 united with the Oneida Conference, in which for nearly twenty years he did effective work, though physically weak. In 1854 he removed to Racine, Wis. The last year of his life he spent in Kansas making a way for Methodism. He died of overwork some time in 1871 or 1872. He was well-informed, disciplined, and refined; laborious and sympathetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 55.

Adams, N. H., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, died Oct. 23, 1854, while rector of St. Matthew's Church, Unadilla, N. Y. For twenty-seven years he had ministered in this parish, which embraced his entire ministry. He was of an amiable disposition, and very much beloved by his Church. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1854, p. 627.

Adams, Nehemiah, D.D., an eminent Congregational minister, was born at Salem, Mass., Feb. 19, 1806. He graduated at the Harvard University in the class of 1826. He pursued his theological studies at the Andover Seminary, where he graduated in 1829. Dec. 17 of that year he was ordained and installed as colleague pastor with the Rev. Dr. Holmes of the First Congregational Church, Cambridge; and March 28, 1834, he was installed as pastor of the Essex Street Church, Boston. On account of failing health, he was obliged, in 1869, to resign his pastorate; but the society refused to accept his resignation, choosing rather to obtain an associate pastor and allow him to travel for the benefit of his health. He made a long voyage in the fall of 1869 to San Francisco, thence to Honolulu and Hong Kong, and returned in 1870. He died in Boston Oct. 6, 1878.

Dr. Adams was a Christian gentleman, and though often engaged in keen controversies, no word ever fell from his tongue or pen that betrayed anger or resentment. His piety was of a deep and spiritual character, and he possessed in an eminent degree the graces of the Christian. These qualities appear in his published writings, but they greatly enriched and beautified his long and useful life. He was for many years an officer of the American Tract Society, and of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

Not long after entering upon his ministry in Boston, Dr. Adams became engaged in the Unitarian controversy, on which topic he preached vigorous and scholarly sermons, and published several books in defence of Trinitarian doctrine. One of these publications was entitled Remarks on the Unitarian Belief. In a periodical entitled The Spirit of the Pilgrims, published from 1826 to 1833, and devoted to the defence of the Puritan faith, as against the modifying and destructive tendencies of modern liberal thought, he appeared with great frequency. Other published writings of his are, The Friends of Christ in the New Testament:—A Life of John Eliot:—An Autobiography of Thomas Shepard:—Christ, a Friend:—Agnes and the Key of her Little Coffin:—Bertha and her Baptism:—Communion Sabbath:— and others of a devotional and religious character, including tracts, hymns, poems, addresses, and discourses. His South Side View of Slavery, published in 1854, is perhaps the best-remembered of his books, from the strong feeling it called out on the part of abolitionists. This book was the expression of a favorable opinion formed of Southern institutions during a winter spent in Georgia for his health, and it elicited a wide and warm discussion in the North, in connection with which Dr. Adams published his correspondence with governor Wise of Virginia. See Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 36. (W. P. S.)

Adams, Newton, M.D., a Baptist missionary, was born at East Bloomfield, N. Y., in 1804. When he was thirty years of age he decided to enter upon missionary life, and in that capacity, in 1834, went to South Africa to labor among the Zulus. He was one of six men who with their wives went to the Zulu country to establish there a missionary station. In 1844 he was ordained a minister of the Gospel. His death occurred Sept. 16, 1851, when he was in the prime of his life and of his usefulness. See Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Adams, Obadiah, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted in Loombridge, Sussex, where he became a very useful local preacher. He was appointed to labor in Jamaica, W. I., in 1818, and was successfully conducting the mission in Spanish Town when he was cut off by fever, April 18, 1816, at the age of twenty-nine years. See Minutes of British Conference, 1820.

Adams, Phineas, a Unitarian minister, was born at Rowley, Mass., in 1741. He graduated at Harvard College in 1762, was ordained pastor of the Church in West Haverhill in 1770, and, after serving it successfully for nearly thirty years, died Nov. 17, 1801. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 222.

Adams, Richard, M.A., an English Nonconformist, was educated at Cambridge, where he was admitted A.M. in 1644. He afterwards, 1646, entered Brasenose College, Oxford, and soon after obtained a fellowship. In 1655 he was presented to the living of St. Mildred, Bread Street, London, where he continued until ejected for nonconformity in 1662. He afterwards preached to a small congregation in Southwark, and died at Hoxton in 1684. Besides Sermons of his own, he assisted in the publication of some of his brother's works, and those of Mr. Charnock. He also compiled the Commentary on Philippians and Colossians in Poole's Bible.

Adams, Samuel R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Campton, N. H., June 5, 1825. He was converted when but fifteen years of age, and always maintained an unblemished Christian character. He obtained his education by his own exertions; graduated at Wesleyan University in 1851; spent two years in teaching in his own state; and in 1853 went to Indiana with the intention of devoting his life to school-teaching. He was licensed to preach in 1854, and admitted into the Indiana Conference in 1857. After teaching a short time in Aurora, he took charge of the Seminary at Wilmington, in the same state, and three years later was chosen president of Moore's Hill Male and Female Collegiate Institute, which position he held till near the close of his life. In 1861 he was appointed chaplain of the 26th Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and, after sixteen months' service, died at Springfield, Mo., Dec. 19, 1862. Mr. Adams was an ardent patriot, a kind and courteous teacher, and an earnest, instructive, practical preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 171.

Adams, Samuel W., D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Vernon, N. Y., in August, 1815. He pursued his collegiate studies at Hamilton College, and studied theology at the Hamilton Theological Seminary. For three years he was pastor of the Church in his native town. Here he remained until called to the pastorate of the First Baptist Church in Cleveland, O., in 1846, which office he held fourteen years, and was greatly respected and beloved in the community. He died Oct. 29, 1864. See Appletons' Annual Cyclop. iv, 621.

Adams, Solomon, a Congregational minister, was born at Middleton, Mass., March 30, 1797. He graduated at Harvard College in 1820, and at the Andover Theological Seminary in 1823. In the autumn of the same year he became principal of Washington Academy at East Machias, Me., where he remained five years. In 1828 he removed to Portland, taking charge of the Free Street Seminary. After serving in this institution for twelve years, he removed to Boston, where for many years he was principal of a similar school. Mr. Adams was very much interested in education, and was an efficient member and officer of the American Institute of Education. In 1825 he was ordained as an evangelist, but, although he preached frequently, his greatest success was achieved as a teacher. He died at Auburndale, Mass., July 20, 1870. See Cong. Quar. 1871, p. 325.

Adams, Theophilus B., a Baptist minister, was born in New Hampshire in 1798. He entered the ministry, as did most of the Baptist ministers of his time, with but little preparation for the work except a heart warmly interested in the spiritual welfare of his fellow-men. His own experience taught him the value of an education, and he encouraged sound learning for the ministers of the Gospel. He was twelve years in the work, eight of which were spent in Acworth, N. H., where he died, Aug. 15, 1831. See Christian Watchman, Sept. 9, 1831. (J. C. S.)

Adams, Thomas (1), brother of Richard, became a student of Brasenose College, Oxford, England, in July, 1649, and was made fellow in June, 1652. He was much esteemed for his learning, piety, and diligence. Ejected from the university in 1662, he resided for a considerable time in the family of Sir Samuel Jones, and afterwards was chaplain to the countess-dowager of Clare. He died Dec. 11, 1670. He wrote a few tracts on the principles of religion, and one on the controversy between the Church and Dissenters. See Wood, Fasti, vol. ii.

Adams, Thomas (2), a Unitarian minister, was a native of Roxbury, Mass., and graduated at Harvard University in 1788. He was ordained at Camden, S. C., Nov. 18, 1791, and died Aug. 16, 1797. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 67.

Adams, William (1), a Congregational minister, was left an orphan when nine years old. He probably obtained his preparatory education at Ipswich, Mass., and in 1667 entered Harvard University, graduating in 1671. Soon after, he was invited to preach at Westfield, Mass., but it does not appear that he accepted the invitation. In February, 1672, he preached at Dedham, when the congregation unanimously invited him to become their pastor, and he was duly ordained Dec. 3, 1673. Little is known of his ministry. He died at Dedham, Aug. 17, 1685, at the age of thirty-five. Two of his sermons—one preached in 1678, the other in 1685—were published. A Commentary on 1 Tim., written by him, is still preserved, and is exceedingly elaborate. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 181.

Adams, William (2), D.D., an English divine, was born at Shrewsbury in 1707, and entered Pembroke College, Oxford, at the age of thirteen years. He took the degree of A.M., April 18, 1727, and afterwards obtained a fellowship. In 1732 he was presented to the curacy (or vicarage) of St. Chad's, Shrewsbury, upon which occasion he quitted the college. He took his degrees of B.D. and D.D. at Oxford in 1756, and in July 26, 1775, became Master of Pembroke; in consequence obtaining a prebend of Gloucester attached to that office. The year before he went last to Oxford, Mrs. Elizabeth Cressett presented him with the rectory of Cound, in Shropshire, which he retained till his death. When he became Master of Pembroke, he resigned the living of St. Chad, and was soon after made archdeacon of Llandaff. He died at his prebendal home at Gloucester, Jan. 13, 1789. He published three occasional Sermons (1741, 1742, 1749), but his principal work was an Essay on Hume's Essay on Miracles (1752, 8vo). Two volumes of Sermons, etc., were printed (Shrewsbury, 1777, 1790). His sermon on True and False Doctrine caused a dispute, although neither he nor Rev. William Romaine, a sermon of whose he criticised, took any part in the controversy. See Gentleman's Mag. 1789; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Biblog. s. v.

Adams, William (3), an early Methodist preacher, was born in Fairfax County, Va., July 23, 1759. In 1775, after a season of distress and powerful conviction, he was converted. He was received on trial by the Conference in 1779, and appointed to the Baltimore Circuit, where he served with great profit for about six months. He died Dec. 3, 1779. See Jackson, Lives of Early Methodist Preachers, vi, 275.

Adams, William (4), D.D., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Colchester, Conn., Jan. 25, 1807. He received his early education from his father, John Adams, LL.D., the eminent teacher and philanthropist, president of Phillips Academy, Andover, Mass. It was here the son laid the foundation of that accurate and extensive scholarship in ancient and modern learning which enriched his life and public labors. He graduated at Yale College in 1827. He pursued his theological studies at Andover Seminary, and was licensed to preach in Boston in 1830, and ordained and installed pastor of the Congregational Church in Brighton, Mass., where he remained for three years; and, after preaching a short time in Pearl Street, New York, he accepted a call from the Central Presbyterian Church in Broome Street, New York, where he was installed in 1834. His whole subsequent life was spent in that city; and his name and influence have been happily identified with its best interests, religious, civil, and social, for nearly half a century. In 1853 the Madison Square Presbyterian Church was organized; and a large and beautiful building was erected on the eastern side of the square. Of this church he became pastor.

Dr. Adams stood at the head of the profession in the denomination which he distinguished by his scholarship, his varied accomplishments, his purity and dignity of life and manners. In the division which took place in the Presbyterian Church, Dr. Adams became identified with the New-school branch. In May, 1852, he was elected moderator of the Assembly which was held in Washington, D. C. When the movement was made to effect a reunion of the two severed branches, he was one of the hearty promoters of the same, and was made chairman of the Committee of Conference on the part of the New-school Assembly appointed in 1866; and continued to act in that capacity until the reunion was consummated. At the meetings of the two assemblies in New York in 1869, when the preliminaries were definitely arranged, he appeared before the Old-school Assembly in the Brick Church, to present the cordial greetings of the Assembly with which he was connected. He was often designated to represent the clergy on occasions of great responsibility, and always proved himself equal to the occasion. At the Evangelical Alliance of 1873 held in New York, Dr. Adams was naturally and without question selected as the most suitable man to deliver, in the name of the American Alliance, the address of welcome to the distinguished theologians, professors, preachers, and laymen from all other lands.

In the fall of 1873 Dr. Adams was elected president of the Union Theological Seminary and professor of sacred rhetoric. Twice before he had been elected to the same position, but had declined. He was eminently qualified for the position by his extensive and varied attainments as a scholar, combined with his rare elocutionary gifts as a speaker. The ministerial labor of Dr. Adams was by no means the extent and measure of his work. He was identified with all the benevolent schemes of the Church, and devoted much of his time to their practical working. He was a frequent contributor to religious and secular journals, and an industrious writer otherwise. Besides sermons, addresses, magazine articles, etc., he published in 1850, The Three Gardens, Eden, Gethsemane, and Paradise:—Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, with Biographical Introduction:—Thanksgiving Memories of the Day, and Helps to the Habit:—Conversations of Jesus Christ with Representative Men. His Lecture on the Catacombs of Rome, delivered to a crowded audience in Association Hall, was one of the most interesting ever given to a New York audience. He was the first to read and interpret correctly the inscriptions on the monuments in the Catacombs. He died at Orange Mountain, N. J., Aug. 31, 1880.

Dr. Adams was a very successful teacher. He had an old department, into which little that was new could be introduced; but he treated it in a wonderfully fresh way. He delivered lectures regularly to the senior class, and at first also to the junior class. But his strength was in his method of giving private instruction to all of the students. It was his custom to call some one of them to him every day, and, taking him into the chapel, have him go through the whole service. At the conclusion of these exercises, he would criticise the efforts of the student kindly but severely.

Dr. Adams was remarkable for his fine personal appearance. He had a commanding figure, a graceful, dignified presence, and a courtly address. When a young man he was six feet high, and possessed a light, elastic step. His great energy and indefatigable industry kept him constantly employed at some task. His cheerful disposition and conversational powers made him an amiable companion. He had a large acquaintance with men prominent in all of the professions in this country and Europe. See N. Y. Observer, Sept. 2; N. Y. Tribune, Sept. 1, 1880; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v. (W. P. S.)

Adams, William (5), an English clergyman, was born in 1814. He became vicar of St. Peter's, Oxford; acquired considerable celebrity as a writer of religious works; and died in 1848. Among his published works are, Shadow of the Cross (1842):—Sacred Allegories (2d ed. 1844):—The Fall of Cæsus (1846):—and Warnings of Holy Week (3d ed. 1849). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Adams, William (6), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Sheerness, England, Jan. 1, 1831. He emigrated to the United States with his widowed mother in 1841, experienced religion in 1850, and joined the Baptist Church. Later he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church; studied for the ministry at Cazenovia Seminary; and in 1855 entered the Oneida Conference, in which he served the Church with fidelity, ability, and success until overwork compelled him to retire in 1875. He died at Sioux City, Ia., June 13, 1877. Mr. Adams was an extensive reader, a diligent student, a close and fluent writer, and a ready speaker. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 117.

Adams, Zabdiel, a Congregational minister, was born at Braintree, Mass., Nov. 5, 1739. He was immediately connected with the celebrated Adams family, his father being an uncle of John Adams. He was a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1759. He was ordained as pastor of the Church in Lunenburg, Mass., Sept. 5, 1764, and died March 1, 1801, in the thirty-seventh year of his ministry. He preached the Duddelean Lecture on Presbyterian ordination in 1794, and published several Sermons, one of which was the election sermon before the Massachusetts Legislature in 1782. See Whitney, Funeral Sermon; Allen, Amer. Biog. (J. C. S.)

Adams, Zenas, a Canadian Methodist minister, brother of the Rev. Ezra Adams, was born at Ascott, Ont., in 1795. He was called into the work in connection with the New England Conference in 1814; labored in New Haven and Danville (Conn.), Unity, Salisbury, and Weymouth (Mass.) in 1826, and in the Boston District; located in 1829; and returned to Canada and settled at Esquesing, where he died, probably in 1852. He was very successful in winning souls. The sick and the wayward, the toiling and unfortunate, blessed him for his ministrations of care and comfort. In prayer and class meetings his gifts were inimitable. His powers of argumentation were formidable, enabling him to trace out the most subtle errors and expose them with great effect. See Carroll, Case and his Contemporaries, (1869), ii, 189-194.

Adamson, JOHN, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in 1784, and died Aug. 12, 1857. Uprightness and integrity marked his Christian character through all his life. As a minister, he was known but little outside his own society, for it was only one year before his death that he was first recorded as a minister. See Annual Monitor, 1858, p. 1.

Adamus Magister. See ADAM of BREMEN.

Adar, an Assyrian deity, the god of the thunderbolt and storm-cloud, was called "the Sun of the South," and was also the deity of physical power, corresponding to the Greek Hercules. He was frequently also called Bar and Ninip.

In the Persian religion, Adar is the breath of the holy fire, also the spirit which animates it. Of the holy fire there are many kinds: (1) Berezeheny, fire in the earth, proved by the burning naphtha springs; a purified form was worshipped in three different holy places of Persia;

(2) Wufreian, fire in living beings (animal heat); (3) Oruazeshi, the fire in plants; (4) Wazeshi, the fire in the clouds (lightning); (5) Speneshi, the fire in houses, kitchens, etc.; (6) Ormuzd, the pure fire burning on the altars, whose highest potency was the Brahma fire; (7) Ferobun, worshipped under Jemshid; (8) Gochasp, adored under Chosroes; and (9) Burzin Matun, worshipped under Zerdusht. To touch the holy fire with the hand was forbidden, and was punishable by death, even though a priest became guilty of it. See FIRE.

Adauctus, a Christian martyr, was a royal steward in a city of Phrygia, the name of which is unknown. He perished during the persecution of Diocletian, about 303. He is commemorated by the Latin Church, Feb. 7; by the Greeks, Oct. 3 or 4.—London, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Valesius states (Notes to Eusebius) that the Adauctus (or Audactus) mentioned above is not the same with the one celebrated by the Roman Church. But we find that there are two saints of this name commemorated at Rome. One was a companion of Felix, an African bishop, martyred with him in the Diocletian persecution, and is probably the same with the one commemorated Aug. 30. See Baillet, Vies des Saints, vol. ii, Aug. 30; Ruinart, p. 248.

Adda, one of the companions of St. Cedd in his mission to the Middle-Angles in 653. He was an Englishman by birth, and brother of Uta, abbot of Gatheshead. See Bede, Hist. Eccles. iii, 21.

Adda, FRANCESCO D', Conte, was a Milanese nobleman and amateur painter, who studied under Leonardo da Vinci. He painted small cabinet-pictures in the style of his master. He died in 1550.

Addæi Doctrina. Under this title there is extant what purports to be a history of the introduction of Christianity into Edessa by Addæus, or Addai, one of the seventy disciples sent there by the apostle Judas, St. Thomas. From the narrative, as published by Cureton, Ancient Syriac Documents Relative to the Earliest Establishment of Christianity in Edessa (Lond. 1864, with a preface by W. Wright), and more complete by Phillips, The Doctrine of Addai the Apostle, now First Edited in a Complete Form in the Original Syriac, with an English Translation and Notes (ibid. 1876), we learn that Addai, or Thaddeus, not only converted king Abgar Ukama, but also the larger portion of the nobles and people of Edessa, and built churches in and about that place. Addai died in peace, but Aggæus, his successor, was killed by an apostatized son of Abgar, and was buried by the believers in the church where he was murdered. The author of this narrative signs himself Labubna, a contemporary. Cureton, Phillips, and Bickell regard this document as genuine, and as the source from which Eusebius derived his material concerning the introduction of Christianity into Edessa. Not so, however, Nestle, in a review of Phillips's work in Schluter's Literaturzeitung, 1876, p. 644, who, while admitting that some passages which are found in Eusebius may be accounted for by a hasty translation from the extant Syriac text, yet thinks that the differences existing between Eusebius and the Doctrina are so great that it seems to be improbable that the former should have perused the latter. As to the age of the composition there is also a difference of opinion. Nöldeke places it about the year 300, Wagenmann in the latter half of the 2d century, and Bickell in the 1st century. According to the latter, the conversion of the king and people of Edessa during the 1st century must now be regarded as a matter of fact, although he would not identify Addai with Thaddeus. See Bickell, Conspectus Rei Syrorum Literariæ (Monasterii, 1871), p. 15 sq.; the same in Literarischer Handweiser für das katholische Deutschland (1869), p. 145 sq.; Wagenmann, in Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, xxi, 320-322; Nöldeke, in Liter. Cen-

Addaru, the twelfth month of the Assyrian year. It was dedicated to the seven great gods; was called by the Accadians Sekisil, "sowing of seed," and answered roughly to our February.

Addas, one of the three disciples of Manes, who, according to the Acts of Archelus, was originally sent to preach his master's doctrines in Scythia, and was afterwards commissioned with the others to collect Christian books. He was subsequently sent as a missionary to the East. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catech. vi, 31) gives his name as Baddus (Baddâc). Photius (Biblioth. Cod. 85) mentions certain writings of Addas, one of which was entitled Môdlov, in allusion to Mark iv, 21, and which was refuted by Diodorus of Tarsus. The Greek form of abjuration (Cotelier, Patres Apost. i, 544) mentions a work against Moses and the prophets as written by Addas in conjunction with Adimantus (q. v.).

Adderborn, COUNCIL OF OF NEAR (Concilium Adderburnense), was held in a place of that name, near the river Nadder (or Nodder), in Wiltshire, England, in 705. The council was composed of English abbots and bishops, and confirmed a grant of free election of their abbot to the abbeys of Malmesbury, Frome, and Bradford, which grant had been made by bishop Aldhelm. See William of Malmsb. lib. v, De Questis Pontif.; Wilkins, i, 68.

Addi Fuson, in Hindû mythology, was a festival in honor of the goddess Parvati, the wife of Siva, in the month of Addi. It was celebrated in the temples of Siva. The goddess, on this occasion, was triumphantly carried through the streets on a wagon.

Addington, STEPHEN, D.D., a learned Dissenting minister, was born at Northampton, England, June 9, 1729, and was educated under Dr. Doddridge. Having been admitted to preach, he removed in 1750 to Spaldick, Huntingdonshire, and in 1752 became minister of a Dissenting congregation at Market-Harborough, Leicestershire. In 1758 he opened his house for the reception of pupils, and for many years he devoted nine hours each day to their instruction. He removed to Miles Lane, Cannon Street, London, in 1781, and soon after was chosen tutor of a new Dissenting academy at Mile End. He continued in the care of his congregation till within a few months of his death, Feb. 6, 1796. Besides several educational works, he wrote, Maxims Religious and Prudential, with a Sermon to Young People (12mo):—Dissertation on the Religious Knowledge of the Ancient Jews and Patriarchs, etc. (1757, 4to):—Life of St. Paul the Apostle (Lond. 1784, 4to):—Sermon on Hosea iv, 6 (ibid. 1786, 8vo). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. s. v.; Theol. Mag. Jan. 1803, p. 7.

Addir (the mighty Father), a name applied to the true God by the Philistines, because he had visited the Egyptians with plagues.

Addis, W. B., an English Congregational minister, was first appointed by the London Missionary Society to Travancore, India, and in 1830 was transferred to Coimbatore, where he continued till 1861, when failing health compelled him to retire from active service. He resided at Coonoor, on the Neigherries, till his death, Feb. 18, 1871. See (Lond.) Comp. Year-book, 1872, p. 304.

Addiscott, HENRY, an English Congregational minister, was born at Devonport in 1806, of pious parents. He entered the Western College as a student in 1832. In 1837 he entered upon his first pastorate at Torquay, where he was ordained. In 1838 he removed to Maidenhead, and in 1843 entered upon his final pastorate at Taunton. Here he died, Oct. 2, 1860. Mr. Addiscott's preaching was very attractive, instructive, and powerful. See (Lond.) Comp. Year-book, 1861, p. 197.

Addison, Edward, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born at Thirsk, Yorkshire, in 1820. In 1845 he was accepted as a candidate for the ministry, and appointed to British Akrah. Four years he labored in Western Africa with zeal and success, both in preaching and in conducting a native theological institution. His pure character and exemplary pastorate commanded warm regard. He died, after twelve years of suffering, at Barnstable, Devonshire, May 8, 1861. See Minutes of British Conferences, 1861, p. 20.

Addison, James H., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Baltimore, Md., Oct. 12, 1822. He emigrated to Texas in 1835; was converted in 1844; in 1848 was received on trial in the Texas Conference, and in its active ranks was faithful until 1858, when he supernumerated, which relation he sustained until his sudden death, Jan. 21, 1870. Mr. Addison was a laborious and useful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1870, p. 506.

Addison, Launcelot, D.D., an English prelate, was born at Mauldisneaburne, parish of Crosby-Ravensworth, Westmoreland, in 1632. He was educated at Appleby, and was afterwards sent to Queen's College, Oxford, where he was admitted A.B. Jan. 25, 1654, and A.M. July 4, 1657. He was chosen one of the terre filii in 1658, but, objecting to the tyranny to which he was exposed, he soon after quitted Oxford. After the Restoration he obtained the chaplaincy of the garrison at Dunkirk, and in 1663 that of Tangier. He returned to England in 1670, and was made chaplain in ordinary to his majesty. Soon after, he obtained the living of Milston, Wilts, and also a prebend in the Cathedral of Salisbury. He took both degrees in divinity at Oxford July 6, 1675, and July 3, 1683, was promoted to the deanery of Lichfield. On Dec. 8, 1684, he was collated to the archdeaconry of Coventry, and held it with his deanery in commendam. He died April 20, 1703, and was buried in the church-yard of Lichfield. He published, The Present State of the Jews (Lond. 1676, 12mo):—The Christian's Manual (ibid. 1700, 12mo):—A Modest Plea for the Clergy (1677, 8vo):—The First State of Mahometanism, etc. (1688, 8vo):—An Introduction to the Sacrament (1681, reprinted 1686):—ΧΡΙΣΤΟΣ ΑΥΤΟΘΕΟΣ, or, An Historical Account of the Heresy Denying the Godhead of Christ:—The Christian's Daily Sacrifice on Prayer (1698, 12mo):—An Account of the Millennium, etc. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Biog. s. v.

Addison, Walter Dulany, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Annapolis, Md., Jan. 1, 1769. In 1784 he was sent to England to complete his education, and was placed in charge of the Rev. John James, who kept a select school near London. Thence he was removed to a large academy near Greenwich, and in 1787 to Epsom, under the tuition of the curate, Rev. Joseph Golding, and there he was converted. Three years after, he went to London and studied under Dr. Barrow for six months, when he embarked with his brother John for America. On attaining his majority, he came into possession of nearly four thousand acres of land, twenty-five slaves and other property, near Annapolis, Md. In 1798 he removed to Oxon Hill, a part of his estate. For several years he had been studying for the ministry, and about this time he was ordained deacon, and took charge of Queen Ann's Parish in Prince George Co., where he remained two years. In 1796 he was appointed on the Standing Committee. After his resignation of Queen Ann's Parish he frequently officiated in the churches contiguous to his residence until 1803, when he became rector of St. John's Parish, within which his estate was located. This position he held until 1809. Meanwhile (in 1804) he had commenced teaching a school at his residence on Oxon Hill. The following year he removed to Hard Park, where he continued to teach until 1809, when he removed to Georgetown, D. C., and taught school there in connection with his brother John, and also served the church in that place. He continued in charge of St. John's Church until his increasing infirmities compelled him to resign it. In 1818 he became entirely blind. In 1830 he left Georgetown and went to Washington, D. C., where he remained until 1847, after which time he resided in Baltimore. He died there Jan. 31, 1848. Mr. Addison was a man of great firmness of character, and it was largely through his influence that various fashionable amusements, such as balls, card-playing, etc., were interdicted in the diocese. His liberality was conspicuous both in his intercourse with other denominations and in the use of his wealth. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v. 403.

Adē, a four-armed deity of the Banians.

Adecerditæ (prop. Hadecerditæ) is the name given by Prædestinatus (i, 79) to a sect who said (Philastrius, Her. 125) that Christ preached after his death to all that were in Hades, that they might repent and be saved.

Adelaide (or Alice), St., the daughter of Rodolph, second king of Transjuran Burgundy, was born in 931, and was widowed at the age of nineteen years, by the death of her husband Lothair, king of Italy. She afterwards married Otho I, emperor of Germany, and so acted as to win the esteem and affection of her people. She died Dec. 16, 999, at Seltz, on the Rhine, at the monastery which she had erected there twelve years before. Although never formally canonized, her festival is marked in several modern martyrologies on Dec. 16. St. Odilo of Cluny has written her Life, which is given in Surius. See Baillet, iii, 239; Butler, xii, 298.

Adelard. See ADALARD.

Adelard (or Athelard), an English Benedictine monk who flourished about A.D. 1150, resided at Bath and became a member of the celebrated monastery of that city. He travelled into Egypt and Arabia; and translated Euclid's Elements out of Arabic into Latin before any Greek copies were discovered; also wrote several mathematical and medical treatises, which remain at Oxford in MS.

Adelbert. See ADALBERT.

Adelbert, a Roman Catholic divine, was a monk and professor of divinity of St. Vincent's at Metz, and died in 964. He wrote a Chronicle containing a list of the bishops of Metz up to his time. Trithemius declares he had seen it, but no copy is known to exist now. The authors of the Histoire Littéraire de la France (vi, 396) attribute to Adelbert an Abridgment of Pope Gregory's Exposition of Job, to which he gave the title of the Mirror. Martène gives the preface in his Thesaurus Anecdotorum (ii, 84).

Adelbold (Aldeboldus, or Adelboron), a German prelate, was born of a noble family in the bishopric of Liege. He was educated there and at Rheims, and became a councillor of emperor Henry II, and commander of the army. Unsuccessful in these positions, he assumed the monastic habit in the Monastery of Lobes. In 1008 he became bishop of Utrecht, rebuilt the cathedral, and devoted his later years to promoting learning and founding churches in his diocese. He died Nov. 27, 1027. He wrote De Vita S. Henrici Imp., given by Canisius, vi, 383; by Surius, July 14; and by Gretser, in Lives of the Saints of Bamberg (Ingolst. 1611):—a treatise De Ratione Inveniendi Crassitudinem Sphæræ (printed by B. Pez in his Thesaurus Anecdotorum, vol. iii). Trithemius attributes to him Hymns in Praise of the Cross and of the Blessed Virgin, etc. See Biog. Universelle (1811); Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 126; Dupin, Bibl. Ecclès. 10th and 11th Cent.

Adelgreiff, JOHANN ALBERT, a German seer, was born near Elbing. He was the son of a Protestant minister, and well versed in the ancient languages. He claimed that seven angels had charged him with the work of banishing evil from the earth and of beating the sovereigns with rods of iron. He was arrested at Königsberg, accused of magic, and condemned to death. His works were concealed. He died Oct. 11, 1636. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adelhelmus (or Adelinus) was the successor of Hidelbrand in the bishopric of Seez, in Normandy, which he governed till about 910. He wrote an Account of the Life and Miracles of St. Opportuna, Virgin and Abbess, which is given entire by Mabillon, corrected by a MS. in the Church of St. Opportuna, Paris; and in an abridged form by Surius (April 22). See Ann. Ord. Bened. III, ii, 220; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 67; Dupin, Bibl. Ecclès. 9th Cent.

Adelherius (or Athelherius). See ADALARIUS.

Adeliah, the name which the followers of Ali (q. v.) among the Mohammedans take to themselves. The word denotes, in Arabic, the Sect of the Just, but the other Mohammedans call them Shi'ah. See SHITES.

Adelman, bishop of Brescia, flourished in the 11th century, and was a disciple of Fulbert (q. v.) and fellow-student of Berenger (q. v.). He was at first clerk of the Church at Liege, and afterwards master of the ecclesiastical school there, probably from 1041 to 1048. In 1047 (probably) he addressed a letter to Berenger, endeavoring to reconcile him to the then novel doctrine of transubstantiation. The following year he was made bishop of Brescia, where he died, according to some in 1057, or, according to others, in 1061. The letter to Berenger had the following title, De Veritate Corporis Christi in Eucharistia, Epistola ad Berengarium (Bibl. Max. Patr. xviii, 438). He also wrote Rythmi Alphabeticæ de Viris Illustribus sui Temporis. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 134; Mabillon, Vet. Analect. 382; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Darling, Cyclop. Bibliog. s. v.

Adelme (or Adhelm), St. See ALDHELM.

Adelophagi, the name given by Prædestinatus (i, 71) to a sect who, according to Philastrius (Her. 86), "did not eat their meat with men," alleging prophetic example; and believed the Holy Spirit to be created.

Adelphäton (ἀδελφάτον), a Greek term for (1) a brotherhood; (2) a convent.

Adelphè (ἀδελφή, sister), a Greek term for a nun.

Adelphians, a heretical sect, condemned by Maximus (in Dionysius, De Eccles. Hierurch. c. 6) for observing the Lord's day as a fast.—Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. xx, ch. iii, § 5.

Adelphius (1), a Gnostic contemporary with Plotinus (Porphyry, Vit. Plot. 16). He is not mentioned by Christian writers. (2.) A member of the first Council of Arles, supposed to have been bishop of Lincoln (see Augustine, Opp. ix, App. 1095 A; Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 350; Routh, Rel. Sacr. iv, 313). (3.) An Egyptian bishop and confessor, exiled by the Arians to the Thebaid. In 362 he writes as bishop of Onuphis, in the Delta. Athanasius addressed a letter (c. 371) to him, in which he briefly defends the Catholic faith against the objections of Arians, and, by anticipation, of Nestorians and Eutychians.

Adelphus, a chorepiscopus (q. v.) to Adolius, bishop of Arabissus, in the middle of the 5th century. He signed as proxy for his diocesan at the Council of Chalcedon. Moschus (Spirit. Prat. c. 29), followed by George of Alexandria in his Life of Chrysostom, antedates the episcopate of Adelphus by half a century; and, confusing him with the unnamed bishop of Cucusus, by whom Chrysostom was honorably received on his arrival at his place of exile, makes the saint lodge at his house at Cucusus. See Tillemont, xi, 623; Baronius, Annales, ann. 407, § 29.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Ademantus. See ADIMANTUS.

Ademar (Ademarus, or Aymar) OF CHABONNOIS, was born in 988, and was a monk of St. Cibar of Angoulême (or, according to some, of St. Martial of Limoges). He wrote, Chronicon a Principio Monarchiæ Francorum, chiefly from 829 to 1029 (published by Labbe):—also Commemoratio Abbatum Lemoricensium Basilicæ S. Martialis Apostoli:—Letter to Jordanus upon the pretended apostolate of St. Martial:—Acrostichon, etc. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 180; Dupin, Bibl. Eccles. 11th Cent.; Biog. Universelle, vol. i.

Adenulf (or Atenulphus), archbishop of Capua, lived about the year 1590 (?), and wrote, in verse, The Office of the Martyr St. Mark, Bishop of Altino, who suffered under Domitian, and other metrical works.

Adœna, in Roman mythology, was the goddess of arrival, who had no temple; but who received promises and oaths from travellers which were to be fulfilled in case of a safe arrival at home.

Adephagia, in Greek mythology, was a goddess in Sicily, where she had a temple, and was worshipped like Ceres.

Adey, JOHN, an English Congregational minister, was born at Painswick, Gloucestershire, May 15, 1793. He served the Lord from childhood. As a young man Mr. Adey was engaged in business at Winslow, Bucks; but during his leisure hours devoted himself to evangelistic labors in the neighboring villages. Being especially struck with the spiritual destitution of Great Horwood, he resigned his business and gave his best efforts to the building-up of Christianity in the place. After a time he removed to Cranbrook, Kent; and thence to Ramsgate. While at Ramsgate Mr. Adey often preached in London. In Southwark, for twenty-two years, he was "in labors most abundant." Hundreds were converted, and many young men were led into the ministry. In 1858 Mr. Adey removed to Bexley Heath, Kent; in 1868 he retired from the stated ministry; and on Dec. 4, 1869, he was struck with paralysis, and, after twelve days, entered into rest. Mr. Adey was widely known as a preacher to the young, to sailors, and to the working-classes; to all of whom he was exceedingly useful. See (London) Cong. Year-book, 1871, p. 300.

Adgate, CHESTER V., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Neversink, N. Y., in 1795. He experienced conversion in early life; and in 1819 was admitted into the Genesee Conference. He died in Penn Yan, Feb. 4, 1833. Mr. Adgate possessed respectable talents, was a careful student, social in disposition, and upright in life. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1833, p. 216.

Adhab al-Kabi, in Mohammedanism, is the punishment in the grave. The followers of Islam believe that the dead are judged immediately, and are punished even before the resurrection.

Adhba, a festival among the Mohammedans, the same as the Turkish great Beiram (q. v.).

Adhemar de Montell, bishop of Metz, was born near the close of the 13th century. He was a native of Languedoc; and was sovereign bishop of Metz from 1327, holding both the sword and the crosier. He was at war with Ralph, duke of Lorraine, when king Philip of Valois intervened, brought the war to an end, and established a treaty of peace. This warrior-prelate then had difficulties with the regent of Lorraine, and with Robert, duke of Bar. He reduced to ashes the castle of Salins, invaded the Barrois, took Conflans, and established justice by force of arms. His warlike tastes obliged him to make loans, and to mortgage large territories and entire villages, such as Neuville and Sarrebourg. He died in 1361, and was interred in the chapel of the bishops which he had caused to be constructed in the Cathedral of Metz, the main part of which was not finished until 1480. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adhemar (AIMAR) de Montell, bishop of PUY, in Velay, first pursued a military career, but was consecrated bishop May 3, 1061. At the Council of Clermont, held by Urban II in 1095, he first demanded the cross, and excited the enthusiasm which led to the first crusade. Having been appointed legate by the pope, he joined himself to the company of Raymond, count of Toulouse; passed over the Alps; traversed Dalmatia and Albania; and at Constantinople made a truce with Alexis Comnenus, who at first created obstacles in the march of the crusaders. He then went to Nice, where he re-established discipline in an army of six hundred thousand men. He distinguished himself in several combats with the Saracens, masters of Asia Minor; he favored certain religious frauds; and caused the siege of Antioch to be given up to the Mussulmans. He died of the plague at Antioch, Aug. 1, 1098. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adi-Buddha is the one Supreme Intelligence in the creed of the Buddhists of Nepaul, the only sect of the followers of Buddha which believes in a Supreme Being, either like the Aum (q. v.) of the Vedic period, or the Brahma (q. v.) of the later period of Hindû history. See BUDDHISM.

Adie, GEORGE, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, died at Greenwood, near Leesburgh, Va., May 3, 1856. For nearly a quarter of a century he was a useful and influential minister of the Gospel; and, until within a few weeks of his death, he ministered at St. James's Church, Shelburn Parish, Leesburgh, of which he had been rector for so many years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1856, p. 301.

Adikos (unjust), in Greek mythology, was a surname under which Venus was worshipped in Libya.

Adilsi, in Norse mythology, was a giant of unconquerable strength, who assisted Rolf Krake.

Adimantus (Ἀδὶμαντος), or Ademantus (Ἀδὴμαντος), one of Manes' twelve disciples, who, according to Photius (Contra Man. i, 14) and Petrus Siculus (Hist. Man. xvi), was sent as a missionary into various regions. He seems to have met with special success in North Africa, where he was held in high veneration till the time of Augustine (Contra Adim. xii, 2; Contra Faust. i, 2). He wrote a book, apparently in Latin, in which he endeavored to prove a contradiction between the Old Test. and the New, taking passages chiefly from the Pentateuch, but also a few from the Psalms, Proverbs, and the prophets. This was refuted by Augustine (ut sup.). In other ancient documents (see Zotelier, Patres Apost. i, 544), this work is ascribed to Addas (q. v.) as well as to Adimantus; and Augustine states (Contra Adh. Leg. ii, 42) that Addas was the præ-nomen of Adimantus. Hence considerable confusion has arisen among later writers respecting these two persons.

Adites, in Shemitic legend, is the name of the first mythical dynasty of Arabian kings; also a Hamitic race, one of the two great nations by whom the peninsula of Arabia was early peopled. See AD.

Adith is the legendary name of the wife of Lot, who became a pillar of salt. The masses of stone along the shore of the Dead Sea are thought, by the inhabitants, to be human beings changed into pillars of salt. The wife of Lot is mentioned in the book of Wisdom (x, 6, 7). See LOT.

Aditi (the light), in Hindû mythology, is one of the two wives of Kasyapa; the other, Diti, is the darkness. Aditi is a personification of the day, and therefore is the daughter of Daksha and the mother of the twelve Adityas. Aditi and Kasyapa sprang from Brahma, and are therefore called children of God. Because of their great light, they are called the source of light. Aditi and Kasyapa are the parents of Indra, the first of the twelve Adityas. The latter were pressed hard by the sons of the giants in a frightful war. Aditi asked her husband what she should do. He advised her to bring an offering to the honor of Vishnu, who would be born as her son, and would annihilate the giants. It happened so; and thus Aditi gave birth to Vishnu in the person of the dwarf Vamana.

Aditya, in Hindû mythology, were the children of Aditi and Kasyapa, the twelve suns ruling the twelve months of the year. Among them, Indra is the highest, the sovereign of the entire sun-system. He is not the guide of the sun, like Matali. The names in profane history are very different from those given in the sacred poem Mahabharata and the canonical book Bhagavata-Purâna. As Diti and Aditi are classed together, so all the children are one—the sun, or the year.

Adiur (devoted to Ur), a mythical Chaldean king, referred to by Sargon II as the founder of the dynasty. He may have been the Alorus of the Greeks.

Adjunct Gods (or Adjuncts of the Gods), among the Romans, were a kind of inferior deities, added as assistants to the principal ones to ease them of their functions. Thus to Mars belonged Bellona, to Neptune Salacia, to Vulcan the Cabiri, to the Good Genius the Lares, and to the Evil the Lemures.

Adjutants-General is the title of those fathers among the Jesuits who dwell with the general of the order, and whose business it was to watch over the principal occurrences of distant countries, and from time to time communicate information to the general. See JESUITS.

Adjuto (also St. AJOUTRE or USTRE) lived in the 12th century. He was the son of a Norman gentleman, of the family of the seigneurs of Vernon-sur-Seine, but assumed the cross in the war against the Saracens, and after seventeen years' service was captured and put to torture. He refused to renounce the faith, and, returning to France, contributed largely to the Abbey of Tiron, and built a chapel and a few cells near Vernon, where he shut himself up, rigidly observing the rule of St. Benedict. He died April 30, 1131 or 1132, and was buried in the Chapel of St. Mary Magdalene at Vernon. His life was written by Hugo, archbishop of Rouen. See Butler, Lives, April 30; Baillet, Vies des Saints, April 30.

Adjutor, in Africa, is commemorated as a saint in the Hieronymian martyrology on Dec. 17.

Adkins, Joseph, a Baptist minister, was born in Warren County, Ga., in 1802, and remained there all his life. For many years he was a preacher in that section of country. During the late war he was a warm friend of the Union, and when Georgia was reconstructed he was elected a state senator. A delegation having been appointed to visit Washington to complete the legal reconstruction of the state, he was made a member of it. The anger of his political opponents was awakened against him for the decided stand he had taken, and he was murdered in Warren County, Ga., May 10, 1869. (J. C. S.)

Adkins, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, was born at Ravenstone, Buckinghamshire, April 1, 1787. He was very precocious, even at the age of eight. On reaching his twelfth year he was sent to Newport Pagnell College, in which he soon rose to the rank of a teacher; and such was his proficiency in various branches of knowledge that at the age of seventeen he became a tutor in a large school at Northampton. Hand in hand with the growth of his intellect was that of his spiritual life, and a desire to consecrate himself to the service of Christ. In 1807 Mr. Adkins entered Hoxton Academy for special ministerial preparation, and was soon sent into the neighboring villages to preach. In 1810 he supplied the vacant pulpit of the Congregational Church in Southampton, and in the following year was ordained to its pastorate. Here for more than fifty-seven years he labored with much success. His death occurred Dec. 9, 1868. Mr. Adkins was a good linguist, and had considerable acquaintance with the Latin and French languages, as also with the Greek New Testament and Hebrew Bible. But his piety was more conspicuous than his learning. He walked with God, and his devotion burned as a living flame. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1870, p. 275.

Adkinson, Abraham, a Universalist minister, was born in Westmoreland County, Pa., Dec. 24, 1811, but removed to Indiana in 1815. He early developed energy and decision of character; organized the temperance movement of Switzerland County in 1833; was the first to boldly advocate negro-emanipation in that section; joined the Free-will Baptists in 1838, and soon after was ordained a preacher in that denomination, which office he filled until 1870, when he became a Methodist. He finally embraced Universalism about 1872; was ordained a preacher of that faith in 1873, and labored as pastor in Stringtown, Ind., until 1876, when consumption obliged him to retire from the regular work. He died Aug. 22, 1876. Mr. Adkinson was abundant in labors, and highly esteemed in life. See Universalist Register, 1878, p. 81.

Adkinson, Irvin D., a Congregational minister, was born at Moorefield, Switzerland Co., Ind., Nov. 11, 1837. His academic study was pursued at Moore's Hill Seminary, and at Hillsdale, Mich. He graduated from Hillsdale College in 1863, and was ordained in 1866. Afterwards he studied one year in the Bangor Theological Seminary, and one year in Mr. Hepworth's School for the Ministry in Boston. In 1868 he became professor of ancient languages in a new Free-will Baptist College at Ridgeville, Ind., where he remained until 1873, during most of the time acting pastor of the Free-will Baptist Church there. In 1875 he was installed pastor of the Congregational Church at West Concord, N. H., and died there, Feb. 25, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 418.

Adlam, Samuel, a Baptist minister, was born in Temple Parish, Bristol, England, Feb. 4, 1798. As a child he exhibited remarkable mental powers, and at a very early age became proficient as a student in grammar and acquired a knowledge of Latin, Greek, and French. He came to the United States in 1821 and took up his residence in Boston, where he devoted himself to his trade, that of a manufacturer of philosophical instruments. His establishment was large enough to give employment to nineteen apprentices. Not long after settling in Boston, he became a member of the First Baptist Church, then under the pastoral care of Rev. Dr. Francis Wayland, by whom he was baptized. Feeling a desire to preach the Gospel, he studied theology with his revered pastor, and was ordained Nov. 1, 1824, as the minister of the Church in West Dedham, Mass. He completed his somewhat imperfect preparation for the ministry by spending some time at the Newton Theological Institution, where he graduated in the class of 1838. He was subsequently settled at Marblehead, Mass., and Hallowell and Dover, Me. From the latter place he removed to Newport, R. I., where he became pastor of the First Baptist Church, his ministry with this Church continuing from 1849 to 1865. In the latter year he retired from the pastorate, and for some time devoted himself to the work of fitting young men for college. He visited England in 1871, and interested himself in researches into the archives of several institutions there, to discover documents and facts bearing upon Rhode Island history. Until smitten by the cerebral disease which afflicted the closing years of his life, he spent much of his time in his valuable library, engaged in those literary employments to which his cultivated tastes inclined him. "For his talents, scholarship, piety, industry, fidelity, and success, both as a preacher and a writer, he deserves an honorable niche in our country." He died at Newport, Oct. 18, 1880. See Providence Journal, Oct. 20, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Adler, Friedrich Christian, a Protestant theologian of Germany, who was born July 2, 1771, at Naumburg, and died June 17, 1828, as pastor at Kistriz, near Weissenfels, is the author of Winke und Entwürfe für Prediger u. Schullehrer zur populären Erklärung der Psalmen (Leips. 1811-14):—Die Psalmen exegetisch-homiletisch bearbeitet, etc. (ibid. 1817):—Kurze Gesch. der christl. Religion u. Kirche von ihrem Entstehen an bis auf unsere Zeiten (ibid. 1815):—Andachts- u. Communionsbuch (ibid. 1813). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 117, 251, 260, 376. (B. P.)

Adler, George Christian (1), a German pedagogue and theologian, was born at Wohlbach, in Silesia, Nov. 1, 1674. He studied theology at Leipsic and at Halle, devoted himself to the instruction of the young, and founded a gymnasium (Collegium Friedericianum) at Königsberg. He died Aug. 30, 1741, at Altstadt-Brandenburg. Besides a great number of theological works and sermons, he wrote, De Liberalium Artium in Ecclesia Utilitate, si rite Tractentur (Stuttg. 1702):—De Morte Eruditum Philosophica (Berl. 1707). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adler, George Christian (2), a German archaeologist and theologian, was born at Altstadt-Brandenburg, May 6, 1734. He studied theology at Halle, and became a Lutheran minister, first at Sarau, then at Altona. He died at Altona, Nov. 2, 1804. His principal works are, Ausführliche Beschreibung der Stadt Rom (Altona, 1781):—Nachricht von den pontinischen Sümpfen (Hamb. 1784):—an edition of Frontin, De Aqueductibus Urbis Romæ (Leips. and Altona, 1792), with notes. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adler, Jacob Georg Christian, a Protestant theologian of Denmark, was born Dec. 8, 1756, at Arnis, in Schleswig. In 1783 he was called to Copenhagen as professor of theology and court-preacher. While visiting the congregations of his diocese, he died at Gilau, Aug. 22, 1834, being at that time doctor of theology, member of consistory, and general superintendent. He published, Novi Testamenti Versiones Syriac. Simplex, Philoxeniana, et Hierosolymitana . . . Examinatæ et Illustratæ (Copenh. 1789):—Bibliotheca Biblica Sereniss. Wurtembergens. Ducis olim Lorkinæ Edita, etc. (Altona, 1787):—Kurze Uebersicht seiner biblisch-kritischen Reise nach Rom (ibid. 1783). See Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 55, 69, 92, 166; ii, 133, 176, 273. (B. P.)

Adlington, HENRY, a Christian martyr, was one of thirteen who were burned at the stake at Stratford-le-Bow, near London, in 1556, for their constancy in the Christian faith. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 150.

Admapu, in the mythology of the tribes of the Andes, is a traditional collection of laws which are said to have been handed down from Adam and Eve. These laws consist of a number of threads, which are tied together in knots, by which he who understands the language of the knots (quipos) can read, just as out of a book.

Admêtê, in Greek mythology, was (1) the daughter of Oceanus and Tethys. (2) A daughter of Eurystheus, who gave her the girdle of the queen of the Amazons, which Hercules was compelled to get. She was priestess to Juno at Argos, and fled with the statue of Juno to Samos. The Argives promised a great reward to any one who would bring the statue again from Samos. Pirates attempted this, and succeeded in bringing it on board their ship; but when about to sail the vessel would not move. Taking this for an evil omen, the sailors wound wreaths around the statue and again set it on land, and sailed off. Admete was the first who heaped divine honors on Hercules.

Admêtus, in Greek mythology, was the son of Pheres, king of Phææ, and the friend of Apollo and Hercules. In his youth he was present in the Calydonian hunt and in the journey of the Argonauts. Alceste was loved by him, and Admetus asked her father, Pelias, to give her to him as his wife. This was promised upon one severe condition—that the lover should yoke a lion and a wild boar in front of the same wagon. Apollo aided him in the fulfilment of this condition. When, however, Admetus came to his wife in the bridal-chamber, there lay an immense bunch of snakes in it, which Diana had sent because Admetus had forgotten to bring thank-offerings to her. He reconciled the goddess, and the lovers were joined. Admetus was very beautiful, and Apollo therefore showed him many favors. The short period of life allotted to him by the Paræon account of the murder of the Cyclops was lengthened by Apollo in this wise: He advised Admetus to go and ask the Paræon to promise to spare his life if some one could be found to die in his stead. They consented. Alceste, full of sympathy for her husband, offered herself willingly to die for Admetus, and did so. But despair seized Admetus when he found that he had lost his wife, and thereupon Hercules showed his friendship by bringing back Alceste from Tartarus.

Administration is an ecclesiastical term applied to the execution of the duties of the ministry. In the Episcopal Church the term is used to imply, not the persons who are intrusted with official power, nor the office itself, but the exercise and fulfilment of the functions of the office. In the Form for the Ordering of Deacons are these words: "Almighty God, who . . . didst inspire thine apostles to choose into the order of deacons the first martyr, Stephen, and others, mercifully behold these thy servants now called to the like office and administration," etc.

ADMINISTRATION, ECCLESIASTICAL, of the property of the Church, in the early ages, was entirely in the hands of the bishops. They were enjoined, however, to consult with their priests and deacons, and were subject to give account to the provincial synod. This continued to be the case up to the beginning of the 9th century. There were (especially in the East) officers called Æconomi [see ÆCONOMUS], who managed the temporalities of the churches under the control of their respective bishops. The bishops had originally the entire disposal of all the property and offerings of all the parishes in their dioceses (Conc. Agde, can. 22; 1 Conc. Orléan, can. 15) except the sacred vessels and other such things, which were appropriated to the churches where they were offered. This was so in France up to the time of the first Council of Trent. The bishops received all the revenues of the Church, leaving to the clergy only two thirds of the offerings. The Council of Carpentras, in 527, ordered that all the revenues, etc., should be given to the clergy of the parish and for repairs, unless the bishops were in great need. In Spain, the custom, in the beginning of the 6th century, was to give the bishop one third of the entire revenue of each parish. The Council of Braga, in 560, allowed the same, devoting the other two thirds to the clergy and repairs. The Council of Trosle, in 909 (can. 6), appears to show that the clergy at that period enjoyed the sole use of the revenues of their benefices, but were liable to be called to account by the bishop for their use of them. The Council of Trent (sess. 22, cap. 8, 9) granted to bishops the right of visiting all foundations for the temporal or spiritual good of the poor and sick, etc.

Admire, JAMES B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Oldham County, Ky., Jan. 1, 1820. He experienced religion in 1842; removed to Indiana in 1850; served the Church successively as class leader, exhorter, and local preacher; and in 1853 united with the Indiana Conference, in which he labored diligently until his death, Oct. 15, 1861. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 168.

Admission to the Church. This was very simple in the early Christian times. Upon a personal confession of belief in Jesus as the Saviour of men, and the adoption of the ordinance of baptism, men and women of all classes and conditions were freely welcomed to the community of the saints, without any other ceremony. In monkish times, when the Church became a national institution, this class of catechumens (q. v.) was organized, and full admission was deferred for a considerable period. A longer or shorter term of probation has in like manner been found advisable or necessary in modern times, and those who have been baptized in infancy are usually called upon, in adult years, to adopt the vows made in their behalf by their parents or sponsors (q. v.), and on responding satisfactorily to the questions propounded touching their actual experience and purposes, they are admitted either by the rite of confirmation (q. v.) or by a simple declaration in public to that effect, usually with a hand-shaking in token of Christian fellowship. See MEMBERSHIP.

Admission Service. See ADMISSION.

Admittendo Clerico, in English ecclesiastical law, is a writ granted to any one who has established his right of presentation against the bishop in the Court of Common Pleas.

Adolfi, Ciro, an Italian painter, was born in 1683. He distinguished himself by some excellent fresco paintings in the public edifices at Bergamo and in the state. His principal works are, The Four Evangelists, in the Church of S. Alessandro della Croce:—the Deposition from the Cross, in the Church of Santa Maria delle Grazie:—and the Decollation of St. John, in the parochial Church of Colognola. He died in 1758.

Adolfi, Giacomo, an Italian painter, brother of the preceding, was born at Bergamo in 1682. He painted history with success, and also painted sacred subjects for the churches, convents, and monasteries of Bergamo. The Crowning of the Virgin, in the Church of the Monastery del Paradiso, and the Adoration of the Magi, in the Church of S. Alessandro della Croce, are considered his best productions. He died in 1741.

Adolph, GOTTLOB, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 30, 1685, at Nieder-Wiese, in Upper Lusatia. He studied at Leipsic; was in 1720 appointed pastor at Gross-Hennersdorf, near Zittau; in 1726 deacon at Hirschberg; and in 1737 archdeacon there. He died Aug. 1, 1745, while in his pulpit, struck by lightning. He wrote, Disputatio de Psalmis Filiorum Korah (Lips. 1706). He is also the author of a number of hymns. See Kluge, Hymnopoëgraphia Silesica (Breslau, 1751), i, 1-11; Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, v, 234 sq.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Adon (master), in Phœnician mythology, was the name under which an incarnation of the sun was worshipped in Byblus.

Adonæa (or Adonias), in Greek mythology, is a surname of Venus, derived from Adonis.

Adone, in Arabian mythology, is the name of the sun. In the pre-Mohammedan times the Arabians worshipped it daily, and brought offerings of frankincense and myrrh.

Adoneus, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Bacchus in Asia Minor.

Adonia were feasts anciently held in honor of Venus and Adonis. They typified the dying and resurrection of nature, and lasted two days—the first of which was spent in tears and lamentations, the second in mirth and feasting.

Adonis Garden, in Greek mythology, was a name for the flat vessels, made of various and very costly materials, containing earth sown with seed, to be used on the occasion of the festival of Adonis.

Adonis River, a stream of Palestine running from the base of Lebanon to the Mediterranean (Strabo, xvi, 2, 19, 755; Pliny, Hist. Nat. v, 17, 20), celebrated as the scene of the fable of the death of Adonis (q. v.), whose blood at certain seasons was said to tinge the stream—evidently referring to the reddish hue of the earth washed down by the freshets—has been identified since the Middle Ages with the modern Nahr Ibrahim, a romantic stream which gushes out from a cave and falls in cascades down the declivity. See APHEK.

Adoratio Magorum, the adoration of the wise men from the East, is the name of the Epiphany.

Adoration OF THE CROSS is respect paid to the cross by bending the knee before it, as practiced in all Roman Catholic countries and by the members of the Greek Church. On Good-Friday the ceremony of adoring the cross is performed at Rome, and in all the cathedrals and principal churches of the Catholic communion throughout the world. After the performance of the usual introductory service, the officiating priest and all his assistants advance to the altar, where a bow more reverential than usual is made to the cross by each of them. They then repeat in a low voice certain prayers, on the conclusion of which they rise up and descend from the altar, a signal having been given by the "master of the ceremonies." The cushions on which they knelt are then removed, and the choir, as well as the congregation, repeat certain prayers, all kneeling. Again the officiating priest approaches the altar, kisses it, goes through the lessons for the day in a mumbling voice, receives the cross from the deacon whose duty it is to hand it to him, removes from the head of it the veil which covers the entire crucifix, and then elevates it with both hands, singing Ecce lignum crucis ("Behold the wood of the cross"). Instantly the whole congregation start to their feet, and all the ministers at the altar begin to sing In quo salus mundi pendit ("On which the Saviour of the world was extended"). The singers answer, Venite et adoremus ("Let us come and adore"). As soon as the last syllable is chanted, all present, except the officiating priest, fall upon their knees and offer silent adoration to the cross. In a few minutes all rise again, and the priest uncovers the right arm of the cross and again elevates it, saying, as before, but in a louder voice, Ecce lignum, etc. Next he approaches the middle of the altar, and, turning towards the congregation, elevates the cross again, which now he exposes by the removal of the veil from every part of it, and repeats the same words in a still louder and more emphatic voice. A purple cushion is then laid upon the steps of the altar, upon which the priest lays the cross; he then retires for the purpose of taking off his shoes; his attendants do the same; returning barefoot, they reverently approach the piece of wood upon the cushion, and, kneeling down, they meekly kiss it. Then all present, in the order of their rank (the clergy always first), perform the same ceremony of kissing the crucifix, which at last is taken up by a deacon and placed in an upright position on the altar.

In Moscow, St. Petersburg, and other cities of Russia many ceremonies are performed during Passion week, which are brought to a close about four o'clock on the morning of Easter-Sunday by the ceremony of adoring the cross. The members of the Greek Church not only kiss this symbol of the Christian religion, but when the bishop or archbishop holds it forth for the reverence of the worshippers they rush forward, to the imminent risk of many of them, and embrace the crucifix with vehement devotion and affection. See CROSS.

Adoration OF THE HOST. See HOST.

Adoration, PERPETUAL. Various religious orders practice the perpetual adoration of the holy sacrament, relieving one another constantly, so that, day and night, there is always some one occupied in prayer before the host. The most noted among these celebrants were the nuns of the Perpetual Adoration at Marseilles.

Adorea (from ador, "wheat"), in the ancient Roman worship of the gods, were the light flat cakes made of flour and salt, which were used at offerings, partly to burn them and partly for the priests. The offerings which consisted only of such cakes were called Adorea sacrificia.

Adorno, Francesco, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Genoa in 1531, was educated in Portugal, taught and preached with great celebrity in Rome, and died at Genoa, Jan. 13, 1586. He composed on the prayer of St. Charles, of whom he was confessor, a learned treatise entitled De Disciplina Ecclesiastica. The Ambrosian Library has two of his MSS., entitled De Ratione Illustrandæ Ligurum Historiam, and a treatise on the taxes (De Cambiis). See Biog. Universelle, Suppl. s. v.

Adorno, Giovanni Agostino, an Italian priest, founder of the Congregation of Regular Clerks Minors, was descended from the ancient family of the Adorni. He laid the first foundation of the order at Naples in 1588, and received the approval of Sixtus V. He died at Naples, Sept. 29, 1591. See Moréri, who cites Aubert le Mire, De Cong. Cleric. in Communi Vivent.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Adosht, in Persian mythology, was a sacred, rough stone, about half a foot high, which was used in the fire-temples of the ancient Guebres—i. e. fire-worshippers, so called because they do not pray directly to fire, but pray only in the presence of fire.

Adrānus, in Italian mythology, was the god of the Sicilian nations, whose temple stood near Adranum. This temple was guarded by a large number of trained dogs, of which it is said that they conducted drunken men, but wicked people they tore to pieces.

Adrastea (the Avenger), in Greek mythology, was (1) the daughter of Oceanus, or Erebus, and of Nemesis. She is represented with a ship's rudder or with a wheel. Some derive the name from Adrastus, who, as a memorial of Eteocles, built a temple to Nemesis near Thebes. (2.) The daughter of the Cretan king Melissus, who was given to Rhea to bring up by the mother of Jupiter.

Adrastea (1).

Adrevald, a Benedictine monk, was born about 818, in a village near the Monastery of Fleury, and died in 878. He acquired considerable reputation by his writings, especially Opusculum de Corpore et Sanguine Domini, against the famous John Scotus, published in vol. xii of the Spicilegium of D'Achery:—Vita S. Agilulfi (Mabillon), i. e. a life of Ayoul, friar of Fleury and priest of Lerins, who died in 677 (in vol. i of Acta Ordinis S. Benedicti):—also Historia Miraculorum S. Benedicti. The author was the first to give to the governors of the provinces of the frontiers the title of margrave or marquis. He has often been confounded with Adelbert, another monk of Fleury who died in 853, and wrote an account of the translation of Benedict, in the Acta Ordinis S. Benedicti. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adria, PETER OF (so called from his birthplace), was a monk of the Order of St. Dominic, and a disciple of St. Thomas. In 1294 he was made vicar-general of the province of Sicily; and in 1306 bishop of Vico, which position he held about ten years. An unpublished treatise on The Spiritual Life is attributed to him.

Adriaensen, CORNELIS, a Flemish preacher of the Order of St. Francis, was born at Dort in 1521, and died at Ypres, July 14, 1581. He wrote sermons full of invectives against the leaders of the Huguenots in the Low Countries. There are many editions of these sermons, the first of which was published in 1569. Another at Amsterdam, in 1607 and 1640, bears a figure joined to the title which gives an idea of the character of the book. It represents the strange discipline to which Adriaensen submitted his penitents, in order to deliver them from the natural timidity which hindered them from boldly confessing to him all their thoughts, their words, their songs, and their actions, which have their origin in the temptations peculiar to the flesh; discipline which Voet called "Disciplinam gymnopygicam Cornelianam," in his Disp. Select. iv, 262. Sander claims that Adriaensen's writings have been corrupted by heretics, in order to expose virtuous people to derision. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adrian, Sr. (1), was put to death at Rome, in the 3d century, with Sts. Eusebius, Marcellus, Hippolyta, and others, under the reign of the emperor Valerian.

There are two saints of this name—one commemorated in the Roman martyrology on July 26, the other in the Armenian on Aug. 28—one of which may be the above.

Adrian, Sr. (2), suffered martyrdom at Cæsarea, in Palestine, in 309, by order of the governor Firmilianus. He was exposed to the lions, March 5, with St. Eubulus as his companion in martyrdom. The Greeks commemorate them together, the Latins separately—the latter March 7 (in some martyrologies March 4). See Ruinart, p. 332; Moréri, who cites Eusebius, De Martyr. Palest.

Adrian, Sr. (3), was an officer in the imperial army (cir. 307) at Nicomedia. Shocked at the cruelties practiced upon the Christians of that city by Licinius, he remonstrated with him upon his conduct. The only effect of this was that he himself was tortured, and afterwards beheaded. His memory is commemorated in the Roman martyrologies on Aug. 26 or Sept. 8, in the Greek on Nov. 6.

Adrian, Sr. (4), the husband of St. Natalia (q. v.), was also martyred at Nicomedia, under the emperors Galerius Maximianus and Licinius. His body is said to have been transported to Argyropolis. He is commemorated August 26, with St. Natalia and twenty-three other fellow-martyrs. By some he is thought to be the same with the preceding. See Baillet, vol. iii, Sept. 8; Moréri, who cites The Acts of St. Adrian.

Adrian, Sr. (5), a disciple of St. Landoaldas, missionary of the Low Countries (cir. 667), was assassinated on his journey to fetch alms which king Childeric II had destined for St. Landoaldus at Wintershoven.

Adrian was the last patriarch of all Russia. He had before been metropolitan of Kasan, and had the pain, during his pontificate, of having the patriarchal court fall away from its former eminence, and of seeing it lose successively many of its privileges which the piety of the predecessors of Peter the Great had recognised. When the czar, terrible in his vengeance, deluged with blood the streets of Moscow, Adrian had the courage to go in a procession to him with the image of the Holy Virgin of Vladimir and implore mercy. At his death, Peter the Great opposed the election of any one to succeed him; his spirit of exclusive sway being no doubt justified by the circumstances, as he would not share the power and influence over the orthodox people with the patriarch, since it was already enfeebled, and he would turn to ridicule all the parodies played at Moscow. Peter declared to the Russian clergy that hereafter he himself would be chief, and that he would reunite the patriarchal dignity with that of the crown. He named, also, an administrator of the patriarchate, and instituted in 1721 the sacred synod. Thus the Russian Church lost its spiritual chief. The patriarchate continued one hundred and fourteen years after the exaltation of Job, consecrated in 1588 by Jeremy, patriarch of Constantinople, of which Adrian was the ninth successor. Adrian died in 1702. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adrian di Castello, an Italian cardinal, was born at Cornetto, in Tuscany, about 1450. Having been sent by pope Boniface VIII as nuncio into Scotland, he became acquainted in London with Morton, archbishop of Canterbury, at whose recommendation Henry VII appointed him his agent at Rome. He was rewarded with the bishopric of Hereford; and in 1505 was translated to that of Bath and Wells. In 1503 he was admitted into the College of Cardinals, and narrowly escaped poisoning at a banquet in the Vatican. Detected in 1518, with cardinal Alonso Petrucio and others, in attempting the death of pope Leo X, he withdrew from Rome; and so effectually concealed himself that the place and time of his death are unknown. He was subsequently degraded. He wrote De Sermone Latino, and De Vera Philosophia.

Adrian, surnamed LE CHARTREUX (Carthusianus), who lived in 1410 at the Chartreuse, near Gertruidenberg, left a work which is often confounded with a moral treatise by Petrarch, entitled Liber de Remediis Utriusque Fortune, Prosperæ scilicet et Adversæ, per Adrianum, quondam Poetam Præstantem, necnon Sacræ Theologiæ Professore (Cologne, without date, about 1470), a very rare work. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Adrian Hamsted. See ADRIANISTS.

Adrianæa were certain temples built by Adrian, emperor of Rome, in several towns about A.D. 127. As these temples contained no statues nor any marks of being dedicated to pagan gods, some have imagined that they were built in honor of Jesus Christ, whom Adrian wished to worship, but was dissuaded from it, lest the whole country should be thereby led to embrace Christianity.

Adriani, ADRIAN, a Flemish Jesuit, was born at Antwerp. He entered the society at Louvain in 1544, and governed the Jesuits in that place for many years. In 1551 he made profession of the four vows; and, after the death of St. Ignatius, was called to Rome to assist in the election of a second general of the society. Displeased with the disputes and intrigues he found there, Adriani returned to Flanders; and died at Louvain, Oct. 18, 1580. He wrote several treatises in the Dutch language, among which are, Inspiration; or, The Inward Language of God (1570; transl. into Latin by Brunensis [Cologne, 1601]);—The Lord's Prayer:—On Active Life, Temporal Property, Works of Mercy (1668):—The Origin and Progress of the Cenobitic Life:—Of Obedience:—Of Evangelical Poverty (1570, 8vo and 4to):—Of Confession (3 eds.):—Of Frequent or Annual Communion. See Sotwell, De Script. Soc. Jes.

Adrianists, an obscure sect of Dutch Anabaptists, named after Adrian Hamsted. Among other heresies, they denied the miraculous conception of our Lord by the Virgin Mary. Hamsted was minister of the Dutch sectaries in London, and was deposed by Grindal, bishop of London, in the year 1561. A form of recantation, stating his heretical tenets, is printed in Strype's Annals of the Reformation (i, 176); but it was not signed by Hamsted, who was excommunicated by Grindal, and went abroad. He seems to have organized a small community in Holland, which was called after his name. See Grindal, Works, p. 243.

Adriano was a Spanish monk of the Order of the Barefooted Carmelites, who lived at Cordova. He was an extraordinary painter; but he practiced only for amusement. He studied under Pablo de Céspedes. He destroyed most of his paintings as soon as they were finished, hence they are extremely scarce. Some of his best works were preserved by his friends. His chief work is a Crucifixion, now in the convent of the Carmelites at Cordova. He is spoken of by Pacheco, who knew him well, as a great artist. He died in 1650.

Adriansen, CORNELIUS. See ADRIAENSEN.

Adrianus, an alleged bishop of St. Andrews, martyred by the Danes in 874. He is commemorated on March 4. See ADRIAN; ANIANUS; HADRIANUS.

Adrianus, MATTHEUS, a famous Hebraist of the 16th century, was a convert from Judaism. He was of Spanish descent; but joined the Church in Germany. He was originally a physician; but his acquaintance with Reuchlin and Conrad Pellikan—the latter he instructed in Hebrew—secured for him the position of a teacher in the house of Johann Amerbach at Basle. In 1513 he was appointed teacher of Hebrew at Heidelberg, where Johann Brenz and Johann Ecolampadius were among his pupils. At the recommendation of Erasmus he was called in 1517 to Louvain, as teacher in the Collegium Trilingue. In 1519 he left Louvain and went to Wittenberg, which he left in 1521. When and where he died cannot be ascertained. His Introductio in Linguam Hebræam, and Hebrew translation of some Christian prayers, are now of the greatest rarity. See Geiger, Das Studium der hebr. Sprache in Deutschland (Breslau, 1870), p. 41-48, 134; Hirt, Orientalische u. exegnetische Bibliothek, vi, 320; Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuch, p. 2 sq. (B. P.)

Adrumetians, the monks of Adrumetum, or Adrumytto, in Africa. They misinterpreted Augustine's Antipelagian doctrine, especially that contained in his 194th Epistle, into Antinomian conclusions respecting grace and predestination, and are thus sometimes considered the first Predestinari-ans.

Adrumytto, an episcopal see in Africa, in the province of Byzacia, suffragan to Carthage. It is supposed by some to be identical with the place now called by the Arabs Hamameta, in the kingdom of Tunis. Two councils were held here on matters relating to ecclesiastical discipline—one in 347, the other in 397. Polycarp was bishop of this see in the time of St. Cyprian.

Adso (Azon, or Asson), known also as HERMERIUS, or HENRICUS), a French prelate, was born in the diocese of Châlons-sur-Marne, in the early part of the 10th century. He embraced the monastic life at Luxeuil, under the direction of the Benedictines. He succeeded, about 968, his friend Alberic as abbot of the monastery of Montier-en-Der. He labored earnestly for the spiritual and temporal welfare of the community, and, under the auspices of Manasses, bishop of Troyes, undertook to regulate the psalmody and order of divine service throughout the diocese. He was employed for nearly two years by Bruno, bishop of Langres, in re-establishing good order in the Monastery of St. Benignus of Dijon. He died at Champagne in June, 992, while on a voyage to Jerusalem. His writings are, Vita S. Frodoberti Abbatis Primi Cellensis (in Mabillon, Annales Ord. Bened. ii, 626);—Vita S. Mansueti Scoti (the first part containing the life of Mansuetus [q. v.], and the second an account of his miracles):—Vita S. Apri (2 pts.):—Vita S. Basilii (in Mabillon, ut sup. ii, 67):—Vita S. Waldeberti (in Mabillon, vol. iii, pt. ii, p. 451):—Vita S. Bercharii Abbatis (in Mabillon, ii, 831):—and a treatise, De Antichristo, which is also attributed by some to Alcuin or Rabanus Maurus. See Cave, *Hist. Adultery, ECCLESIASTICAL TREATMENT OF. By a study of the writings of the fathers and of the canons of the ancient Church, we are made acquainted with the Church's views concerning this crime.

1. Definition.—In the legislation of Justinian, the wife is regarded as the real criminal, and her paramour, whether married or unmarried, as the mere accomplice of her crime. She is essentially the adultera, and he, because of his complicity with a married woman, becomes an adulterer. The same meaning is attached to the term "adultery" during the whole early Christian period, as appears from the heathen writings of Valerius Maximus, Quintilian, Juvenal, and Apuleius. In the latter half of the 4th century we have exact and very valuable ecclesiastical definitions. Gregory of Nyssa distinguishes between fornication and adultery, the latter including deceptions and injury affecting another (i. e. man). A canon of Basle furnishes this incidental definition: "We name him who cohabits with another woman (aliena, not his own wife) an adulterer." Ambrose (Defence of Abraham) says, "All unchaste intercourse is adultery; what is illicit for the woman is illicit for the man," etc. Gregory Nazianzen argues that the man should not be left free to sin while the woman is restrained; and says that this inequality came to pass because men were the law-makers, and that it is contrary to (a) the fifth commandment; (b) the equal creation, resurrection, and redemption of both sexes; and (c) the mystical representation of Christ and his Church. Chrysostom (Sermon on the Bill of Divorce) says, in substance, "It is commonly called adultery when a man wrongs a married woman. I, however, affirm it of a married man who sins with the unmarried; for the essence of the crime depends on the condition of the injurers as well as the injured." Yet we encounter a qualification: the offence of a husband with the unmarried is "a different kind of adultery." Jerome feels most strongly the unity of marriage, and joins with it the proposition that the word man contains woman, and says, therefore, that 1 Cor. vi, 16 applies equally to both sexes.

2. Classification.—By the Lex Julia, adultery was placed among public wrongs. But a public wrong does not necessarily infer a public right of prosecution. Under Augustus, the husband was preferred as prosecutor, next the wife's father, and was in danger of incurring the guilt of procuration if he failed to prosecute. The Church agreed with the State in not allowing a husband to condone. Divines who were not canonists differed considerably. Hermas's Pastor allowed and urged one reconciliation to a penitent wife. Augustine at first hesitated between condonation and divorce, opposed forgiveness, and concluded by advising continence.

3. Penalties.—The following are the Church penalties: (1.) Against Adultery, strictly so called.—A convicted adulterer cannot receive orders (Conc. Ancyra, can. 20). An adulteress or adulterer is sentenced to seven years' penance (Neo-Cæsarea, can. 1). A presbyter so offending is to be fully excommunicated and brought to penance (ibid., can. 8). The layman whose wife is a convicted adulteress cannot receive orders, and, if already ordained, must put her away under penalty of deprivation (Basil. can. 9). An unchaste wife must be divorced; an unchaste husband not so, even if adulterous (ibid. can. 58). The adulterer must undergo fifteen years of penance (ibid. can. 59, which gives seven years to simple incontinence). Gregory of Nyssa (can. 4) prescribes eighteen years, and nine only for simple incontinence.

(2.) Against Adultery as under Spiritual, but not Civil, Law.—Two conclusions were drawn both by canonists and divines: (a) Divorce, except for adultery, is adultery. Under this fell the questions of enforced continence and of marriage after divorce. (b) To retain an adulterous wife is also adultery. These divisions should be remembered, though the points are often blended in the canons (Can. Apost. 5). No one in higher orders is to cast out his wife on plea of religion. This is altered as regards bishops (by Trull. can. 12), but the change was not enough to satisfy Rome. If a divorced husband marries again, the second wife is not an adulteress, but the first. A woman must not leave her husband for blows, waste of dower, incontinence, nor even disbelief (1 Cor. vii, 16), under penalty of adultery. Basil. can. 21 assigns extra penance to what would now be called simple adultery, i. e. the incontinency of a married man. An offending wife is an adulteress, and must be divorced. Not so the husband (Carthage, can. 105). Divorced persons are to remain unmarried, and an alteration of the imperial law in this sense is to be petitioned for. The same canon and its parallels forbade marriage after divorce, whether just or unjust, and the view of its being adultery had gained ground in the West. But we find from several sources that Church custom did not permit incontinency to be held a like condition in husband and in wife.

(3.) Constructive Adultery.—The following are treated as guilty of the actual crime: a man marrying a betrothed maiden (Trull. can. 98); girls seduced marrying other men than their seducers (Elib. can. 14); consecrated virgins who sin, and their paramours (Basil. can. 18). These supersede Ancyra, can. 19, by which the offence was punished as digamy. Marriage between Jew and Christian was to be treated as adultery (Cod. Theod.); and, on the principle of idolatry being considered from Old-Test. times as adultery, marriage with an unclean transgressor involved wife or husband in the sinner's guilt. See Bingham, Christ. Antiq. index.

Adultus, a title of Jupiter when he was invoked in the rights of marriage.

Adummim. Tristram remarks that this "is probably Telat el-Damm, i.e. the Mount of Blood, a mediæval fortress, surrounded by a rock-hewn moat, standing above the well-known khan, and commanding the Jericho road on the south of the Kelt. The name Mount of Blood applies not only to the castle, but to the eminence of bright red-colored rock on which it stands. It was known to the Crusaders as Tour Rouge" (Bible Places, p. 95). His authority for this is Mr. Drake (in the Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," April, 1874, p. 70), who adds, "The Arabs say it is called the Mount of Blood because of a severe battle once fought there, but the bright-red limestone and marl are much more likely to be the true cause."

Advaia (or Advoja), in Hindû mythology, is a surname of Brahma, who is only like himself, because there is no one who is like to him.

Advent. In addition to what has already been given on this subject, it may be proper to add the directions of the various councils respecting the observance of the feast. A canon of the Council of Macon (A.D. 581) enjoins that from the Feast of St. Martin (Nov. 11) to the Nativity there be fasting on Monday, Wednesday, and Friday of each week, and that the canons be then read; also that the sacrifices be offered in the Quadragesimal order. In the second Council of Tours (567), the fast of three days in the week is ordered for the months of September, October, and November, and from Dec. 1 to the Nativity every day. But this is for monks only. It seems, from all that is certainly known, that Advent took its place among Church seasons only in the latter part of the 6th century. Once established as one of the great festivals, it was felt that its dignity demanded a season of preparation. Originally left to the discretion of the faithful, the number of days or weeks to be set apart was eventually defined by rule, and at first, it seems, in the churches of Gaul. Yet the same rule did not everywhere prevail, for the oldest Gallican sacramentary shows three Sundays in Advent, and the Gothic-Gallican only two. But the rule that the term of preparation should be a quadragesima, to commence after the Feast of St. Martin, implies six Sundays. This rule—not enacted, but re-enforced, by the Canon of Macon (581)—obtained in other churches, as appears from the fact that the Ambrosian (or Milan) and Mozarabic (or Spanish) Ordo shows six missæ, implying that number of Sundays, and the same rule was observed in some of the Gallican churches. The rule—not of Advent, but of this quadragesima—is first met with in the diocese of Tours. The observance of the Quadragesima Apostolorum and Quadragesima S. Philippi (in the Greek calendar Nov. 14) is enjoined upon monks by Nicephorus, patriarch of Constantinople (806). The Church of Rome, under Gregory, at the close of the 6th century, received the season of preparation as an ecclesiastical rule, restricted in its proper sense to the four Sundays before the Nativity, and this became the general rule for the Western Church throughout the 8th century and later. The Sacramentary of Gelasius, a Lectiary written for Charlemagne by Paul the Deacon, and other older works, all give five Sundays. This seeming discrepancy is easily explained, since the fifth Sunday before the Nativity was not considered as itself a Sunday in Advent, but as the preparation for Advent.

After the pattern of the Lenten fast, Advent was marked as a season of mourning in the public services of the Church. The custom of omitting the Gloria in Excelsis, and also the Te Deum and Ite Missa Est, and of laying aside the dalmatic and subdeacon's vestment, was coming into use during the 8th century. The Benedictine monks retained the Te Deum in Advent as in Lent, alleging the rule of their founder. The Alleluia also, and the sequences, as also the hymns, were omitted, but not in all churches. In some churches the Miserere (Psa. li) and other mournful psalms were added to or substituted for the ordinary psalms. For lessons, Isaiah was read all through, beginning on Advent Sunday. When that was finished, the twelve minor prophets followed, or readings from the fathers, especially the epistles of pope Leo on the incarnation and sermons of St. Augustine.

In the Greek Church the season of preparation for the Nativity is of late introduction. No notice of it occurs in the liturgical works of Theodore Studites, though the forty days' fast of St. Philip was enjoined (upon monks) by Nicephorus. This forty days' fast, beginning Nov. 14, is now the rule of the Greek Church. In the separated churches of the East no trace appears, within our period, of an Advent season, unless we except the existing Nestorian or Chaldæan rule, in which the liturgical year begins with four Sundays of Annunciation before the Nativity. The Armenian Church, refusing to accept Dec. 25 as the Feast of the Nativity, and adhering to the more ancient sense of the Feast of Epiphany as including the birth of Christ, prepares for this high festival (Jan. 6) by a fast of fifty days, beginning Nov. 17.

Advent Antiphons are those ancient antiphons used before and after the Magnificat which begin with the letter O. We give those for Dec. 16–23 as they stand in many ancient and some modern rituals:

"Dec. 16.—O Sapientia! O Wisdom! which comest forth out of the mouth of the Most High, and reachest from one end to the other, mightily and sweetly ordering all things; come and teach us the way of prudence.

"Dec. 17.—O Adonai! O Lord and Ruler of the Honour of Israel! who appearedst unto Moses in a flame of fire in the bush, and gavest unto him the law in Sinai; come and redeem us with a stretched-out arm.

"Dec. 18.—O Radix Jesse! O Root of Jesse! who standest for an ensign of the people, at whom kings shall shut their mouths, unto whom the Gentiles shall pray; come and deliver us, and tarry not.

"Dec. 19.—O Clavis David! O Key of David and Sceptre of the House of Israel! thou that openest and no man shutteth, and shuttest and no man openeth; come and loose the prisoner from the prison house, and him that sitteth in darkness from the shadow of death.

"Dec. 20.—O Oriens! O Orient, Brightness of the Eternal Light and Sun of Righteousness! come and lighten them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

"Dec. 21.—O Rex Gentium! O King of the Gentiles and their Desire, the Corner-stone! who madest both one; come and save man, whom thou hast made out of the dust of the earth.

"Dec. 22.—O Emmanuel! O Emmanuel, our King and Lawgiver! the Desire of all nations and their Saviour; come and save us, O Lord our God.

"Dec. 23.—O Virgo Virginum! O Virgin of Virgins! how shall this be? for neither before thee was any like thee, nor shall there be after. Daughters of Jerusalem, why marvel ye at me? the thing which ye beheld was a divine mystery."

Advent Christian Association, a branch of the Adventists (q. v.), which now includes the great majority of those who believe in the speedy coming of Christ to rule the world in his own person. In 1852 Jonathan Cummings, one of the ministers of the Advent body in the earlier days, claimed to have obtained "new light on the commencement and terminus of the periods of Daniel." He predicted with the utmost positiveness that the resurrection would take place in 1854. About this time F. H. Berrick wrote a book entitled The Lord Soon to Come to sustain the same theory. The time movement having failed with the earlier Adventists as a body, there was no disposition on the part of the managers of the official periodicals to permit any extended discussion of the theory in their columns. In consequence of this the advocates of the new doctrine held a mass meeting at Lowell, Mass., in January, 1854, and decided to establish a paper to give currency to their views. As a result The World's Crisis was issued at Lowell in March of that year. Mr. Cummings gathered about him several hundreds of followers on the plan of a community of goods, but that feature of the enterprise failed. When the year 1854 had passed, The World's Crisis was obliged to confess the error of its doctrine in regard to time, but certain other differences existed which prevented its supporters from returning to their former fellowship. They appointed a conference to meet at Worcester, Mass., June 5, 1855, where doctrinal views were set forth, but no organization was effected. In February, 1856, The World's Crisis office was removed to Boston, where it has remained ever since. Another mass convention was assembled at Worcester, Nov. 6, 1861, at which "The Advent Christian Association" was organized. This association consisted of those who believed in the entire mortality of man, the sleep of the soul in death, and the final destruction of the wicked. By the evangelical class they were termed materialists. Although their number was limited at the beginning, those who belonged to the original organization gradually came over, until this branch now comprises the greater part of the Adventists in America. It has about one thousand ministers, and some thirty state and sectional conferences meeting annually. Its form of Church government is Congregational. See Wellcome, Hist. of the Second Advent Message, p. 594 sq.

Adventists, a name applied to those Christians who believe in the speedy coming of Christ to reign over his kingdom in the world. From intimations in Paul's Second Epistle to the Thessalonians (ii, 2, 3), it would appear that there were those even so early as that time who were looking for the immediate coming of Christ in his own person; and frequently along the ages since, the same expectation has been revived, with various changes as to circumstances and dates. Among the early prophets of this type was Ludovick Muggleton, a journeyman tailor in the time of Cromwell, who, with his companion Reeves, absolved and condemned according to their own pleasure. They claimed that they were the two last witnesses spoken of in Revelation, who were to appear previous to the destruction of the world. See MUGGLETONIANS. The Fifth Monarchy Men (q. v.) in the days of Cromwell formed another class of prophets whose influence was but short-lived. The Assyrian, the Persian, the Grecian, and the Roman were the four great monarchies, and these men, believing that the spiritual kingdom of Christ made the fifth, bore the name by which they are distinguished. They aimed at the subversion of all human government. In the 17th century, Thomas Burnet (q. v.), in his Theory of the Earth, taught that in the latter period of time, Christ shall live and reign on the earth for a thousand years, and that this period shall be the seventh millenary of the world. For as God created the world in six days and rested on the seventh, so the world, it is argued, will continue six thousand years, and the seventh thousand will be the great Sabbatism or holy rest to the people of God.

Men of very different denominational creeds have written freely on this subject. For example, the Restorationist, Mr. Winchester, in his Lectures on Prophecy, suggests that all the large rivers in America are on the eastern side, in order that the Jews may be carried the more easily down to the Atlantic, and then across that ocean to the Holy Land; that Christ will appear at the equinox, either in March or September; and, finally, that the body of Christ will be luminous, and be suspended in the air over the equator for twenty-four hours, and will be seen with circumstances of peculiar glory from pole to pole by all the inhabitants of the world. The author of a work entitled Illustrations of Prophecy contends that in the period commonly called the millennium a melioration of the human race will take place, by natural means, throughout the world. Robert Hall, Dr. David Bogue, and others, in the latter part of the 18th century, and others still later, published varying views of the matter. Edward Irving (q. v.) also published two volumes on prophecy, in which he contends for a millennium involving the personal reign of Christ on earth, commencing in 1866. However Millenarians may differ among themselves respecting the nature of this great event, they all agree that a revolution will be effected in the latter days by which vice and its attendant misery will be banished from the earth. It is remarkable that the subject of the second advent of Christ has generally been made most prominent by its adherents when the public mind has been more than usually excited about other matters, such as the prevalence of the plague, a disastrous epidemic, or frequent earthquake shocks. See PREMILLENARIANS.

I. Origin of the Modern Phase of Adventism.—The agitation of the question began in America about the close of the last century. In 1796 the Rev. Joshua Spaulding, minister at the Tabernacle in Salem, Mass., published a series of sermons on The Coming and Kingdom of Our Lord Jesus Christ, advocating the speedy appearance and reign of Christ. In 1800, Benjamin Farnham published a work at East Windsor, Conn., on the premillennial advent of Christ. Other works were published at various subsequent dates. In 1808, Elias Smith, a Christian Baptist minister, produced the first religious newspaper devoted to this subject ever published in the world, at Portsmouth, N. H. It was called The Herald of Gospel Liberty, and advocated the premillennial personal coming of Christ, and nearly all the views of what are now called Adventists. About this time, students of prophecy began to predict, from an examination of Daniel's "seventy weeks" and 2300 days, that the coming of Christ would take place in 1843 or 1847, according as the "seventy weeks" ended with the death of Christ, or four years later. Among these was William Miller (q. v.; also for an account of his followers and their doctrines see MILLERITES). The preaching of Mr. Miller was followed by a great awakening. Thousands were converted to God, and many ministers and members of other denominations, either through his public addresses or through the reading of his published works, were led to embrace his views and change their denominational connections.

The first general conference of Adventists assembled in Boston, Oct. 14, 1840. It was designed to be denominational, and, accordingly, was composed of ministers of various communions. The Conference convened in Chardon Street Chapel, and the pastor, Joshua V. Himes, read the call for this assembly as follows:

"The undersigned, believers in the Second Coming and Kingdom of the Messiah at hand, cordially unite in the call for a general conference of our brethren of the United States and elsewhere, who are also looking for the advent near, to meet at Boston, Mass., Oct. 14, 1840, at 10 o'clock A.M., to continue two days, or as long as may then be found best. The object of the conference will not be to form a new organization in the faith of Christ, nor to assail others of our brethren who differ from us in regard to the period and manner of the advent, but to discuss the whole subject faithfully and fairly, in the exercise of that spirit of Christ in which it will be safe immediately to meet him at the judgment-seat. By so doing, we may accomplish much in the rapid, general, and powerful spread of the everlasting gospel of the kingdom at hand, that the way of the Lord may be speedily prepared, whatever may be the precise period of his coming."

The Conference remained in session two days, and at its close published a report of its proceedings and issued a Circular Address to all those of the same faith. During the year 1841, conferences were held at Lowell, Mass., June 15-17; at Portland, Me., Oct. 12-14; in New York city, Oct. 25, 26; and at Dover, N. H., Dec. 14.

On the 18th of May, 1842, the "Second Advent Association of New York City and Vicinity" was formed. The members were to pay a monthly contribution to defray expenses of forwarding the message of Christ's immediate coming. A few days later another enterprise was started, which had a large influence in extending the doctrines of Adventism. At the Second Advent Conference held in Boston, May 24, 1842, a committee was appointed to provide a place and select a time for holding a camp-meeting "for Christians to worship God, to awaken sinners, and purify Christians by giving the midnight cry, viz., to hold up the immediate coming of Christ to judge the world." The first camp-meeting was held at Hadley, Lower Canada, commencing June 21, 1842. Another was held at East Kingston, N. H., commencing June 29. Others followed in quick succession, and all of them were attended by large numbers of people, many of whom were earnest seekers of religion. The preaching was vigorous and effective, and a large number of conversions resulted. In July of the same year a large tent was finished and set up in Concord, N. H., capable of accommodating nearly 4000 people. This was carried from place to place, and the enterprise resulted in awakening more interest than had been done by the camp-meetings.

As the year 1843 drew nigh, the expectations of the Adventists began to rise. Mr. Miller had predicted the personal appearing of Christ some time between March 21, 1843, and March 21, 1844. Others had fixed the time very early in the former year. The earliest date fixed upon by any of the Adventists was Feb. 10, forty-five years from the time the French army took Rome in 1798. The next day which was thought the most probable was the 15th of February. After this date had passed without any unusual occurrence, attention was turned to the Passover season as the one most likely to bring the second advent. The 14th of April was a point of time anticipated with the deepest solicitude by many. But the day came and went, as did all the other set times, without any remarkable occurrences. After the 21st of March, 1844, Mr. Miller had to confess his disappointment, but declared that, although mistaken, his confidence in God was not shaken, nor yet his belief in the speedy coming of Christ. All Advent believers who still remained in the faith continued, and still continue, to look for the advent of the Messiah. The following declaration of Fundamental Principles on which the Second Advent cause is based was made about the time of this disappointment, and is still held:

"I. The Word of God teaches that this earth is to be regenerated, in the restitution of all things, and restored to its Eden state as it came from the hand of its Maker before the fall, and is to be the eternal abode of the righteous in their resurrection state.

"II. The only millennium found in the Word of God is the thousand years which are to intervene between the first and second resurrection, as brought to view in the 20th of Revelation. And the various portions of Scripture which are adduced as evidence of such a period of time are to have their fulfillment only in the New Earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

"III. The only restoration of Israel yet future is the restoration of the saints to the New Earth, where the Lord my God shall come, and all his saints with him.

"IV. The signs which were to precede the coming of our Saviour have all been given; and the prophecies have all been fulfilled but those which relate to the coming of Christ, the end of this world, and the restitution of all things.

"V. There are none of the prophetic periods, as we understand them, that extend beyond the [Jewish] year 1843. "The above we shall ever maintain as the immutable truths of the Word of God, and therefore till our Lord come we shall ever look for his return as the next event in historical prophecy."

After the passing-away of the Jewish year 1843, the great body of the Adventists settled down in the belief that they could henceforth reckon particular times with no degree of positiveness. They believed that they had reached the end of all the prophetic periods, at the termination of which the advent was expected, and that while they should have to wait only the little while that their chronology might vary from God's time, yet they believed that they could have no more clew to the definite date. The time movement had failed. Every preparation had been made by the great majority of these believers for the final coming of the Lord on Oct. 22, 1844. The Advent periodicals issued large editions and suspended publication, considering their work ended; and many thousands of believers gave up all worldly pursuits, disengaged themselves from all worldly alliances, and sat down in the firm expectation of the coming of the Messiah. The day came and went, and nothing unusual occurred. From that time a new phase of the movement was necessary to its existence. Under various leaders it assumed various forms. The great body of Adventists, however, remained in the line of the originators of the movement. The publishers resumed their work, and declared their firm belief in the doctrine which they had been proclaiming, only varied in minor details. The following is from the pen of Joshua V. Himes, Mr. Miller's earliest and most zealous follower in the proclamation of the immediate coming of the Lord: "We have now passed every point of definite time in which we looked for our blessed Saviour, and yet I do not give up the question; I only give up the point that our chronologies are to be depended upon for literal exactness as to time. But we are in the circle of a short period, and may look now every hour for the advent." Such was the view held by the principal leaders in the movement, and they began anew their labors, somewhat cautiously at first, yet more vigorously afterwards.

But while the great body went forward in harmony with the original leaders, there were many side-issues which drew to themselves varying numbers, thus creating division in the ranks and causing much discredit to all concerned. The first question that produced a distracting influence was Judaism, which taught the conversion and restoration of the natural Jews. These not finding satisfaction in the discussions of the question in the regular Advent papers, started the American Millenarian in Boston in 1842, and afterwards removed it to New York. A considerable number left the main body on account of these differences of opinion.

The next disturbing cause was a strange fanaticism, originating with John Starkweather, who had become assistant to Mr. Himes at Chardon Street Chapel, Boston. He was a turbulent spirit, and was noted for making divisions wherever he went. His principal theme was the necessity of a preparation for the Saviour's coming. He taught that conversion, however full and thorough, did not fit one for God's favor without a second work, and that this second work was usually indicated by some bodily sensation. Accordingly, the losing of strength and other spasmodic phenomena were manifested and hailed as evidences of the great power of God in the sanctification of those who were already Christians. This he called the sealing power. The fanaticism grew to such proportions in the Church that measures had to be taken to remove it. All who spoke in opposition to such manifestations were charged with "offending against the Holy Ghost." Notwithstanding these denunciations, however, Starkweather and his followers were forced to withdraw, and worship in another place. Meetings were held in various places, camp-meetings were organized, and a conference attempted. Some followers were gathered, and many disgusting and disgraceful scenes enacted; but the movement assumed only small proportions.

The "shut-door" theory is next in order among the issues dividing Adventists. This notion originated with Joseph Turner, of Maine, and several others in various places, who simultaneously claimed to have it impressed upon them by the Holy Spirit, on "the tenth day of the seventh month." Mr. Turner proclaimed it at a camp-meeting held at Woodstock, Me., Oct. 22, 1844, while some penitents were presented for prayers, he repeating "Every one to your tents, O Israel," and declaring that Christ had left the mercy-seat. With him it soon settled into a theory, and he with others began to proclaim throughout the Advent societies that the door of mercy was shut from and after Oct. 22, 1844; but that all who remained steadfast in their experience of the movement of 1844 were already members of Christ's kingdom. This theory found adherents, and was confirmed by one Ellen G. Harmon, who travelled from town to town, where she was strangely exercised in body and mind, usually talking in assemblies until nature was exhausted, and then falling to the floor, remaining for a considerable time in an epileptic state. Afterwards she would relate the wonders which had been revealed to her during the trance, even professing to have seen Christ and the records contained in the book of life. Some of the Advent publications defended the theory, and others were controlled temporarily by its advocates. Extravagant views were held by most of the adherents of this theory, such as visions and dreams. Feet-washing and kissing were declared to be Gospel ordinances.

Another branch of this class of believers was established, with "visions" and "revelations," which had been so systematically organized as to deserve separate treatment. See ADVENTISTS, SEVENTH-DAY.

II. Organization.—As has already been intimated, the purpose of these zealous heralds of the second advent of Christ was simply to arouse the world to a consideration of their message, and induce the careless and impenitent to turn to God and prepare to meet the Lord at his coming. They aimed at no separate denominational organization, considering the time too short for any such necessity. But circumstances made it necessary to organize in some localities. Converts to the faith existed in such numbers as to require organization into societies. It frequently happened that the Adventists of a congregation were a minority, and were expelled from fellowship in their churches. Opposition on the part of believers of the various denominations drove many from their doors, and thus societies sprang up in various places from the beginning of the movement, while thousands who embraced the doctrine continued to hold their Church relationship as they had always done.

But after the disappointment of 1843-44, some plan of operations was required for the prosecution of the work in hand. To define more clearly the views of the Adventists, and determine who were of their number, it was decided to call a conference to meet at Albany, N. Y., April 29, 1845. As a result of the deliberations of that body, a report was adopted setting forth their views and recommending a course of action. This report formed the basis of subsequent organizations, and from it we present the following extract:

"In view of the many conflicting opinions, unscriptural views, leading to unseemly practices, and the sad divisions which have been caused by some professing to be Adventists, we deem it incumbent on us to declare to the world our belief that the Scriptures teach, among others, the following important truths:

"1st. That the heavens and earth, which are now, by the Word of God, are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. That the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up. That the Lord will create new heavens and a new earth, wherein righteousness—that is, the righteous—will forever dwell (2 Pet. iii. 7, 10, 13). And that the kingdom and the dominion under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him (Dan. vii. 27).

"2d. That there are but two advents or appearances of the Saviour to this earth (Heb. ix. 28). That both are personal and visible (Acts i. 9, 11). That the first took place in the days of Herod (Matt. ii. 1), when he was conceived of the Holy Ghost (i. 18), born of the Virgin Mary (ver. 25), went about doing good (xi. 5), suffered on the cross, the just for the unjust (1 Pet. iii. 18), died (Luke xiii. 46), was buried (ver. 53), arose again the third day, the first fruits of them that slept (1 Cor. xv. 4), and ascended into the heavens (Luke xiv. 51), which must receive him until the time of the restitution of all things, spoken of by the mouth of all the holy prophets (Acts iii. 21). That the second coming or appearing will take place when he shall descend from heaven, at the sounding of the last trumpet, to give his people rest (1 Thess. iv. 16, 17; 1 Cor. xv. 52), being revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the Gospel (2 Thess. i. 7, 8). And that he will judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and kingdom (2 Tim. iv. 1).

"3d. That the second coming or appearing is indicated to be now emphatically nigh, even at the doors (Matt. xxiv. 33), by the chronology of the prophetic periods (Dan. vii. 25; viii. 14; ix. 24; xii. 7, 11, 12; Rev. ix. 10, 15; xi. 2, 3; xii. 6, 14; xiii. 5), the fulfilment of prophecy (Dan. ii. vii. viii. ix. xi. xii. xiii. xiv. xv. xvi. xvii.), and the signs of the times (Matt. xxiv. 29; Luke xxi. 26, 26). And that this truth should be preached both to saints and sinners, that the first may rejoice, knowing their redemption draweth nigh (ver. 23; 1 Thess. iv. 18), and the last be warned to flee from the wrath to come (2 Cor. v. 11), before the Master of the house shall rise up and shut to the door (Luke xiii. 24, 25).

"4th. That the condition of salvation is repentance towards God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ (Acts xx. 21; Mark i. 15); and that those who have repentance and faith will live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ (Tit. ii. 11-13).

"5th. That there will be a resurrection of the bodies of all the dead (John v. 28, 29), both of the just and the unjust (Acts xxiv. 15); that those who are Christ's will be raised at his coming (1 Cor. xv. 23); that the rest of the dead will not live again until after a thousand years (Rev. xx. 5); and that the saints shall not all sleep, but shall be changed in the twinkling of an eye at the last trumpet (1 Cor. xv. 51, 52).

"6th. That the only millennium taught in the Word of God is the thousand years which are to intervene between the first resurrection and that of the rest of the dead, as intimated in the 20th of Revelation (ver. 2-7); and that the various portions of Scriptures which refer to the millennial state are to have their fulfilment after the resurrection of all the saints who sleep in Jesus (Isa. xi. xxxv. 1, 2, 5-10; lxxv. 17-25).

"7th. That the promise that Abraham should be the heir of the world was not to him or to his seed through the law, but through the righteousness of faith (Rom. iv. 13); that they are not all Israel which are of Israel (ix. 6); that there is no difference, under the Gospel dispensation, between Jew and Gentile (x. 12); that the middle wall of partition that was between them is broken down, no more to be rebuilt (Eph. ii. 14, 15); that God will render to every man according to his deeds (Rom. ii. 6); that if we are Christ's, then we are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise (Gal. iii. 29); and that the only restoration of Israel yet future is the restoration of the saints to the earth created anew, when God shall open the graves of those descendants of Abraham who died in faith without receiving the promise with the believing Gentiles who have been grafted with them into the same olive-tree, and shall cause them to come up out of their graves and bring them, with the living who are changed, into the land of Israel (Ezek. xxxvii. 12; Heb. xi. 12, 13; Rom. xi. 17; John v. 28, 29).

"8th. That there is no promise of this world's conversion (Matt. xxiv. 14); that the horn of the papacy will war with the saints and prevail against them until the Ancient of Days shall come and judgment be given to the saints of the Most High, and the time come that the saints possess the kingdom (Dan. vii. 21, 22); that the children of the kingdom and the children of the wicked one will continue together until the end of the world, when all things that offend shall be gathered out of the kingdom and the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father (Matt. xiii. 37-43); that the man of sin will only be destroyed by the brightness of Christ's coming (2 Thess. ii. 8); and that the nations of those which are saved and redeemed to God by the blood of Christ, out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation, will be made kings and priests unto God, to reign forever on the earth (Rev. v. 9, 10; xxi. 24).

"9th. That it is the duty of the ministers of the Word to continue in the work of preaching the Gospel to every creature, even unto the end (Matt. xxviii. 19, 20); calling upon them to repent, in view of the fact that the kingdom of heaven is at hand (Rev. xiv. 7), that their sins may be blotted out when the times of refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord (Acts iii. 19, 20).

"And 10th. That the departed saints do not enter their inheritance or receive their crowns at death (Dan. xii, 13; Rev. vi, 9-11; Rom. viii, 22, 23); that they without us cannot be made perfect (Heb. xi, 40); that their inheritance, incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeeth not away, is reserved in heaven, ready to be revealed in the last time (1 Pet. i, 4, 5); that there are laid up for them and us crowns of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give at the day of Christ to all that love his appearing (2 Tim. iv, 8); that they will only be satisfied when they awake with Christ's likeness (Psa. xvii, 15); and that when the Son of Man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, the King will say to those on his right hand, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world' (Matt. xxv, 34). Then they will be equal to the angels, being the children of God and of the resurrection (Luke xx, 36)."

The same conference recommended the organization of societies to be governed according to the independent plan, acknowledging only the New Test. as an authoritative guide in Church government. Yet many of the Advent believers still continue to hold their membership in the churches to which they formerly belonged, not departing, except in this particular, from their former faith. There are many others also who, not finding their views exactly met by the common belief of any one religious body, have no denominational connection; still they are reckoned as Adventists.

A mission was begun in England in 1846 by sending Joshua V. Himes, R. Hutchinson, and F. G. Brown thither in June of that year to proclaim the advent of the Messiah at hand. A paper—the European Advent Herald—was published one year, and many lectures and sermons were delivered; but the mission was abandoned in 1847 for want of men and means. A similar mission to the British West India Islands was undertaken by L. D. Mansfield and wife. This also failed, and was abandoned in the following year. Several missionary societies have been in existence from time to time, among which are "The American Advent Mission Society," organized in 1865, and "The Union Female Missionary Association," organized in 1867.

After the death of Mr. Miller, there was considerably more division of opinion among his followers than had been formerly, and this gave rise to denominational divisions, which are considered in the articles on ADVENT CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION; ADVENTISTS, EVANGELICAL; and ADVENTISTS, SEVENTH-DAY.

III. Literature.—The publications called forth by the agitation of this question have been very numerous. Perhaps not less than one thousand books and pamphlets have appeared in this country, while many have come to us from England. Of periodicals of all kinds, about one hundred have been published at one time or another. The oldest paper published by Adventists was started about the year 1840, under the title of The Signs of the Times, but is now called Messiah's Herald. See ADVENTISTS, EVANGELICAL. The other principal periodicals of this class are The World's Crisis (Boston), Advent Herald (ibid.), The Christian (ibid.), Herald of Life (Springfield, Mass.), and Advent Review and Herald of the Sabbath (Battle Creek, Mich.). See Wellcome, Hist. of the Second Advent Message (Yarmouth, Me., 1874).

Adventists, Evangelical, are the representatives of the original followers of William Miller (q. v.) and his coadjutors. See ADVENTISTS; MILLERITES. They were organized at Boston, under the name of "The American Millennial Association," in November, 1858. They adhere to the doctrine of the conscious state of the dead and the eternal conscious suffering of the wicked. Their principal organ is the Messiah's Herald, published at Boston. They have six or eight state and sectional conferences. Those holding the same views in Pennsylvania and Canada organized under the name of Messiah's Church, and have a conference in each of these sections. They are in full accord, both as to faith and labors, and sustain the same enterprises. See Wellcome, Hist. of the Second Advent Message, p. 603.

Adventists, Seventh-day, are a branch of the Adventists (q. v.) who observe the seventh day as the Sabbath. They originated as early as 1844. They set no time for the coming of Christ, believing that the prophecies which, in the opinion of other Adventists, fix the second advent in or about the year 1844, really brought the world only to the "cleansing of the tabernacle," a period of brief but uncertain duration preceding the coming of Christ. One of the first movers in this new departure was elder James White, formerly a "Christian" minister of Maine. He embraced the doctrine of Adventism in 1842, and began at once to preach it in Maine. In 1844 he embraced the "shut-door" theory of Mr. Turner and Ellen G. Harmon (already referred to under ADVENTISTS), and began to claim extraordinary revelations from heaven as to doctrine and duty. Among these revelations was one requiring the observance of the seventh day as the Sabbath. He subsequently married Miss Harmon, and has published many of her "visions" in various forms. Mr. White started a paper at Middletown, Conn., called Present Truth, and a little later issued it at New York. Some time after this the name was changed to Advent Review and Herald of the Sabbath, which was published at South Paris, Me., then at Rochester, N. Y., and finally, in 1855, at Battle Creek, Mich., where it continues to be issued. The "Seventh-day Adventist Publishing Association" publish at Battle Creek four denominational papers in English, one in Danish, and one in Swedish. Another English paper has been established in California. A mission has been established in Switzerland, where two hundred believers were reported in 1875. Missions have been determined upon for Great Britain, France, Germany, Holland, Italy, Hungary, Africa, and Australia. There are 15 State conferences, 218 preachers, 943 churches, and 27,742 members. Strict temperance views prevail. Strong drink and tobacco are forbidden. Abstinence from pork, tea, and coffee is also recommended. See Wellcome, Hist. of the Second Advent Message, p. 401 sq.

Adventitus (or Aventor), one of the companions of St. Mauritius, martyred with him and many others by order of emperor Maximilian, Sept. 22, 286, at Agaurn. See Ruinart, p. 272.

Adventius, bishop of Metz, early embraced the clerical life, and was educated under the supervision of Drogo, whom he succeeded in the above-mentioned see in 855. He was present and spoke in the Synod of Metz in 869, and in that of Douzi in 871. Besides his own epitaph, which he made, there is extant (in Baronius) the writing which he composed in favor of the divorce between Lothair and his queen Thietburga. See Meurisse, Hist. des Evêques de l'Eglise de Metz; Rivet, Hist. Lit. de la France, v, 249.

Adversa. See AVERSA.

Advertisements was a term used for certain statements of principles, rules, suggestions, and directions drawn up by the bishops during the reign of queen Elizabeth, and issued for the guidance and direction of their clergy. They had little moral weight, and no legal authority.

Advocates of the POPE are two important offices in the apostolical chamber at Rome, one being the legal, the other the fiscal advocate. Both are employed to defend the interests of the chamber in all courts. There are never more than twelve consistorial advocates in Rome. They are nominated by the pope, and plead in consistories, whether public or private. They supplicate the pallium for all newly created archbishops in the secret consistory. They have the privilege of creating doctors in the canon as well as civil law when assembled in their college Della Sapienza. They wear a long robe of black wool, of which the tail is purple, lined with red silk, and a cape falling down between the shoulders of the same color, and lined with ermine. But their ordinary dress is a cassock, lined with black serge, and a cloak trailing on the ground. One of these advocates is rector of the college Della Sapienza. He is to receive all the rents which are appropriated to it, and to pay the salaries of the public readers or lecturers, whose chairs are filled by a congregation of cardinals deputed by the pope for that purpose. The seven senior consistorial advocates have large salaries—twice as large, indeed, as the five junior advocates—and the fees drawn from those who obtain doctorates are considerable.

Advoja. See ADVAIA.

Advower is the advocate of a church or religious house, as a cathedral, monastery, abbey, etc., called a defensor or bailiff in Germany. Sometimes it signifies a person who has a right to present to a church living. Charlemagne had the title of advower of St. Peter's, which the people conferred on him for having protected Italy against the Lombards. Pope Nicholas constituted king Edward the Confessor and his successors advowers of the Monastery of Westminster and of all the churches in England. Advowers were the guardians and administrators of temporal concerns, and under their authority all contracts passed which related to the churches. The collection of the tithes and all other church revenues were under their control, as a reward for which many of the richest benefices were placed by the heads or principals of convents at their disposal. The command of the forces furnished by their monasteries for war was intrusted to them. Sometimes there were subadvowers, who introduced great disorder, and very much contributed to the ruin of the monasteries. Abuses of this office having become general and intolerable, it was abolished by Frederick II of Germany. The origin of this office is sometimes assigned to the time of Stilico, in the 4th century; but the Benedictines represent it as commencing so late as the 8th century. Persons of the first rank were gradually introduced into it on account of the skill and power required in its execution. For a classification of advowers, see ADVOCATE OF THE CHURCH.

Advowson. Some additional facts may here be presented. In case the patron does not present within six months, the presentation lapses to the bishop; and if he neglect to collate within the following six months, to the archbishop, and after him to the crown. If, however, after the first six months the patron present before the bishop has collated, the presentation of the patron is good. So, after the expiration of twelve months, if the bishop collate before the archbishop, the bishop's appointment is good. If a benefice in the gift of a person outlawed or tainted fall vacant, the sovereign presents. If the patron remain in a state of excommunication for the space of forty days, his clerk may be refused. Presentation made while the benefice is full is void. If a patron present first one and then another clerk, the ordinary may institute whichever he pleases; but where the sovereign is patron the ordinary must institute the second. A patron may not present himself, but the ordinary may admit him on his petition. A married woman, having the right of advowson, must present in the name of her husband. See Johnson, Clergyman's Vademecum.

Adÿta (ādvta, inaccessible), a name given in early times to the chancel of a church, because there was no place of access here for the people, who were wholly excluded therefrom. — Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. viii, ch. vi, § 4.

Antea, in Greek mythology, was the name of a festival of Ajax celebrated on the island of Salamis, where he was born. A temple was erected there, in which stood a wooden image of him. He was likewise worshipped in Athens and on the promontory of Rhæteum.

Ædes, a name given by the Romans to unconsecrated temples.

Ædesius (or Hedesius), a Christian martyr, was a noble Lycian and a student at Alexandria, where he was martyred by drowning about A.D. 306. See Eusebius, De Mart. Palest. v, 14; Syriac Acta in Assemani, Acta Mart. ii, 195.

Ædicula, a small temple or chapel among the ancient Romans, called also æcellum.

Ædile, a Roman magistrate whose business it was to superintend the temples and other public buildings, the public games, and spectacles. Two curule ædiles were annually elected, and there were, besides these, plebeian ædiles. The office was one of dignity and honor, though reckoned a minor magistracy.

Ædituus, an officer among the Romans who had charge of the offerings, treasure, and sacred utensils belonging to the temples of the gods. A female officer of the same kind, termed Æditua, presided over the temples of the goddesses. See DOORKEEPER.

Æga, in Greek mythology, was the daughter of Olenus, who with her sister Helice brought up the young Jupiter. She was subsequently placed among the stars. Æga had such a brightness that the Titans were blinded when they attempted to besiege heaven. They accordingly asked her mother to darken the star. Gæa hid Æga in a cave on Crete, where afterwards she became Jupiter's nurse.

Ægæa, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Venus, from her extraordinary worship on the islands of the Ægean Sea. She was also called "the inhabitant of the island," for she was worshipped more than any other deity.

Ægæus, in Greek mythology, was, according to Strabo, a surname of Neptune, derived from Æga, a city in Eubœa, where a temple was erected to his worship on a hill.

Ægeon, in Greek mythology, was (1) a giant with one hundred arms and fifty heads, whom the gods called Briareus (the frightful, the powerful). He was a son of Uranus and the Earth. He and his brothers, Cottus and Gyges, were bound by their father and imprisoned in a cave, from fear of their strength, until Jupiter in a war against the Titans liberated them, and with their help became victorious. Once Neptune, Juno, and Minerva had plotted to bind Jupiter. Thetis brought Ægeon up into Olympus and placed him side by side with Jupiter. At the sight of the frightful giant the deities were so afraid that they abandoned their design. (2.) One of the evil sons of the Arcadian king Lycaon. Jupiter, when he had changed the father into a wolf, killed the sons by lightning.

Ægates is commemorated as a Christian saint in some martyrologies on Oct. 24.

Ægeates, JOHN, a Nestorian priest, lived, according to Vossius, about 483; but Cave thinks that he lived some years later, as he continued his history five books after the deposition of Peter the Fuller. This was an Ecclesiastical History from the reign of Theodosius the Younger, and ending with the deposition of Peter the Fuller (q. v.). There is only a fragment of this work extant, in the Concilia, vol. vii, and in the collections of Theodorus Lector. He wrote, also, a treatise against the Council of Chalcedon.

Ægidius, an Anabaptist who appeared at Aix-la-Chapelle about the end of the 16th century, and was condemned to death at Antwerp.

Ægidius, ST., is considered by many to be identical with ST. GILES (q. v.). In addition to what has already been given in that article, it is related of him that he refused treatment for an accidental lameness, that he might be able to practice more rigid self-mortification. From this anecdote he has been esteemed the patron of cripples, and St. Giles's Cripplegate, built about 1090, is dedicated to him. In art, St. Giles is generally represented as an aged man, with a long white beard; a hind, pierced with an arrow, rests its head or fore-feet in his lap, or crouches at his feet. Representations of him are seldom met with in Italy, but very frequently in early French and German art. The relics of the saint, buried in the church dedicated by himself to St. Peter, but translated by abbot Autulphus in 925 to the neighboring abbey, were allowed to rest in peace until the Albigensian war in 1209 exposed them to danger, when they were transported to Toulouse and laid over one of the altars in the Church of St. Saturninus, where the body still was when Baillet wrote. Pope Urban IV gave the saint's office a place in the Roman Breviary as a semi-double, but since the middle of the 16th century it has been reduced to a simple office. St. Giles still retains a place in the Reformed English Calendar. His festival is kept on Sept. 1.

Ægidius (JOHN of St. Giles), an English Dominican, was born at St. Albans. Educated at Paris, he became a distinguished medical practitioner in that city, and was employed (in 1198) by king Philip. He removed to Montpellier, where he studied diseases of the mind. Returning to Paris, he studied divinity, and soon became a doctor in that faculty, and a professor in the schools. In 1223 he joined the Dominicans, being the first Englishman of that order. In 1235 he went to Oxford, where he became lecturer in arts and divinity. A close intimacy sprang up between him and Grossetete, bishop of Lincoln, who obtained leave of the general of the order that Ægidius might reside with him as an assistant. While he was physician of Philip II he amassed great wealth, which he employed for the purchase and repairs of the Hospital of St. Jacques at Paris—a branch of St. James of Compostella in Spain, and destined to lodge the pilgrims. He gave it in 1218 to the Dominicans. He died about 1253. He wrote some works on medicine and theology which were never published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ægidius LEODIENSIS, or Giles of Liege, a monk of the Vallée d'Or, a monastery of the Order of Cîteaux, in the diocese of Luxemburg, lived in the early part of the 13th century. He wrote a history of the bishops of Liege, from the time of Theodwin, successor of Wason, to Henry III, sixty-ninth bishop. This history (Gesta Episcoporum Leodiensium), to the year 1246, has been continued to 1348 by John Zlocseuius, canon of St. Lambert of Liege. John Chapeville published it, with other chronicles, at Liege in 1613. The life of St. Albert, taken from his work, has been translated into Spanish, and published under the title Vida de S. Alberto, Cardinal del Título de Santa-Cruz, Obispo de Lleja y Martyr, trad. en Castellano por Andres de Soto (Brussels, 1613). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ægidius (bishop) OF TUSCULUM, in the 10th century, was sent by pope John XIII, accompanied by many Italian, French, and German priests, into Poland in 965, to assist in instructing the Poles in Christianity. See Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iii, cent. x, pt. i, ch. i.

Ægidius OF VITERBO, an eminent Italian prelate and scholar, was born in 1470. He studied with the Augustinians at Viterbo, was made doctor of theology, and in 1503 general of his order. In 1512 he attended the Lateran Council; acted as papal delegate at different courts; and died Nov. 12, 1532. Ægidius was also a Hebrew scholar, and translated some Cabalistic works into Latin, which are still in MS. See Herrera, Alphabetum Augustinianum; Ughelli, Italia Sacra; Fabricius, Bibl. Med. et Inf. Ætat. i, 63; Gaudolph, De 200 Scriptor. Augustin.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Ægiöchus, an appellation given by Homer and others to Jupiter, either because he was cherished by a goat, or because his buckler was covered with a goat's skin.

Ægoceros, a monster into which Pan transformed himself when, with the rest of the gods, he fled from Typhon. Jupiter, for his subtlety, placed him among the stars.

Ægophäga (or Ægophäge), a name of the goddess Juno among the Lacedæmonians, from the goat which Hercules sacrificed to her.

Æilfric. See ÆLFRIC.

Æiparthénos (ἁϊπάρθενος, ever virgin), a title of the Virgin Mary. See VIRGINITY, PERPETUAL.

Æitholas. See ÆITHOLAS.

Æel, in Scandinavian mythology, was the name of the nectar which departed heroes drank in Walhalla, from the hands of the goddess Freyia.

Æilfhun. See ALHUN.

Æilhun. See ALHUN.

Ælius, PUBLIUS JULIUS, bishop of Debelum, Thrace, towards the close of the 2d century, was one of several bishops who protested against the Montanist pretension to the gift of prophecy. Their signatures are produced in a letter (a fragment of which is preserved by Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. v, 19) by Serapion. Ælius ascribes the Montanist prophecies to dæmoniical possession.

Æella, in Greek mythology, was one of the Amazons, the first with whom Hercules fought, when he came to get the girdle of her queen. She was slain by that hero.

Æello, in Greek mythology, was the name of (1) one of the Harpies. Her mother was Electra, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, who married Thaumias, by whom she had these horrible children, and a very beautiful daughter, Iris. (2.) A dog of Actæon.

Ælred. See AILREDUS.

Ælurus, the god-cat, an ancient Egyptian deity, sometimes represented as a cat, and sometimes as a man with a cat's head.

Ælurus, the surname, or rather nickname, of a schismatical patriarch of Alexandria, Timotheus Ælurus, who for many years was the leader of the Monophysite party there and at Constantinople in the middle of the 5th century. See TIMOTHEANS.

Æmiliani, ST. JEROME, an Italian philanthropist, was born at Venice, of noble parentage, in 1481. Having been taken prisoner in his youth, upon his release he dedicated his life to the care of orphans, and accordingly collected a considerable number of them in a house, where they were educated in virtue and industry. This laid the foundation of the regular clerks of St. Maieul, or Fathers of Somascho, so called from the place where he first established their community. He appears to have been a man of most humane disposition; and in 1528, when plague and famine raged in Italy, he sold even his furniture to assist the poor. He died in 1537, and was canonized by Benedict XIV. His Life was written by Andreas Stella, general of the Somaschians (q. v.).

Æmilianus. (1) A saint in Armenia, commemorated in the Latin Church Feb. 8. (2) Confessor in Africa, commemorated in the Latin Church Dec. 6. (3) Confessor, commemorated in the Greek Church Jan. 8. (4) Bishop of Cyzicum and confessor, commemorated in the Greek Church Aug. 8.

Æmilius is the name of three saints in the Roman calendar. (1) Martyr in Africa, commemorated May 22. (2) Of Sardinia, commemorated May 28. (3) Commemorated June 18.

Æmilius, GEORG, a Lutheran theologian, was born June 25, 1517, at Mansfeld, and died as superintendent at Stollberg, May 22, 1569. He wrote, Evangelica Heriaco Carmine Reddita (Basle, 1551, and often):—Pœmata Sacra in Jeseas Caput LIII, Psalmum XXII et quædam Evangelia (ibid. 1551):—Explicationes in Evange- lia Dominicalia et Festivalia (ibid. eod.):—Epistolæ Dominicæ et Festivales Carmine Heroico Expressæ (ibid. eod.):—Imaginum in Apocalypsi Joannis Descriptio Elegiaco Carmine Expressa (Wittenberg, 1571). See Wetzel, Anal. Hymnol. i, 45; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Æneas (or Ængus), an Irish prelate, was the son of Engobham, who lived about the end of the 8th century. In his youth he became a monk of the monastery Cluair-Enach, Leinster, under Melathgene, the abbot. It is probable that he succeeded the latter in the government of the house, but withdrew into a solitude near by, called after him Desert Ængus. Finding the fame of his sanctity spreading abroad, he betook himself to the Abbey of Taulaught, near Dublin. Here he was discovered after seven years and admitted by Maelruan, the abbot, to his intimacy. No further information has been gathered respecting him. He wrote a martyrology, or, as he called it, Festology, in Irish verse, still extant. He afterwards composed a much more copious martyrology in prose:—also De Sanctis Hiberniæ Libri V.—and a History of the Old Testament, in metre. See Ware, De Script. Hibern.

Ænon. Lieut. Conder finds the site of this baptizing-place of John in Aimin, three or four miles north of the springs in Wady Farah, east of Nablûs; and the neighboring Salim, or Shalem, in the present Salim, about the same distance south of these springs (Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," July, 1874, p. 191 sq.); and Dr. Tristram adopts the identification, confirming the local use of these names (Bible Places, p. 192). The latter remarks that "at the head of the valley of Shechem are copious springs in a broad, open valley called Wady Farah. This valley rises near Salim [so called by the Samaritans, but not by the peasantry], separating Mount Ebal from the chain of Nebi Belan, and forming a great geological feature of the country. It soon becomes a deep and narrow ravine, with steep hill-sides burrowed with caverns, in which a perennial copious stream, shaded by oleanders, runs towards the Jordan. There is a succession of springs after the ruins of Burj Farah, with flat meadows on either side, where great crowds might gather on either bank of the stream. It is one of the most picturesque spots in the country, and is close to one of the old main lines of road from Jerusalem to Galilee."

Æolus, in Pagan mythology, was the god of the winds, and is variously represented as the son of Jupiter, Hippotus, or Meneclea. He reigned over the Æolian islands, near Sicily, viz. Lipara, Hiera, Strongyle, Diolye, Ericusa, Phœnicusa, and Eunyonia. He resided at Rhegium, in Italy, or at Strongyle, now called Stromboli. He is represented as holding the winds enchained in a vast cave to prevent their committing such vast depredation as they had formerly; for to their violence was imputed not only the disjunction of Sicily from Italy, but also the separation of Europe from Africa.

Æon, in Phœnician mythology, was the son of Colpias and Baau (Bohu, or Chaos), the two primeval deities. He and his brother Protagonos were the earliest created mortals. Æon was the first to discover the use of fruit as food.

Æpinus, FRANZ ALBERT, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 15, 1673, at Wanzke, in the duchy of Mecklenburg. Having completed his studies at Jena and Rostock, he was appointed in 1696 magister philosophiæ, and was placed at the head of the cathedral school at Ratzeburg in 1700. In 1712 he was called as professor of logic to Rostock; in 1721 he took the chair of theology, and died Feb. 14, 1750, as member of consistory and general superintendent. He wrote, Introductio in Philosophiam (1714; new ed. 1718), which comprises the whole system of sciences, as logic, metaphysics, physics, natural theology, ethics, and politics.

He belonged to the strict Lutheran orthodoxy, and in his writings he shows himself the champion of his Church. In his De Pietatis ad Christianismum Necessitudine (1728) and De Evangelio Æterno, he fights against pietism and chiliasm; and in his Matæologia Fanatica Compendium ex Dippelii Scriptis Collectum, etc. (1721), he battles against the doctrines of the enthusiast J. C. Dippel. See Bergmann, Progr. Funebr. Memoria Monumentum (Rostock, 1750); Becker, Scruturum Exequiis F. A. Alpini (ibid. eod.); Schmerfahl, Nachrichten, ii, 136; Rostochium Litteratum, p. 363; Frank, Gesch. d. prot. Theologie, ii, 239; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Ærea, a title of Diana, who was so called from a mountain of Argolis, where particular worship was paid her.

Æres. See Æs.

Æeromancy was a species of divination practiced among the Greeks and Romans, by which future events were foretold from certain appearances or noises in the air. One mode of æeromancy was as follows: The person employing it folded his head in a cloth, and having placed a bowl of water in the open air, he proposed his question in a low voice, when, if the water was agitated, he considered that what he had asked was answered in the affirmative.

Ærtsen (misspelled Ærtzen), PETER (called by the Italians Pietro Longo, from his tall figure), an eminent historical painter, was born at Amsterdam in 1519. At the age of eighteen he copied some capital pictures in the cabinet of Bossu, in Hainault. He gained much celebrity in historical painting. His greatest work, The Crucifixion, at Alkmaer, was destroyed by a mob in 1666. At Delft are two of the pictures of this artist, a Nativity and the Offering of the Wise Men; and at Amsterdam, in the Church of Our Lady, are three, viz. the Death of the Virgin Mary, a Nativity, and the Adoration of the Magi, all of which are reckoned excellent performances. He died at Amsterdam in 1573.

Æruscatôres, a name given to the priests of Cybele among the Romans because they begged alms in the public streets. The word came to be applied to fortune-tellers generally, or vagrants like the modern gypsies.

Æs (Æres or Æsculânus), in Roman mythology, was a divinity who presided over the coinage of copper, and was represented standing in the ordinary habit of a female, with an upright spear in the left hand and a balance in the right.

Æsar, the Etruscan name of the Supreme Being.

Æschines, an Athenian philosopher, is said to have been the son of a sausage-maker. He followed Socrates continually, which drew from that philosopher the remark that the sausage-maker's son was the only one who knew how to pay due regard to him. It is alleged that poverty obliged him to go to Sicily to the court of Dionysius; and that he met with great contempt from Plato, but was very well received by Anstippus, to whom he showed some of his dialogues, receiving from him a handsome sum of money. He returned to Athens, where he taught philosophy to maintain himself, and afterwards wrote orations for the forum. He wrote several dialogues, and others are attributed to him which are not genuine. The following are thought to be genuine: Concerning Virtue: whether it can be Taught:—Eryxi-as or Erasistratus; concerning Riches: whether they are Good:—and Axiochus; concerning Death: whether it is to be Feared.

Æsculânus. See Æs.

Æsculâtrus. See ASCLEPAS.

Æternâles, a name given by Danæus, in his edition of Augustine's treatise De Heresibus, to a sect which is numbered as the sixty-seventh in that work and as the eightieth in Philaster. The Æternâles taught that the world will remain forever in its present condition, even after the second coming of our Lord. Augustine remarks that Philaster gives neither the name of the sect nor its originator. The author of Prædestinatus mentions the same tenet as that of a sect which he names Sataniani (q. v.), from one Satanianus; but this name was sometimes given to the Euchites.

Æthalides, a mythical hero, son of Mercury and Euphemia, was a native of Larissa, who had the liberty from his father of being sometimes with the living and sometimes with the dead, so that he was aware of all that was passing among both. He was a herald of the Argonauts, and the duties of his office gave rise to the fable; he being necessarily often present with, and often absent from, the army, and being obliged to be exactly informed of all that happened.

Æthelbert. See ETHELBERT.

Ætherea, a surname of Pallas and other aerial divinities, taken from the fabulous origin of the Palladium.

Æthiops, in Pagan mythology, was the son of Vulcan by Aglaia, one of the Graces. From him the Æthiopians had their name, being previously called Æthereans.

Æthlius, the son of Jupiter by Protogenia, and father of Endymion, is said to have been one of the initiators of the Olympic games.

Æthon, a name given by the poets to the four black horses of Pluto.

Æthusa, in Paganism, was a mythical character, daughter of Neptune by Apollo.

Ætius (1), a Palestinian bishop who condemned the archontic Peter of Capharbaricha about a generation before A.D. 361 (Epiph. Hær. p. 291). (2.) A bishop of Lydda (Diopolis) of this name subscribed the Council of Nice; yet he had been claimed not long before by Arius as a partisan (Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. i, 5; Epiph. Hær. p. 731 c). He took part in the Arian Synod of Antioch in 330 (Theodoret, Hist. Eccles. i, 20); and the Arian historian Philostorgius (ibid. iii, 12) accuses him of having joined the Athanasians in the hope of evading the charge of fornication, adding that he died soon after by an appropriate judgment. (3.) An Ætius stands second among the Palestinian bishops who subscribed the Council of Sardica, and who, two years later, specially congratulated Athanasius on his return from exile. (4.) A bishop of the Valentinians at Constantia, in Cyprus. According to Polybius (Vit. Epiph. p. 59), he was struck dumb by Epiphanius for his blasphemies, and died on the seventh day.

Ætra, an English prelate, was a pupil of St. Hilda, in the Monastery of Whitby, and (according to Bede) became bishop of Dorchester. He is probably the same as HÆDDI (q. v.); but Florence of Worcester (Chronicle, sub ann. 622) supposes him to have been the bishop of a new see established for the South Angles in A.D. 679. Perhaps Ætra may have been a diminutive for Hæddi. See Bede, Hist. Eccles. iv, 23; Ang. Sacra, i, 192, 3.

Æf, in Egyptian mythology, was the mystical name of the sun in the lower hemisphere, or Hades.

Aesa, PIETRO, an Italian painter, who flourished about the year 1650, was called Della Basilicata, from his being a native of a province of that name in the kingdom of Naples. His works are on religious subjects. Dominici speaks of this artist in very favorable terms. His works are preserved in many of the churches and convents at Naples. In the chapel of the monastery at Marsico Nuovo is an altar-piece, the Assumption of the Holy Virgin, which is highly esteemed.

Affaitati, ANTONIO MARIA, a Capuchin friar, was born in 1660. He lived at Milan, where he was appointed to assist those condemned to death. He died April 26, 1721. He wrote, Fiori Istorici, ovvero Compendio d'Erudizioni Virtuose, e Fatti Illustri d'Uomini Grandi, Antichi e Moderni, Sagri e Profani, e loro delli Memorabili (Milano, 1711; a 2d and more complete ed. was published in 1732):—Memoriale Catechisto, Esposto alle Religiose Clausurali di qualunque Ordine (ibid. 1716):—Il Patriarca Davidico, Spiegato nella Vita e Santità Eminente di S. Giuseppe, Sposo di Maria sempre Vergine (ibid. ed.):—Il Caritativo Assistente in Pratica; Metodo per Confortare ed Ajutare i Condannati a Morte ad un Felice Passaggio, etc. (ibid. 1719). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Affarosi, CAMILLO, a Benedictine of Italy, was born in 1680 at Reggio, in Lombardy. He employed himself chiefly with the history of his native place. He died in 1763. He wrote, Memorie Istoriche del Monastero di S. Prospero di Reggio (Modena, 1733, 1737):—Notizie Istoriche della Città di Reggio in Lombardia (Padua, 1755). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Affelmann, JOHANN, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Soest, in Westphalia, Nov. 25, 1588. He studied at Marburg, Giessen, and Rostock; and in the latter place, when twenty-one years old (in 1609), he became doctor and professor of theology, and as such he labored there until his death, Feb. 28, 1624. He took an active part in the controversies of his time, and wrote on Christ's ubiquity, baptism, and the Lord's supper, against Roman Catholics and Calvinists, chiliasts and enthusiasts. Fifty years after his death, Dr. G. Möbius, in Leipsic, published his writings, Symtagma Exercitationum Acad., in 2 vols.—the first containing the Scripta Polemica, the second Scripta Egetica. The introduction to this collection contains also a short biography. See Tholuck, Das akademische Leben des 17ten Jahrhunderts; Krabbe, Aus dem kirchlichen u. wissenschaftlichen Leben Rostocks, p. 33 sq.; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Affidatio (betrothal), a term which probably came into use about the 10th century. It seems to belong to the period of fully developed feudalism. The earliest example is of the year 1287; and the forms given in which the word occurs, from the rituals of Limoges and of Rheims, are more modern yet, to judge from the passages in French which are intermixed in them.

Affiliation, a term used among monks to signify the incorporation of a monk with the particular monastery to which he binds himself, and whose son he thenceforth becomes.

Affirmativi, the name given by the tribunal of the Inquisition to those heretics who, in word or deed, confess that they do actually hold the errors attributed to them, and, when interrogated formally, obstinately maintain them. See Emericus, Director Inquisitorum, pt. ii, qu. 34.

Afflatus, a term used by the poets of ancient Rome to indicate the inspiration of some divinity which prompted their poetic effusions. Not only, however, were poets supposed to be under the influence of the divine afflatus, but all who performed great exploits or succeeded in any important undertaking.

Affitto, Eustachio d', a Dominican of Italy, was born in the early part of the 18th century, and died in 1790 at Naples. In 1782 he published the commencement of a large work on the literary history of Southern Italy, entitled Memorie degli Scrittori del Regno di Napoli (vol. i as far as letter A). The 2d vol. appeared in 1792. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Affitto, Giovanni Maria, an Italian Dominican, was born near the close of the 16th century. He devoted himself to the study of mathematics, and especially to the art of defence. He died at Naples in 1673. He was called in Spain Don Juan of Austria, and was the author of a treatise on fortifications, besides certain theological and philosophical writings. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Affusion (another name for pouring or sprinkling), although previously practiced, did not become general until the 13th century in the Western Church, which permits it, although the ancient practice of immersion, or dipping, has never been formally abolished in favor of pouring water on the person to be baptized. Affusion was probably an indulgence to clerics, or persons baptized at the point of death, and then extended to infants in delicate health. The Eastern Church retains dipping, and insists on rebaptism by immersion in all cases where it has not been observed. See SPRINKLING.

Afghan Version. See PUSHTOO.

Afghans, a people inhabiting Afghanistan (q. v.), and, according to their own traditions, descended from Melic Talut, that is, from king Saul. Sir William Jones has conjectured that they are a remnant of the ten tribes of Israel carried off in the Captivity. He says, "We learn from Esdras that the ten tribes, after a wandering journey, came to a country called Arsareth, where we may suppose they settled. Now the best Persian historians affirm that the Afghans are descended from the Jews; and they have among themselves traditions of the same import. It is even asserted that their families are distinguished by the name of Jewish tribes; though, since their conversion to Islamism, they have studiously concealed their origin. The language they use has a manifest resemblance to Chaldaic; and a considerable district under their dominion is called Hagareth, which might easily have been changed from Arsareth." The Afghans still preserve a strong resemblance to the Jews in their customs and ritual observances. They contract marriages chiefly with their own tribes; they adhere to the Levitical law in the brother marrying the widow of his deceased brother whenever the brother has died without issue; divorces are permitted among them, and a ceremony prevails among one of their tribes bearing a marked resemblance to the Feast of Tabernacles. Their language also contains a greater number of Hebrew words than any other in India.

Afhacker, GILLES, a theologian of Holland, a native of Vreeswyk, was professor of theology at Utrecht near the commencement of the 17th century. He wrote a curious history of the theological disputes which existed at that time in Holland between the Gomarists and Remonstrants. This history, published under the pseudonym of Salomon Theodote, is entitled Enotikon Dissecti Belgii, in quo Historica Relatio Originis et Progressus eorum Dissidiiarum Continetur quæ in Fœderatis Belgii Provinciis Remonstrantes et Contra-remonstrantes per Annos aliquot Exagitarunt (Ursellus, 1618). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Afræ Sorôres (the African sisters), that is, the Hesperides, mythical personages in the Pagan legends.

African Code, a title given to the codification or compilation of the conclusions arrived at in the various African councils (q. v.). On this African Code a good deal has been written, but a good deal also remains unsolved, and perhaps insoluble. Several of the canons contained in it have been assigned to more councils than one, and several of the councils are differently dated or numbered by different editors or collectors. Perhaps the best edition of it is that published in Greek and Latin by Mansi (iii, 699-843). Originally promulgated in Latin, it was probably translated into Greek before the Trullan Council of A.D. 683, by the second canon of which it became part of the code of the Eastern Church. It comprehends, first, the deliberations of the Council of Carthage, A.D. 419; then the canons of the same synod to the number of 33; then "canons of different councils of the African Church," in the words of their heading, especially those down to 138. Other collections extant contain fewer or more canons, some adding those of later councils, others quite ancient and not including those of the Council of Carthage, A.D. 419. Notwithstanding this variety, the title of "African Code" seems properly given to the 138 canons above mentioned as designating those canons alone which have been received generally by the East and West. The chief interest attaches to the two canons interdicting appeals beyond the sea. See Migne, Patrol. lxxxiv, 179-236; Beveridge, Synodic. i, 365-372; Johnson, Vademecum, ii, 171.

African Councils. We give under this head a chronological view (from Smith's Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v.) of the various ancient synods held in different parts of Africa, exclusive of those of Egypt [see ALEXANDRIA, COUNCILS OF], with the transactions of each, leaving further details for the separate places named. The date and relative order of many of these are disputed:

CARTHAGE, A.D. 200, 217—Supposed to be the same under Agrippinus, in favor of rebaptizing heretics.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 251—Under St. Cyprian; decreed that the lapsed should be received to communion, but not till they had performed their full penance.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 252—Against Novatian, who denied that the lapsed were ever to be received to communion again; and Felicissimus, who affirmed that they were, even before they had performed their penance.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 254 or 255—Under St. Cyprian, in favor of infant baptism.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 256—Under St. Cyprian, approving the consecration by the Spanish bishops of Felix and Sabinius in place of Basil and Martin—two bishops who had purchased certificates, or "libels," of having sacrificed to idols, and declaring that Stephen, bishop of Rome, had interposed in favor of the latter unreasonably, from having been duped by them.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 256—In favor of rebaptizing all who had received heretical baptism, when St. Cyprian uttered his celebrated invective against Stephen. The question was finally ruled in the seventh of the Constantinopolitan canons.

CIRTA, A.D. 305—To elect a new bishop in place of one who had been a "traitor," that is, had surrendered copies of the Scriptures to the Pagan authorities, to which all present, when they came to be asked, however, pleaded equally guilty.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 312—Of seventy Donatist bishops against Cæcilian, bishop of that see.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 335—Under Donatus, author of the schism; favorable to the "traditores."

CARTHAGE, A.D. 348—Under Gratus; its acts are comprised in fourteen chapters, of which the first is against rebaptizing any that have been baptized with water in the name of the Trinity. This is probably the council whose canons are invoked in canon 12 of the African Code.

THEVESTÉ, A.D. 362—Of Donatists quarrelling among themselves.

AFRICAN, A.D. 380—Of Donatists, in condemnation of Tichonius, a Donatist bishop.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 386—Confirmatory of the synodical letter of Siricius, bishop of Rome.

LEPTE, A.D. 386—Passed canons on discipline.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 390—Under Genethlius, bishop of Carthage; made thirteen canons, by the second of which bishops, priests, and deacons are required to abstain from their wives and observe continence.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 398—Of Maximian's (Donatist bishop of Carthage) supporters against Primian (another Donatist bishop of Carthage).

HIPPO, A.D. 398—At which St. Augustine disputed "De fide et symbolo" as a presbyter.

CABARUSSI and of the CAVERNS, A.D. 394—Of the same on the same subject.

BAGAIS, A.D. 394—Of Primian's supporters, against Maximian.

BAGAIS, A.D. 396—Against translations of bishops and priests.

BYZANTIUM, A.D. 397—Confirming all that had been decreed in 393 at Hippo.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 397—Passed fifty canons, among which the "Breviarium canonum Hipponensium" is said to have been inserted.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 400—Of seventy-two bishops; passed fifty canons on discipline.

MILEVIS, A.D. 402—To decide several points affecting bishops.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 403, 404, 406—For bringing back the Donatists to the Church.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 407, 408, 409—All incorporated into the African Code.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 410—Against the Donatists.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 411—Great conference between the Catholics and the Donatists; Aurelius and St. Augustine both taking part on behalf of the former; 286 bishops said to have been present on the Catholic side, and 279 on the Donatist, yet 313 names are given on the latter side. There were three different stages in the proceedings.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 412—In which Celestius was accused of Pelagianism and appealed to the pope, probably the fifteenth under Aurelius.

CIRTA, A.D. 412—In the matter of the Donatists; published a synodical letter in the name of Aurelius, St. Augustine, and others. Silvanus, primate of Numidia, heads it.

AFRICAN, A.D. 414—Of Donatists.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 416—Composed of sixty-seven bishops; addressed a synodical letter to Innocent of Rome, condemning both Pelagius and Celestius.

MILEVIS, A.D. 416—Against Pelagius and Celestius; composed of sixty bishops; published twenty-seven canons on discipline; addressed a synodical letter to Innocent of Rome, to which was appended another in a more familiar tone from Aurelius, St. Augustine, and three more.

TISDRA, A.D. 417—Passed canons on discipline.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 417, 418—Against the Pelagians.

HIPPO, SUFFETULA, MAORIANA, A.D. 418—Passed canons on discipline.

THENEA, A.D. 418—Published nine canons on discipline.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 419—Attended by 229, or, according to other accounts, 217 bishops; and by Faustinus, bishop of Potenza, and two presbyters as legates from Rome.

NUMIDIA, A.D. 423—In which Antonius, a bishop of that province, was condemned.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 426—At which Leporius, a French presbyter, cleared himself from Pelagianism.

HIPPO, A.D. 426—At which Heraclius was elected successor to St. Augustine at his nomination.

HIPPO, A.D. 427—Said to have passed canons 29 and 30, in the Latin numbering of the African Code.

AFRICAN, A.D. 434—To render account of their faith to king Hunneric, when it appeared that of 475 sees, 14 were then vacant; 38 had been deprived of their bishops by death, and most of those who survived were in exile.

BYZATIUM, A.D. 507—To appoint new bishops in place of those who had died or been exiled.

JUNCA, A.D. 523—Under Liberatus; to condemn a bishop of the province of Tripoli who had usurped a church not in his diocese; St. Fulgentius, bishop of Ruspe, being one of those present.

CARTHAGE, A.D. 525—Under Boniface; when two volumes of the canons were found.

AFRICAN, A.D. 533—Sent a synodical letter to John II of Rome by Liberatus, deacon of the Church of Carthage, so well known for his writings.

BYZATIUM, A.D. 541—Sent a deputation to Justinian, and legislated on discipline.

AFRICAN, A.D. 550—Excommunicated Vigilinus for condemning the three chapters.

SUFFETULA, A.D. 510—Passed canons on discipline, some of which are preserved.

AFRICAN, A.D. 594—Against the Donatists, probably for the last time.

BYZATIUM, A.D. 602—To examine certain charges made against Clement the primate.

NUMIDIA, A.D. 603—To examine the case of Donadeus, a deacon, who had appealed from his bishop to Rome.

BYZATIUM, NUMIDIA, MAURITANIA, CARTHAGE, A.D. 633—Against Cyrus, Pyrrhus, and Sergius, the Monothelite leaders.

BYZATIUM, NUMIDIA, MAURITANIA, CARTHAGE, A.D. 646—Against the Monothelites; the councils of Byzantium, Numidia, and Mauritania addressed a joint synodical letter, and the bishop of Carthage a letter in his own name, to Theodore, bishop of Rome.

Africāna, in Roman mythology, was a surname of Ceres, under which she had temples in several African cities; these temples had no priests, but priestesses, who were widows that did not intend to marry again.

Africānus, Str. (also St. FRIE, or FRIQUE), a French prelate, was bishop of Coninages, in Gascony, in the 6th century. Nothing is known of his acts. His body was buried at Rouergue, near Vabres. His principal festival is kept May 1; that of the finding of his body Jan. 15; and that of the translation of his relics Feb. 8.

Afu, among the Arabians, is the forgiveness which the Koran enjoins to be practiced by them. God forgives transgressions; and, in order that we may be as much like God as possible, we should do the same.

Agābus is commemorated as a saint in some Roman martyrologies on Feb. 13, and in the Byzantine on April 8.

Agali, in Hindū mythology, was a princess of the family of the children of the moon, wife of Kudamen, and mother of Sadanandi.

Agamarshana, in Hindūism, is a verse in the holy books which the natives repeat to cleanse themselves from sin.

Aganduru, RODERIGO MAURICIO, a Spanish missionary, lived near the close of the 16th and the commencement of the 17th century. His religious zeal was directed towards the conversion of the inhabitants of the island of Luzon and the Japanese. In 1640 he was sent to Rome by the friars of his order (Barefooted Augustinians) in order to give an account to pope Urban VIII of the results of his mission. Aganduru wrote several works on kindred subjects, for which see Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aganice (also Aglaonice), in Greek legend, was the daughter of prince Hegetor in Thessalia. She knew how to foretell eclipses of the moon, and was said to be able to draw the moon down from heaven.

Aganippe, in Greek mythology, was (1) a spring on Helicon, the same as Hippocrene, which inspired him who drank to compose poetry. The Muses are called Aganippidae after it. According to others, the nymph of the spring was a daughter of Permessus. (2.) The mother of Danae and wife of king Acrisius.

Agāpē, Str. (1.) Virgin of Antioch, commemorated February 15 and March 10. (2.) Of Thessalonica; she was burned under Maximianus Herculus, April 1, 304; commemorated April 3, in many martyrologies April 5. (3.) Martyr; commemorated April 16. (4.) Daughter of Sophia; commemorated September 17. (5.) Virgin; commemorated at Rome August 8. (6.) Virgin; commemorated at Heraclea November 20.

Agapemōnē (ἀγαπημόνη, love abode), a conventual establishment consisting of persons of both sexes, founded at Charlynch, near Bridgewater, in the County of Somerset, England, by Henry James Prince, formerly a clergyman of the English Church. The inmates belong to a new religious sect, and are sometimes called Lampeter Brethren, from the place where Prince was educated. The adherents of the sect generally, of whom there are a great many in the southwestern counties of England, are known as Princeites, or Starkeyites, from a Mr. Starkey, one of the prime movers in the heresy.

Mr. Prince was born at Bath in 1811, and was educated for a physician. He decided, however, to enter the ministry, and, on leaving college, became curate of Charlynch. While there he gave expression to strange sentiments, in which may be seen the germs of his later doctrines. He succeeded in making a convert of his rector, the Rev. Samuel Starkey, and his views began to excite so much attention that he was removed to a curacy at Stoke, in Suffolk. Here, however, his conduct was in no respect improved, and he was dismissed; and about the same time Starkey was silenced. A conference was held by the Lampeter Brethren, and it was decided to leave the Church. They began preaching in the South of England, and attracted large crowds, securing many converts. One of their tenets was community of goods, and many farmers brought their wealth and laid it at the feet of the "apostle." Funds were accumulated in various ways, and the community have lived since 1859 in property sumptuously fitted up at Spaxton, near Charlynch.

The inmates of this home are married couples, but they have religious objections to the increase of population, as if believing that the perfection of all things will be the extinction of the human race. Prince himself makes extravagant claims. Letters intended for him pass through the post-office addressed to "The Lord;" and his followers claim that he is their creator. He asserts that Christ came to redeem the soul, but he came to redeem the body. The following passages occur in one of his pamphlets, of which he has published several: "God in Jesus Christ has again entered into covenant with man at the resurrection of mankind, and this is the first resurrection, and now brother Prince is his witness." "This one man, brother Prince, has Jesus Christ selected and appointed his witness to his counsel and purpose to conclude the day of grace and to introduce the day of judgment; to close the dispensation of the Spirit, the Gospel, and to enter into covenant with flesh." He considers himself perfect, and incapable of further improvement. These are his words: "Having neither wishes nor desires, my will can have no disposition whatever to move in any one direction rather than another, but like the finely poised beam of a well-adjusted balance, it hangs delicately suspended on the divine will, in a holy equilibrium of inward passiveness." They were still preaching their doctrines at a recent date. See Dixon [W. Hepworth], Spiritual Wives (2 vols. 1868).

Agapemonites. See PRINCETITES.

Agapētæ, or Agapēti, the name given to a branch of Gnostics which existed towards the end of the 4th century. According to Jerome, they consisted principally of women who attached themselves to young people, and taught them that nothing was impure with pious minds. One of their maxims was, that they were bound rather to perjure themselves than to reveal the secrets of their sect.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Agapētus, the name of several martyrs and prelates. (1.) A deacon, said by some to have been the companion in martyrdom of pope Christus, and in many martyrologies he is commemorated with Sts. Xistus and Felicissimus on the same day. They are believed to have suffered on the same day, A.D. 258, although in different places. (2.) Saint and martyr of Palestrina, near Rome. He was beheaded by the officers of Aurelian, about 275, when he was only fifteen years of age. He is celebrated Aug. 18. (3.) Archbishop of Rhodes, and one of the metropolitans to whom the emperor Leo wrote respecting the death of Proterius. Replying to a letter of Leo's respecting the Council of Chalcedon, he vigorously defended the cause of the council. His name appears affixed to the encyclical epistle of the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 459, directed against simony. (4.) Deacon of the Church of Constantinople, flourished about A.D. 527, when he wrote a letter, called Charta Regia, to the emperor Justinian, containing excellent advice on the duties of a Christian prince. The work is given in the Bibl. Patrum under the following title: Agapeti, Constantinopol. Ecclesiæ Diaconi, ad Justinianum Imperatorem Oratio Parænetica, etc. It was printed in Greek and Latin (Venice, 1509, 8vo; Basle, 1518, 8vo; with notes, Frankfurt, 1659), and translated into French by Louis XIII. (5.) Bishop of the Macedonians at Synnada. The sect was fiercely persecuted by Theodosius, the Catholic prelate, with the view of extorting money. During his absence from Synnada, Agapetus convened the clergy and laity of his sect, and, persuading them to accept the Homoousion, took possession of the churches and the episcopal throne, from which Theodosius, on his return, was unable to expel him. See Cave, Hist. Lit.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Agapētus (or Agapius), three men are given who are known by either of these names. (1.) Bishop of Seleucia, metropolis of Isauria, who was present at the Councils of Nicæa and Antioch (Labbé, Concil. ii, 58, 586). (2.) Bishop of Apamea, succeeded his brother Marcellus in the reign of Arcadius. A disciple of St. Marcian, he had been conspicuous for eminence in ascetic virtue. Theodoret (Hist. Eccles. iv, 28; v, 27; Rel. Hist. c. 3) speaks of him with high commendation, and bestows on him the epithet ὁ πανεὶφνημος. (3.) A friend and correspondent of Chrysostom, whom he addresses with much respect. He appears to have offered to visit Chrysostom in his banishment at Cucusus, but he begs him to content himself with writing (Chrys. Ep. xx, lxxiii).

Agapetus DE DURO CORNU, abbot of Campredon, died of grief, A.D. 817, upon the accidental destruction by fire of his library.

Agapius, one of Manes' twelve disciples. Petrus Siculus and Photius mention a book of his entitled Heptalogus; and Photius (Biblioth. cod. 179) gives an account of two other works of his, dedicated to a female follower named Urania. In them Agapius maintains the doctrine of the two principles, the sinful nature of the body, and the duty of abstinence from flesh, wine, and marriage.

Agapius, Sr., was a bishop and martyr, who with St. Secundianus was put to death for the faith at Cirta, in Numidia, May 6 (other martyrologies say April 29), 259 (or 260), in the same persecution in which Sts. James and Marianus suffered. See Ruinart, Acta Sin-cera. See AGAPETUS.

Agapius, a Greek monk of Mount ATHOS, in Macedonia, lived in the 17th century. He was the author of The Salvation of Sinners (Ἀπαρῳαὶν Σωτηρία). Claude doubts his being the author. The work is written in Modern Greek, and cited by Arnaud (De la Perpétuité de la Foi). Nau translated it into Arabic. It was printed at Venice (1641, 1664). See Moréri, who cites Richard Simon.

Agapius, bishop of CÆSAREA, succeeded Theotecnus towards the end of the 3d century. Eusebius, his contemporary, praises him for his knowledge, the laborious character of his episcopate, and his great liberality towards the poor. He ordained St. Pamphilus a presbyter (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. vii, 32; Niceph. vi, 37).

Agapius (St.) OF PALESTINE was exposed to the wild beasts at Cæsarea in 306 (or 307) by order of Cæsar Maximin, but, surviving this ordeal, was drowned on the second day after. The Roman martyrologies commemorate him Nov. 20, and again Aug. 19, with Sts. Timotheus and Thecla, which is the day on which the Greeks keep his festival. See Baillet, Aug. 19; Ruinart, p. 322, 323.

He is, perhaps, the same with Agapius who is commemorated in the Byzantine calendar as having been martyred with his companions at Gaza on April 2. See AGAPETUS.

Agar, Charles, an Irish prelate of the last century, was born in Gowran Castle, in the County of Kilkenny, and educated in Westminster School, and afterwards at Christ Church, Oxford. Having entered into holy orders, he was appointed first chaplain to the duke of Northumberland while lord-lieutenant of Ireland in 1763, from which situation he was promoted to the deanery of Kilmore, and to the see of Cloyne in 1768. In 1779 he was translated to that of Cashel, over which he presided for twenty years. During that time he restored all the old churches and cathedrals in his diocese and built eleven new churches. In 1795 he was elevated to the peerage as baron Somerton, and yet higher as viscount Somerton in 1800. In 1801 he was translated to the archbishopric of Dublin, and was one of the representative spiritual peers in the first imperial parliament. In 1806 he was dignified with the title of earl of Normanton. In 1807 he and the other prelates of the Established Church were commanded by his majesty to make a minute return of the state of the Irish Church in their respective provinces and sees; and in a visitation of the same year he directed, with a too-long-deferred regard for the working clergy, that the incumbents of the diocese should, for the future, pay to their curates seventy-five pounds per annum instead of fifty pounds, as before allowed. In 1808 he was the promoter of a bill for securing the estates and funds devised by the Rev. Richard Daniel, and to apply the profits to the relief of the poor of St. Luke's parish in the city of Dublin, the support of the Hospital for Incurables, and other charitable institutions. He died July 14, 1809. See D'Alton, Memoirs of the Archbishops of Dublin, p. 349.

Agar, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Newtonbrook, Canada, Feb. 10, 1843. He received an academical education; experienced religion at the age of seventeen; soon began preaching; about 1864 removed to New York State, and in 1873 was received into the Western New York Conference, wherein he labored until his death, at Kendall, Feb. 9, 1878. Mr. Agar was a young man of more than ordinary preaching abilities; his pulpit efforts were logical, scriptural, and forcible; in his pastoral work he was systematic and faithful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 71.

Agar, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in York. He was converted in his twenty-first year; entered the ministry in 1810; preached on the Driffield, Glasgow, and other circuits; and died suddenly in Portsmouth, Aug. 23, 1830, aged forty-two. "I scarcely ever knew a person who had fewer infirmities, nor were they of a nature to form any serious drawback on the very great excellency of his Christian character" (Rev. Daniel Isaac). See Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, 1832, p. 161; Minutes of British Conference, 1831.

Agatha (or Agathe), Sr. (1.) The virgin martyred at Catania; passion commemorated Feb.

5. (2.) One commemorated April 2. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v. The former is often figured in sacred art, either as a single figure or grouped with other saints. She usually bears in one hand the palm, in the other a dish or salver on which is the female breast, in allusion to her torture. She often wears the crown of martyrdom. The shears, as the instrument of her torment, are frequently in her hand or beside her, at other times a book of devotion. She generally wears a long veil as a token of modesty. See Jameson [Mrs.], Sacred and Legendary Art, p. 608 sq.

St. Agatha. (From a picture of the 15th century.)

AGATHA'S (St.) LETTERS, a superstitious charm against fire; the heathen took her veil from her tomb to extinguish a conflagration. When Frederick II was about to lay Catania in flames, the legend says that at the reading of the Gospel he saw these words written in letters of gold on the book: "Harm not Agatha's birthplace, for she avengeth injury."

Agathadōrus, Sr., was the servant and fellow-martyr of St. Carpus (q. v.), bishop of Thyatira, in Asia. He was flogged to death April 13, 251, by command of Decius. See Baillet, i, 181, April 13; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Agathalyus, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Philo.

Agathangēlus, an Armenian historian and secretary to Tiridates, first Christian king of that country, lived about (probably) 320. He wrote the Life of St. Gregory Illuminator, and History of the Introduction of Christianity into Armenia (Constantinople, 1709, 4to). The National Library of Paris has a copy of this book and a manuscript much more complete.

Agathangelus, Sr., deacon of St. Clement (bishop of Ancyra), who suffered with him a long and cruel martyrdom in the 4th century. The principal festival of these saints is kept by both Greeks and Latins Jan. 23. Their acts are mere fables, as Baronius allows. See Baillet, vol. i, Jan. 23. See ACHATIUS.

Agathense, CONCILIUM. See AGDE, COUNCIL OF.

Agātho of ALEXANDRIA, a Christian martyr, was a man of arms in that city, and was condemned to lose his head for rebuking some lewd persons who were deriding the dead bodies of some of the Christians. This occurred in the middle of the 3d century. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, i, 182. He is commemorated in the Roman martyrology on Dec. 1. Another of the same name, a deacon, is commemorated April 4, and a third July 5.

Agatho of CONSTANTINOPLE was, first, reader in the Church of that city, then librarian, and lastly prothonotary and second chancellor. He was notary of the sixth holy and œcumenical synod (A.D. 680), and wrote out all the acts of that council, delivering a copy to each of the five patriarchs. In 712 he wrote his Libellus, or Epilogus, in which he narrates all that the tyrant Bardanes attempted against the council. See Cave, Hist. Lit. s. v.

Agathodæmon, in Greek mythology, was the Grecian name for the Egyptian Kneph—snake. See ÆSCULAPIUS. It was also a good deity to whose memory a glass of unmixed wine was drunk at the end of meals, and to whom a temple was built in Arcadia.

Agathon (ἀγαθόν, good), a Greek term used by Basil the Great for the holy eucharist.

Agathonica, Sr., of Pergamus, the sister of St. Pappylus, who, seeing her brother suffer courageously with St. Carpus and his companions, threw herself into the flames with them. She is commemorated April 13.

Agathonicus, martyr, commemorated in the Byzantine calendar Aug. 22.

Agathopōdes (more prop. Agathopus). RHEOS, was a deacon of Antioch, one of the two companions of St. Ignatius on his journey to his martyrdom at Rome, and one of the authors of the Acta of that martyrdom. He is not known to have been a martyr himself, although given by Baronius, Martyrology (April 25). He is mentioned in the first set of Pseudo-Ignatian epistles as an "elect man," who has "renounced life," etc., and is also reproduced in the second set of spurious epistles.

Agathus is commemorated as a Christian saint in some Latin martyrologies on May 8.

Agatkon was the same among the Iroquois as Nautena among the American tribes generally.

Agaune (or ST. MAURICE EN VALAIS), COUNCILS OF (Concilium Agauense).

I. Held on May 14, 523 (according to others, April 30, 515 or 516); nine (others say sixty) bishops were present. The continual psalmody ("Laus Perennis") established in this monastery upon the plan of the Acœmetian monks at Constantinople, was here confirmed by Sigismund, king of Burgundy.

II. Held in 888, in which Rodolf was elected and crowned king of Burgundy. See Greg. Turon. p. 107, 108.

Agde, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Agathense), was held on Sept. 10 or 11, 506. Twenty-four bishops were present, and ten deputies of absent bishops from different provinces of Gaul, which at this time was under the dominion of the Visigoths. Cæsarius, bishop of Arles, presided. In this council the discipline of the Church was treated of, and forty-seven canons were drawn up, confirming the discipline already established in many other councils. Of these, the 12th enjoins fasting every day in Lent, Sundays excepted. The 16th forbids the making any person deacon under twenty-five years of age without the consent of his wife, and a promise of continence. The 17th forbids ordination of bishops or priests under thirty years of age. The 18th orders all lay persons to communicate at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide. The 19th forbids any woman to take the veil under forty years of age. The 20th forbids the clergy to wear long hair, and orders the archdeacon to cause that of the disobedient to be cut. The 27th forbids the establishment of any monastery without the consent of the bishop, and the ordination of a monk without the consent of his abbot. The 31st orders that those persons who, having been at variance for a long time, shall refuse to be reconciled, shall be excommunicated. The 34th orders that converted Jews shall remain eight months in the rank of catechumens before they are baptized. The 39th forbids persons in holy orders to attend wedding festivities. The 44th forbids a priest to bless the people or a penitent in church. See Labbé and Cossart, Concilia Sacrosancta, iv, 1381.

Agdus, an immense mythical stone from which Deucalion and Pyrrha took those which they threw over their heads to people the world. Jupiter, enamoured of this stone, changed it into a woman, who bore to him Agdistia.

Agææ. See ÆGÆÆ.

Agelnothus (Ethelnothus, Egelnotus, or Agilnoth), surnamed "the Good," was archbishop of Canterbury in 1020. According to some, he was a Benedictine of the Abbey of Glastonbury, and dean of that cathedral. He went to Rome in 1022 to receive the pall from the pope, and upon his return is said to have brought from Pavia an arm of St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, for which he paid one hundred talents of silver. This he presented to Leofric, earl of Coventry, together with a work which he composed on the subject. He died Oct. 29, 1038. He left a volume of Letters, and a work In Praise of the Blessed Virgin, addressed to Fulbertus, bishop of Chartres. See Godwin, De Præsul. Angl. Comment.; Pitseus, De Illust. Angl. Script.

Agēsīlātus, a name given to Pluto from his disposal of the dead.

Agētes (or Agētis), in ancient Paganism, was a mythical personage, son of Apollo and Cyrene, and brother of Aristheus.

Aggravation, in ecclesiastical usage, is a term given (1) to the threat to fulminate excommunication after three monitions to obey the Church. The aggravation may not be published by the minister without the order of the official. (2.) The extreme penalty of the major excommunication (i. e. the stoppage of all intercourse between the excommunicated party and the body of the faithful). The word in this sense has now no use.

Aghori is the name of a Hindû sect professing complete worldly indifference. The original Aghori worship seems to have been that of Devī, in some of her terrific forms, and to have required even human victims for its performance. Dr. Horace Wilson thus describes their practices: "The regular worship of this sect has long been suppressed, and the early traces of it now left are presented by a few disgusting wretches who, while they profess to have adopted its tenets, make them a mere plea for extorting alms. In proof of their indifference to worldly objects, they eat and drink whatever is given to them, even ordure and carrion. They smear the body with excrement, and carry it about with them in a wooden cup or skull, either to swallow it for the purpose of obtaining alms, or to throw it upon the persons or into the houses of those who refuse to comply with their demands. They also for the same purpose inflict gashes on their limbs, that the crime of blood may rest upon the head of the recusant, and they have a variety of similar disgusting devices to extort money from the timid and credulous Hindû. They are, fortunately, not numerous, and are universally detested and feared."

Agiasma (or rather HAGIASMA, ἀγίασμα) is the name given by the Seventy to the sanctuary in the Old Test., and applied by the early Church to the altar; called also AGION (q. v.).

Agiel, in Cabalistic mythology, is the intelligence of the planet Saturn.

Agil (or St. Aisle) was the son of Agnoald, councillor of Hildebert, who was persuaded by his friend Columbanus to devote his child at an early age to the monastic life. Accordingly, Agil entered the Monastery of Luxeuil about 590, and in 615 was deputed by a synod of the Frankish churches to accompany Eustacius (q. v.) on a missionary tour in Bavaria. Having considerable success, he undertook, at the request of Dagobert (q. v.), the superintendence of the Monastery of Meaux, about 636. He continued till advanced age to carry on missionary labors.

Agilbert (or Adilbert), a Roman Catholic prelate, was probably a native of Paris. He appears in Bede, first as "pontifex quidam, natione Gallus," from which he is supposed to have been consecrated by French bishops without any see. After studying in Ireland, he went into Wessex about 648, and was appointed by king Cenwalch bishop of the West Saxons. Being unable to learn English, the king gave half of his diocese to Wina, which so displeased Agilbert that he left Wessex and went to Northumbria, whence, after taking part with Wilfrid and his own priest Agatho at the Synod of Strenshall in 664, he returned to France. He was made bishop of Paris in 668, and still later declined the invitation of Cenwalch to return to Wessex. The year of his death is unknown, but it occurred in the Monastery of Jouarre, Oct. 11. It is questionable whether he is the Agilbert who, according to Fredegar, was sent in 680 by Ebrouin to duke Martin to deceive him by taking a false oath on an empty reliquary.

Agilbertus, St., a fellow-martyr with St. Agoardus (q. v.).

Agiles, RAYMOND (surnamed de Podio because he was a canon of Puy-en-Velay), went to the Holy Land in 1096 as chaplain to Aimar de Monteil, the apostolic legate. He was present at the taking of Jerusalem, and wrote a history of the proceedings, entitled Gesta Dei per Francos (printed in the collection of Bongars).

Agilmar (or Aimar), a French prelate, was bishop of Clermont in the 9th century. Driven from his diocese by the Normans, he took refuge in the county of Amaons, where he brought the relics of Sta. Illis and Vincent. He deposited these in two grottoes, which became the nucleus of large villages. In the Assembly of Pavia, Agilmar had a number of prelates who promised fidelity to Charles the Bald, and in 878 he sent, in behalf of Louis the Stammerer, a letter to pope John VII, of which a long fragment may be found in Gallia Christiana, and in Acta Sanctorum, i, 13. He signed the acts of the Council of Mehun-on-the-Loire in 891. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agilus. See AGIL, St.

Agioi (or rather Hagioi, "Άγιοι, saints) was one of the common appellations of Christians, and current among them at the date of the apostolical epistles. Subsequently it was used as one of the names of the baptized or faithful, in contradistinction to the catechumens. We also find this word and the superlative ἀγιώτατοι employed as epithets of bishops. See SAINT.

Agionites (or Agionenses), a sect which appeared in the 7th century, and which pretended to more than ordinary sanctity. It is but little known, appears to have had but few followers, and was condemned in the Council of Gangra, together with the Encratites, Manichæans, and Montanists.

Agiotatos (or rather Hagiotatos, ἀγιώτατος, most holy), a title used in the early Church in addressing or speaking of bishops. — Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. ii, ch. ix, § 6.

Agius, a priest and monk of the Monastery of Corby, in Saxony. He lived in the 9th century, and wrote a history of the Life of St. Hathumuda, the first abbess of Gandersheim, his friend; also a Dialogue, in elegiac verse, on her death, which happened in A.D. 874. The two works are published by D. Bernard. See Pez, Anecdotes, vol. ii;

Aglaia, in Greek mythology, was one of the Graces or Charities, so called because of her cheerfulness, beauty, and worth. Homer says she was the wife of Vulcan.

Aglaonice. See AGANICE.

Aglaophœne, in Greek mythology, was the name of one of the Sirens.

Aglionby, George, was the eighth dean of Canterbury by appointment of Charles I, but was never installed, nor received any advantage from it, as the Parliament had, in 1642, seized on the profits of those capitular bodies which were in their power. He survived his nomination but a few months, dying at Oxford in November, 1643.

Aglionby, John, an eminent English divine, was born about 1566, and was admitted into Queen's College, Oxford, in 1583. Being elected fellow, he took orders, and afterwards travelled abroad, where he made the acquaintance of the famous Bellarmine. On his return, he was made chaplain in ordinary to queen Elizabeth, and in 1600 took his D.D. About the same time he became rector of Islip, and in 1601 he was elected principal of St. Edmund's Hall. He was also chaplain in ordinary to king James I, and died at Islip, Feb. 6, 1609. He was eminent for his learning, deeply read in the fathers, and is given by Wood (Annals) as one of the Oxford divines who were to translate the Gospels, Acts, and Apocalypse.

Agnan (in Lat. Anianus), St., bishop of Orleans, demanded aid from Aëtius against Attila, who was obliged to abandon the place. It is said that the governor was attacked with a serious malady, and, believing his recovery to be due to the prayers of the prelate, set the prisoners free. It was in memory of this action that the bishops of Orleans had, on the day of their entry into the village, the privilege not only of delivering all the prisoners, but those in the province of Orleans who had been detained for certain crimes. The Huguenots in 1562 invaded the tomb of Agnan, and burned his remains. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agnani, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Agnani), was held March 24, 1160. Pope Alexander III, assisted by certain bishops and cardinals in this council, excommunicated the emperor Frederick, and absolved all his subjects from their oath of fidelity to him.—Landon, Manual of Councils, s. v.

Agnelli, an Italian Franciscan, was born at Pisa about 1194, and becoming acquainted in early life with Francis of Assisi, was by him appointed warden of the newly erected convent of his followers at Paris. He was afterwards sent, with the title of provincial minister, to found the Order of Franciscan Friars in England. This mission landed at Dover in September, 1224, and proceeded to Canterbury, where Agnelli remained while others went to London, Oxford, and Cambridge. Agnelli died at Oxford at an early period of his mission, worn out with fatigue by a journey into Wales. See Brit. Mus. and York Minster Lib.

Agnelli, GIUSEPPE, a learned Italian monk, was born at Naples in 1621, and entered the Jesuit Society in 1637. For five years he taught moral theology, afterwards was employed in preaching, and governed the colleges of Monte-Pulciano, Macerata, and Ancona. The last thirty years of his life he passed among the Society of Jesuits at Rome, where he died, Oct. 8, 1706. Among his many works, the most celebrated is Il Parrochismo Istruttore (Rome, 1677, 2 vols. 4to; 1704, 6 vols. 8vo).

Agnello (Agnelli, or Agnellus), ANDREA, was abbot of St. Mary's, Blancherme, and of St. Bartholomew's, Ravenna. He was made abbot of the monasteries when very young, and even before he had taken the religious vow. He occupied the tenth place among the priests of Ravenna, under Petronacius, from A.D. 821 to 837, and wrote a history of the prelates who governed the Church of Ravenna before him, entitled Agnelli, qui est Andreas, Abbat S. Mariæ ad Blachernas, Liber Pontificalis, sive Vitæ Pontificum Ravennatum. This work was first made public by the abbot Benedict Bacchini at Modena in 1708. Muratori printed it in vol. ii, pt. i, of Scriptores Rerum Italicarum. The father of Agnello having conspired against the pope, Paul I, he was taken to Rome, where he died in prison. This treatment rendered the son less favorable to the interests of the court of Rome, and his writings were regarded as outrages against the pontifical authority. Moreri has confounded this archbishop with the preceding. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agnellus, archbishop of Ravenna, was born in A.D. 486 of noble family, and was possessed of considerable wealth. On the death of his wife, he entered holy orders, and became præfectus of the Church of St. Agatha. He was consecrated bishop in 556, and held his bishopric until his death, in 569. In addition to efficient work in his diocese, he wrote Epistola de Ratione Fidei ad Armenium, against Arianism. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 529; Rubens, Hist. Ravenn. iii, 169.

Agnes, St. (1), a virgin who at the age of twelve (or thirteen) was beheaded at Rome, under Diocletian. The acts of her martyrdom said to have been written by Ambrose are spurious, but the substance of her history, as given by Prudentius (14th hymn, Περὶ Στεφάνων) and Ambrose (De Virginitate, lib. i), amount to this: St. Agnes, having made a profession of Christianity and virginity, was persecuted by her suitors. She was sentenced by the judge to be confined in a brothel, and one who tried to outrage her there was struck with blindness, but was restored through her intercession. This miracle, however, did not save her life, for shortly after, having refused to offer incense to idols, she suffered martyrdom. A church at Rome in her honor, said to have been built in the time of Constantine, was repaired by pope Honorius in A.D. 625–638, and another was built at Rome by Innocent X. The Latin, Greek, and Anglican churches celebrate her festival Jan. 21; the Greeks also Jan. 14 and July 5, and the Latins Jan. 28. Her name stands in the black-letter calendar of the English Prayer-book on Jan. 21, and it is one of four (St. Margaret's, St. Lucy's, and St. Agatha's days being the other three) appointed in England by the Synod of Worcester, under Walter de Cantilupe, in 1240. See Baillet, Vies des Saints, January 21; Butler, Lives; Ruinart, Actu Sinc. p. 457; Moréri, who cites Bollandus, Acta, April.

St. Agnes was the favorite saint of the Roman women. Her effigy is found on the ancient glass and earthenware of the Christians of the 3d century. She bears the palm as martyr, but seldom the book, or accompanied by the lamb; these two last were later symbols. When alone, she is generally placed between two trees; sometimes she is at the side of the Virgin Mary; sometimes between the Lord and St. Laurence, between St. Vincent and St. Hippolytus, between St. Peter and St. Paul. See Jameson (Mrs.), Sacred and Legend Art. p. 600 sq.

St. Agnes, with Doves on either side, bearing the Crowns of Chastity and Martyrdom. (From an ancient glass vessel.)

Agnes, St. (2), of Monte-Pulciano, in Tuscany, was born in 1274, and at nine years of age entered the convent of the Order of St. Francis, called Sacchine, or Sackins, because they wore scapularies of coarse linen, such as sacks are made of. At fourteen she became cellarist of the house, and subsequently abbess of another house at Proceno. Lastly, she established a monastery at Monte-Pulciano in accordance with the rule of St. Benedict and the institution of St. Dominic. She died April 20, 1317, and was buried in her convent; but the building having been given in 1435 to the monks of St. Dominic, they removed her remains to the high-altar. St. Agnes was canonized by Benedict XIII in 1726, and her festival is kept on April 20. See Baillet, April 20;

Agnesio (or Agnes), JUAN BAUTISTA, a Spanish priest, was born at Valencia, and lived about 1550. He wrote many works in prose and verse, among them being an Apologeticum Panegiricum de Laudibus D. Hieronymi, etc. See Moréri, who cites Biblioth. Hisp.

Agnew, JOHN HOLMES, D.D., an American Congregational minister, teacher, and editor, was born at Gettysburg, Pa., May 9, 1804. His first pastoral charge was at Uniontown, Pa.; he was elected professor in Marion College, Mo.; in Newark College, Del.; and in Washington College, Pa. He had for many years devoted himself to literary and educational pursuits, being at one time editor of the Eclectic Magazine, and afterwards for several years principal of a female seminary at Pittsfield, Mass. Subsequently he engaged unsuccessfully in some coal-mine speculations, in 1860 became secretary of the Southern Aid Society, and in 1865 took charge of the American Federal Monthly, a continuation of the old Knickerbocker Magazine. He died at Peekskill, N. Y., Oct. 12, 1865. See Appleton's Annual Cyclopædia, 1865, p. 652; Princeton Sem. Gen. Catalogue, 1872, p. 48.

Agni is the Vedic name of the Supreme Being under the character of the deity of fire; the analogue of the Hephæstus of the Greeks.

Agni, TOMMASO, an Italian prelate, of Leontini, in Sicily, laid, about 1231, the foundations of the house belonging to his order (the Dominican). He was made titular bishop of Bethlehem in 1255, and appointed legate of the Roman see in the Holy Land. He was afterwards made archbishop of Cosenza, and in 1272 Latin patriarch of Jerusalem and bishop of St. Jean d'Acre, which he held together. He died in 1277, leaving a Life of Peter the Martyr, given in the Acts of the Saints, April, vol. iii. See Moréri, who cites Échard.

Agnitus is commemorated as a Christian saint in the Roman martyrology on Aug. 16.

Agnō (or Hagno), in Greek mythology, was one of the nymphs who nursed Jupiter. She gave her name to a fountain, concerning which many fabulous wonders are told.

Agnoetæ (or Agnoites), a school of Alexandrian monophysites, for which see THEMISTIANS.

Agnolo, Aniello Fiorè, a Neapolitan sculptor, flourished about the 15th century. He executed two works in the Church of San Domenico Maggiore at Naples, which, according to Cicognara, possess considerable merit in design—one a basso-relievo, dated 1470; the other a Virgin and Infant, with two angels, on the monument of Mariano Alaneo.

Agnolo, Baccio d', an Italian wood-carver, sculptor, and architect, was born at Florence in 1460. He gained considerable distinction in wood-carving, and then went to Rome to study architecture. He still carried on his former occupation, and his studio was the resort of such artists as Michael Angelo, Sansovino, the brothers Sangallo, and others. On his return to Florence he devoted himself chiefly to architecture, and planned many of the finest palaces and villas of the city. He introduced the fashion of applying frontispieces of columns to the doors and windows of private residences, which had hitherto been confined to churches. A much-admired work by this artist is the campanile, or bell-tower, of the Church di Santo Spirito in Florence. He died in 1543, leaving three sons, architects, one of whom, Giuliano, completed his father's unfinished works.

Agnostics. See SCEPTICISM, LATEST FORMS OF.

Agnýa-sétra is a class of worlds, according to the Buddhist system of religion. The Buddhists reckon that there are innumerable systems of worlds, each system having its own earth, sun, and moon. The space to which the light of one sun or moon extends is called a Sakwala, and includes an earth with its continents, islands, and oceans, as well as a series of hells and heavens. The Sakwala systems are divided into three classes, of which the Agnýa-sétra denote those systems which receive the ordinances of Buddha, or to which his authority extends. These systems are a hundred thousand ketas in number, each kela being ten millions.

Agordus, Sr., with St. Agilbertus, came into France from beyond the Rhine, about the 5th century, and suffered martyrdom under the Vandals, in company with many other Christians. Their bodies were buried at Creteil, about two leagues from Paris. The modern Roman martyrology commemorates them June 24. See Baillet, June 24; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Agon, one of the inferior ministers employed in the ancient Roman sacrifices, whose office it was to strike the victim. The name is probably derived from the question which he put to the priest, Agone, "Shall I strike?"

Agonalia, in Roman antiquity, were festivals celebrated on Jan. 9, May 21, and Dec. 11 in each year in honor of Janus, whom the Romans invoked before undertaking any affair of importance. Ovid, in his Fasts (i, 319-322), mentions various etymologies of the word.

Agonius (also Enagonius), in Greek and Roman mythology, were surnames of those gods that protected the soldiers in battle. Jupiter was also specially so called as the god of battle. Mercury also was so designated as manager of the Olympic games.

Agonothēta (or Agonothētes, from ἀγων, a contest, and τίσιμι, to place), in Grecian antiquity was the president or superintendent of the sacred games. At first the person who instituted the games and defrayed the expenses was the Agonothetes; but in the great public games, such as the Olympic, Pythian, etc., these presidents were the representatives of different states, or were chosen from the people in whose country the games were celebrated. They received the several titles of αἰσυνήται, βραβυνταί, ἀγωνάρχαι, ἀγωνοδῖκαι, ἀσλοδίται. They were also called ῥαβδούχοι or ῥαβδονόμοι, from the rod or sceptre emblematic of their authority.

Agonycrites (Gr. ἀγων, and κλῖνω), a fanatical sect which arose in the beginning of the 8th century. Their peculiar tenet was that people ought not to pray kneeling, but standing or dancing. They were not numerous, and were condemned by a council held at Jerusalem in 726.

Agop, JOHN, an Armenian priest, lived at Rome in the latter half of the 17th century. He wrote an Armenian Grammar (Rome, 1674):—a Latin Grammar (ibid. 1675), in Armenian:—and an Italian translation of the correspondence of Constantine the Great and of pope Sylvester with Tiridates, king of Armenia (Venice, 1683). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agoræus, in Greek mythology, was an appellation given to those deities who had statues in the public markets or flora. Thus Mercury Agoræus was to be found at Athens, Sicyon, Thebes, Sparta, etc.; and thus Minerva Agoræa was in extraordinary veneration among the Lacedæmonians.

Agostino, PAOLO, an eminent Italian musician, was born at Valerano in 1593. He was the scholar of Bernardino Nanini, and the successor of Soriano in the pontifical chapel. His death occurred in 1629. Antonio Liberati considered him as one of the most scientific and ingenious composers of his time; and adds that when he was master of the chapel of St. Peter's Church at Rome, he astonished the world with his productions for four, six, and eight choirs or choruses. Father Martini, who bears testimony to the truth of this eulogium, has inserted an Agnus Dei, in eight parts, of this composer. See also AUGUSTINO.

Agotkon, in North American mythology, was a name by which the Iroquois called the inhabitants of the lower heaven, i. e. spirits of the second order, which name also fortune-tellers and sorcerers received, who were said to associate with these spirits.

Agout, CHARLES CONSTANCE CÉSAR LOUP JOSEPH MATTHIEU D', a French prelate, was born near Grenoble in 1747. He finished his studies at the Seminary of St. Sulpice at Paris, and was appointed bishop of Pamiers in 1787. He emigrated during the Revolution, and returned to France in 1801, after having resigned his bishopric. He studied especially the sciences of commerce and of finance. He died at Paris, July 21, 1824. He wrote, Projet d'une Banque Nationale (Paris, 1815):—Éclaircissement sur le Projet d'une Banque Nationale, etc. (ibid. 1816):—Des Impôts Indirects et des Droits de Consommation, ou Essai sur l'Origine et le Système des Impositions Françaises (ibid. 1817):—Lettre à un Jacobin, ou Reflexions Politiques sur la Constitution d'Angleterre et la Charte Royale, etc. (ibid. 1815):—Conversation avec E. Burke, sur l'Intérêt des Puissances de l'Europe (ibid. 1814). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agoyeh is the fetich of the negroes of Vidah, a monkey-like statue made of black clay, and seated upon a red chair, which is ornamented with red bands, cloths, feathers, etc. On its head is the point of a spear.

Agræcūla (or Agræculus), ST., was made bishop of Chalons-sur-Saône in 582. He was present at many councils, built a church supported by pillars, and ornamented with marble and mosaic. A man of rare mental qualities, he united to them solid piety and great self-denial. He died A.D. 580, in his eighty-third year. His festival is celebrated March 17, the supposed day of his death. See Baillet, March 17; Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. v, 46;

Agræus, in Greek mythology, was (1) a name given Apollo from his feeding cattle; (2) also a name of the god Aristæus.

Agrain, EUSTACHE D', constable and viceroy of Jerusalem during the first Crusade, was of a noble family of Vivarais. He set out for the Holy Land in 1096 with Raymond, count of Toulouse. His exploits were of value to him, besides the viceroyalty of Jerusalem, and the principality of Sidon and of Cæsarea, which he transmitted to his children. He was surnamed l'Épée et le Bouclier de la Palestine. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agrate, MARCO FERRERIO, an Italian sculptor, lived near the close of the 15th century. He executed several works in the cathedral at Milan, among which is the celebrated statue of St. Bartholomew Flayed. It is worked in marble with much care, but is devoid of taste.

Agrath was the name of one of the four females to whom the Jewish rabbins attribute the honor of being the mother of angels. The other three are Lilith, Eve, and Naamah. See ANGELS.

Agraule, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Minerva, derived from a similar name in Attica.

Agreement of Sandomir. See SANDOMIR.

Agresbur, in North American mythology, was the god of war among the Iroquois, and at the same time their supreme God.

Agresti, LIVIO DA FORLÌ, an Italian painter, was born at Forlì, a town in the Roman territory. He studied under Pierino del Voga at Rome. He was employed by pope Gregory XIII in the great works that were executed by his order in the Vatican. On the staircase is a grand fresco painting by him, representing Philip of Arragon submitting his kingdom to the dominion of pope Eugenius III. There are also some of his works in the churches and public places of Rome. His best works are in his native city, Forlì, where he painted in the chapel of the cathedral the Last Supper, and some admirable figures of the prophets. He died at Rome in 1580.

Agreus (the hunter), in Greek mythology, was the surname of Pan and Aristæus.

Agriania, in Greek Paganism, was a festival in honor of deceased persons in Argos; also certain prize-fights among the Argives.

Agriolus, bishop of Treves and confessor, is celebrated in some old martyrologies under date of Jan. 13.

Agricolā, the name of several persons of whom little is known. (1.) A martyr in Africa, commemorated Nov. 3. (2.) Saint, born Dec. 3. (3.) A martyr in Auvergne, Dec. 9. (4.) A martyr at Ravenna, Dec. 16.

Agricola, ST., of Bologna, Italy, was martyred with his slave Vitalis, by crucifixion, A.D. 304. Their bodies, it is said, were interred in ground belonging to the Jews, where they remained concealed until they themselves revealed the fact to St. Eusebius. The latter is reported to have raised their bodies, and to have taken away a few drops of St. Agricola's blood and some of the wood of his cross, which he placed in the altar of a new church at Florence, at the dedication of which he preached a sermon, An Exhortation to Vir- ginity, still extant, which is the only act remaining to us of the history of these martyrs. The Roman martyrology commemorates them on Nov. 3. See Baillet, Nov. 4; Butler, eod.; Gregor. Turon. De Gloria Mart. lib. i, col. 772.

Agricola, Magnus, a learned Benedictine, was born at Augsburg, Sept. 11, 1640. He was professor of philosophy at the University of Salzburg, and retired to the cloister of St. Ulrich, where he died, April 23, 1708. He wrote, Sententia Philosophica IV Libellis Comprehensa (1671):—Quæstiones Naturales Mixtae de Principiis ex Lib. I et II Physicorum (1674):—Tractatus de Artibus Humanis. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Agricola, Michel, a learned Swede, was born in Finland, near the commencement of the 16th century. He studied theology under Luther at the University of Wittenberg, and was made rector in 1539. In 1554 Gustavus I appointed him bishop of Abo, and sent him to preach Christianity to the Laplanders. He died in 1557. He is known as the translator of the New Test. into Finnish, which was printed at Stockholm, in 4to, in 1548. It contains a preface by Agricola, in which he states that the translation was made from the Greek, with the aid of the Latin, German, and Swedish versions. (B. P.)

Agricola, Rudolph (originally Rodolf Huyemann), a distinguished Dutch philosopher and theologian, was born at Bafflo, near Groningen, in 1443. He was educated at Louvain, where he graduated as A.M. He afterwards studied at Paris, and at Ferrara, in Italy. He returned to Holland in 1479, and soon after became syndic of Groningen. In 1482 he became professor at Heidelberg, where he died in 1485. His principal work is the De Inventionem Dialecticam, in which he attacks the scholastic philosophy of his day. He also opposed the corruptions of Rome. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.; Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iii, cent. xv, pt. ii, ch. ii; Ueberweg, Hist. of Philos. ii, 10.

Agrionia were festivals celebrated annually by the Boeotians in honor of Dionysus, in which the women, after playfully pretending for some time to search for that god, desisted, saying that he had hidden himself among the muses. They were solemnized at night by the women and the priests only. The tradition is that the daughters of Minyas, having despised the rites of the god, were seized with frenzy and ate the flesh of one of their children, and that the Agrionia were celebrated in expiation of the offence. A singular feature of the festival was the assembling of maidens of the family of Minyas in front of the temple, whence the maidens would flee, followed by a priest with a sword, who would kill any of the maidens he might overtake.

Agrippa CASTOR, an ecclesiastical writer who flourished in the reign of Hadrian (about A.D. 135), and is highly spoken of by Eusebius and St. Jerome. He is the first who is said to have written against heresy, and wrote a most accurate Confutation of the Ἐκρηγνυζα of Basilides, a fragment of which alone remains in Eusebius (iv, 7). Theodoret seems to imply that he wrote another work in refutation of Isidorus, the son of Basilides. See Cave, Historia Literaria, Sec. II, i, 57.

Agrippa von Nettersheim, HEINRICH CORNELIUS, a German philosopher, theologian, and chemist, was born in Cologne, Sept. 14, 1486. Having been a disturber of the peace in the South of France, he fled to Paris, where his public discourses gained for him a professorship of theology at Dôle. Accused of heresy and magic, he fled to England in 1510, and afterwards returned to Cologne and became secretary to Maximilian. He subsequently studied and practiced medicine, and was an ardent student of alchemy and the other occult sciences. His work De Incertitudine et Vanitate Scientiarum (Paris, 1531) is a satire on the state of knowledge at the period in which he lived. His death occurred at Grenoble, Feb. 18, 1538.

Agrippina, a martyr at Rome, is commemorated in the Byzantine calendar on June 23.

Agrippinense, CONCILIUM. See COLOGNE, COUNCIL OF.

Agrippinus, of Alexandria, is commemorated as a saint in some Roman martyrologies on July 15; in the Ethiopic on Jan. 30.

Agriškowé was a battle-cry of the Iroquois, and also of the Hurons; the latter, however, say Agriškowé. For a long time there was doubt as to the meaning of the word, until it was found to be derived from Agres-bur, the god of war, and was used as a cry for help.

Agroteras Thusia was an annual festival at Athens in honor of Artemis, or Diana, in fulfilment of a vow made by the city before the battle of Marathon to offer in sacrifice a number of goats equal to that of the Persians slain in the conflict. The number was afterwards restricted to five hundred.

Agrypnia, in Greek paganism, was a festival which was celebrated yearly in honor of Bacchus at Arabela, in Sicily.

Agū was another form of the Accadian moon-god Acu (q. v.).

Aguado, FRANCISCO, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Torrejon de Ardoz, near Madrid, in 1566, and entered the Society of Jesuits at Alcalá in 1588, being then A.M. He was governor of several houses of the order in Spain, twice governed the province of Toledo, and was twice sent as deputy to the congregations at Rome. Philip IV chose him as his preacher, and the count Olivares, Philip's prime-minister, appointed him his confessor. He died at Madrid, Jan. 15, 1654. Among his works are Treatise on Perfect Religion (Madrid, 1629, fol.), in Spanish:—On the Wise Christian (ibid. 1638, fol.):—On the Sacrament of the Eucharist (ibid. 1640, fol.):—Various Exhortations on Matters of Faith (ibid. 1641, fol.):—Sermons for Lent and Advent (ibid. 1643, fol.):—On the Mysteries, etc., of our Lord and the Virgin (ibid. 1646, fol.):—Life of P. Goudin, the Jesuit (ibid. 1648, 8vo).

Aguas, JUAN DE, a Spanish theologian, who lived in the 17th century, was canon of the metropolitan Church of Saragossa, and synodal examiner of the archbishopric. He wrote, Por el Origen y Sucesos de los Templos Sedes Catedrales, Alegacion Historica, Apéndice con Notas y Aplicacion por la Catedralidad Privativa del Templo Máximo Metropolitano de Zaragoza (Saragossa, 1668). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aguazzari, ALFONSO, an Italian Jesuit, was a native of Sienna, in Tuscany. When very young he entered a congregation of priests at Brescia, but in 1567 he united himself to the newly formed Society of Jesuits. He was rector of the English college at Rome, and later of the German. He died in 1602. He wrote, The Life of a Young Englishman called Edward Throgmorton.

Agucchio, GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Bologna, Nov. 20, 1570. He was educated under the care of his uncle, cardinal Philip Sega. After his death, Agucchio was appointed secretary to cardinal Aldobrandini, and attended him when he went as legate to Henry IV of France. He continued in this employment, with a short intermission, until the death of the cardinal, when he became secretary to Gregory XV. In 1624 Urban VIII sent him as nuncio to Venice, but the contagious distemper which ravaged Italy in 1630 obliged him to retire to Friuli, where he died in 1632. His works are, A Treatise upon Comets and Meteors:—The Life of Cardinal Sega and of Jerome Agucchio:—and a letter to the canon Bartolommeo Dolcini, entitled L'Antica Fondazione e Dominio della Città di Bologna (Bologna, 1638, 4to). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Agudi, LUIGI MARIA, an Italian divine, was a native of Milan. He was at first a Barefooted Carmelite, and was considered one of the first preachers and theologians throughout Italy during the 17th century. He taught theology at Naples and Bologna; but applying himself subsequently to preaching, he addressed vast crowds at Como, Naples, Verona, Milan, Venice, and other Italian cities. After being a Carmelite for twenty-nine years, and filling the office of prior, provincial vicar, definitor, and visitor, he assumed the habit of the Dominicans, by permission of the pope, in 1669, in the Convent of Santa Maria at Milan. His works are, Carmelus Sapiens, sive de Scriptoribus Utriusque Carmeli, etc.:—Fontes Salvatoris, sive de Sacramentis, in Genere et Specie, etc. (Lugd. 1683, 4to):—De Justitia et Jure, de Restitutione, de Contractis:—De Censuris:—Anima Bibliotheca:—Quadragesimale, sermons for all the Sundays of the year:—Silva Sermonum, or homilies gathered from the early fathers.

Aguffi was a saint of the Kalmucks. He is represented as a man sitting on a chair with a cup in his hands.

Aguiet, FRANÇOIS, a celebrated French sculptor, was born in 1604 at the town of Eu, in Normandy. He studied under Simon Guillain, of Paris. He practiced some time in England, and afterwards went to Rome, where he remained two years. He acquired the reputation of one of the best sculptors of his age in France. He died at Paris in 1669. His best works are a marble crucifix in the Church of the Sorbonne:—the mausoleum of cardinal de Berulle, in the Church de l'Oratoire, Rue St. Honoré, and that of the duke de Longueville:—and the tomb of the duke Rohan, in the Church of the Celestines at Paris.

Aguilar (Terrone del Cagno), FRANCISCO, was bishop of Leon, in Spain, and was originally of Illiturgi or Anduxar, in the diocese of Jaen. He was preacher to king Philip II; held the chair of theology at Granada; and was made first bishop of Tui, and lastly of Leon. He died in 1613, and left an Instruction for Preachers and some other works.

Aguilar, Grace, an English Jewish authoress, was born at Hackney, near London, June 2, 1816. She was a descendant of a family of Hebrew merchants in Spain, who had fled from that country on account of religious persecution, and found a refuge in England. She died at Frankfort, in Germany, Sept. 16, 1847. A writer in the Jewish Chronicle in 1874 says:

"No Jewish female author has attained the general and well-deserved popularity achieved by Grace Aguilar. Her numerous literary productions have been read and appreciated in England, America, Germany, and France. Her Women of Israel is a work stamped with the most ardent zeal and fervent piety, in every line of which breathe the national sentiment and the true patriotism which are the characteristics of her writings. It is a book teeming with powerful lessons to her own sex and eloquent exhortation to the opposite sex. She desired to elevate the character of the women of Israel. She has shown that when all the nations of the East degraded females, the exalted Jewish code gave them an equality in civil and religious institutions suitable to women's mind and to their special mission. She has also demonstrated that many women in Israel have been the exponents of the noblest sentiments and the most sublime actions. Her Spirit of Judaism and Jewish Faith are likewise works of considerable merit, and full of that pious fervor and filial affections which carry the reader along with her and impress him with profound sympathy for the writer. Her Jewish Faith displays signs of no mean acquaintance with Jewish and Christian philosophers and divines, and its logical reasoning is far from betraying the sex of the author. With all her abilities, which were of no ordinary range, she was humble and unassuming, kind to all, and greatly attached to her parents. The ambition of Grace Aguilar was neither for wealth, for reputation, nor for distinction. The pure consciousness of raising the literary and religious character of the Jewish race in general and of her own sex in particular was at the same time her guiding motive and her reward."

Aguilar, Pedro Sanchez de, was a native of Yucatan, in America, who, when canon of Los Charcas, in Peru, wrote a book (in Latin and Spanish) entitled Informe contra Idolorum Cultores del Obispado de Yucatan (Madrid, 1639, 4to). The work relates to the powers of bishops and the necessity of punishing idolatry. See Antonio, Biblioth. Hisp. ii, 191.

Aguilar, Raphael Moses de, a Portuguese Jew, who died in 1680, was among those who, in 1641, emigrated from Portugal to Brazil. On his return to Amsterdam, he published a Portuguese and Hebrew grammar, entitled Epitome da Grammatica Hebraica (Amst. 1661). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 21; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 28; Lindo, Hist. of the Jews in Spain, p. 369; Etheridge, Introd. to Hebrew Literature, p. 467; Steinschneider, *Biblog. Aguillanneuf (A-gui-l'an-neuf), an old cry used on Jan. 1 as a mode of rejoicing. It is derived from the Druids, who at the beginning of the year distributed the blessed mistletoe to the people, announcing at the same time the new year. In Brittany, Picardy, and Burgundy the children are said still to sing these words on New-year's-day.

The name was also given to a collection made in some dioceses on Jan. 1 to procure candles for the churches. Young persons of both sexes took part in it, and were apt to commit, even in the churches, all sorts of extravagances. The Synod of Angers, in 1595, prohibited these proceedings within churches; but the custom still continued out of them until a later synod (1668) forbade the observance of it altogether. See Moréri, who cites Thiers, Traité des Jeux.

Aguillon (or Aguelon), FRANÇOIS D', a Belgian Jesuit, was born at Brussels in 1567. He first introduced the study of mathematics among the brothers of the Low Countries, taught philosophy at Douay, and theology at Antwerp, where he was rector of the college. He died at Seville in 1617. He wrote, Opticorum Lib. VI Philosophicis juxta ac Mathematicis Utiles (Antw. 1613, fol.). This work contains the first mention of stereographic projection. This was known from the time of Hipparchus, but had never received a name. Aguillon worked on catoptrics and dioptrics until his death. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aguirre, Gaspar Salzedo de, was professor of theology in the University of Bacca, Spain, and prior of St. Ildefonso at Jaen, in the 17th century. He wrote, Allusiones N. Testamenti ad Vetust. (1608):—A Relation of Some Remarkable Matters concerning the Kingdom and Bishopric of Jaen (in Spanish, 1614, 8vo):—Phlego de Cartus (1694). See Antonio, Biblioth. Hisp. i, 407.

Aguirre, Juan, a Spanish sculptor, was born at Segovia, and was the scholar and son-in-law of Matteo Inverto. He executed the tabernacle of the Church of Villacastin, with the statues of the evangelists and six other saints, in 1594, which, according to Bermudez, possessed great merit. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Agyei, in Greek mythology, was a kind of obelisk sacred to Apollo, and placed in the vestibule of houses for their security.

Agyrtæ (ἀγυρίω, to congregate) was a name given to priests of the goddess Cybele, who wandered up and down, attracting crowds of people, by pretending suddenly to be inspired by the goddess, roused into a divine fury, slashing and cutting themselves with knives. They generally carried about with them an image of Cybele, which they placed upon the back of an ass, and deceived the people by fortune-telling, persuading them to give presents to the goddess in return for the information which by her inspiration had been imparted to them as to their future fate.

Ahabath Olam (אַהַבַּת עוֹלָם, eternal love), one of the benedictions which the Jews who were dispersed over the whole Roman empire in the time of our Lord daily recited before the reading of the Shema. It ran thus:

"Thou hast loved us, O Lord our God, with eternal love; thou hast spared us with great and exceeding patience, our Father and our King, for thy great name's sake, and for our fathers' sake, who trusted in thee; to whom thou didst teach the precepts of life, that they might walk after the statutes of thy good pleasure with a perfect heart. So be thou merciful unto us, O our Father, merciful Father, that showeth mercy. Have mercy upon us, we beseech thee, and put understanding into our hearts, that we may understand, be wise, hear, learn, teach, do, and perform all the words of the doctrine of thy law in love. And enlighten our eyes in thy commandments, and cause our hearts to cleave to thy law, and unite them to the love and fear of thy name. We will not be ashamed, nor confounded, nor stumble forever and ever; because we have trusted in thy holy, great, mighty, and terrible name, we will rejoice and be glad in thy salvation, and in thy mercies, O Lord our God: and the multitude of thy mercies shall not forsake us forever. Selah. And now make haste and bring upon us a blessing and peace from the four corners of the earth; break thou the yoke of the Gentiles from off our necks, and bring us up-right into our land. For thou art a God that workest salvation, and hast chosen us out of every people and language; and thou, our King, hast caused us to cleave to thy great name in love, to praise thee, and to be united to thee, and to love thy name. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who hast chosen thy people Israel in love."

Ahadith, a name for the Mohammedan traditions, which are alleged to amount to 5266 in number.

Ahair, JOHN, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in North Carolina, about 1768. He was a devout, zealous Christian, and labored in the ministry three years, dying in Nov. 1794. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1795, p. 60.

Ahalya, in Hindû mythology, was the daughter of Brama of wonderful beauty. The god of the sun, Indra, fell in love with her, and won her favor when her husband Gautama, a priest, was absent. The angry husband cursed the god, and in consequence thereof a singular punishment was inflicted upon the latter. On his body a thousand Phalli grew. His begging and pleading caused the priest to change the punishment. The Phalli fell off, and in place of them Indra received one thousand eyes, whence his surname Sahasraksha.

Aharaigichi is the supreme being among the Abiponeans, which they also call Kebet or Groaperikar ("grandfather"). They acknowledge him not alone as their creator, but also as the creator of the cultured white people, the Spaniards. To the Spaniards he gave clothes, gold, and silver; but to the Abiponeans he gave courage, strength, and fearlessness. The Pleiades are his symbol. The natives consider him sick when these go away, and hold festivals of joy when they return. They have no priests but sorcerers, who stand in great esteem on the occasion of these festivals.

Ahastara, in Hindû mythology, is a surname of the sun.

Ahavanya, in Hindû mythology, is the fire worshipped by the Indians.

Ahhotep (Fields of Peace), a locality in the Egyptian mythology, mentioned in the Ritual of the Dead. Comp. AAHHOTEP (Peace of Aah).

Ahi (Assistant), a title of the Egyptian deity Horus, as the performer of the religious rites called the Assistances of Horus to his father Osiris. He is called also Lord of the Heart, and is mentioned in chapter cl of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Ahi is a name for the serpent mentioned in the Rig-Veda as the chief of the Asuras.

Ahimnius, bishop of Auaga, in the province of Zengit, Africa (together with Fortunatus, Optatus, and other bishops), consulted Cyprian as to the restoration of Ninus, Clementianus, and Florus, who in the Decian persecution succumbed to the greater severity of the proconsul, and had spent three years in penance. The occasion of their meeting was to consecrate a bishop for Caspa; and as Donatulus subsequently appears as bishop of that place, he is no doubt the person ordained.

Ahit, an Egyptian sacerdotal office, holdable by both sexes. Its duties are not exactly known. See also AHI, of which this name is the feminine form.

Ahlwardt, PETER, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 14, 1710, at Greifswalde. He studied at his native place as well as at Jena. His lectures he commenced at his native place in 1732, where he died March 1, 1791. He wrote, Diss. de Davide, Prudente Politico, Præcipue in Causa Homicidiorum a Joab Commisssorum (Gryph. 1733):—Tentamen Metaphysicum de Subordinatione Finitum Primorum, Secundum quos Homines suas Tenentur Componere Actiones (ibid. 1734):—Diss. de Sanctitate Dei Trinius ex Jes. 6, 3 (ibid. eod.):—Progr. de Immortalitate Animæ Humanae, ex Ratione Demonstrata (ibid. 1735):—Diss. de Duratione rerum et Mundi per se nulla (ibid. 1738), etc. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, sq. (B. P.)

Ahmed, a name by which MOHAMMED is mentioned in the Koran. In chapter lxi it is written, "Jesus, the son of Mary, said, O children of Israel, verily, I am the apostle of God sent unto you, confirming the law, which was delivered before me, and bringing good tidings of an apostle who shall come after me, and whose name shall be Ahmed." Mohammedan writers endeavor to confirm this alleged prediction by the words of Jesus as recorded in John xvi, 7, "Nevertheless I tell you the truth; it is expedient for you that I go away: for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you; but if I depart, I will send him unto you." This Comforter, or Paraclete, they transform into Periclete, the Illustrious, and all explain as referring to Mohammed.

Ahriman, in Persian mythology, is the evil spirit according to Zoroaster's system of religion. The eternal god Zeruane Akerene created light and darkness (or Ormuzd) and Ahriman, both of whom are eternal and only limited by one another. Both of these were living lonesome and separate, Ormuzd in light and Ahriman in darkness. Then God created the earth, in order that the good might combat with and overcome the evil. He divided the period of the earth's existence into four great ages of three thousand years each. In the first age, light was to rule; in the second, darkness besieged by the light; in the third, light and darkness alternately; in the fourth, the same, ending in the full sway of the light. Ormuzd created in the first age all that can be seen, over against which Ahriman placed a frightful creation of darkness, but did not attempt a combat either in the first nor in the second age, although he was asked to do so by his genii. At the end of the second age, feeling himself strong enough, he began war with Ormuzd; he entered heaven himself, but alone, and, filled with wonder and amazement, was thrown down upon the earth. Here he made fire impure by smoke and steam, devastated everything, and enveloped all things in a thick darkness, until he was driven back by Ormuzd and thrown into the eternal abyss. Ahriman, however, again roused himself, reached the earth, and made it his habitation. Now the third age began, in which Ahriman created an evil spirit for every good spirit created. In the fourth age he is to obtain the superiority, and will cause a comet to fall upon the earth, which will set it on fire, and change it into a stream of burning metal that shall flow into the eternal pit. Ahriman's kingdom is thus to be entirely burned up. In this way the kingdom of darkness becomes the kingdom of light; the evil spirits are purified and become good spirits beside the throne of God. See ORMUZD.

Ahti, an ancient Egyptian goddess, having the head of a uræus and the body of a hippopotamus. She was one of the Typhonic or malevolent deities.

Ahu, an ancient Egyptian deity; another name of the god Atum or Tum, the setting sun.

Ahuramazda (Wise Spirit) was the great and beneficent creator of good in the Zendic mythology. He was called also "The Good Spirit," and he has been considered as in some points resembling the Assyrian deity Merodach. The world was created by him for the residence of mankind, and all the good angels were made by him also. His chief mission, however, was to preserve the human race and to defeat the evil being, Ahriman. His name is often contracted into Ormuzd (q. v.).

Ahuta, in Hindû mythology, is one of the five great sacraments which the Bramins must do daily. It consists in the reading of the holy books.

Ahzab, the name given to the sixty equal portions into which the Mohammedans have divided the Koran, probably in imitation of the Jews, who divided the Mishna into the same number of parts. See KORAN.

Ai. Lieut. Conder reports the existence, near the modern village of Deir-Diwan, of the "remains of a large town, bearing the name Haiyan, which closely approaches Aina, the form under which Ai appears in the writings of Josephus. Rock-cut tombs and ancient cisterns, with three great reservoirs cut in the hard limestone, are sufficient to show that this was a position of importance. To the west is an open valley called 'Valley of the City,' which, gradually curving round eastward, runs close to the old road from Jericho by which Joshua's army would probably have advanced. To the north of the site there is also a great valley, and the plain or plateau on which the modern village stands close to the old site expands from a narrow and rugged pass leading up towards Bethel, which is two miles distant on the watershed. Beside this pass and north of the ruins is a large terraced knoll, very stony, and crowned by a few olives—a conspicuous object in the landscape. It is called simply Et-Tell, 'the mound,' and a connection has been supposed between this name and the fact that Joshua made Ai 'a heap (tell in the Heb.) forever.' The place does not, however, show traces of having at any time been covered with buildings, and the rock-cut tombs and cisterns above noticed seem too far from it to indicate Et-Tell as the exact site of Ai, being close to the pass; it has moreover no valley such as would seem fitted for the ambush immediately west of it' (Tent Work in Palestine, ii, 109).

Aiam Almadoulat (the reckoned days), the first ten days of the month Moharram, or the first month of the Arabian year, in the course of which the Koran is believed to have descended from heaven to be communicated to men.

Aiat (signs or wonders), the verses, or small portions of unequal length, into which the one hundred and fourteen chapters or large portions of the Koran are divided.

Aiglier (or Aygler), BERNARD, a French prelate, was born at Lyons, in the 13th century. At first a simple monk, he became sacristan of the abbey of Savigny, and Innocent IV made him one of his chaplains and abbot of Lerins. Charles of Anjou took him with him when he went to take possession of the kingdom of Naples and Sicily. Upon this occasion Urban IV made him abbot of Monte-Cassino and cardinal, and also sent him as his legate into France against the Albigenses. He was also sent to Constantinople to conclude an alliance against the Saracens. He assembled a general synod at St. Germain, and died April 5, 1282, leaving, among other works, De Collationibus:—De Beneficiis et Officiis:—In Regulam St. Benedicti:—Speculum Monachorum. See Colonia, Hist. Lit. de Lyon, ii, 327; Chron. Cussin Chron. SS. Lirinens.

Aigradus (or Angradus), a French prelate, was monk of Fontanelles, near Rouen, and flourished about 699. He received his monastic institution under St. Lambert, and became archbishop of Lyons in 678. At the request of St. Hilbert (q. v.) he wrote the Life of St. Ansbert, who ruled the monastery of St. Vaudrille from 678 to 695. The compilers of Gallia Christiana (xi, 167) and modern authors attribute to Aigradus the fragment of the Life of St. Lambert (or Lambert), edited as anonymous by Mabillon, Acta Ord. Bened. III, ii, 462-465. See Henschen, Commentary, Acta SS. Boll. Feb. ii, 343; Histoire Lit. de la France, iv, 33-35, 57.

Aigulphus (or Ayoû), St., abbot of Lerins, was born at Blois, about 630. He assumed the Benedictine habit in the abbey of Fleury, and was employed by Mommolus, the abbot, to dig up the relics of Sts. Benedict and Scholastica from under the ruins of Monte Cassino and bring them into France, which he did. He was despatched by Clotaire III to reform the abbey of Lerins, but the monks rebelled, and, having first imprisoned him, they delivered him and thirty-three faithful monks into the hands of pirates, by whom they were beheaded on the island of Amathis, A.D. 675. Their festival is given by the Roman martyrology on Sept. 3. See Baillet, Sept. 3; Mabillon, Life of Aigulphus.

Aihala (or Al-aswid), a rival prophet to Mohammed in Arabia. He pretended that two angels appeared to him, giving him his commission. His eloquence and bravery drew great crowds after him; but he maintained his position only four months, being killed by his opponents. Aihala and Mosseilama, who also pretended to be a prophet sent from God, were called by the Mohammedans the two Liars.

Aijkthyrner, in Norse mythology, is a reindeer standing in Walhalla and eating the limbs of the tree Lerad. Out of his horns flows so much water that thirty-six rivers are fed by it.

Aijukal, in the mythology of the Mongolians, is one of the four supreme gods, probably related to Vishnu of India. Images, partly of brass and partly of finer metals, are made of the deity in China. He has three heads and ten hands. He is seated, as are the majority of Oriental gods.

Aiken, Alison, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Maury Co., Tenn., Sept. 9, 1814. He received a careful religious training; was converted at the age of twenty-five; soon began to preach, and in 1841 entered the Tennessee Conference, and labored with marked success till 1855, when he was transferred to the Louisville Conference, in which he continued until his death, Oct. 17, 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1873, p. 865.

Aiken, John E., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Chatham, Conn., March 18, 1802. He experienced religion at the age of eighteen; soon became class leader; was licensed to exhort in 1824, and in 1831 was received into the Pittsburgh Conference. In 1849 he located at Painesville, where he died, Dec. 17, 1853. Mr. Aiken was earnest, devoted, and greatly beloved. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1854, p. 409.

Aiken, Silas, D.D., a Congregational minister, was born at Bedford, N. H., May 14, 1799. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1825 with the highest honors; was ordained pastor of the Congregational Church in Amherst, N. H., March 4, 1829; was installed in Park Street Church, Boston, in 1837; and became pastor of the Church in Rutland, Vt., March 29, 1849. On account of impaired health he resigned this pastorate in 1863, but held the nominal relation of pastor for several years afterwards. He died in Rutland, April 8, 1869. During his three pastorates, extending over thirty-four years, he received eight hundred and ninety members into the churches. His character and work won the esteem of all who knew him. See Cong. Quarterly, 1869, p. 428.

Aiken, Solomon, a Congregational minister, was a native of Hardwick, Mass. He graduated from Dartmouth College in 1784; was ordained pastor of the Church in Dracut, Mass., June 4, 1788, from which he was dismissed June 4, 1814. After this he removed to the State of New York. He died about 1832. As a political partisan he acquired some celebrity. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 87.

Aikenhead, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Arbroath, Scotland, in 1768. His parents were members of the Church of Scotland, and trained their boy in the right way, so that he soon found peace in believing. In 1796 he devoted himself to the ministry, and was appointed to the Boston Circuit. In 1832 he became a supernumerary at Devonport, where he died, March 12, 1835. He was a man of studious habits, and had a well-cultivated mind and great stores of information. His disposition was amiable—always so; frank and ingenuous, to a stranger he appeared reserved. He was a man of lovely Christian character, and withal a faithful and useful minister. See Wesleyan Meth. Mag. Aug. 1837, p. 561; Minutes of the British Conference, 1835.

Aikhe, an Etruscan male divinity, who is represented on an Etruscan mirror accompanying the deities Euturpa, Altria, and Thalna.

Aikin, John C. L., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Alabama in 1820. He professed religion in his sixteenth year, and in 1847 was received into the Alabama Conference. In 1849 he was transferred to the Arkansas Conference. Failing health in 1859 compelled him to take a supernumerary relation, which he held until his death, May 17, 1866. As a preacher Mr. Aikin was plain, practical, and pathetic. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1866, p. 80.

Aikin, Samuel Clark, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Windham, Vt., Sept. 21, 1790. He graduated from Middlebury College in 1814, and afterwards entered the Andover Theological Seminary, from which he graduated in 1817. He was ordained and settled over the First Church, Utica, N. Y., Feb. 3, 1818, where he stood as a strong, earnest, and successful pastor until 1835. In that year he was installed pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Cleveland, O. In 1858 he resigned his charge, but continued to reside in Cleveland until his death, Jan. 1, 1879. See Presbyterianism in Central New York, p. 209; Andover Gen. Catalogue, 1880, p. 16. (W. P. S.)

Aile. See AISLE.

Ailekes Olmak, in the mythology of the Laplanders, are three deities which they suppose are companions of the sun, and are therefore called deities of the holy days. Friday, Saturday, and Sunday were holy days with them. These gods are named Frit Ailek, Lawa Ailek, Schodnobbio Ailek. Others state that only Sunday is a holy day with them.

Aileranus (Aireranus, or Areranus), St., sur-named the Wise, was head of the famous college of Clonard, County Meath, Ireland. He died, according to the annals of Ulster, in 665. Among his works are, the Life of St. Bridget of Kildare:—Life of St. Patrick:—and Life of Féchinus. But the best known of his writings is an Allegorical Exposition of the Genealogy of Jesus Christ. This was inserted by Sedulius the Younger in his Collections on St. Matthew, and published in 1667, from a copy of a MS. of St. Gallen, with the title Ailerani Scoto-Hiberni, Cognomento Sapientis, Interpretatio Mystica Progenitorum D. Jesu Christi, etc. See Usher, Primord. Eccles.;

Ailli, PETER D.' See AILLY.

Ailred (Ealred, Aluredus, or Ethelred), an English ecclesiastical writer, who was born at Herham in 1109, and died in 1166 as prior of the Cistercian Abbey of Rievaulx, Yorkshire, is the author of a number of religious works, which may be found in the Biblioth. Patrum, xxiii.

Aimak, in the mythology of Tartary, are household deities to whom small animals are sacrificed in case of accidents.

Aimar. See ADEMAR; AGILMAR.

Aimara Version. In this language, which is spoken in Peru, a Jesuit, Ludovico Bertonio, as early as the year 1612, wrote the history of the life of Christ. Nearly the whole New Test. was translated from the Vulgate into Aimara in 1827 by Dr. Pazos Kanki. This work was conducted under the superintendence of Mr. Thomson, and with the sanction of the British and Foreign Bible Society. Of this translation the gospel of St. Luke, with the Spanish version in parallel columns, was issued in 1832 by the British and Foreign Bible Society for the inhabitants of Bolivia. For linguistic purposes see Bertonio, Arte breve de la Lengua Aymara (1608-1612); Mossbach, Die Inkas-Indianer und das Aymara (1874). (B. P.)

Aimene (or Emene), a Trojan to whom divine honors were rendered in Greece.

Aimeric. See AMAURY.

Aimeric, MALEFAIDA (or OF MALEFAYA), a patriarch of the Latin see of Antioch, was born in the beginning of the 12th century, in the village of St. Viance, Lower Limousin, France, and early embraced the monastic state. His zeal in the crusade under Urban II caused his election to that position in 1142, and his reformation of the hermits of Mount Carmel procured its confirmation by Alexander III in 1180. He died in 1187, leaving, De Institutione Monachorum (in vol. v of the Bibliothèque des Pères), and a few historical narratives of the crusades (in Martenne's Trésor, vol. i).—Biographie Universelle, s. v.

Aimerich, MATEO, a Spanish Jesuit, was born in 1715 at Bordil, in the diocese of Girona. While young he entered the Order of St. Ignatius, and after the expulsion of the Jesuits from Spain he retired to Ferrara, where he died in 1799. Among other theological works he wrote, Nomina et Acta Episcoporum Bareinonensium (Barcelona, 1760):—Quinti Moderati Censorini de Vita et Morte Lingue Latine Paradoxa Philologica, Criticis Nonnullis Dissertationibus Exposita, Asserta et Probata (Ferrara, 1780):—Relazione Autentica dell' Accaduto in Parnasso (ibid. 1782). This is in defence of the preceding work:—Specimen Veteris Romanæ Litteraturæ Deperditæ vel adhuc Latentis (ibid. 1784):—Novum Lexicon Historicum et Criticum Antiquæ Romanæ Litteraturæ Deperditæ vel Latentis, etc. (Bassano, 1787). Aimo, in the mythology of the Laplanders, is the place where departed souls live. It lies in the holy mountains, and these souls are among dwarfs, who, in their mode of living, are like men, but they rank much higher than men. This place of residence has various parts, just as the region of the devil, Mubben Aimo.

Aimonus. See AIMON.

Aimonus, PARISIENSIS (so called from his being a monk of the Abbey of St. Germain-des-Prés, at Paris), lived in the middle of the 9th century, and wrote, An Account of the Translation of the Body of St. Vincent:—Two Books of the Miracles of St. Germanus, Bishop of Paris:—also works on the Relics of St. George, St. Aurelius, and St. Nathalia. See Mabillon, Ord. Bened.

Ainmüller, MAXIMILIAN EMMANUEL, a German artist, founder of a new school of glass-painting, was born at Munich, Feb. 14, 1807. In 1828 he had acquired such distinction as to be appointed director of the newly founded royal painted-glass manufactory at Munich. The process perfected by him consisted in actually painting the design upon the glass, and carefully subjecting each color as it was laid on to a heating operation. The earliest specimens of his work are to be found in the cathedral at Ratisbon. Other specimens may be seen in Glasgow cathedral, St. Paul's cathedral, and St. Peter's College, Cambridge; but his finest productions are in the Cologne cathedral. He had some skill as a painter in oil, especially in interiors, and his pictures of the Chapel Royal at Windsor, and of Westminster Abbey, have been much admired. He died Dec. 9, 1870.

Ainoli. See LAUDS.

Ainsworth, CHARLES W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Petersham, Mass., in January, 1817. He experienced religion in 1834, and in 1841 entered the New England Conference. Between 1845 and 1848 he held a superannuated relation. He died at his post in Milford, Mass., Sept. 23, 1851. Mr. Ainsworth possessed a deep, ardent, and cheerful piety; was an able speaker, and a man of prayer. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1852, p. 37.

Aions, a mystical divinity, who is mentioned in ch. cxi of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Apak-sina, an Elamitic deity, of whom nothing is known, and whose statue was taken captive by Assurbanipal, king of Assyria.

Airaput, in Hindû mythology, is the powerful white elephant which is ridden by the god Indra, and carries the world. This elephant is said to have come out of the ocean.

Airay, Christopher, an English clergyman, was born at Clifton, in Westmoreland, about 1601, and entered Queen's College, Oxford, in 1621, of which he was afterwards elected fellow. In 1642 he took his B.D., having previously become vicar of Milford, in Hampshire. He died Oct. 18, 1670. He wrote, Fasciculus Præceptorum Logicalium in Gratiam Juventutis Academicæ Compositus. See Biog. Brit.; Wood's Athenæ Oxon.

Airay, Henry, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in Westmoreland in 1559. He was educated by Bernard Gilpin, and by him sent to St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford, in 1579. He soon removed to Queen's College, of which he was chosen fellow in 1586. Entering orders, he became a constant preacher in the university, especially in the Church of St. Peter's-in-the-East, and was elected provost of his college, March 9, 1598 (or 1599). Airay was a zealous Puritan, but was excused from submitting in 1602; and in 1604, when king James appointed an anniversary of his escape from the Gowrie Conspiracy, and ordered a sermon and service on Tuesdays throughout the year, Dr. Airay introduced this last custom into Oxford. He was the first (in 1606, when vice-chancellor) to call Laud to task for preaching sentiments supposed to favor popery. He died in Queen's College, Oct. 10, 1616, and was buried in the chapel. He published, Lectures upon the Whole Epistle of St. Paul to the Philippians (Lond. 1618, 4to):—The Just and Necessary Apology touching his Suit in Law, for the Rector of Charlton-on-Otmore, in Oxfordshire (ibid. 1621, 8vo):—A Treatise against Bowing at the Name of Jesus.

Aire, a linen napkin, embroidered with colored silk, used as a chalice-veil at Canterbury in 1635, and by bishop Andrewes.

Airu, the second month of the Assyrians, sacred to the deity Hea. Its Accadian name was Khar-sidi, "the Propitious Bull." It answered roughly to our April.

Airy (or Ageri), Str., bishop of Verdun, was born about 517, in the diocese of Verdun, and succeeded Desiderius in the bishopric in 550. He occupied this position for thirty-eight years, and died Dec. 1, 588. His festival is celebrated Dec. 1. See Gregory of Tours, Baillet, Dec. 1.

Aisa, in Greek mythology, is the name for fate, sometimes thought to be an eternal supernatural power; at other times said to be the decrees of Jupiter.

Aitchison, WILLIAM, a Congregational minister, was born in Glasgow, Scotland, Jan. 4, 1826. He studied theology at Yale College, graduating in 1851, and during this period was tutor in the college from September, 1850, to April, 1851. He was for some time pastor at Fitchville, Conn. He was ordained at Norwich Jan. 4, 1854, to go to Shanghai, China, as a missionary of the American Board. In June, 1859, he was offered a place in the American embassy, then about going to Peking. After being in Peking about eight days, he was taken sick and borne away on the boats on the Peiho River, about twelve miles distant. He died Aug. 15, 1859. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1860.

Aithalas. (1) Deacon and martyr, commemorated in the Greek Church Nov. 3. (2) Martyr, commemorated in the same Church Sept. 1.

Aithrion (αἰθριον, the open air), a word employed by Eusebius to describe the open space between the church-walls and the extreme circumference of the various courts or outbuildings, and is synonymous with the common term area. This court or churchyard was the station of the energumens, and of that class of penitents called flentes. These persons were also called χεμαζόμενοι, from the circumstance of their standing in the open air exposed to the weather.

Aitkins (Aiken, Elkins, or Atkins), JAMES, a Scottish bishop, was born at Kirkwall, and educated at Edinburgh, from whence he went to Oxford. Returning to Scotland, he became chaplain to Hamilton in 1638, in which station he conducted himself so well that, upon the return of the marquis to England, the latter procured from the king a presentation for Mr. Aitkins to the church of Birsá, in Orkney. In 1650, in consequence of some trouble arising in the Church, he was apprehended and compelled to leave with his family for Edinburgh, and resided there obscurely until the Restoration, when he went to London to congratulate the king, at which time the bishop of Winchester presented him to the rectory of Wentfrith, in Dorsetshire. There he continued until 1677, when he was elected and consecrated bishop of Moray; but he was translated from this see to that of Galloway, Feb. 6, 1680. He died at Edinburgh, Oct. 28, 1687. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 153, 282.

Aiton (or Halton), an Armenian prince, who served long in the wars of Palestine against the Saracens. About A.D. 1290 he became a Premonstratensian monk in the island of Cyprus, and spent his life in retirement and devotion. About 1307, while resident at Poitiers, in France, he dictated a history of the Tartars, their customs and their wars, which Nicolaus Falconius translated from the French (in which language it had been composed) into barbarous Latin, entitled Itinerarium et Flos Historiarum Orientis, with an appendix entitled Passagium Terræ Sanctæ. See Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iii, cent. xiv, pt. ii, ch. ii.

Aitwaros, in Lithuanian mythology, is a spirit living in the country, frequenting fences, bushes, and roads.

Aius Locutius (or Loquens) (the predicting speaker), in Roman mythology. In the year B.C. 390 a voice was heard in Rome which warned the Romans of the approaching Gauls. The voice was not heeded, and the Gauls destroyed the city. A temple was afterwards erected to Aius Locutius to reconcile the slighted deity.

Aiushi, in Kalmuck mythology, was a brazen image which showed the skill and perfection this nation had acquired in mechanical art. With crossed feet, he appears to sit upon an opening flower. The lower part of the body is covered, while the upper part is naked. The head carries a crown in the shape of a pyramid. This god is worshipped by old people: he is said to possess the power to give health, long life, and rejuvenescence.

Aix, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Aquisense), was held in September, 1585, by Alexander Canigianus, archbishop of Aix, assisted by the bishops of Apt, Gap, Riez, and Sisteron, his suffragans, together with the grand vicar of the bishop of Fréjus. Several useful regulations were drawn up relating to the discipline of the Church and the reformation of morals, similar to those of Bourges in the preceding year. See Labbe, Concil. xv, 1119; Landon, Manual of Councils, s.v.

Aix-la-Chapelle, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Aquisgranense). There were several of these.

I. Held in A.D. 800. At it Felix d'Urgel was heard in his defence before Charlemagne. He was answered and refuted by Alcuin (q. v.), whom Charles had induced to come over to France. On account of his frequent relapses, Felix was deposed, but he returned into the bosom of the Church, having sincerely abjured his errors, which he did in the form of a letter addressed to the clergy and people of Urgel. He was, nevertheless, banished to Lyons, where he passed the remainder of his days. See Mansi, Concil. vii, 1151.

II. Held in October, 802, by order of Charlemagne. It was a numerous council. The bishops with the priests read the canons, and the abbots with the monks the rule of St. Benedict, in order that both parties might thenceforth live in conformity to the law which was prescribed for them. At that time there were no monks or religious persons who followed any other rule than that of St. Benedict. There remains to us of this council a capitular of seven articles. The most important are those which relate to the chorepiscopi. It was determined that they had no power to perform any episcopal function, and should be considered simply as priests. This discipline agrees with that of the ancient councils of Anagrá and Neo-Cæsarea; nevertheless, it was not until towards the middle of the 10th century that they ceased to have authority in both the East and the West.

III. Held in December, 809, upon the question of the procession of the Holy Spirit, which had been first raised by John, a monk of Jerusalem. In order to decide it, the emperor sent as deputies to pope Leo III two bishops, Bernarius and Jesse, and the abbot Adelhard, who held a long conference upon the use of the word Filioque chanted in the Creed by the churches of France and Spain, but not by the Church of Rome. The pope expressed his regret that the same caution had not been used elsewhere; and without condemning those who in chanting the Creed added the word Filioque, and allowing that the word expressed the true faith, he refused to sanction the introduction of the word into the Creed, respecting the decision of those councils which had forbidden any addition to be made. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1194.

IV. Held in September, 816. In it a rule was composed for canons, containing 145 articles; another, containing 28 articles, was drawn up for canonesses. Both rules are of great length, and are said to have been mainly composed by Amalry, deacon of Metz. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1307.

V. At this council, held in July, 817, eighty chapters were drawn up concerning the rule of St. Benedict, which were confirmed by the emperor Louis, and by his authority put into execution. See Labbe, Concil. vii, 1505.

VI. This council, held in 825, upon the subject of images, was a continuation of one held at Paris in the same year. The bishops wrote (Dec. 6) to the emperor at Aix-la-Chapelle their decision, and the whole matter was sent to the pope by the hands of two bishops. The result of the negotiations between the pope and bishops is unknown. The French, however, maintained for some time after that images are neither to be broken nor adored, rejecting the second Council of Nice, although the pope had approved it.

VII. Held Feb. 6, 836. The acts of this council are divided into three parts. Part i refers to the life and doctrine of bishops, and contains twelve canons, the third of which makes it imperative upon all bishops to have some poor persons always at their table when they eat, or within sight, and to send them food. Part ii relates to the morals, conversation, and degree of knowledge to be required in other ecclesiastics, and contains twenty-eight canons. Part iii treats of the virtues and duties required of the emperor and his children, principally in ecclesiastical affairs. This part contains twenty-five canons. A very long address was also drawn up to Pepin, king of Aquitaine, requiring him to restore the property of the Church. See Labbe, Concil. vi, 1700.

VIII. This council was a plenary court of the emperor Frederick, assembled in 1165, for the canonization of Charlemagne, which was performed Dec. 29. Although this canonization was the result of schismatics, and had the sanction only of an antipope, no pope has ever refused to recognise it.

Ajala, MARTIN PEREZ DE, a Spanish prelate, was born in the diocese of Carthage in 1504. He first taught grammar in order to support his family. He was sent by Charles V as theologian to the Council of Trent, and obtained successively two bishoprics and finally the archbishopric of Valencia. He died in 1566. He prepared a Latin translation of the Apostolical Traditions (Paris, 1562, 10 vols.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ajataa, in the mythology of the Finns, was an evil female spirit that led all those to ruin to whom she appeared. She led travellers into wrong paths or into swamps to suffocate them, or into woods, where they died of hunger or became a prey to wolves.

Ajoutre, St. See ADJUTO.

Ajzat is a name of the sections into which the Koran is usually divided, each of them twice as long as the Ahzab (q. v.), and subdivided into four parts. These divisions are for the use of the readers in the royal mosques and the adjoining chapels, where emperors and other great men are buried.

Aka is one of the mystical deities of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Akabja, BEN-MAHALALEEL, a celebrated Tanaite, who probably lived in the 2d century, is known for his learning and probity, and the attitude he took against his colleagues. He had made decisions in regard to four Halachas in a manner unpalatable to the sages. As nothing could shake his testimony, an attempt was made to bribe him into compliance with the theological wishes of the rabbins by the tempting offer of raising him to the office of ab-beth-din. But he remained firm. "Rather," exclaimed he, "may I be termed a fool all my life than for one hour stand as a transgressor before God!" (Eduyoth, v, 6). Argument failing, he was excommunicated, and in conviction of the righteousness of his cause, he patiently bore this sentence to the day of his death. But before his decease, Akabja admonished his son to submit to the Sanhedrim. He could not have done so, as he had received the traditions from more than one rabbi; but his son had only heard them from the lips of his father. Before expiring, the rabbi also directed his son not to seek the patronage of men, but the recommendation of deeds which would deserve the praise of others. This was his maxim: "Ponder on three things, and thou wilt be kept from committing sin. Consider whence thou comest, whither thou goest, and in whose presence thou must shortly render an account" (Pirke Aboth, iii, 1). See Frankel, Darke Mishna, s. v. "Akabja;" Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, iv, 59; Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. u. s. Sekten, ii, 84; Hamburger, Real-Encyklop. s. v. (B. P.)

Akakia (akakia, guilelessness), a Greek name for the purple bag, filled with dust or earth, which the Greek emperor originally carried, in token of humility, at his coronation.

Akals is a name given among the Druses on Mount Lebanon to ecclesiastics. They are distinguished from the seculars by their white dress, and particularly the white turban, which they wear as a symbol of their purity. They despise all employments of honor in the world, believing that on the return of Hakem, the personification of deity, they shall be kings, viziers, and pashas. They do not marry the daughters of seculars, and they refuse to eat with the sheiks and emirs of their own nation. Akals eat only with Akals, and with the peasants and humble laborers. They superintend divine worship in the chapels and instruct the children in a kind of catechism. They are obliged to abstain from swearing and all abusive language, and dare not wear any article of gold, or silk in their dress. There are different degrees of Akals, and women are also admitted into the order—a privilege of which many avail themselves, as they are thus exempted from wearing the expensive head-dress and rich silks fashionable among them. The order is estimated to number about ten thousand.

Akambue, in the mythology of the Caribbeans, is a general name for the spirits, good and evil.

Akar is a mystical name of a region of the Egyptian Hades, which is mentioned in the Ritual of the Dead.

Akar is also a mystical reptile, called the "viper of Lot," mentioned in ch. xciv of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Akarkhentkats (wise one keeping her place), in Egyptian mythology, is the name of the third of the mystical cows, or Hathors.

Akasukhis, a Hindû sect, who hold up their faces to the sky until the muscles of the back of the neck become contracted, and retain it in that position. They wear the jatu and allow the beard to grow, smearing the body with ashes. They subsist on alms.

Ak-baba, in Oriental mythology, is a fabulous bird mentioned in the stories of the Arabians, Turks, and Persians. It is said to live one thousand years.

Akbrat, a species of adoption permitted among Mohammedans and very common among the Turks. The ceremony by which this deed is confirmed consists in the person who is to be adopted putting on and going through the shirt of the person who adopts him. See ADOPTION.

Akdah, in Oriental mythology. Prior to Mohammed, the Arabs made use of fortune-telling and of oracles. The oracles were especially noted for the seven holy arrows, which were called by the above term. Whoever desired to know anything, or was unable to arrive at a decision concerning something, went to the priests in the temple, where these seven Akdahs were kept. Three of the arrows were put into a bag. The priest would draw one, which would be the answer of the oracle. On the first arrow was written "Do it;" on the second, "Do not do it;" and the third was blank, indicating that the undertaking might or might not be fortunate.

Akerman, JAMES, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bromham, Wilts, June 28, 1786. Although blessed with Christian parents, he was not converted until his twentieth year. He soon after commenced to preach, and in 1809 regularly entered the work of the ministry. On the Axminster and Exeter circuits he met with persecution from the magistrate and from mobs. On the Redruth Circuit a great revival attended his ministry, in which nearly two thousand souls were converted. A disease of the heart, to which he had been subject for many years, compelled him to leave the active work in 1829. His death at Penzance, April 13, 1848, was very sudden. Akerman's character was one of peculiar amiability. See Minutes of British Conference, 1848; Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, 1851, p. 521.

Akersloot, WILLIAM, a Dutch engraver, was born at Haarlem about 1600. His principal religious engravings are, Christ Taken in the Garden, after Hondius; — Christ Bound: — Peter Denying Christ, after Molyne.

Akh (Intelligence), in Egyptian mythology, is one of the five component parts of the human being. It was also sometimes called Khu.

Akh es-Samain (Brother of the Heavens) was an Arabian deity worshipped at the city of Irdah.

Akhekh, in Egyptian mythology, is one of the names of the mystical Serpent of Evil.

Akhem, in Egyptian mythology, is the sacred name of the Mummified Hawk. It was an emblem of the deity Sokari, or rather of the Memphite dwarf deity Pthah-Sokari-Osiris.

Akhuvitr (or Akhvizr), an Etruscan goddess, who is represented as clothed like Alpanu, with the addition of a star behind her head.

Akhvistr, an Etruscan divinity, generally represented as a nude winged youth, with a long fillet in his hand, and an attendant upon Turan and Atunis (Adonis).

Akka. See ACCHO.

Akkási, JACOB BEN-MOSES, of Huesca, lived towards the end of the 13th century. Nothing is known of him except that he translated the Mishna commentary to the treatise Nashim (נשים) from the Arabic of Mai-monides into Hebrew for the Jews of Rome in 1298. Grätz is of opinion that his name is not Akkási, but Abbási. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 29; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 284. (B. P.)

Aklima, in Oriental mythology. According to the traditions and books of the Persians and Mohammedans, Eve had twins by Adam. Aklima was twin sister of Cain, and fondly loved by him; but Adam gave her to Abel, which caused the first fratricide. See ABEL.

Akomano (the Evil Spirit), in Zendic mythology, is the first of the evil Darvands.

Akrill, JOSEPH, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Horncastle, May 15, 1817. He was converted in early life, was received on trial by the Conference, and sent to the Theological Institution at Hoxton. His abilities were of no ordinary character, and his ministry was increasingly spiritual and faithful. He was a diligent student. He died of a short but severe illness at Chester, Oct. 5, 1849. See Minutes of British Conference, 1850.

Aktis (the Sunbeam) was the son of Helios, the sun, and is a mythical hero who was said by the Rhodians to have been the first astronomer.

Aktistetæ. See ACTISTETÆ.

Aku (or Paku), an Accadian deity.

Akuman, in Persian mythology, is the first evil spirit created by Ahriman. He is the most frightful of all the evil spirits, is poisonous, and plagues good people. The Prince of Darkness created seven such monsters, and set them against the seven Amshaspands. Rustan, a Persian, fought seven days and nights with Akuman. Rustan was thrown into the sea by Akuman, but rose again and overcame the monster.

Akusaa (the Setting Sun), an Egyptian goddess, the wife of the god Tum.

Al, or El (God), the name of the Supreme Being of the ancient Nabatheans. He was the universal Deity of Palestine and Phœnicia. See GOD.

Al, in Hindû mythology, is the noted tree in Brahma's Paradise bearing all the fruits of the world.

Álaba (or Álava) y Esquivel, DIEGO DE, a Spanish prelate of the 16th century, was born at Vitoria, the capital of Álava. He studied at Salamanca, and was made bishop of Astorga, in which capacity he attended the Council of Trent. After his return he was made bishop of Avila, and lastly of Cordova. He died Feb. 16, 1562, leaving a work entitled De Conciliis Universalibus ac de his quæ ad Religiónis ac Reipub. Christ. etc. (Granada, 1852, fol.). See Asplicueta, De Rescrip. No. 164; Antonio, Biblioth. Hisp.; Landon, Eccles. Dict.

Alabandus, in Greek mythology, son of Callirrhoe, was ranked among the gods, and worshipped at Alabanda, a city of Caria.

Alacogue, MARIE or MARGUERITE. See ALCOQUE.

Alaguni, in Hindû mythology, is one of the four heavenly streams which flow from the palace of Brahma and unite to form the Ganges.

Al-aib ("the rump bone," os coccygis). The Koran teaches that a man's body is entirely consumed by the earth, excepting only the al-aib, which is to form the basis of a new body. The renewal of the whole human frame is to be effected by a forty days' rain, which will cover the earth to the height of twelve cubits, and cause the bodies to spring up like plants. But the time of the resurrection is to them a perfect secret, known only to God; the angel Gabriel himself acknowledging his ignorance on this point when Mohammed asked him.

Alain DE LA ROCHE, a French monk of the order of Preaching Friars, was born in Brittany in 1415. He assumed the Dominican habit at Dinan, and finished his studies in a monastery of the same order in Paris. In that city and in other places he taught theology; and died on the Festival of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, about 1462. Andrew Coppenstein gives his works as follows: A Treatise on the Psalter or Rosary of Jesus Christ and Mary (Fribourg, 1619; Cologne, 1624):—The Fraternity of the Psalter of Our Lady (Paris, 16mo):—The Mirror of the Sinful Soul, etc. See Échard, Script. Ord. Præd.

Alainus (Alanis, or Halain), a French monk, was abbot of Farfe in the 8th century. He was born in Aquitaine, whence he passed into Italy. After taking the religious vows at Farfe, he became a hermit, and, retiring to a neighboring mountain, applied himself to copying several works of antiquity. In 761 he was elected abbot of Farfe, and died in 770. His principal work is a Homiliary, a compilation of passages of Scripture. See Rivet, Histoire Lit. de France, V, v, 10.

Alal, a wicked dæmon in the Accadian mythology who caused diseases of the chest.

Alala, another form of the name of the Assyrian goddess Allat. She was one of the forms of Ishtar.

Alalcomeneis, in Greek mythology, was an epithet of Minerva, concerning the origin of which there are many, but no well-substantiated, theories.

Alalcomenia, in Greek mythology, daughter of Ogyges, king of Thebes, by Thebe, daughter of Jupiter, and Lodamia, was the most celebrated daughter of that monarch, from her office as nurse to Minerva, and from the worship paid her after her death. She was considered the goddess who brought designs to a happy issue, and was represented, not by a whole statue, but only by a head or breast, to show that it is the head or understanding that determines the limits of things; and for the same reason the heads only of victims were sacrificed to her. Her temples were all uncovered, to signify that she drew her origin from heaven, the sole source of wisdom.

Alam (the shadow, or the image), in Babylonian astronomy, was the name of the deity Marduk as the planet Mercury in the month Chislew.

Alam, in Hindû mythology. Around about the mountain Meru there are four other mountains, on each of which grows a beautiful tree called Alam, always blooming and bearing fruit.

Alamanni. See ALEMANNI.

Alami, SALOMON, a Jewish writer of Portugal who lived in the 14th century, is only known by his אֶפֶסְתֵּרָה בְּיָמָיו, an epistle to his disciple, wherein he exhorts him to live a pious and moral life. This epistle is very valuable, as it gives us a true picture of the condition of the Jews at that time. He is especially severe on the rich who do not care for the poor or for religion, and rather follow their own inclinations. This epistle (which was first published at Constantinople, 1619) has lately been edited by A. Jelinek (Leipsic, 1854). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 33; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, viii, 42 sq.; Kayserling, Gesch. d. Juden in Portugal, p. 61 sq. (B. P.)

Alan, a Scottish prelate, was elected to the see of ARGYLE in 1250, and was also bishop in 1253, when he ratified to the monks of Paisley the donation of the Church of Kilfinan. He confirmed a Church in Kintyre to the abbey of Paisley. He was bishop here in 1261, and was contemporary with William, bishop of St. Andrews. He died in 1262. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 286.

Alan, a native of LYNN, in Norfolk, England, flourished in the 14th century, and taught at Cambridge. He died in 1420, leaving many works, among which are, Elucidarium S. Scripturæ:—Moralia Bibliorum, de Vario Scripturæ Sensu:—Praelectiones Theologicae. See Lucius, in Bibl. Carm.; Pitseus, De Script. Angl.

Alan, an English Benedictine monk, and subsequently abbot of TEWKESBURY, who flourished about 1177. As a monk, he was distinguished for his learning and piety. He died in 1201, leaving an account of the Life and Exile of St. Thomas of Canterbury, with whom he had been closely intimate; also a volume of Sermons, and one of Epistles. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 245.

Alandus, JOHANNES, a Jesuit, biographer, and ascetic writer of Poland, was born at Leopold in 1561. He was director of the college of Nieswicz, the village of prince Nicholas Radziwill. He wrote a work on The Miracles of the Angels (Nieswicz, 1610):—Soliloquia S. Augustini, published under the name of Tyrzna (ibid. 1612):—also a History of the Life of Prince Nicholas Radziwill (Wilna, 1635). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alanus. See ALAN DE L'Isle.

Alapi, the Assyrian name of the winged human-headed bulls which were used to guard the entrances of the palaces, and beings similar to which were believed to have had real existence at the mythical time of Izdubar. They were also called Kirubi, whence perhaps the cherubim of Hebrew writers.

Alar, FRANÇOIS ANTOINE, a French Dominican, general preacher, and prior of the Convent of St. Paul at Valenciennes near the commencement of the 19th century, wrote, Les Allumettes d'Amour du Jardin Dédicieux de la Confrérie du Saint Rosaire de la Vierge Marie (Valenciennes, 1617). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Al-Araf, according to the Mohammedan theology, is the wall of separation between heaven and hell. Those whose good and evil deeds exactly balance each other are placed astride this wall, they being deemed not worthy of heaven nor yet deserving of hell. Those who have gone to war without their parents' consent and have fallen in battle are placed in the same category. The Mohammedan Al-Araf bears some resemblance to the Roman purgatory; but there are decided differences.

Alarcon, ALFONSO DE, a Spanish ecclesiastic of the 17th century. He was canon of Ciudad Rodrigo, secretary of Francis de Alarcon, and bishop of Pampluna. He compiled a large number of poetic writings, on the occasion of the death of Martin Suarez of Alarcon, killed at the siege of Barcelona, entitled Corona Sepulcral; Elogios en la Muerte de D. Martin Suarez de Alarcon, Hijo Primogénito del Marqués de Trocical, Conde de Torres Vedras, Escritos por Diferentes Plumas, Sacados á Luz, etc. (Madrid, 1652). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alarcon, ARCÁNGEL, General of the Order of Capuchins, was born at Tarragona, and died in the year 1598. He left in verse, Verjel de Plantas Divinas.

Alarcon, BARTOLOMÉ, DE LOS RIOS, a Spanish hermit of the Order of St. Augustine. In 1622 he went to Brussels; in 1635 he was definitor of the province of Cologne, etc., and died at Madrid in 1652. Among his works are, Phanix Thenensis e Cineribus Redivivus (Antw. 1637, 8vo):—Christus Dominus in Cathedra Crucis Docens et Patiens (Brussels, 1645, 4to):—Vita Coccinea, or Commentary on the Gospels of the Passion and Resurrection (Antw. 1646):—Hierarchia Mariana (ibid. 1641, fol.):—De Excellentia et Virtutibus B. M. V. (1647, fol.).

Alarcon, DIEGO DE, a Spanish Jesuit, died at Madrid in 1634, and left a work on scholastic theology (Lyons, 1633) and a Life of Father Diego Deza.

Alard (Adhelard, or Adeldard), a Dutch priest, was born at Amsterdam in 1490. He was versed in the Greek and Latin languages, also in belles-lettres, which he taught at Amsterdam, Cologne, Utrecht, and Louvain. He bequeathed his library to the orphans of Amsterdam, and died at Louvain in 1544. He edited a large number of works on literature and controversy, among which are, Hippocratis Cos Epistola (Saltingiaci, 1539):—the Lucubrations of Frison R. Agricola, and the work of Marbod, De Gemmis:—Selectæ Similitudines, sive Collationes ex Bibliis (Paris, 1543). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alard, FRANÇOIS, a Flemish theologian, was born of a noble family at Brussels about the beginning of the 16th century. His father, William Alard de Centier, a zealous convert to popery, obliged him to enter the Order of Dominican Friars. While employed by them as a preacher, a Hamburg merchant procured him, privately, the works of Luther, and aided him in escaping from his convent. He then studied divinity at Jena and Wittenberg, but, deprived by his friend's death of his assistance, he ventured to return to Brussels and ask help of his father. His mother denounced him to the Inquisition; and, upon his refusal to return to the Church, she even offered to furnish wood to burn him. He was sentenced to death and conducted to prison, from which he contrived to escape, and, reaching Oldenburg, became almoner to the prince. Hearing that freedom of religion was granted at Antwerp, and his father coming to see him, he persuaded him to renounce Romanism. When it was no longer safe for him to remain in the Netherlands, Christian IV of Denmark gave him the curacy of Wilster, in Holstein, where he died, July 10, 1578. His works, written in Flemish or German, consist of, The Confession of Antwerp:—Exhortation of the Ministers of Antwerp:—Agenda; or, Discipline of Antwerp:—Catechism:—Treatise on Original Sin. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alard, LAMBERT, a German historian, son of William, was born at Krempen in 1600. He first studied there and at Hamburg; went to Leipsic when nineteen, and entered upon a course of theology and political science. In 1624 he had acquired much reputation as a philosopher and poet; and, returning to Krempen, was made dean of the college. After holding this position for five years, the king of Denmark appointed him inspector of the schools at Brunswick and assessor of the Council of Meldorf. By order of the emperor he was, in 1643, created A.M., and was made a licentiate in di-rinity by diploma. He died May 29, 1672. His works are, Delicia Attica (Leips. 1624, 12mo):—Heraclius Suzonicus (ibid. eod. 12mo):—Græcia in Nuce, seu Lexicon Novum Omnium Græcæ Linguae Primogenitarum (ibid. 1628, 1632, 12mo):—Promptuarium Pathologicum Novi Testamenti (ibid. 1635, 1636, 12mo), and others.

Alard, Nicolaus, Sr., a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 17, 1644. He studied at Gießen and Helmstädt; was appointed in 1675 pastor at Tönningen; and promoted in 1679, by the Kiel University, as doctor of theology on presenting a dissertation, De Christo Θεωσώμεν. In 1682 he was called as provost to Eyderstadt; four years later (in 1686) king Christian V appointed him general superintendent of Oldenburg. Alard died Oct. 3, 1699. He wrote, Idea Theologiae:—Tubula Grammaticæ Ebrææ, Chronologiam, etc., Exhibentes:—Der verderbte Zustand der reformirten Kirche, etc. See Thiessen, Gelehrte Geschichte von Hamburg, i, 6; Moller, Cimbria Litterata; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Alard, Nicolaus, Jr., son of the preceding, was born Sept. 6, 1683. He studied at Kiel; was in 1712 pastor at Neukirchen, in 1717 at Steinbeck, and in 1738 cathedral preacher at Hamburg, where he died, Feb. 13, 1756. He wrote, Decas Alardorum Scriptis Clarorum (Hamburg, 1721):—Bibliotheca Harmonicobiblica (ibid. 1725):—Dissertatio de Misericordia Dei Fortuita ex Aureo Beati Lutheri in Genesis Commentatio (Wittenberg, 1705). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Supplement, s. v.; Thiessen, Gelehrte Geschichte von Hamburg, s. v.; Moller, Cimbria Litterata; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Alard, Wilhelm, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, son of Francis, was born at Wilster, in Holstein, Nov. 22, 1572. He studied at Wittenberg, and was appointed co-rector at Kremepe in 1596. In 1608 he succeeded to the pastorate of that place; and died May 8, 1645. He is the author of Decas Prima Hymnorum ad Deum Opt. Max. (Hamburg, 1599):—Tres Centurie Ex cubicularum Piarum (Frankfort, 1607, 1628, 1630):—Chilias Triariorum h. e. Epigrammatum Piorum seu Meditatio- nularum ex Evangeliiis Anniversariis et Patrum Dicitis (Goslar, 1618, 1626):—Pædia Christiana ad Imitationem Servatoris Jesu xii Annos Nati Vario Genere Carminis Adornata (Lips. 1622):—Euthanasia, sieben Predigten von der edlen Kunst christlich und selig zu sterben (ibid. 1623):—Achtzehn Danksagungspredigten (ibid. 1640). See Witten, Memor. Theol. Dec. xi. (Francof. 1684), p. 1473 sq.; Moller, Cimbria Litterata (Hannæ, 1774), i, 4-7; Wezel, Hymnop. vol. i; Koch, *Gesch. d. deutsch. Alary, Étienne Aimé, a French priest, was born at Montpezat, in Vivarais, Sept. 29, 1762. He studied theology at the seminary of Viviers, and took sacred orders in 1785. At the time of the Revolution he was of the number of royalists who assembled at Jales, and emigrated in 1792. He was then appointed almoner of the general ward of the prince of Condé; and successively confessor of the dukes of Angoulême and Berry. He was found in all the campaigns in which the army of Condé was engaged from 1792 to 1800, displayed rare courage, and distinguished himself by lavish expenditure in succoring the wounded. He was wounded before Munich in 1796. He returned to France in 1803, was arrested in 1804, imprisoned at Sainte-Pélagie, and transferred to the Temple, where he spent many years of captivity. Banished until the return of Louis XVIII, he followed that monarch into Belgium, and resumed the functions of almoner of the general ward. He died in 1819. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alary, George, a French missionary, was born Jan. 10, 1731, at Pampelonne, in the diocese of Albi. In 1764 he went to Siam, where he preached Christianity.

After eleven months of bondage at Rangoon, in the kingdom of Ava, he resorted successively to Bengal, Pondicherry, Macao, and the province of Kouei-tcheou, in China. In 1773 he returned to France, and pope Clement XIV appointed him director of the Seminary of Missions at Paris. During the Revolution he retired to England. In 1802 he returned to France, where, until 1809, he filled his former office. He died Aug. 4, 1817. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alascani, a name given to the followers of John à Lasco (q. v.), a celebrated Polish Reformer. He left no permanent sect, but was instrumental in promoting the Lutheran Reformation.

Alastor, in Greek mythology, was (1) a surname of Jupiter, as punisher of evil. (2) A son of Neleus and Chloris, who married Harpalyce, the daughter of Clymenus, king of Argos. (3) A companion of Sarpedon, slain by Ulysses. (4) One of the horses of Pluto.

Al-asvad. See AHALA.

Alath, in ancient Nabathæan mythology, was the feminine form of the local deity Elga.

Alatrino, JOHANAN MORDECAI, an Italian rabbi who lived at the commencement of the 16th century, wrote, L'Angelica Tromba, con Alcuni Sonetti Spirituali del Medesimo (Venice, 1628). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alava y Esquivel, DIEGO DE. See ALABA.

Alb, in Scandinavian mythology, was the spirit of the night, or the nightmare; the succubus of mediæval writers.

Alba, DUKE OF. See ALVA.

Alba, Giacomo, an Italian rabbi, was a native of Montferrat, and lived at Florence near the close of the 16th and at the commencement of the 17th century. His treatises and commentaries on the Pentateuch, under the title Toledoth Jacob, were published at Venice in 1609. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alba, John of, a Spanish Carthusian of the monastery near Segovia, province of Valencia, Spain. He studied the Scriptures with great success, also the Oriental languages; and died in 1591, leaving many works. Some of these have been printed, and others remain, or at least did so a little before 1850, in the library of his monastery of Val-Christ. See Antonio, Biblioth. Hisp. i, 477.

Alba, Martial, a martyr, was a student in the University of Lausanne in 1560. He was a Frenchman, and was one of five who instructed others in the knowledge of the Lord. They went from Lausanne to Geneva, from there to Lyons, where, while sitting at the table of a friend, Alba was apprehended and led to prison, where he continued a year. He was learned and well exercised in the Scriptures. Alba was examined, and refuted his adversary in reasoning; but right was overcome by might, sentence was given, and he was burned in Lyons, his face first being smeared with fat and brimstone. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 409.

Albani, Alessandro, an Italian cardinal, was born at Urbino, Oct. 15, 1692; and was promoted to the rank of cardinal by pope Innocent XIII. He had great taste and knowledge of antiquities, and became a munificent patron of learning. He wrote some historical and literary works, which are held in much esteem. In 1762 his portfolio, consisting of three hundred volumes—one third original drawings of the first masters, the others collections of the most capital engravings—were sold to the king of Great Britain for fourteen thousand crowns. Albani died Dec. 2, 1779. See Stroock, Vita Alex. Albani (Romæ, 1779); Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albani, Annibale, an Italian prelate, brother of Giovanni Francesco, was born at Urbino, Aug. 15, 1682, and died about 1750. He was cardinal of St. Clement, chamberlain of the Church at Rome, bishop of Sabina, and archpriest of the Basilica of St. Peter of the Vatican. We are indebted to him for a collection of the works of his uncle, pope Clement XI (Rome, 1724, 2 vols. fol.; Frankf. 1729).—and Monologium Græcorum (Urbino, 1727), in Greek and Latin. He also edited the Roman Pontifical (Brussels, 1739, 3 vols. 8vo). See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albani, Giovanni Francesco, an Italian prelate, nephew of Alessandro, was born at Rome in 1720. Endowed with a pleasing countenance, and sought for on account of his genius and learning, he spent his early years in pleasure, and neglected the affairs pertaining to his calling. He, however, continued to have considerable influence owing to the Jesuits, who since the bull Unigenitus considered him as obligated to the brotherhood. He was advanced to the purple, soon after he entered the priesthood, in 1747, and not long after was appointed archpriest of the Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore and bishop of Porto. In 1767 Albani took an active part in behalf of the Jesuits. In 1775 he was appointed bishop of Ostia and Velletri, and consequently dean of the sacred college; and in 1779 succeeded his uncle Alessandro in almost all the charges which that prelate had possessed. He was appointed plenipotentiary of Austria, protector of Poland, and head of the Order of Malta, of the republic of Ragusa, and of the College of La Sapienza at Rome. He became an ardent patron of literature; increased the library of his uncle from 25,000 to 30,000 volumes; and in 1793 his villa was computed to contain about 200,000 works of art and specimens of antiquities. When the French took possession of Rome, they confiscated his estates, and sacked and plundered his palace and villa. The cardinal took refuge in a Carmaldolese convent on the southern frontier; then went to Naples, and to Messina. In 1800 he was present at Venice at the election of pope Pius VII. Returning to Rome, he died there in 1803. See Athenæum, vol. iii; Duppa, Subversion of the Papal Government, p. 131; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albani, Giovanni Geronimo, an Italian cardinal of the same family with the foregoing, was born at Bergamo, Jan. 3, 1504. He at first studied law; then bore arms in defence of the republic of Venice, for which he was rewarded with the chief magistracy of Bergamo. He there met cardinal Alessandrini (afterwards pope Pius V), who was so struck by his zeal for religion that, when he was elected pope, he invited him to Rome, and made him cardinal in 1570. Upon the death of Gregory XIII, the conclave would have elected Albani but for fear of the influence of his children. He died at Rome, April 23, 1591. He wrote the following: De Donatione Constantinæ Ecclesiæ Facta (Cologne, 1585);—De Ecclesiæ et ad eos Confugientium Immunitate (Rome, 1553);—Disputationes ac Concilia (ibid. eod.; Lyons, 1563);—De Summi Pontificis et Concilii Potestate (ibid. 1558);—De Cardinalatibus, et de Donatione Constantinæ (1584);—Commentaria ad Bartholomæum de Saxoferrato (Venice, 1561). See Biog. Univ. i, 388; Le Mire, De Script. sec. xvi, c. 65; Mag. Biblioth. Eccles.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albani, Giuseppe, an Italian cardinal, nephew of Giovanni Francesco, was born at Rome in 1750. He held a place in the sacred college after 1801. Like many other Roman lords, he passed his youth in idleness, preferring music to all other occupations. Narrowly bound to the system of his brotherhood, he allied himself with Austria against France, and his enemies accused him of complicity in the assassination of Bassville. In 1796 he went to Vienna in order to serve the interests of the holy see; but letters addressed to cardinal Cusca, which were intercepted, and put under the eye of the French director, furnished a pretext to the general-in-chief of the French republic for breaking the amnesty and for occupying Rome. He remained a long time in Vienna, and returned to Rome in 1814, where he became first secretary of the pope's briefs and the legate of the pope at Bologna. At the accession of Pius VIII he became secretary of state, a position which he lost at the exaltation of Gregory XVI. He was appointed, in 1831, apostolic commissioner in the four legations for the purpose of establishing order and peace. He entered the regular army, but finally retired from all these offices, and died at Pesaro, Dec. 3, 1839. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albania was an epithet of Juno, thus named from Alba, where she was worshipped.

Albanian Version of the Scriptures. This language is vernacular in Albania, which lies partly opposite to the Ionian Islands, and extends for more than 250 miles along the Mediterranean and Adriatic coasts. The Albanians possessed no version of the Scriptures till the year 1819, when Dr. Pinkerton, agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, employed a native Albanian to prepare a translation of the New Test. into Albanian. The translator, Evangelos Mexicos, after having finished the translation, handed the same for revision to Gregory, archbishop of Negropont. In 1825 the Gospel of St. Matthew was printed, and in 1827 the New Test. was completed at press in Corfu, under the superintendence of the Rev. J. Lowndes. The expense of the work was borne by the Ionian Bible Society. Of late the attention of the British and Foreign Bible Society has been directed towards the Albanians, who, with much that is degrading, combine some fine traits of character. During the year 1866 a translation of the four gospels and the Acts of the Apostles in the Gheg, or Northern Albanian dialect, was printed at Constantinople. The translation was made by Mr. Constantine Christophorides, a native of the country. During the year 1868, the Psalms in the Tosk, or Southern Albanian dialect, were printed, which were also translated by Mr. Christophorides. The same translator proceeded with other parts; and at present there exist in Gheg the New Test. and Psalms, and in Tosk the New Test. and the Psalms in a revised edition. (B. P.)

Albano (or Albani), FRANCESCO, an Italian painter, was born at Bologna, March 17, 1578. When quite young he displayed a talent for painting, and was placed, at the age of twelve, under the tuition of Denis Calvart. Albano afterwards went to Rome, where his genius soon gained him a reputation. The greater part of the work in the national Church of the Spaniards was executed by Albano. Returning to Rome, he executed the large works to be seen in the tribune of the Madonna della Pace. He died at Bologna, Oct. 4, 1660. Among his best works at Bologna are, the Baptism of Christ, in the Church of San Giorgio;—the Annunciation, in the Church of San Bartolomeo;—and the Resurrection, in the Church of Santa Maria de Galeria. He is regarded more as an agreeable than a great painter. Among his other best efforts are the pictures of the four elements, painted for the cardinal Maurice, and now in the Gallery at Turin.

Albans (St.), JOHN OF. See ÆGIDIUS OF ST. GILES.

Albanus, a saint (different from St. Alban of England) commemorated in the Martyrologia Bedæ on Dec. 1.

Albanus, HEINRICH FRIEDRICH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Jan. 6, 1694, at Eisleben. He studied at Leipsic and Wittenberg, was in 1719 called to the pastorate at Zscheplin, in Saxony, and died Feb. 10, 1754. He wrote, Disputatio Philolog. de Emphasi Verbi Psalmo li, 9 (Lips. 1712);—Dissertatio de ἀποκρίνῃ ἡρώα 1 Cor. iv, 3 (ibid.);—Dissertatio Epistolica de Quibusdam Vindemiæ Antiquitatibus apud Romanos (ibid. 1712);—Comment. Philolog. Omnis Homi

Mendax ad Ps. cxvi, 11 et Rom. iv, 4 (Dresden, 1717). He also published some sermons, for which see Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Albaspinius, GABRIEL. See AUBESPINE.

Albee, ISAAC, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born at Wiscasset, Me., Sept. 20, 1766. He was converted at Anson in June, 1795, and in August following he, with others, organized the first church of his denomination in that section of the country. Of this church he was ordained deacon on Oct. 19, 1812, and received license to preach and administer the ordinances wherever God in his Providence should call him. It is said of him that he was truly a nursing father in Israel. He died at Anson, Feb. 27, 1861. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1863, p. 90. (J. C. S.)

Albelda, JOHN. See ALVELDA.

Albelda, MOSES BEN-JACOB, a Greek rabbi at Salonichi, who flourished at the beginning of the 16th century, is the author of דרש משה, or expositions on the Pentateuch (Venice, 1608): פירוש חמדי, or disquisitions on the Pentateuch (ibid. 1526, 1601): ראשית דבר, or treatises on the articles of faith (ibid. 1588): שער דמנה, an ascetical work on the vanity of the world, etc. (ibid. 1586): באור כל פ' רשי לחוריה, a supercommentary on Rashi's Commentary on the Pentateuch (Constant. s. a.). See Furst, Bibl. Jud. i, 31 sq.; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 33 sq.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Alberelli, GIACOMO, an Italian painter, was born at Venice, and lived about 1600. He studied under Jacopo Palma, the younger, and remained his coadjutor for thirty-four years. He died about 1650. Some of his works are in the public edifices of Venice, the best of which is a picture of the Baptism of Christ in the Church of Ognissanti (or All-Saints).

Alberga (med. Lat.), a term used to signify the right of procurations, as alberguria is the composition made in lieu of procurations. See Martène, Thesaur. Ane. i, 815.

Albergati, Antonio, an Italian prelate, was born at Bologna, Sept. 16, 1566. In 1609 he was appointed bishop of Veglia (Naples) by Paul V. He died at Rome, Jan. 4, 1634. He wrote, I Tre Libri della Guida Spirituale (Bologna, 1628): Instructio et Decreta Generalia pro Pastoribus Civitatis et Diocesis Leodiensis (Leodii, 1614). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albergati, Fabio, a native of Bologna, Italy, flourished about the close of the 16th century. He was the author of Il Cardinale (Bologna, 1599, 4to), and of Trattato del Modo di Ridurre a Pace le Inimicizie Private (Venice, 1614, 8vo). In 1573 Zanetti published, at Rome, six vols. of Albergati's moral works. See Dict. Historique; Biog. Universelle; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.

Albergati, Niccolò, an Italian cardinal, was born at Bologna in 1375. At the age of twenty he entered the Order of Chartreux, and distinguished himself by his doctrines in favor of the absolute sovereignty of the pope. Martin V made him bishop of Bologna; then cardinal of St. Croix of Jerusalem; and sent him as apostolic nuncio to France in order to mediate between Charles VI and Henry V, king of England. He was several times expelled from his bishopric by the people of Bologna, and was obliged to take refuge in Rome. In 1431 Eugenius IV sent him to preside at the Council of Basle. Here he encountered strong opposition against his doctrines concerning the pope, and returned to Rome with his mission unaccomplished. In 1433 he went to Basle with three associate cardinals, who, with him, governed the seventeenth session of the council. New dissensions arose, and Albergati obtained, in 1437, a bull from the pope transferring the council to Ferrara. This was the occasion of a new schism. The prelates who assembled at Ferrara, Jan. 10, 1438, declared null all that was done by those who remained at Basle. The Council of Ferrara was broken up by a pestilence, and nothing was decided concerning the union of the Church East and West. Albergati was appointed penitentiary; then treasurer of the pope; and died shortly after at Sienna, May 9, 1443. Benedict XIV canonized him in 1745. See Rugger, Testimonia de Nic. Albergato (Rom. 1744); Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberghino, GIOVANNI, an Italian monk of the third Order of St. Francis, was born at Palermo in 1574. He assumed the habit of that order in 1590. While still young, he took his doctor's degree, and taught philosophy and scholastic theology with great credit. He was appointed definitor of the province of Sicily, and twice provincial, as well as consulter and censor of the Inquisition. He died at Palermo in 1644, in the Convent of St. Mary of Pity. His works are, Manuale Qualificatorum S. Inquisitionis (Palermo, 1642, 8vo; Saragossa, 1671): Lucubrations Scholasticæ et Mor. Theologiae:—Breve Chronicon Tertii Ordinis S. Francisci. See Mongitore, Biblioth. Sicil. i, 314; Coronelli, Biblioth. Univ.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Albergoni, ELEUTERO, a Minorite preacher, was born at Milan about 1560. He was provincial and consulter of the sacred office, for a number of years acted as teacher and preacher at Milan, was in 1611 appointed bishop of Montemarano, in Naples, and died in 1636. He wrote, Resolutio Doctrinæ Scoticæ (Padua, 1593; Lyons, 1643):—Concordanza degli Eangeli Correnti nelle Cinque Domeniche di Quaresima con Cantico della B. Vergine (Milan, 1594):—Connezio Evangeliorum Quadragesimalium et Psalmorum (Rome, 1631):—Lezioni sopra il Magnificat Concordanti con gli Eangeli Ambrogiani (ibid. eod.). See Mazzuchelli, Scrittori d'Italia (Brescia, 1753 sq.), s. v.; Argellati, Biblioth. Mediolanensis (Milan, 1745). (B. P.)

Alberht, abbot of Ripon, who succeeded abbot Botwin in A.D. 786, was probably present at the legatine Council of the North, held in September, 787, the acts of which were signed by an abbot Aldberich. He died in the autumn of the same year.

Alberht is also the name of (1) an archbishop of York. See ALDBERHT. (2) The ninth abbot of Glastonbury in Malmesbury's list, dated A.D. 712.

Alberic OF AIX. See ALBERT.

Alberio, probably an Italian, was a monk of MONTE-CASINO and cardinal of the Four Crowned Saints, and lived about 1057. He attended the Council of Rome, in 1079, against Berenger, and was charged with defending the faith of the Church and refuting Berenger's arguments. Peter the Deacon mentions as works of his composition: Treatise on the Body of the Lord:—Hymns on St. Nicholas:—Treatise against the Emperor Henry on the Election of the Pope:—Dissertations on the Last Judgment:—The Pains of Hell:—The Joys of Paradise:—Assumption of the Blessed Virgin:—St. Paul:—St. Apollinaris:—On the Martyrdom of SS. Modestus and Cæsarius:—also Life of St. Dominic. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 142.

Alberic OF OSTIA, a friar of the Order of St. Benedict, was born at Beauvais in 1080. He re-established the discipline in the Monastery of Cluny and in the Abbey of Vézelay (diocese of Autun). He was appointed cardinal-bishop of Ostia, and was sent as legate to England, at that time disturbed by the war of David I, king of Scotland, against Stephen I, king of England. On Dec. 14, 1138, Alberic held a council at London in order to settle certain questions. After a fruitless mission into Sicily in order to bring into submission the people of Bari, who were rebelling against Roger II, he returned to the East and called a council at Antioch, Nov. 30, 1140, which deposed the patriarch Rudolph, who was accused of heresy. After having visited Jerusalem and the holy sepulchre, he returned to Rome. He afterwards returned to France in order to combat, with St. Bernard and Geoffrey of Chartres, the heresiarch Éon de l'Estoile, to establish in his seat the archbishop of Bordeaux, who had been banished by his clergy, and to arrange with Louis the younger a journey through the Holy Land. He died at Verdun in 1147. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberic of ROSATA (or Roxiati), a learned Italian, lived about 1350. We have of his composition an excellent Commentary on the Sixth Book of the Decretals:—De Statutis (four books):—Dictionary of Civil and Canon Law:—a treatise On Witnesses, and another On Propositions. See Biog. Univ. i, 396; Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberic, probably a Frenchman, was a Cistercian monk of the Abbey of TROIS-FONTAINES, diocese of Chalons, and was born near that place early in the 13th century. He is the author, according to some, but in the opinion of others only the interpolator and continuator, of a Chronicle from the Creation to 1241. Leibnitz printed it in his Accessiones Historiæ (Leips. 1698, 4to), vol. ii, and Menckenius in Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum et Saxon. (ibid. 1728, fol.), vol. i. The National Library at Paris contains a more complete MS. than has ever been published. Alberic also wrote some poems. See Biog. Univ. i, 396; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 298; Rose, Gen. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberic, Felippo, an Italian monk, was born at Mantua about 1470. He was commissioner at the court of Rome, and was sent by the pope, Julius II, to France, to England, and to Germany in order to combat the doctrines of Luther. He died at Naples in 1551. He wrote a History of the "Order of the Blessed Virgin."—a Life of St. Philip of Benisi, a Latin poem:—De Sacratissimo Christi Corpore per Judæam Pænis Afflicto. This last poem is in heroic verse, and very rare. Its subject is the pretended miracle known under the name Billettes, dated in the year 1290. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberic of VERE (ALBERICUS DE VERE), an Englishman of the family of the earls of Oxford, was a monk of the order of the Regular Canons of St. Augustine. He flourished about 1250, and composed a Treatise on the Eucharist:—Life of St. Osyth:—and an Account of the Antiquities of the Monastery of St. Osyth. See Life of Alberic in Surius, Oct. 7.

Alberici, Enrico, an Italian painter, was born at Vilminore, in the territory of Bergamo, in 1714. He studied three years under Ferdinando Cairo of Brescia, and is said by Tassi to have been an artist of distinction. He died in 1775. Some of his most prominent paintings are to be found in the Church dei Miracoli at Brescia, viz., the Woman of Samaria:—Parable of the Pharisee and the Publican:—the Raising of Lazarus:—the Prodigal Son:—and the Good Shepherd.

Alberici, Giacomo, a friar of the Order of Augustinians, died at Rome in 1610. His work Catalogo degli Illustri Scrittori Veneziani (Bologna, 1605) contains the lives of Croce, Gabrielle, Zartino, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albericus DE VERE. See ALBERIC OF VERE.

Albero of MONTREUIL, archbishop of Treves, was born in 1080 at Montreuil, near Toul. He was a zealous propagator of the ecclesiastical ideas of Gregory VII, and abolished many abuses then predominant in the Church. In 1130 he was made archbishop. At first he declined this honor, but finally adhered to the wishes of the pope. His position was a very trying one; but, with his usual energy, he commenced the reformation of his diocese. The monasteries were especially cared for, while his own palace formed the nucleus for the gathering of men of learning in his time. He died Jan. 18, 1152. See Walde, De Alberone Trevirorum Archiepiscopo (Monasterii, 1855); Prümer, Albero von Montreuil, Erzbischof von Trier (Gött. 1874); Huyskens, Albero von Montreuil, Erzbischof von Trier, 1. Theil (Münster, 1879); Wetzter u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Alberon (or Adalberon) I, prince-bishop of Liege, was a brother of duke Godfrey, canon and dean of Metz, and was elected bishop of Liege after the office had been vacant for about two years. This long vacancy was caused by the contentions of the empire and the priesthood concerning the investitures. Peace was made between the two powers Sept. 23, 1122; and the following year the emperor Henry V came to celebrate the festivals of the Passover at Liege. During his sojourn the election of bishop took place, and Alberon united all the votes in behalf of his brother, the duke. The first care of this prelate was to clear his diocese of brigands who infested it. Their retreat was the citadel of Fouquemont, from which they were finally driven. Thus, under the episcopacy of Alberon, peace and harmony were restored. About 1123 he founded a monastery on Mount Cornillon; a short time after the one at Floreff was founded, belonging to the same order. In 1124 he placed the canon monks in the Church of St. Giles-au-Mont. In 1127 Renaud of Martigni, archbishop of Rheims, submitted the laws of his Church to the seigniorship of Bouillon and his successors; but he reserved for himself, and those who should come after him in the Court of Rheims, the prerogatives of justice and of military service. At the same time, he received the homage of Alberon. Alberon abolished the ancient custom of mortmain which had prevailed among the bishops of Liege. He died in January, 1129. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberon II, prince-bishop of Liege, was born of the house of the counts of Namur. He was dean of the Church of Metz, and in 1136 was made bishop. In 1140 he had a war with the count of Namur, Henry II, the most fierce and daring of his neighbors. This was soon ended by a treaty of peace which made him the ally of his enemy. He then turned his attention towards the recovery of what he had lost, and sought to engage the emperor and the pope in his behalf; but the money which the count of Bar had lavished in these two courts made this attempt useless, and therefore he resorted to arms. In 1141 Alberon made a league with the count of Namur; and the two, having united their forces, besieged the château of Bouillon. After long and painful effort they became discouraged; and the prelate proposed a journey to the place where rested the remains of St. Lambert. At length the supplies failed, and they surrendered. Historians relate this as a miracle; and Nicholas of Liege, a writer of the time, has given us a full account of it under the title Triomphe de Saint Lambert. Some believe that the character of Alberon was such that it would not call down the special favor of Heaven; and it is certain that under his episcopacy the license of the people and the debauchery of the clergy reached their climax. Henry of Leyen, provost of the Church, at length came to the rescue. He went to Rome, and carried the reports of these disorders to the tribunal of the sacred court. The pope called for the bishop of Liege, who, accordingly, presented himself at Rome. It is not known what passed between him and the pope, but on his return from Rome he was attacked with a violent fever, and died at Otride, Italy, March 27, 1145. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberoni, Giulio, a famous Italian cardinal and prime-minister of Spain, was born near Piacenza, May 31, 1664. Being the son of a gardener, he at first was a tiller of the soil. At the age of fourteen years he became clerical bellringer of the Cathedral of Piacenza. He entered the school of the Barnabites, where he showed a good deal of ability, and sought the protection of Barni, vice-legat of Ravenna, who, having become bishop of Piacenza, placed him in charge of the house and made him a member of the order. Afterwards Alberoni accompanied the son of his protector to Rome, and there learned the French language. He also gained the friendship of the secretary of the duke of Vendôme and of the poet Campistron, which was of great service to him afterwards. During the war of the Spanish Succession he was interpreter to the government of Parma. In 1706 Alberoni accompanied the duke of Vendôme to Paris, where he was presented to Louis XIV, who offered him the rectory of Anet; but he refused this, preferring to remain with his patron rather than be placed at the head of a parish. The duke of Vendôme having been appointed in 1711 generalissimo of the armies of Philip V, Alberoni accompanied him to Spain as his secretary. A little later the death of his benefactor occurred, and he returned to Paris to inform Louis XIV of the fact. The following year the duke of Parma conferred upon him the title of count, and appointed him his consular agent to Spain. The princess of Ursins had at that time great influence at the Court of Madrid; but at the death of the queen of Louis XIV, Elizabeth Farnese, daughter of the last duke of Parma and niece of the acting duke, was proposed for queen. Alberoni shared with the new queen his unlimited influence with the king. About this time the death of Louis XIV completely changed the policy of the cabinet of Madrid. The age of Louis XV rendered a regency necessary; and Philip V believed that he had a claim to the position. After the death of Innocent XIII (March 7, 1724), cardinal Alberoni obtained ten votes in the conclave. It was on this occasion that the lampoon was posted in Rome—"Il cielo vuol Orsini; il popolo, Corsini; le donne, Ottoboni; il diavolo, Alberoni." Cardinal Orsini was chosen under the name of Benedict XIII. Alberoni did not gain the favor of the new pope, and therefore retired to his estate at Castel-Romano, and did not return to Rome until after the death of the pope, which occurred in 1730. The new pope, Clement XII, confided to him several negotiations, and appointed him in 1734 legate of Ravenna. In spite of his advanced age, he was still active. He constructed canals, founded benevolent institutions, reformed the police system, and prohibited vagrants from taking refuge in churches. About this time he became entangled in the affairs of the small republic of San Marino. Alberoni had to the last his health and energy. His conversation was sprightly; and he was able to converse in Italian, French, and Spanish. He died at Rome, June 16, 1752. After his death, a pretended Testament Politique was printed under his name in 1753. The Vie d'Alberoni, by Rousset, which we cite as the principal authority, was completed in 1718. Two letters of his have been found, the first of which is addressed by Alberoni to cardinal Camarlingo Paulucci, and is the famous apology of the cardinal-minister. This is followed by a second apology in the form of a letter addressed to a Genoese marquis by a Roman prelate. This prelate is Alberoni himself. See Hoefler, Novv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert (Alberic, or Albricus), a French ecclesiastic, was canon of Aix, in Provence, and died about 1120. He is the author of a History of the First Crusade, from A.D. 1095 to 1120. Albert was not a witness of the exploits he records, but appears to have had recourse to information from others. Reinerius Reineccius first published it under the title of Chronicon Hierosolymitanum (Helmstädt, 1584). It is printed by Bongars, as the work of Albert, in the Gesta Dei per Francos, i, 184. See Biog. Universelle, i, 419; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 206; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefler, Novv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert DE ARGENTINA was theologian of the bishop of Strasburg in the 14th century. About 1378 he composed a History, from the beginning of the house of Hapsburg to the death of Charles IV, A.D. 1270 to 1378 (imperfect by Cuspinian, Basle, 1553, 1569). Christianus Urstadius gave it entire in his Scriptores Germanici (Frankf. 1670, ii, 97). Albert also wrote a Life of Bertholdus, Bishop of Strasburg and Spire. For the catalogue of his other works, see Dupin, Bibliothèque, 14th Century; also Cave, Historia Literaria.

Albert of BERGAMO was a monk of the Third Order of St. Dominic. He gave at a very early age tokens of his future eminence in holiness. At the age of seven he devoted himself to prayer and fasting. Later he assisted his father in his agricultural labors; and, to satisfy his parents, took a wife, who was displeased with his charities. After a time he retired to Cremona, and shortly after took the monastic vows. He went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and died May 7, 1279. His body was buried under the choir of the church where he had spent much of his time in prayer. Benedict XIV permitted his festival to be observed by the Dominicans and the clergy of Bergamo and Cremona.

Albert, baron of BONSTETTIN, was almoner of the emperor Maximilian II, and dean of the Hermits of St. Augustine, in Switzerland. He lived about 1500, and wrote The Life of St. Nicholas of Tolentino, a monk of that order, who is reported to have lived many years without eating (given by Surius, Sept. 10). See Cave, Hist. Lit. vol. ii, App. p. 214.

Albert of BRANDENBURG, grand-master of the Teutonic Order, took monastic vows at Mergentheim, where he received the record of his nomination; and entered at Königsberg Nov. 22, 1512. Albert having refused to render homage to Poland, king Sigismund declared war against him Dec. 28, 1519. This lasted until 1521, and was terminated by the intervention of the emperor and the king of Hungary, who secured a truce of four years. In 1521 he accorded to Walter of Plettenberg, provincial master of the Teutonic knights in Livonia, the right to exercise sovereignty in his own name. In 1524 Albert took the oath of loyalty to the empire in the Diet of Nuremberg, and held to the rank of the ecclesiastical princes—after the archbishops and before all the bishops of the empire. In 1525 the treaty with Poland expired, and it was desired to enter upon the conferences at Presburg; but this was useless. The grand-master, already preceded by the doctrines of Luther, sent an embassy to Cracow, where he finally went himself; and concluded, April 9, a treaty with his uncle, the king, by which he was recognised hereditary duke of all the territory possessed by the order in Prussia, with the stipulation that his brothers and their successors should receive investiture by the king. This was immediately put into execution. Albert, strengthened by a large number of Poles, took possession of the duchy, quitted the habit of the order, and expelled the Catholics. Thus was the Teutonic Order overthrown in Prussia, by the action of its grand-master. He died near the middle of the 16th century. See Hoefler, Novv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert II of CUYCK, prince-bishop of Liege, ascended in 1194 to the tribunal of that Church, after Rome had declared null the election of Simon of Limburg, a youth of sixteen. Pope Celestin III made null that election at the request of Albert of Cuyck and three other archdeacons, and ordered another election at Namur, Nov. 18, 1194, at which Albert was elected. In order to indemnify Simon of Limburg, Celestin made him cardinal. Albert disgraced his office by the simony which he so boldly practiced, and which was thus communicated to the clergy of Liege. The various hardships which the country suffered at this time were regarded as a punishment brought upon them for the wickedness of this prelate. He nevertheless made himself beloved by the people of Liege, to whom he granted many favors. Albert died Feb. 1, 1200. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, bishop of FREISING(EN), came of an Alsacian family of Hohenburg. He was first chaplain of pope Clement VI, who resided at that time at Avignon, and who, in 1345, appointed him to the bishopric of Würzburg, contrary to the wishes of the chapter. This occasioned trouble between the pope and the emperor, which was settled by the appointment of Albert to the bishopric of Freising. He died in 1359. He is supposed to have written the lives of the martyrs St. Kilian, bishop of Würzburg, and his companions St. Colman and St. Totman, in the Acta Sanctorum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert of GEMBLoux (Albertus Gemblacensis), a Benedictine, was born at Loben, near Liege, towards the close of the 10th century. He studied at Paris and at Chartres under the celebrated Fulbert, and became priest of Gembloux, then of St. James, at Liege, where he died in 1048. Sigebert speaks of him as being eminent for his knowledge of civil and religious affairs, as well as for his zeal in religion. He assisted Burkhard, bishop of Worms, his pupil, in the compilation of Magnus Volumen Canonum, and wrote several hymns and lives of saints. Of these the Life of St. Veronus Olbertus (ed. by Galopinus, 1635; and by Henschenius, Acta SS. vol. iii, March 30) is the best known. See Sigebert, De Script. Eccles. c. 142; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 128; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert II, count of HALLERMONDE and cardinal-archbishop of Magdeburg, enlisted on the side of king Philip of Suabia, and reconciled that prince with Innocent III. At the death of Philip (1208), he made peace with Otho IV, whom he accompanied in 1209 to Rome. In the following year, as legate of the holy see in Germany, Albert promulgated the sentence of deposition pronounced by the pope against Otho, and in 1212, at the Diet of Mentz, he concurred in the election of Frederick II. This brought the arms of Otho into Magdeburg. Twice the prelate was made prisoner in the course of these hostilities, and twice he was delivered by the valor of his troops. In 1216 he brought under his jurisdiction the metropolitan bishopric of Camin. Albert had no peace until the death of Otho, which occurred in 1218. He assisted, in 1225, at the Diet of Aix-la-Chapelle, where he resolved on a new crusade to the Holy Land, but he had the prudence not to enroll himself for this expedition. In 1229 he raised a war between the prelate and the margraves of Brandenburg, Otho and John, to bring under subjection the house of Waldeck; but this was soon ended. The prelate was considered one of the most important men of his time. In 1207 he commenced to rebuild his cathedral church, which had been burned. He died about 1232. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, patriarch of JERUSALEM, was born about 1150 at Castello di Gualtieri, near Parma. After having been prior of a community of canons, he was appointed successively bishop of Bobbio and of Vercelli. The high estimate in which his prudence, his uprightness, and his ability were held led the emperor Frederick Barbarossa and pope Clement III to choose him as arbitrator of their disputes. Henry VI, successor of Frederick, appointed him count of the empire. Popes Celestin III and Innocent III also employed him in many negotiations. In 1204 the Christians of Palestine appointed him Latin patriarch of Jerusalem, although he could not reside there because Jerusalem was in the hands of the Mussulmans. At this time he established certain wise but rigid regulations for the order of the Carmelites which were modified by the commissaries appointed by pope Innocent IV. Pope Innocent III invited Albert to be present at the General Council of Lateran, held in 1215; but Albert was assassinated the year before, Sept. 14, at Acre, by a man whom he had rebuked for his crimes. He is honored April 8 as a saint of the Order of Carmelites. Tritheim attributes to him Status Terræ Sanctæ, which is unpublished. The Regula Carmelitarum is found with the Life of Albert in the Acta Sanctorum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, bishop of LIVONIA, was born in 1160. Being a native of Germany, he placed himself at the head of the nobility of Saxony and of Westphalia and came to Livonia in order to propagate the Catholic religion. He obtained of Innocent III in 1204 permission to found a monastic military order, which took the name "Chevaliers Porte-glaives" (in Latin, Ensisferi, and in German, Schwertbrüder). Their first grand-master was Winno of Röhrbach. Albert established a number of colleges for the diffusion of the light of religion throughout all Livonia. He died at Riga, Jan. 17, 1229. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert (or Olbert) of LOBEN. See ALBERT OF GEMBLoux.

Albert I, archbishop of MAGDEBURG, was first monk of Corbie, then of St. Maximin of Treves. He was sent in 961, by the emperor Otho I, to preach the Gospel in Russia. In 968 he was appointed archbishop of Magdeburg by pope John XIII. On Dec. 21 following, he arrived at Magdeburg, where he consecrated the bishops of Merseburg, of Zeitz, and of Misnia. He gave a grand reception to Hermann, burgrave of Magdeburg, and in 978 he received from Otho the jurisdiction of all the inhabitants of the place, with the right of appointing the burgrave. The following year he gave to the canons the right of electing their archbishop. Albert deserved the consideration which he received for the faithful performance of his duties. While on his way to visit the diocese of Merseburg, he fell from his horse, and died from the accident June 10, 981. His body was interred in the cathedral at Magdeburg. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert III, count of Sternberg and archbishop of MAGDEBURG, was appointed by pope Urban V, at the request of the emperor Charles IV, of whom he was chancellor, in preference to Frederick of Hoym, bishop of Merseburg, whom the chapter had chosen. Albert, after his installation, confirmed the privileges of the states and towns of his archbishopric. This prelate was a very bad economist. He alienated many cities and villages dependent upon his Church, and gave up Lusatia, which his predecessor had acquired of the landgrave Tiesecman. Having in consequence of this brought upon himself the scorn and derision of his subjects, he collected his treasures, with many valuable articles, and went to Bohemia, where in 1371 he exchanged his archbishopric for the bishopric of Leutmeritz, which was at that time held by Peter of Bruma. He died near the close of the 14th century. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert IV, lord of Querfurt and archbishop of MAGDEBURG, is represented as a penurious, anxious, wanton prelate. In 1390 he aided the prince of Brunswick against the inhabitants of Brandenburg, and in 1394, by the aid of the prince of Anhalt and the lord of Querfurt, by treachery, he surprised the city of Rathenow and pillaged it. This city was restored to the inhabitants of Brandenburg by the prelate in 1396. The deterioration of currency in 1401 obliged the archbishop and his chapter, with the city of Magdeburg, to which they vainly laid claim, to take advantage of the interdict. The threat which the prelate made of bringing this before the formidable tribunal of Westphalia was, however, efficacious. A contract was made Feb. 14, 1403, by means of which all was restored to order. Soon after the archbishop became ill and chose as his coadjutor Günther, younger son of the count of Schwarzburg. Albert died at Giebichenstein, June 14, 1403, and was interred in the cathedral. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert (or Albrecht) I, archbishop of MENTZ, was the son of Sigebert, count of Saarbrück, and chancellor of the emperor Henry V. In 1110 he accompanied this prince to Italy, and on their return to Germany Albert was elected archbishop (Aug. 15, 1111), and immediately received the investiture by the ring and pastoral staff. The following year he took part against Henry, who, with the Council of Vienna, attempted the excommunication of the pope; and Henry, surprised and irritated at this, cast him into the prison of Treufels, where he suffered for three years, until, in 1115, he was released at the threats and demands of the people. Albert resorted to Cologne, and there received his episcopal ordination at the hands of Otho, bishop of Bamberg, in the presence of Thierri, cardinal-legate. But the city of Mentz soon changed its regard for him, and in 1116 it is said that such a sedition was raised against him that he was obliged to take flight, but was soon restored by his friends. Albert still persevered in his aversion for the emperor, and sought every occasion to injure him, not only with pope Paschal, but also with Gelasius II and Calixtus II, his successors. This roused the spirit of revenge in Henry, and they became exceedingly hostile towards each other. These hostilities were arrested by a diet which was held at Würzburg. Albert assisted (Sept. 8, 1122), with the cardinal-legate Lambert, who was afterwards pope under the name of Honorius II, at the Diet of Worms, where this prince renounced his investitures, but retained the right of conferring the regalia upon prelates. Henry died in 1125, and Albert accordingly called an assembly for the election of a new emperor. The choice was for Lothaire, which was in accordance with the desires of Honorius II and the king of France, and for him Albert worked zealously. Albert died July 14, 1137, and was interred in the abbey of Erbach, which he had founded. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert II, archbishop of MENTZ, was brother of the preceding, and succeeded him in 1138. In 1141 he allowed himself to become involved in the conspiracy of the Saxon nobles, who wished to annul as surreptitious the election of the emperor Conrad, made in 1138. A little later he became reconciled with that prince, and engaged to serve in the crusade which he was then planning and which was carried into effect in 1147. The death of this prelate, which occurred at Erfurt, June 23, 1141, forbade his putting this promise into execution. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert of METZ (Albertus Metensis), a Benedictine of the monastery of St. Symphorien at Metz, lived near the commencement of the 11th century. He wrote historical sketches, which were inserted by Eckart in his Corpus Historicorum Medii Aevi, i, 91-131. These sketches contain important details of the history of Lorraine and of Alsace from 973 to 1025. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, St., a Carmelite of MONTE TRAPANI, was born at Trapani, Sicily, in 1212. Dedicated to the service of God in his infancy, Albert assumed the habit of the Carmelites in the above-mentioned convent, where he subjected himself to great austerity. Receiving a mission to preach, he went to the remotest parts of Sicily, addressing Jews as well as Christians. He died in a solitude near Messina, Aug. 7, 1292, and, according to common opinion, was buried there, in the church of the convent of his order. Part of his relics were taken to the convent at Monte Trapani. He was canonized at Rome about the middle of the 15th century, and his festival is observed Aug. 7. See Baillet, Vies des Saints, Aug. 7.

Albert of PADUA was a monk of the Order of Hermits of St. Augustine in the 14th century. He was a disciple of the celebrated Gillius Romanus at Paris, and taught theology with such reputation that scholars flocked to him from all parts. Boniface VIII called him to Rome; but that pontiff dying very soon after, Albert returned to France, and died at Paris in 1328. He wrote many Sermons (Paris, 1544, 1550), and An Explication of the Gospels for Every Sunday in the Year (Venice, 1476, fol.). Other works of his in MS. are preserved at Padua. See Cave, Historia Literaria.

Albert of SAXONY (Albertus de Saxoniam) was a learned Dominican friar who lived in the first half of the 14th century. According to Lockhant, he studied and sojourned a long time in Paris. The library of Bologna contains a number of MS. commentaries by him upon the Alphonsine tables and the Physics of Aristotle. He also wrote, Magistri Alberti de Saxoniam Tractatus Proportionum cum aliis precipue Augustini Niphi (Venice, 1496). He afterwards prepared an abridgment, entitled De Velocitate Motuum F. Alberti de Saxoniam, Opus Redactum in Epitomen a F. Isidoro de Isolaniis Mediolanensis Ordinis Prædicatorum (Lugd. 1580). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert of STADE (Albertus Stadiensis) was a Benedictine priest of the Cloister of St. Mary at Stade. He was appointed priest in 1232, and made vain efforts, with the concurrence of the pope, to put down the disorders of the monks of his abbey. Being greatly troubled, because the bull which he obtained in 1236 of Gregory XI produced no effect, he entered in 1240 the Order of Franciscans. He became, after Olearius, general, and still lived in 1260. Albert of Stade, who must not be confounded with Albert of Pisa, composed in Latin a Chronicle, embracing the period from the creation of the world down to 1256. This is especially valuable for consultation concerning the occurrences in the north of Germany from 1072 to 1256. Andrew Hoier added a supplement, which comprehends a period of sixty years (Hafnia, 1720). This was published with notes, by Reineccius, under the title Chronicon Alberti Abbatis Stadensis, a Condito Orbe usque ad Auctoris Ætatem, etc. (Helmstädt, 1587). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert of TREVES (Albertus Trevesanus) was priest of the Monastery of St. Matthias at Treves. The monastery was distinguished in the 9th and 10th centuries for its precepts and its learned masters. Albert died in 980. He wrote, in verse and in prose, instructions for the young priests; and added the history of his time to the history of Treves, which he entitled Gesta Treverorum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, Charles, a German Reformed minister, was born at Whitehall, Lehigh Co., Pa., in 1824. He graduated at Mercersburg in 1848; was ordained to the work of the ministry in 1852 by the Classis of North Carolina, where he acted as president of Catawba College for some time. He finally came North; passed over to the Episcopal Church; and died in Texas in 1869. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 499.

Albert, Charles H., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the Missionary Diocese of Arkansas and Indian Territory, entered the ministry about 1854. In 1857 he was minister in Marshall, Tex.; the following year resided in Matagorda, Tex.; in 1860 became rector of St. John's Church, Camden, N. J.; the following year he had charge of St. Mark's Church, LaSalle, Ill.; in 1862 officiated in St. Paul's Church, Peru, N. Y.; in 1864 was rector of St. Paul's, Kankakee, Ill.; in 1866 officiated at Batesville, Ark., and remained in this mission-field until his death, which occurred in 1868. See Prot. Epis. Almanac, 1869, p. 109.

Albert, Crantz, a German ecclesiastic, was born at Hamburg. He took his doctor's degree in 1490; and became dean of that cathedral and professor. He earnestly desired a reformation in the Church; and when he heard of Luther's intention to set it on foot, advised him as follows: "Go, my brother, into your cell, and say Miserere mei, Deus!" He died at Hamburg in 1517, leaving Metropolis; or, An Ecclesiastical History of the Churches of Germany from 780 to 1504 (Basle, 1548; Cologne, 1574, 8vo; Frankf. 1576, 1590):—thirteen books on the History of the Vandals (Frankf. 1575):—a Chronicle of the Other Northern Nations, viz. Sweden, Denmark, Norway, etc. (Strasb. 1546; with additions by Wolfus, Frankf. 1575). All these have been inserted in the Index of Prohibited Works. There is also a small work on the Office of the Mass (Rostock). See Cave, Hist. Lit.

Albert, Erasmus, a Lutheran divine of Germany, was born at Wetterau (or, according to some, at a small village near Frankfort-on-the-Main) at the close of the 15th century. He studied divinity, and became one of the most zealous adherents of Luther. For a time he was preacher to Joachim II, elector of Brandenburg; but, on a dispute respecting the revenues of the clergy, he lost that situation, and travelled in the interest of the doctrines of the Reformation. In 1548 he was a preacher of Magdeburg; but the Interim proposed by Charles V obliged him to leave that place and reside in a private station at Hamburg. He was afterwards appointed superintendent-general of New Brandenburg, in Mecklenburg, where he died, May 1, 1553. He published the Alcoran of the Cordeliers, collected from the book written by Albizzi in the Conformities of St. Francis with Jesus Christ (in German, 1531; in Latin, Wittenberg, 1542-44). Luther honored it with a preface, and Conrad Baudius augmented it with a second book, translated into French (1556, 12mo; Geneva, 1560, 2 vols. 12mo). The last edition of this satirical work is that of Amsterdam (1734, 3 vols. 12mo). There is also of this author, Judicium de Spongia Erasmi Roterodami:—and the Book of Wisdom and Virtue (Frankf. 1579, 8vo), in German verse. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, Franz, professor of theology at Hamburg, Germany, flourished in the 15th century. He wrote a History of Saxony and the Vandals:—a Chronicle from Charlemagne to 1504. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albert, Jan, a Carmelite monk of Haarlem, Holland, died at Mechlin in 1496, leaving, among other works, a Commentary on the First Epistle of John:—an Explication of the Book of Ecclesiastes:—Sermons:—and Questions on the Master of the Sentences.

Albert, John E., a German Reformed minister, was born in the latter part of the 18th century. He was licensed to preach, probably, during the year 1818; was ordained in 1820, and had charge of three congregations in Pennsylvania. On account of ill-health he resigned his charge in 1832; after which time he lived in retirement at the York Springs, Adams Co., where he died in 1856. He was a very pious man. "The service he rendered his Master must have been a cheerful and pleasant one, since he always, until the day of his death, spoke of the ministry as a subject very dear to his recollection." See Harbaugh, Fathers of the Germ. Ref. Church, iv, 122.

Albert, Pierre Antoine, a Huguenot minister, was born of a highly respectable family in 1765, at Lausanne, Switzerland. In 1796 he became pastor of the French Protestant Church in New York. The history of that Church is full of interest. The Revocation of the Edict of Nantes brought to the New World a large number of refugees, many of whom settled in New York. There were about two hundred families of these Huguenots, and they were among the most influential in the city. In process of time there was built for their use a commodious chapel on Pine Street, to which they gave the name L'Eglise du Saint-Esprit—The Church of the Holy Ghost. It was the custom of the minister, at the close of the public services, always to say "Remember ye the poor," when old and young dropped their benefactions into the poor-box behind the church doors. For one hundred and thirty years the French Protestants used the forms of religious worship to which their fathers had been accustomed in the public services of the Reformed churches of France and Geneva. In 1804 they became Episcopalians. Of this Church Mr. Albert was rector for nine years (1797-1806). He is said to have been "an accomplished gentleman, an erudite scholar, a profound theologian, and a most eloquent preacher. A stranger, of unobtrusive manners and invincible modesty, he led a very retired life. His worth, however, could not be concealed. He was esteemed and beloved by all his acquaintances." See Disosway, Huguenots in America, in Smiles's Huguenots, p. 433; Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Alberti, Albert, a learned Italian Jesuit, was born at Trent, Feb. 2, 1593. He studied at Padua, and distinguished himself by his controversies with the celebrated Scioppi, whom he silenced, and who died of chagrin because of his defeat. Alberti died at Milan, May 3, 1676. His principal works are, Generales Vindicie adversus Famosos Gasp. Scioppi Libellos (Lucca, 1649):—Lydius Lapis Ingenii (ibid. 1647):—Liber contra Sultationes et Choreas (1650):—Actio in Eloquentia tum Profana cum Sacrae Corruptores (Milan, 1651). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberti, Cherubino, a distinguished Italian painter and engraver, was born at Borgo San Sepolcro in 1552. It is probable that he was a scholar of Cornelius Cort; and afterwards acquired a freer style by studying the works of Francesco Villamena and Agostino Caracci. He was far more distinguished as an engraver than as a painter; and executed 180 prints, 75 of which are from his own designs. He died at Rome in 1615. Some of his most important works are, Portrait of Pope Gregory XIII:—The Flight into Egypt (in 1574):—The Holy Family, with St. Elizabeth (dated 1571):—The Body of Christ Supported in the Clouds by Angels:—The Virgin Mary and Infant in the Clouds, inscribed "Regina Cœli":—Mary Magdalene, Penitent (dated 1582):—The Crucifixion:—St. Andrew Bearing the Cross:—Christ Praying in the Garden:—and many others of value.

Alberti, Durante, an Italian painter, was born at Borgo San Sepolcro in 1588. He visited Rome when quite young, and gained eminence by some works he executed for the churches and other public edifices. There are some of his works in several of the Roman churches. In the Church of San Girolamo della Carità, one of the chapels is entirely painted by him in fresco. In the Church of Santa Maria de' Monti he painted The Annunciation. His portrait is in the Academy of St. Luke. He died in 1613, and was buried in the Chiesa del Popolo, his funeral being attended by all the principal artists of Rome.

Alberti, Georg Wilhelm, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1723 at Osterode. After having completed his studies at Göttingen, and having received the degree of magister in 1745 by presenting a dissertation De Imputabilitate Somni, he spent several years in England, where he studied its ecclesiastical and literary affairs and the history of the English sects. The result of his studies he published in his Aufrichtige Nachrichten von der Religion, etc. (Hanover, 1750), and Briefe über den Zustand der Religion und Wissenschaften in Grossbritannien (ibid. 1752-54, 4 pts.). He died Sept. 3, 1758, as pastor in Tündern, Hanover. A list of his writings he gives in the last volume of his Briefe; besides, he is said to have published, in England and in the English language, a work against Hume under the pseudonym of Alethophilus Gottingensis (1747). See Schröckh, Kirchengesch. seit d. Ref. ix, 425; Weingarten, Revolutionskirchen Englands, p. 5; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Alberti, Giovanni Andrea, a celebrated preacher of Nice, was born in 1611, and entered the Society of Jesus in 1628. He was professor of eloquence. He died of the plague at Genoa, July 4, 1657. He wrote, Le Querele della Pietà (Torino, 1640):—an oration delivered on the death of Anthony Provana, archbishop of Turin:—Il Museo Riformato nel Collegio di Genova della Compagnia di Gesù (Genoa, 1640):—Oratio Panegyrica de Venerabili P. Camillo de Lellis, Fundatore Ministrorum Infirmitas (Genue, 1647):—Il Sole Ligure; a discourse addressed to J. B. Lercaro, accompanying a eulogy on his family entitled Lercariorum Elogia (Genoa, 1644):—Adelaide, Istoria Panegirica (ibid. 1649):—Eneade, Panegirica detta a San Francesco Saverio (Boiogna, 1650):—L'Impieta Flagellata dal Santo Zelo d'Elia (Genova, 1655):—Vite ac Elogia XII Patrum Fundatorum Ordinum (Taurini, 1638):—Zeopiste, ovvero Vita di Paola Maria di Gesù Centuriona, Carmelitana Scalza (ibid. 1648). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alberti, Giovanni Battista, an Italian of Savona, was one of the regular clergy called Somaschians. He died about 1660, leaving, among other works, Lib. III de Vita et Rebus Gestis S. Majoli (Genoa, 1638, 8vo):—Lib. IV de Apparitione Virginis Misericordie Savonensis et de Imaginibus ejusdem (ibid. 1642):—Apes Lili (Tortona, 1646).

Alberti, Heinrich, a Lutheran hymn-writer and musician, was born at Lobenstein, in Prussia, June 28, 1604. He was intended for the legal profession, and was to have studied for that purpose at Leipsic, but he gave the preference to music, to which he devoted the energies of his life. At Dresden and Königsberg he cultivated his chosen art, and at the latter place became, in 1631, organist of the cathedral. One of his principal friends was Simon Dach, the eminent musician and hymn-writer. Alberti composed many beautiful tunes for Dach's hymns, as well as for his own and others. The piety that shines forth in his hymns shed its sunlight first on his own heart. He died Oct. 6, 1668. Albert Knapp calls him "an excellent musician for the times in which he lived, and a good poet." He is the author of the excellent hymn Goit des Himmels und der Erden (Engl. transl. in Lyra Germ. i, 213: "God who madest earth and heaven"), to which Alberti himself composed the cheerful tune that is still used in Germany. It is related that in 1685 a tailor at work in the house of a Jew at Hamburg, through singing this famous hymn, and especially the third verse—

"Let the night of sin depart,
As this earthly night hath fled.
Jesus, take me to thy heart;
In the blood that thou hast shed
Is my hope and help alone
For the evil I have done"— was the means of leading the daughter of the Jew to make inquiries about Christ, which resulted in her believing in him. See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, iii, 191 sq., 257 sq. (B. P.)

Alberti, Johann, a German lawyer and scholar of the 16th century, was born at Widmanstadt, and became deeply versed in the Oriental languages. He died in 1559. He published an abridgment of the Koran, with critical notes (1543, 4to), which procured him the title of chancellor of Austria and chevalier of St. James; and a New Testament in Syriac, from a manuscript used by the Jacobites, at the expense of Ferdinand I (1556, 4to). It contains neither the second epistle of Peter, nor the second and third of John, nor Jude, nor the Apocalypse. Only one thousand copies were printed. He also composed a Syriac grammar. See Moréri; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Alberti, Julius Gustav, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Hanover, Aug. 16, 1723. He studied at Göttingen, was appointed in 1753 pastor at Grossenschnen, in 1755 pastor of St. Catherine's at Hamburg, where he died March 30, 1772. His main work is his Anleitung zum Gespräch über die Religion (Hamburg, 1772), which has been republished very often. See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 5 sq. (B. P.)

Alberti, Leone Battista, an Italian ecclesiastic and artist, was born at Florence about 1400. In order to have leisure to pursue his studies, he entered orders; he was canon of the metropolitan Church of Florence in 1447, and abbé of San Savino or of Sant' Eremita di Pisa. Alberti, although known as a scholar, a painter, a sculptor, and an architect, it is to his works of architecture that he owes his principal fame. Among his works are, the completion of the Pitti Palace, Florence; the chapel of the Ruccellai, in the Church of St. Pancras; the façade of the Church of Santa Maria Novella, and the choir of the Church of Nunziata; the churches of St. Sebastian and St. Andrew, Mantua. But his principal work is generally acknowledged to be the Church of St. Francis at Rimini. Of his writings, those on the arts are in the highest estimation, and he derives the most of his reputation from his treatise on architecture, De Re Edificatoria, published after his death (1485, 10 books; last ed. Bologna, 1782, fol.). See Life prefixed to Leoni's Architecture; Vasari, Life; Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Roscoe, Lorenzo de' Medici.

Alberti, Luigi, an Italian theologian, was born at Padua in 1560. He became a monk of St. Augustine, and professor of theology in his native place. He died at Paris in 1628. He published a number of Latin treatises, among which are, The Life of St. Nicholas of Tolentino (Padua, 1610):—De Reali Presentia Christi in Euch. Sac. (1613):—De Terrestri Paradiso (1619):—Life of St. Clara de Monte-Falco:—Lectiones quedam de Operibus VI Dierum (1629):—Lib. de Prædestinatione et Reprobatione (Ven. 1623).

Alberti, Niccolò, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Palermo, Dec. 20, 1652, and entered at an early age the ecclesiastical state. He was soon distinguished for his learning and piety. He died at Palermo, Oct. 16, 1707, after the most intense suffering. His Life has been written by Mongitore. He left several works in Italian, some of which have been published, especially Commentarij Sacro-istorici della Vita, Dottrina, e Miracoli di Gesù Cristo (Palermo, 1703; Venice, 1716):—La Terra de' Viventi Scoperta a' Mortali, cioè lo Stato de' Beati in Paradiso (ibid. 1709):—Offerte Fervorose al SS. Crocifisso, e Maria Immacolata (ibid. 1713, 1714). See Mazzuchelli, Scrittori d'Italia. (B. P.)

Alberti, Paul Martin, a Lutheran theologian, was born May 10, 1666. He studied at Jena, in 1691 was pastor at Nidernhall, and died July 3, 1729, as archdeacon at Heersbruck. He wrote Porta Lingua Sanctæ, h. e. Lexicon Novum Hebræo-Latino-Biblicum (Bautzen, 1704). See Wills, Nürnberg Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Alberti, Valentin, a Lutheran theologian, was born at Lehna, in Silesia, Dec. 15, 1635. He studied at Leipsic, where he also lectured in the philosophical and theological faculty. In 1678 he was promoted as doctor of theology. He died at Leipsic, Sept. 19, 1697. His writings are very numerous. His doctrinal position was that of the orthodox Lutheran Church, and from that point he wrote alike against Pietism and Roman Catholicism. A memoir of Alberti and a catalogue of his writings are given by Pipping, Mem. Theol. p. 669. See Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Albertinelli, MARIOTTO, an Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1475. He is said to have been the disciple and friend of Fra Bartolomeo di San Marco, whose style he followed, and whose merit he nearly approached. He was of a very jealous and unhappy disposition. Once, upon hearing an unfavorable criticism on his work, he abandoned the art for some time, but returned to it some years after. His works are almost wholly upon sacred subjects. Several of them are in the churches and convents of Rome, Florence, and Viterbo. In the Church of San Silvestro a Monte Cavallo is a picture by him of The Virgin and Infant on the Throne, with S. Domenico and S. Caterina da Siena. He died in 1520.

Albertini, Francesco (1), an ecclesiastic of Florence, Italy, who flourished in the beginning of the 16th century. He was an able antiquarian, and published, De Mirabilibus Novæ et Veteris Urbis Romæ (Rome, 1505, 4to; 1510, 1515, 1519, 1520), three books, and dedicated to Julius II.:—Tractatus Brevis de Laudibus Florentiæ et Suanæ (1509):—Memoriale di Molle Statue (Florence, 1510, 4to), etc.

Albertini, Francesco (2), a Jesuit of Cantazaro, in Calabria; died in 1619. He left, besides other works, Corollaria Theologica ex Principiis Philosophicis Deducta (Naples, 1606, 1610, 2 vols. fol.).

Albertini, Giorgio Francesco, an Italian theologian, was born Feb. 29, 1732, at Parenzo. He studied at Venice, entered the Order of St. Dominic, distinguished himself for his talent as a preacher, and was appointed professor of dogmatics in the College of the Propaganda at Rome. He wrote, Elementi di Lingua Latina (Venice, 1782):—Dissertazione dell' Indissolubilità del Matrimonio (ibid. 1792):—Piano Geometrico e Scritturale (ibid. 1797):—Acroasi ossia la Somma di Lezioni Teologiche (Padua, 1798; Venice, 1800). See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Albertini, Paolo, a celebrated divine and politician of Venice, was born in that city in 1430. He entered the religious order of Servites at the age of ten years, and made profession for ten years. Afterwards he taught philosophy, became a popular preacher, and was employed by the Republic of Venice in many affairs of state, being sent as ambassador to Turkey. He died in 1475, leaving several works in Latin: *On the Knowledge of God:—History of the Servites:—*and other theological subjects. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albertino, Arnaldo, an Italian prelate of Majorca. He was first canon of the Church of Majorca; then apostolic inquisitor of the kingdoms of Valencia and Sicily; and, finally, bishop of Paces, in Sicily. He died Oct. 7, 1545. He wrote, Tractatus sive Questio de Secreto quando Debeat aut non Debeat Revelari (Valencia, 1534):—Tractatus de Agnoscenda Assertionibus Catholicis et Hæreticis (Panormi, 1533; Venetiis, 1571). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albertis, DE. See ALBERTI.

Albertrandý, JAN CHRZCIEL (or John Christian), a Polish bishop and scholar, was born at Warsaw in 1731. He was educated entirely under the care of the Jesuits, and joined their society at the age of fifteen. He was sent as public tutor to the College of Pultusk at the age of nineteen; and subsequently held the same office at Plovsko, Nieswicz, and Wilna. In 1760 he was appointed librarian of the collection opened to the public by bishop Zaluski. He was for several years the instructor of count Felix Lubinski, during which time he became one of the first numismatists of his age. Having become keeper of medals and librarian to king Stanislaus, he was sent to Italy in 1782, and subsequently to Sweden, to collect material for a history of Poland. The result was a valuable collection of MSS., almost two hundred in number. As a reward for these services the king presented him with a medal, the cross of the Order of St. Stanislaus, and made him bishop of Zenopolis. When seventy years of age he was called to preside over the newly founded Royal Society of the Friends of Science of Warsaw; and he continued to direct its operations until his death, Aug. 10, 1808. See Knight, Eng. Cyclop. of Biog. s. v.; also Biog. Dict. of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albi, COUNCIL of (Concilium Albiense). Albi, or Alby, is a town of France, capital of the department of Tarn, situated on the river Tarn; and was the place whence the Albigenses derived their name.

A council was held there in 1254 by order of St. Louis, who had lately returned from the Holy Land. Bishops from the provinces of Narbonne, Bourges, and Bordeaux attended; Zoen, bishop of Avignon, presiding. Seventy-one canons were published; part of them relate to the extirpation of heresy, and part to the reformation of the clergy, etc. The first twenty-eight are taken from the canons of Toulouse in 1229.

1. Orders that persons be duly appointed to search after heretics.

2. Grants a silver mark to every one taking a heretic.

5. Deprives of their land persons who allow heretics to harbor there.

6. Orders the destruction of the houses of heretics.

11, 12. Enact that all persons arrived at the age of puberty shall abjure heresy, and take an oath of fidelity to the Roman Church.

13. Orders that all boys above seven years of age shall be brought to Church by their parents, to be instructed by the curate in the Catholic faith, and to be taught the Creed, Pater Noster, and Salutation of the Blessed Virgin.

21-23. Relate to the papers, etc., of the Inquisition.

24. Orders the construction of prisons for the condemned heretics, where they shall be detained and supported (as the bishop shall direct) out of their confiscated property.

25. Orders that the bones of those who have died in heresy, and have been buried, shall be taken up and publicly burned.

29. Renews the canon "Omnes utriusque sexus."

31-36. Relate to excommunication.

37. Orders that every will shall be made in the presence of a priest.

41. Forbids to harbor any suspicious woman within the precincts of the Church.

42. Orders silver chalices to be used in all churches of which the revenues amount to fifteen livres tournois.

43. Forbids clerks to gamble; orders them to have their hair so cut all around as to leave the ears altogether uncovered.

50, 51. Forbid them to hunt, hawk, and tilt, in game, with shield and lance.

55. Orders two regular canons, at least, in every prison.

64, 65. Provide that all Jews shall have a distinctive dress, and shall constantly wear a large wheel figured on their breast.

66-70. Of Jews.

See Labbe, Concil. xi, 720.

Albi, Henri, a French Jesuit, was born at Bollène, in Comtat-Venaissin, in 1590. At the age of sixteen he entered the Order of Jesuits; and, after studying languages for seven years, he studied divinity, which he afterwards taught, together with philosophy, for twelve years. He was afterwards successively rector of the colleges of Avignon, Arles, Grenoble, and Lyons. He died at Arles, Oct. 6, 1659. He wrote, Vie de St. Gabin, Martyr (Lyons, 1624, 12mo):—Vie de St. Pierre de Luxembourg (ibid. 1626, 12mo):—Vie de la Mère Jeanne de Jésus [Foundress of the Augustine Nuns] (Paris, 1640, 12mo):—Vie de Sœur Catharine de Vanini (Lyons, 1665, 12mo):—Eloges Historiques des Cardinaux Français et Étrangers mis en Parallèles (Paris, 1644):—Anti-Théophile Paroissial (Lyons, 1649, 12mo):—L'Histoire des Cardinaux Illustres qui ont été employés dans les Affaires d'État (1653):—and others. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albi (or Alba), Juan de, a Spanish Carthusian, had a great reputation, in the 16th century, for piety and learning. After acquiring a sound knowledge of theology, and great proficiency in the Oriental languages, especially Hebrew, he took the monastic habit in the Carthusian monastery called The Valley of Jesus Christ, near Segovia, where he died, Dec. 27, 1591. He left, among many other works on Holy Scripture, Sa- crarum Simioseon Animadversionum et Electorum ex Utriusque Testamenti Lectione Commentarius et Centuria (printed at his monastery, 1610). Le Mire speaks of another of his writings, Selectæ Annotationes et Expositiones in Varia Utriusque Testamenti Difficilia Loca (1613). See Le Mire, De Script. Sæc. XVI; Antonio, Biblioth. Script. Hisp.

Albicus, SIGISMUND, archbishop of Prague, was born at Mährisch-Neustadt, in Moravia. When young he entered the University of Prague, taking his degree in medicine in 1387. In order to prosecute with more success the study of civil and canon law, he went to Italy, and received his doctor's degree at Padua in 1404. Returning, he taught medicine in the University of Prague for nearly twenty years, and was appointed first physician to Wenceslaus IV. In 1409, on the death of the archbishop of Prague, Wenceslaus recommended him for his successor; and the canons elected him, although reluctantly. He resigned his bishopric in 1413, when Conrad was chosen in his room. Albicus afterwards received the priory of Wissehrad, with the title of archbishop of Cesarea. He was accused of favoring the new doctrines of John Huss and Wycliffe. During the war of the Hussites he retired to Hungary, where he died, in 1427. His only works are on medical subjects. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albin, a Scottish bishop, was elected to the see of Brechin, Oct. 10, 1248, where he continued until 1260, when he was appointed judge in a controversy between Archibald, bishop of Moray, and some of the canons of that see. He died in 1269. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 159.

Albinus is the name of two saints mentioned in the old Roman martyrologies; one a bishop and confessor commemorated March 1, the other a martyr commemorated June 21.

Albinus, priest of the Convent of the Augustinians at Canterbury, was versed in the ancient languages, and very learned for his time. He died in 732. He assisted Bede in the composition of his Historia Ecclesiastica. The letter from Bede thanking Albinus for his assistance is still preserved. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albinus (St.) DE BOSCO. See AUBIN DES BOIS.

Albinus, JOHANN GEORG, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Nessa, March 6, 1624. He studied at Leipsic; was in 1653 appointed rector of the cathedral school at Naumburg; in 1657 he received the pastorate of St. Othmar; and died there May 25, 1679. Albinus composed a number of hymns, which are still used in Germany. One of these, Straf' mich nicht in deinem Zorn, has been translated into English by Jacobi in his Psalmodia Germanica, i, 63: "Lord, withdraw the dreadful storm." See Koch, Gesch. d. deutsch. Kirchenliedes, iii, 392 sq. (B. P.)

Albius, THOMAS. See WHITE, THOMAS.

Albizzi (or Albici), FRANCESCO, an advocate of Cesena, Italy, who, on account of the ill-usage he had received from a client whose cause he lost, returned to Rome. Here he became closely connected with the Jesuits; and, through their interest, became secretary to certain prelates, and afterwards to the pope himself. He drew up the celebrated bull of Urban VIII (q. v.) against the Augustinus of Jansenius, in the famous question of the Five Propositions. He died in 1684, leaving a Treatise on the Jurisdiction of the Cardinals in the Titular Church of Rome (Rome, 1668).

Albo, JOSEPH, a learned Spanish rabbi of Soria, in Old Castile, was born about 1380, and died about 1444. He is known as one of the Jewish disputants in the conference with Jerome de Santa Fé, which took place at Tortosa, between Feb. 7, 1413, and Nov. 12, 1414, under the presidency of Pedro de Luna (afterwards pope Benedict XIII.). Albo, who in the Branch of David (צמח דוד) is styled "the divine philosopher," published in 1425 his ס' נקריים, The Book of Principles (of Jewish faith), a philosophical view of the theology of Judaism, divided into three parts. The first speaks of the existence of God, the second of revelation, and the third of reward and punishment. According to Albo, "the belief in the resurrection of the dead is an article of faith incumbent on the Jews and accepted according to the national tradition, although its denial was not held by him as a rejection of the law of Moses." The Sepher Ikkarim is written in difficult Rabbinical Hebrew, and has been carefully explained by annotations in the Ohel Jacob (זהל יעקב) of Jacob ben-Samuel (Freiburg, 1584; Cracow, 1594); also in the Ets Shathul (עץ שחול) of Gedalia Lûpschütz, with the text (Venice, 1618; Lemberg, 1861), and in Historische Einleitung zu Albo's Ikkarim, by L. Schlesinger (Frankfort, 1844). A Latin translation was made by Genebrard (Paris, 1566), wherein he answers Albo's attacks upon Christianity. See Fürst, *Bibl. Al-Borak (lightning) is the name of the white horse on which Mohammed pretended to have ridden in his celebrated journey from Mecca to Jerusalem. The prophet claims to have made this journey in the twelfth year of his mission, and to have been carried from Jerusalem to the highest heavens in one night. He was accompanied by the angel Gabriel, holding the bridle of Al-Borak on which Mohammed was mounted. This horse is held in high repute by the Mohammedan doctors, some of whom teach that Abraham, Ishmael, and several of the prophets made use of him; that, having been unemployed from the time of Jesus Christ to that of Mohammed, he had become restive, and would not allow any one to mount him unless Gabriel sat behind the rider. Others affirm that Mohammed had the sole privilege of training this horse at first, and that he intends to mount him again at the general resurrection. See MOHAMMED.

Albornos, GILLES ALVARES CARILLO, an eminent Spanish cardinal and statesman of the 14th century, was born at Cuenca, and educated at Toulouse. Alfonso XI appointed him almoner of his court; afterwards archdeacon of Calatrava; and finally, although then very young, archbishop of Toledo. In return for his bravery in saving the king's life at the battle of Tarifa, the king knighted him, and in 1343 gave him the command of the siege of Algezara. Falling under the displeasure of Peter the Cruel, he fled to Avignon, where Clement VI admitted him to his Council and made him a cardinal, upon which he resigned his archbishopric. Innocent VI, Clement's successor, sent him to Italy in 1353, as pope's legate and general, to reconquer the ecclesiastical states which had revolted from the popes during their residence at Avignon. He was recalled in 1357, but was again reappointed, and succeeded in establishing the temporal power of the papacy in these states. For many years he was a very popular minister of state, giving to Bologna a new constitution, and founding there the magnificent college. At length he announced to pope Urban V that he might enter Rome, and received him with great pomp at Viterbo. He then accompanied Urban to Rome, but returned to Viterbo, where he died, Aug. 24, 1367. His body was removed to Toledo, at his own request, and buried with great pomp. He wrote a book, On the Constitutions of the Roman Church (Jesi, 1475, very rare). His political life, Histo- riu de Bello Administratio in Italia per Annos XV, et Confecto ab Æg. Albornoto, was written by Sepulveda (Bologna, 1623, fol.). See Biographie Universelle, s. v.

Albrecht, Christian, a Protestant missionary, was a native of Suabia, and was sent into Southern Africa by the Missionary Society of London. He arrived at Cape Town Jan. 19, 1805, and explored, with other missionaries, the savage country in order to preach Christianity. After having founded the establishment Warn-Bath, he returned, in May, 1810, to the Cape, and there married a Dutch lady, who accompanied him to Warn-Bath. His establishment was devastated by an African chief. He afterwards collected the remains of his colony at Pella, to the south of the Orange River. He died at Cape Town, July 25, 1815. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albrecht, Georg, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Aug. 1, 1601, at Pilsn, near Neuburg. He studied at Tübingen and Strasburg; was at first deacon at Augsburg; and when he had to leave the place, on account of his religion, he went to Gaildorf; and afterwards as superintendent to Nördlingen, where he died, Nov. 21, 1647. He wrote, Erklärung der Passion nach den vier Evangelien (Ulm, 1650), in sixty-four sermons;—Meletemata Festiva (Frankfurt, 1660);—Hierarchia (Economica) (Nuremberg, 1671);—Anti-Bellarminus Biblicus (Nördlingen, 1683), etc. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Witte, Memorie Theologorum. (B. P.)

Albrecht, Johann, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Hildesheim, Sept. 24, 1644. He studied at Helmstädt and Jena; was in 1668 pastor of St. Paul's in his native place; in 1689 pastor of St. Andrew's there; and died May 13, 1691. He wrote, Dissertatio de Forma Judiciorum in Republica Recte Instituenda (Helmstädt, 1666);—Discussio Præcipuorum Fidei Capitum inter Protestantas et Pontificios Controversarum, Disputationibus II Comprehensa (ibid. 1667);—Christliche Passions-Andachten (Hildesheim, 1674). See Lauenstein, Hildesheim. Kirchen-Historie, ii, 158; vii, 21 sq. (B. P.)

Albric (Albericus, or Alfricius), an English philosopher and physician, was born in London about 1080 or (according to others) 1220. He is said to have studied at Oxford and Cambridge; and to have travelled for improvement. He had the reputation of a great philosopher, an able physician, and was well versed in general literature. Bale, in his Third Century, has enumerated the following works of Albric: De Origine Deorum;—De Ratione Veneni;—Virtutes Antiquorum;—Canones Speculativi. The full title of the third work is Summa de Virtutibus Antiquorum Principum, et Philosophorum, and it is still extant in the library of Worcester Cathedral. The same library contains a work by Albric entitled Mythologia. None of these works have been printed. In the Mythographi Latini (Amsterdam, 1681, 2 vols. 12mo) is a small treatise, De Deorum Imaginibus, written by a person of the same name; but it is doubtful whether this is not Albricus, bishop of Utrecht, in the 8th century. See Biog. Universelle, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Albright, Alexander, count de Hirschfeld, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was a native of the Duchy of Oldenburg, Germany, and descended from a very noble family. Concerning the date of his birth and his early life, we have no source of information. He graduated at the military school at Eutin, in Holstein; and in 1840 entered the army of his native state with the rank of lieutenant. Three years later he entered the Austrian army with the rank of captain; and in 1858 emigrated to America. Three years after his arrival he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in Missouri. In due time he became a member of the Missouri Conference; and in 1871 he was transferred to the Texas Conference, and given charge of the German mission in Galveston. Two years later, his health failing, he applied for and obtained the position of professor of German literature at the Texas University; but increased debility forbade his entering upon his professorship, and caused his death at Georgetown, Texas, March 2, 1875. As a man Mr. Albright was austere—the result of his military training. Ostensibly there was little of the winsome and affable in his composition; but within that coarse exterior there beat an affectionate heart. He walked with God, loved his Bible, prayed much, and was full of hope and faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1875, p. 269.

Albright, Anne, a Christian martyr, was one of seven who suffered martyrdom, by burning, at Smithfield, Jan. 31, 1556, for her faithful adherence to the Gospel. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 750.

Albunea, in Roman mythology, was a nymph whose spring lay near Tibur. Numerous sacrifices were offered to her. Some designate her as the tenth Sibyl. Ruins of her temple still exist in the vicinity of Tivoli.

Alburnus, a god revered on a mountain of the same name in Lucania.

Albus, a name given by Sidonius Apollinaris to the catalogue, or roll, in which the names of all the clergy were enrolled at an early period of the Christian Church. See CANON, ECCLESIASTICAL.

Alcalá (de Henares), COUNCILS OF (Concilium Complutense). Several councils have been held here, viz.:

- I. In 1325, on the lives and moral behavior of clerks.
- II. Held in 1326 by Juan of Arragon, archbishop of Toledo and primate of Spain. Three bishops and three deputies were present. Two canons only were published.

1. On the consecration of suffragans.
2. On the defence of the rights and property of the Church.

III. Held in 1333 on discipline.

IV. In 1379 on schism. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; id. Manual of Councils, s. v.

Alcalá, PEDRO DE, a Spanish friar, was sent in 1491, by Ferdinand and Isabella, to Granada, to labor for the conversion of the Moors. He wrote an Arabic grammar, entitled Arte para Saber la Lingua Árabeiga, ó Vocabulista Árabeiga en Lingua Castellana (Granada, 1505). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alcantara, PEDRO DE. See PETER OF ALCANTARA.

Alcazar, Bartolomeo, a Spanish Jesuit, who flourished about 1700, wrote the historic annals of the Society of Jesuits in the province of Toledo, under the title Crono-historia de la Compañia de Jesus en la Provincia de Toledo, y Elogios de sus Varones Ilustres, Fundadores, Bienhechores, Fautores, é Hijos Espirituales (Madrid, 1710). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alcazar, Luis de, a Spanish Jesuit, was born in 1554 at Seville. He was for twenty years professor of theology at Cordova and Seville, and died at the latter place, June 16, 1613. He is known as the author of Vestigatio Arcani Sensus in Apocalypsi (Antw. 1604 and often);—De Sacris Ponderibus et Mensuris (published together with his Vestigatio in 1619);—In ens Partes Veteris Testamenti quas Respicit Apocalypsis, nempe Cantica Cantecorum, Psalmos Complures, nulla Danielis, aliorumque Librorum Capita, Libri V; cum Opusculo de Malis Medicis (Lyons, 1631). Alcè, in Greek mythology, was the daughter of Cybele and Olympus.

Alcedo (or Alzedo), MAURICIO DE, a native of the valley of Sopuerta, in Biscaya, was prothonotary and judge-apostolical, etc., in the early part of the 17th century. He was the author of De Excellentia Episcopalis Dignitatis deque Ecclesie Regenda, Visitanda, Administranda: necnon de Generalis Vicarii Auctoritate et Muneribus (Lyons, 1630, 4to). See Antonio, Biblioth. Script. Hisp. ii, 95.

Alcensia, NICOLAUS, a German Carmelite, lived about 1495, and left some Sermons:—a Commentary on Exodus:—and On the Apocalypse. See Trithemius, De Script. Eccles.

Alcester, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Alnense), in A.D. 709, was an imaginary council, resting solely on the legendary life of Egwin, bishop of Worcester, and founder of Evesham Abbey, by Brihtwald of Worcester (or Glastonbury). It was said to have been held to confirm the grants made to Evesham (Wilkins, i, 72, 73; Mansi, xii, 182-189). Wilfrid of York, said to have been at the council, died June 23, 709.

Alcestis, in Greek legend, was the daughter of Pelias and Anaxibia. She was the only daughter of this king that did not take part in the murder of her father. She was married to Admetus, king of Pheræ, and because of her childlike and sacrificing love she has become the wonder of all ages. Admetus was the friend of Apollo, who promised to save the king on condition that some one would sacrifice himself for him. When Admetus therefore became sick, Alcestis, who had heard of Apollo's condition for the king's recovery, offered herself as a sacrifice, and the king recovered. Hercules liberated the faithful wife from the bonds of Hades.

Alchardus. See ALHEARD.

Alcher, a friar of Cîteaux, in France, lived in the 12th century. Certain writings of Alcher on religious subjects have been published in the works of Augustine, of Hugo de St. Victor, and in Tissier, Biblioth. Cisterciensium. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alchmund (Alhmund, or Alkmund), the Saxon martyr, is commemorated March 19. Of him we have little trustworthy information; but, according to hagiographers, he was the son of Alcred, king of Northumbria, who was put to death, as recorded by Simeon of Durham, in A.D. 800, by the servants of Eardulf. He was early an object of veneration, for a church at Shrewsbury was founded under his dedication by Ethelfleda, daughter of Alfred. According to tradition (Albert Butler, from a MS. sermon in his possession), Alchmund's remains were first buried at Lilleshull, and thence translated to Derby. Several churches in Derbyshire and Shropshire are dedicated to St. Alchmund. See Acta SS. Bolland. March 3, p. 47.

Alchmund is likewise the name of several Saxon prelates.

1. (Alkmund or Ealhmund.) The ninth bishop of Hexham, consecrated April 24, A.D. 767, with archbishop Ethelbert of York. An account of his translation and the miracles attributed to him is given by Ailred of Rievaulx in his Hist. of the Saints of Hexham. See Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. Sanct. Bened. iii, i, 214.

2. The thirteenth bishop of Westchester. He attended the Council of Clovesho, in A.D. 803, with four abbots and two priests. His name is attached to several charters from 802 to 805.

3. An abbot of this name attended the Council of Clovesho among the clergy of the diocese of Leicester. He was evidently a person of mark, for he was present at the legate council of A.D. 787, and attested charters of Offa and Kenulf of Mercia from 789 to 803. See Spelman, Concil. i, 301, 325.

Alciati, Giovanni Paolo, an Italian theological disputant, lived near the middle of the 16th century.

He was a native of Piedmont, and abjured Catholicism in order to unite with the Protestant Church. He set forth the new doctrines upon the mystery of the Trinity, and formed a new party not less odious to the Protestants than to the Catholics. Alciati commenced his innovations at Geneva in concert with a physician named Blandrata and an advocate named Gribaud, with whom Valentine Gentilis associated himself. Their efforts here met with so much opposition that they retired to Poland, where Blandrata and Alciati scattered their heresies with some success. From Poland they intended to cross into Moravia; but Alciati retired to Dantzic, where he died in the Socinian faith, and did not, as some have believed, become a Turk. He published Letters to Gregorio Paoli (1564). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alciati, Terenzio, an Italian Jesuit and theologian, was born at Rome in 1570. Urban VIII had a high regard for him, and said publicly that he was worthy of the honor of cardinal; but Alciati died, Nov. 12, 1651, before receiving this honor, and left the materials for a work entitled Historie Concilii Tridentini a Veritatis Hostibus Eulgate Elechnus. He had undertaken, by order of the pope, to refute the History of Paolo Sarpi. This material was, after his death, of use to cardinal Pallavicino, who composed a new History of the Council of Trent. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alcibiades, a martyr of the Christian faith at Lyons in A.D. 177. Eusebius mentions him in his Hist. Eccles. v, 3.

Alcibiades OF APAMEA was a propagator of heretical doctrines and trafficker in professed spiritual powers, who found his way to Rome from the valley of Orontes, in the time of Hippolytus, early in the 3d century. According to the same authority, Alcibiades was led to Rome by what he had heard of the heretical teachings of Calixtus, then bishop of Rome. On this groundwork he conceived the hope of erecting a more subtle philosophical system, composed of elements derived from the Ebionites, Pythagoreans, Eastern magicians, and Jewish cabalists. He brought with him as his credentials the Book of Elehasai (Eusebius, vi, 38), received from the hand of an angel. He was openly met and successfully resisted by Hippolytus, and his heresy appears to have been speedily and effectually crushed. The untrustworthy Nicephorus (Hist. Eccles. v, 24) makes Alcibiades an opponent of the Elcesaites (q. v.).

Alcimächē (valiant warrior), in Greek mythology, was a surname of Minerva.

Alcis was a German divinity, supposed to correspond to Castor and Pollux.

Alcock, John (1), LL.D., an English prelate, was born at Beverley, in Yorkshire, and educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of doctor of laws. In 1461 he was collated to the Church of St. Margaret, New Fish Street, London, and in the same year was advanced to the deanery of St. Stephen's, Westminster. The next year he was appointed master of the rolls, and six years after he obtained two prebends—one in Salisbury Cathedral and the other in St. Paul's, London. In 1470 he was made a privy-councillor and one of the ambassadors to the king of Castile. In 1471 he was a commissioner to treat with the king of Scotland, and about the same time a member of the privy council to Edward, prince of Wales. In the same year he was promoted to the bishopric of Rochester, and in 1472 constituted lord high chancellor of England, which office he retained about ten months. In 1476 he was translated to the see of Worcester and appointed lord president of Wales. He was in disgrace with the protector, Richard duke of York, and was removed from his office as preceptor to Edward. On the accession of Henry VII he was again made lord chancellor, and in 1486 was translated to the bishopric of Ely. In the cathedral he built a beautiful chapel, and added the hall to the episcopal palace. Malvern Church was rebuilt by him, and he enlarged Westburg Church. At Kingston-upon-Hull he founded a school, and built a chantry on the south side of Trinity Church. He contributed to the building of St. Mary's, Cambridge, and, lastly, founded Jesus College for a master, six fellows, and as many scholars. He died at his castle at Wisbeach, Oct. 1, 1500, and left: Mons Perfectionis ad Carthusianos (Lond. 1501, 4to):—Galli Cunctus ad Confratres suos Curatos in Synodo apud Barnwell Sept. 25, 1498 (ibid. per Pynson, 1498, 4to):—Abbatia Spiritus Sancti in Pura Conscientia Fundata (ibid. 1531, 4to):—In Psalmos Penitentiales, in English verse:—Homiliae Vulgares:—Meditationes Pia:—Sponsage of a Virgin to Christ (ibid. 1486, 4to). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hook, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Alcock, John (2), a Christian martyr of England, was cast into prison, where, from exposure and evil torments, he soon after died. The cause of this treatment arose from the fact that he was known to read an English book used by king Edward, exhorting at the same time the people to pray with him, and would read English prayers to them, which they would repeat after him. This probably occurred in 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 731.

Alcoque (properly Alacoque), MARGARET MARY, who instituted the Devotion to the Sacred Heart of Jesus, was born July 22, 1647, at Lathecourt, a village in the diocese of Autun. From her godmother, Madame de Saint-Amour, she received the name of Margaret. At four years of age she is said to have vowed perpetual chastity. Her piety was such that at nine years of age she received her first communion. In consequence of a severe sickness, she consecrated herself to the Virgin Mary, and added to the name of Margaret that of Mary. On May 25, 1671, she entered the convent De la Visitation de Paray-le-Monial, and in the year following she took her vows. From that time on she had frequent visions, and believed that the Saviour told her that the first Wednesday after the octave of the holy sacrament should be consecrated to a special feast in honor of his heart. The first festival was celebrated in 1685, in the convent at Paray. The severe austerities and macerations which she underwent in the convent finally ruined her health, and she died Oct. 17, 1690. On June 24, 1864, pope Pius IX published a decree of her beatification. Of her smaller writings the best known is La Dévotion au Cœur de Jésus, first published by Croiset in 1698. See Languet, La Vie de la Vénérable Mère Marguerite Marie (Paris, 1729); Daras, Vie de la Bienheureuse Marguerite Marie (ibid. 1875); Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. Alcoran. See KORAN.

Alcyonè (or Halcyone), in Greek mythology, was (1) the daughter of Ægiale by Æolus, a model of unspotted fervent love. Her husband led an unusually happy life with her, and left her only once to ask the advice of an oracle. He was shipwrecked and drowned. Alcyone made daily sacrifices to Juno for the safe return of her loved one, but Juno was not able to receive sacrifices the object of which was impossible to be realized. She therefore instructed Pluto to acquaint Alcyone with the calamity that had befallen her husband. Pluto informed her, and in a moment of utter despair she threw herself into the sea just as the body of her husband was washed ashore. The gods transformed both into birds (halcyones), from whose appearance is derived the expression halcyon days, signifying days of sweet rest. (2) The daughter of Atlas and mother of the Pleiades, and by Neptune mother of several children: Æthusa, Hyrieus (father of Orion), Hyperenor, and Anthas. (3) A surname of Cleopatra, the wife of Meleager, the famous victor over the Calydonian boar.

Alcyoneus, in Greek mythology, was (1) a giant, tall as a mountain, who inhabited the Isthmus of Corinth, and robbed and murdered all passers-by. He lived on herds, and lay in wait for Hercules, who travelled across the isthmus with large numbers of oxen, and with a huge rock he destroyed at one time twelve wagons and twenty-four men belonging to Hercules. When he was in the act of throwing a stone at Hercules, the latter slew him with the club he carried. (2) A dragon-footed giant, the son of Gæa (Earth), born from the blood of the emasculated Uranus. Of all his brothers he was the most powerful: born at Pallene, where he lived, and whence he drove the herds of oxen belonging to the god of the sun. Hercules made a search for the monster, and killed him by his superhuman strength. But no sooner had he been slain than he received new strength from his mother, the Earth, and began a renewed combat with Hercules. Minerva then instructed Hercules to drag him from Pallene; and when he was no longer in his own home, his strength failed him, and he died. He had seven beautiful daughters, the Alcyonides, named, respectively, Anthè, Alcippe, Asteria, Drimo, Methone, Pallene, and Phthonia. According to some, they all threw themselves into the sea upon the death of their father, and were transformed into ice-birds by the sympathizing gods.

Aldabi, a Spanish rabbi, lived at Toledo in the last half of the 14th century. He is the author of the Shebiley Emuna (שְׁבִילֵי אֱמוּנָה, paths of truth), a celebrated work among Jewish theologians. This was printed in Hebrew at Trent in 1559, and at Amsterdam in 1627 and 1708. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; First, Bibl. Jud. i, 33.

Aldberht, (1) one of the bishops of East Anglia, at the period at which the history of Bede closes. His name is omitted in the list of the bishops of Dunwich, to which it must have belonged, or else misplaced; for the fifth bishop, to whom the name of Aldberht is given, must have been later than the time of Bede.

(2.) The ninth bishop of Hereford in the ancient lists. He signs a charter of Offa as "electus" in 777, and as bishop in 781. He died before the Legatine Council of 787, which is signed by his successor Esne, or Æine.

Alde, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French Jesuit, was born at Paris, Feb. 1, 1674. He was secretary of P. le Tellier, and director of the Congregation of Artisans. He died Aug. 18, 1743. He wrote, Description de la Chine et de la Tartarie Chinoise, and some letters in the collection of Lettres Édifiantes. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aldebert. See ADELBERT; ALDBERT.

Aldegonde, St., was born in 630 at Cousobre, in Hainaut, France. Her father, Walbert, was allied to the kings of France, and her niece was a descendant of the royal family of Thuringia. After the death of her parents she returned to the Abbey of Hautmont, and took the veil at the hands of Amand, bishop of Maestricht. She consecrated her fortune to the building of a monastery in a wild spot, bathed by the Sambre, which was the origin of the celebrated chapter of Canonesses of Maubeuge. She died Jan. 30, 680, or, according to others, in 684 or 689. Her body was interred in the establishment which she had founded. The festival of St. Aldegonde is of very ancient date in Hainaut, for she is mentioned in the calendars of the time of Louis le Debonnaire and in the Martyrology of Usuard. The life of this saint has been written by Andrew Triquet, under the title Sommaire de la Vie Admirable de la très-illustre Princesse Sainte Aldegonde, Miroir des Vertus, Patronne de Maubeuge (Liege, 1625). It is also found in Acta Sanctorum Belgii (Brussels, 1783-89).—Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aldegraef (or Aldegrevier), HEINRICH, a German painter and engraver, was born at Zoust, in Westphalia, in 1502. He studied at Nuremberg under Albert Dürer, and followed him in both arts and became very distinguished. Some of his pictures are to be seen in the galleries of Munich and Schleisheim, and at Berlin a remarkable one of the Last Judgment. He executed some pictures for the churches and convents of Westphalia. After a few years he devoted himself entirely to engraving, and became very noted among that class called "the little masters," from the small size of their plates. His style was Gothic. The following are a few of the principal engravings: six plates illustrating the Fall and Expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise (dated 1540):—four plates of the History of Lot (1555):—four plates of the History of Joseph and his Brethren:—Judith with the Head of Holofernes (1528):—the Four Evangelists (1539):—the Virgin Carrying the Infant Jesus, with a standard (1552). The year of his death is not known, but there are prints by him dated as late as 1562. His prints are very numerous, amounting, according to abbé de Marolles, to no less than 350. The first collection of them was made by Mariette, to the amount of 390 pieces, comprising many duplicates with differences. This collection was sold in France in 1805 for 660 francs. See Strutt and Pilkington, Dictionaries; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Aldegüela, José MARTIN DE, a Spanish architect, was born at Manzanaeda in 1730. He studied under José Corbinos of Valencia, and established his reputation by superintending the erection of the church and college of the Jesuits in Teruel. He was soon after engaged by the bishop of Cuenca to finish the Church of San Felipe Neri in that city. He afterwards erected a number of public edifices at Cuenca and elsewhere; constructed the new aqueduct at Malaga, and completed the noted bridge at Ronda.

Alden, Justin T., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hinesburg, Vt., Jan. 21, 1821. He was brought to Christ at the age of thirteen through the teaching, example, and prayers of his pious parents; was educated at Gouverneur Wesleyan Seminary; received license to exhort when but eighteen; two years later to preach; and in 1844 united with the Black River Conference. He died Aug. 29, 1865. Mr. Alden was mild, yet decided; genial, yet so positive in virtue and grace as to banish everything vicious. He was devoutly sincere. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1865, p. 112.

Alden, Seth, a Congregational minister, was born at Bridgewater, Mass., May 21, 1798. He graduated at Brown University in 1814; conducted the Wakefield Academy the following year; entered upon his divinity studies at Cambridge in 1816; and became the pastor of Marlborough Church in November, 1819, where he remained fifteen years. In May, 1835, he was called to Brookfield, Mass., where he labored ten years; thence to Southborough; and, two years and a half later, to Lincoln, where he died four years afterwards. Mr. Alden, a direct descendant on both sides of the house from the Pilgrims, was a man of sincere piety, of untiring devotion to duty, and of a catholicity of spirit which constituted him a friend to all with whom he came in contact. See The Christian Examiner (Boston), 1854, p. 319.

Alden, Timothy, a Congregational minister, father of Rev. Dr. Timothy Alden, was a descendant of the famous John Alden of Plymouth renown. He was born in 1737, graduated at Harvard in the class of 1762, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Yarmouth, Mass., where he remained until his death, which occurred Nov. 13, 1821. He was a faithful, laborious minister of the Gospel. See Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Aldenbrück, AUGUSTIN, a German archæologist and Jesuit, lived in the first half of the 18th century. He engaged in interesting researches upon the monuments, the religion, the coins, the customs and ceremonies of the Ubians, an ancient people of Germany, and published the result of his labors in a work entitled De Religione Antiquorum Ubiorum Dissertatio Historico-mythologica; another edition was published at Cologne by Henry Noethen in 1749. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alderette, Bernardo de, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Zamora in 1594. He entered the company in 1613, and is the first Jesuit to whom the University of Salamanca granted a doctor's cap. He died Sept. 15, 1657, at Salamanca. He is the author of, De Incarnatione in Secundam Partem D. Thomæ (Lyons, 1652-57, 2 vols. fol.):—De Visione et Scientia Dei in Primam Partem D. Thomæ (ibid. 1662, 2 vols. fol.):—and De Voluntate Dei, Prædestinatione, et Reprobatione (ibid. eod. fol.). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Antonio, Bibliotheca Hispania; Alegambe, Bibliotheca Scriptorum Societatis Jesu. (B. P.)

Alderette, Josef de, a brother of Bernardo of Malaga, was born in 1560. He obtained a prebend of Cordova, which he resigned that he might enter among the Jesuits. He afterwards became rector of the College of Granada. He died in 1616. While among the Jesuits he published, Exemption of the Regular Orders (Seville, 1605, 4to):—and De Religiosa Disciplina Tuenda (ibid. 1615, 4to).

Alderson, Alberry L., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Hart County, Ky., in 1810. No record is accessible concerning his early life. In 1833 he entered the ministry in connection with the Kentucky Conference, and in 1851 joined the Louisville Conference, in which he labored until his death, Nov. 3, 1871. Mr. Alderson was timid, retiring, and distrustful of his own ability; yet, when fully aroused, he had few equals as an eloquent orator and powerful preacher. As a speaker, he was clear, earnest, logical, and skilful; as a gentleman, pure and polished; and as a Christian, humble, devout, and full of faith. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1872, p. 725.

Alderson, John, Sr., a Baptist minister, was born in Yorkshire, England, early in the 18th century. When quite young, he came to America under somewhat peculiar circumstances. He had become interested in a young lady and wished to marry her; but his father, a worthy minister of the Gospel, was opposed to the match, and, in order to divert his son from carrying out his purpose, he induced him to travel. In a little while his funds were exhausted, and, ashamed to return to his father, he shipped on board a vessel bound to America. On reaching this country, the captain of the ship in which he had crossed the ocean hired him out to a farmer in New Jersey, that he might earn a sufficient sum of money to pay for his passage. While employed in the capacity of a farm-laborer, he was hopefully converted. Having been well educated, and now feeling a desire to preach Christ, he entered upon the work of the ministry. His first efforts were made near Germantown, Pa., where he preached until 1755, when he removed to Rockingham County, Va. Here he soon gathered a Church, known as the Smith and Lynnville Church, of which he was the pastor for about sixteen years. He then removed to Botetourt County, where, after nine years' labor, he died, in 1781. "No man of his day," we are told, "was more distinguished among the Baptists than John Alderson, Sr. He was one of the earliest evangelical preachers of Western Virginia. To him are many of the churches indebted, under God, for their existence and growth." See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 21, 22. (J. C. S.)

Alderson, John, Jr., a Baptist minister, was born in New Jersey, March 5, 1738, O. S. He took very little interest in the subject of religion until he reached the meridian of life. Severe domestic affliction seems to have been sanctified to him, and he became a new man in Christ. He was ordained pastor of the Lynnville Creek Church, which his father had served, in October, 1775, where he remained two years, and then became pastor of a Church in Greenbrier County, Va., having the oversight also of several feeble churches in the neighborhood. During all this time he was compelled with his own hands to labor for the support of his growing family. After his family cares had been diminished, he gave himself wholly to the pastoral oversight of the churches under his charge. The last part of his life was spent with his son, under whose roof he died, March 5, 1821. Mr. Alderson is represented as having possessed an intellect naturally vigorous; and, although his early advantages had been limited, he was a man of respectable mental culture. In his preaching he delighted to dwell on the atonement of Christ and to recommend him to the attention of men. He was, without doubt, one of the most prominent men in the Baptist denomination in Western Virginia, and, says his biographer, "it may be doubted whether in any part of the state one more self-denying and devoted could have been found." See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 147-151. (J. C. S.)

Aldfrith (or Atfrith) was the tenth abbot of Glastonbury in Malmesbury's list, dated 709. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Aldhun, the first bishop of Durham, was born of a noble family in the 10th century, and succeeded Efsig in the bishopric of Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, in 990. Finding the island greatly exposed to the incursions of Danish pirates, he removed the see, after about six years, to Durham. He took with him the body of St. Cuthbert from Chester-le-Street, and at Dunelm (or Durham) erected a cathedral to that saint. Aldhun had a daughter named Eegfrid (or Ecgfrid), who married Uethred, son of Waltheof, from whom she was afterwards divorced, whereupon Aldhun took back the six towns belonging to the episcopal see, with which he had endowed her. He educated king Ethelred's two sons, Alfred and Edward; and when their father was driven from the throne, he conducted them and queen Emma into Normandy to Richard, the queen's brother, in 1017. In 1018 the English were defeated by the Scots, and the bishop was so affected by the news that he died a few days after. Radulphus de Diceto calls this bishop Alfhunus, and bishop Godwin, Aldwinus. See Hutchinson, Hist. of Durham, vol. i; Surtess, Hist. of Durham.

Aldobrandini, Cinzio Passero, an Italian cardinal, was son of a citizen of Sinigaglia and of a sister of Clement VIII. He took the name of his uncle, and was appointed cardinal in 1593 under the title of St. George. He was a great friend of Tasso, who dedicated to him his Gerusalemme Liberata.

His brother PIETRO, twenty years younger, also cardinal, went as legate to France, and settled the difficulties existing between Henry IV and the duke of Savoy in 1601.

He had still another brother, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO, who served in a Turkish company under the emperor Ralph II, and died at Waradin in 1601.

His son SILVESTRO became cardinal, and his nephew, GIOVANNI GIORGO, prince of Rossano, in the kingdom of Naples. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aldobrandini, Giovanni, an Italian cardinal, was born about 1525. He was the son of a jurist; was first auditor of the tribunal, then bishop of Imola, and finally, in 1570, he received the purple at the hand of Pius V. He was employed in different missions among the various sovereigns in order to form a league against the Turks. He died at Rome in 1573, and was interred in the church of St. Mary, where a marble statue has been erected. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aldom, ISAAC, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Gloucestershire. He was converted in his fourteenth year, admitted into the ministry in 1811, became a supernumerary in 1840, residing first at Peterborough and then (1841 sq.) on the Oundle Circuit, and died at Elton, near Oundle, Northampton, April 29, 1859, in his sixty-ninth year. See British Minutes, 1859.

Aldred, an English prelate of the 11th century, was abbot of Tavistock, and was promoted to the bishopric of Worcester in 1046. He was the first bishop of England that journeyed to Jerusalem, which he did in 1050. Upon his return, he was sent by Edward the Confessor on an embassy to the emperor Henry II, and remained in Germany a year, learning certain points of ecclesiastical discipline, which he afterwards introduced into the Church in England. He was promoted in 1060 to the see of York, holding the see of Worcester in commendam. On this account the pope, when Aldred went to Rome on an embassy from the king, refused him the pall; but being robbed by highwaymen on their journey home, earl Tosti insisted on the pope's making good their loss. He thereupon presented the pall to Aldred, insisting, however, upon his resigning the see of Worcester. After the death of Edward the Confessor, Aldred supported the pretensions of Harold, and crowned his conqueror, William of Normandy, over whom he exerted a very powerful influence. Of the latter part of Aldred's life we know but little. He is said to have been so afflicted by an insurrection of part of the people of his diocese that he died, Sept. 11, 1069. See Biog. Univ. i, 472; Will. Malmsh. in Angl. Sacra, ii, 248.

Aldrewold, a friar of the Abbey of Fleury, in France, was born about A.D. 818, near this abbey, and died in 890. He wrote, Histoire des Miracles opérés par Saint Benoît depuis qu'il avait été transféré du Mont Cassin à l'Abbaye de Fleury. Aldrewold finished this history about 876, and it was printed in the Bibliothèque de Fleury and in the collection of the Bollandists. He also wrote a treatise in which he asserted, contrary to John Scotus, the real presence of Jesus Christ in the eucharist, by the authority of the fathers. D'Achéry published this treatise in his Spicilegium, vol. xii. Another work of Aldrewold is Vie de Saint Agulphe, priest of Lerins and a martyr. Mabillon has reproduced this in his Acta SS. Ord. Bened. vol. xi, from a MS. considered authentic in the Library of the Abbey of Fleury. The other writings which Trithemius attributes to Aldrewold have not come down to us. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aldric, St., a French prelate, was the son of Bavarian parents of royal descent, but subjects of the French empire, and was born about A.D. 800. He passed his early years at the court of Charlemagne, and became chaplain and confessor of the emperor. In 832 he was appointed bishop of Mans, and was deprived of his bishopric by Lothaire, but re-established by Charles II in 841. In 846 he assisted at the Council of Paris, and in 849 at that of Tours. He died Jan. 7, 856. He composed a Recueil de Canons, collected from the councils and the decretals of the popes. The loss of this interesting compilation, known as Capitulaires d'Aldric, is regretted. He also wrote three Testaments and an Order for Divine Service, published in the Analectes of Mabillon and in the Miscellanea of Baluze. He ordered that his church at Mans should, at the grand ceremonies, be illuminated by at least 190 lamps and by ten wax tapers. It is not true that organs were first introduced in his time, neither that the first one was established in his church. They were of more ancient origin. Constantine Copronymus gave one to Pepin in 757, and this was the first one known in France. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. See also ALDRICUS.

Aldrich, David, a Baptist minister, was born in Cumberland, R. I., Jan. 14, 1781. He was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1806. Having pursued a course of theological study with the Rev. Dr. Gano, pastor of the First Baptist Church at Providence, he was ordained to the work of the Christian ministry under the direction of that Church, and settled as pastor of the Church at Goshen, Conn. Ill-health compelled him to retire from the ministry, and he lived during the remainder of his long life on a farm in his native town, holding various civil offices, and in many ways making himself useful in his day and generation. He died May 19, 1879, being at the time of his death the oldest alumnus of Brown University. (J. C. S.)

Aldrich, Jonathan, a Baptist minister, was born at St. Johnsbury, Vt., Sept. 14, 1799. He was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1826, and studied at the Newton Theological Institution one year (1826-27). He was ordained at West Dedham, Mass., in January, 1828. His pastorates were in West Dedham, Beverly, East Cambridge, Worcester, Newburyport, all in Mass.; Baltimore, Md.; and Framingham and Middleborough, Mass. He was for some time the district secretary for New England of the American Baptist Missionary Union. His death occurred at Worcester, Jan. 17, 1862. Mr. Aldrich was the compiler of a Hymn-book, which is used in quite a number of Baptist churches, especially in New England, for social services, (J. C. S.)

Aldrich (or Aldridge), Robert, an English prelate, was born at Burnham, in Buckinghamshire, about the end of the 15th century. He was educated at Eton, and was elected a scholar of King's College, Cambridge, in 1507, when he took his A.M. He became proctor of the university, schoolmaster of Eton, fellow of the college, and at last provost. In 1529 he retired to Oxford, where he received his B.D., and about the same time was made archdeacon of Colchester. He was installed canon of Windsor in 1534, and the same year he was appointed register of the Order of the Garter. On July 18, 1537, he was consecrated bishop of Carlisle, and he died at Horncastle, Lincolnshire, March 25, 1555. He wrote, Epistola ad Gulielmum Hormannum:—Epigrammata Varia:—Several Resolutions concerning the Sacraments:—Answers to Certain Queries concerning the Abuses of the Mass. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Aldricus, St. (or, in France, St. Audry), a French prelate, was born in the Pays du Gâtinais in A.D. 775. Although brought up in luxury, he early began to practice abstinence and every kind of austerity, subsequently taking the vows of the Monastery of Ferrières, then called Bethlehem. He was ordained deacon in 818. His reputation for piety attracted the notice of Jeremiah, bishop of Sens, who ordained him priest in 820, and also that of Louis le Débonnaire, who made him preceptor of his palace. He afterwards became abbot of Ferrières and bishop of Sens in 828, and the following year assisted at the Council of Paris, where he had charge, together with Ebbon of Rheims, of reforming the Monastery of St. Denis. During the revolt of Lothaire, the archbishop of Sens remained faithful to his sovereign. In 834, at the Council of Thionville, he was one of the prelates who annulled the acts of the rebels. He died Oct. 10, 840, and, according to his own request, his body was first buried in the drain of the Church of Ferrières, but it was soon removed to a more suitable place. His festival is observed by the Church of Sens Oct. 10. He wrote, Lettre à Frothaire, Evêque de Toul, in Duchesne, Mabillon, and Labbé. This article, signed by twenty-six prelates, is without date, and is addressed to the bishops of the empire of Lothaire in 833, the period of the deposition of Louis le Débonnaire. His Life, written by a monk of the Abbey of Ferrières, is given by Mabillon.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. See also ALDRIC.

Aldridge, W., an English Congregational ministter, was born April 30, 1796. He was converted early in life and educated at Chestnut College. He preached successively at Newnham, Gloucestershire; Clifford, Herefordshire; Bearfield, Wiltshire; and Grinstead, Sussex. Mr. Aldridge finally settled, about 1840, at Hereford, where he died, Dec. 30, 1857. He was an eminently good man. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1859, p. 190.

Aldrovandini, POMPEO AGOSTINO, a celebrated Italian painter, was born in 1677. He executed many works for the palaces, theatres, and churches of Vienna, Prague, and Dresden, besides several beautiful works in oil, fresco, and distemper. He died in 1739.

Aldulf (or Ealdwulf), the tenth bishop of Rochester, was consecrated by archbishop Brihtwald in the year 726. He was one of the consecrators of archbishop Tatwine in 731, and is mentioned by Bede in his closing chapter. He attests a charter of Oshere in 736 (Kemble, Cod. Diplom. i, 99), and an act of his own, dated 738, is still extant requesting confirmation of a gift of land made to his Church by Eadberht, king of Kent. He also had a grant from Ethelbald of the toll of one ship annually in the port of London in 734. His death is placed by Simeon of Durham in 739, and by Florence of Worcester in 741; but as it is mentioned in connection with that of archbishop Nothelm in both places, it probably took place in 739.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Aldulf, a bishop whose consecration is recorded by Simeon of Durham to have taken place at Corbridge in 786. Wharton supposes him to have been archbishop of Lichfield; but Adulf of Lichfield was not bishop until after 800. He may, however, be safely identified with the bishop of Mayo, in Ireland, "Aldulphus Myiensis ecclesiæ episcopus," who attended the Legatine Council of the North in 787. See Spelman, Concil. i, 301; Wharton, Angl. Sac. i, 430; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Alb, Ægidius, a Flemish painter, was born at Liege, and flourished in the latter part of the 17th century. He went to Rome and adopted the style, and painted in conjunction with Morandi, Romanelli, and Bonatti. He executed an altar piece in oil and the ceilings of the chapels in fresco for the Church of Santa Maria dell' Anima at Rome. He died in 1689.

Alëa, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Minerva at Tegea, in Arcadia, after Aleus, son of king Aphidas of Arcadia, who built the temple of Minerva at Tegea. When this temple was destroyed by fire, it was rebuilt in a much more beautiful style by Scopas, one of the most famous architects of Greece. Pausanias relates that the statue of the goddess was so exquisitely beautiful that Augustus had it conveyed to Rome.

Aleborn, JACOB, a German Reformed minister, probably came into the ministry through the Independent Synod. He was early engaged in the missionary work at Kensington and Rising Sun. In 1840 he was without a charge, and also the two following years. In 1843 we find his name erased from their roll by the Classis of Pennsylvania, and he was entirely lost sight of afterwards. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the German Ref. Church, iv, 490.

Alecto, in Greek mythology, was a fury, daughter of Æther and the Earth.

Alectorian Stone, in Greek mythology, was a rocky substance which the ancients believed was found in the stomach or liver of cocks (hence its name, from ἀλέκτωρ). This stone was said to possess powers producing happiness and good luck. It was also said to produce love, to prevent danger, to give fluency of speech, and to be a disburser of riches. It was believed that Pericles, Demosthenes, and other renowned Grecians were in possession of such a stone.

Alectryomancy was a method of fortune-telling among the ancient Greeks by means of feeding fowls. The letters of the alphabet were placed in a circle, and upon each letter a grain of wheat was put. A cock was brought out, and the letters were carefully noted from which he took the wheat. Words were then construed from these letters.

Alectryon, in Greek mythology, was a servant of Mars, whom he employed as a door-keeper when he made a call on Venus. Alectryon fell asleep. Sol finding entrance to the happy pair, betrayed their silent joy to Vulcan, who threw an invisible net about Mars and Venus; and, calling all the gods together, he thought to make them the butt of ridicule, when all the time he himself was laughed at by the gods. Mars transformed the unfaithful door-keeper into a cock.

Alegre, Angélique d', a French Capuchin friar who lived in the later half of the 17th century, wrote Le Chrétien Parfait; ou, Le Portrait des Perfections Divines Tirées en l'Homme sur l'Original (Paris, 1665). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alegre (de Casanate), Marcos Antonio, a Spanish Carmelite, was born in 1590 at Tarazona, a little town of Arragon. He chose to live in retirement rather than accept the position of secretary of the king, Philip III; and died Sept. 10, 1658. He wrote, Paradisius Carmelitici Decoris, cum Apologia pro Joanne XLIV, Patriarcho Hierosolymitano (Lyons, 1639). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alegressa. The seven Alegresses are prayers addressed to the Blessed Virgin in the Roman Church. The word is derived from alaigre, Lat. alacer, and signifies uncontrolled joy.

Alégrin, JEAN, a French prelate, was born at Abbeville, in Picardy, about the middle of the 12th century. He was, at different times, archbishop of Besançon, bishop of Sabina, and cardinal and Latin patriarch of Constantinople. Under Gregory IX he was sent as legate a latere to Spain and Portugal; and died in 1237 or 1240. He wrote a Commentaire sur les Psaumes de David:—Sermons:—Panégyriques:—and Expositions of the Epistles and Gospels (Paris, 1521). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aleman, LOUIS, known by the name of Cardinal d'Arles, a French prelate, was born in 1390 at the château of Arhent, seignior of the country of Bugey. He was made bishop of Maguelonne; then raised to the see of Montpellier; then archbishop of Arles. In 1426 he was made cardinal by pope Martin V, who sent him to the Council of Sienna, and appointed him vice-camarlingo of the Church. In 1431 he, with cardinal Julian, presided at the Council of Basle. Eugenius IV, who succeeded in the same year Martin V, made every effort to maintain the pontifical authority, battered and broken by the Council of Constance, which had placed the authority of the councils beyond that of the pope. The Council of Basle, directed by the cardinals Aleman and Julian, sought to widen this breach. Pope Eugenius then wished to be transferred to Bologna, that he might exercise greater influence; but the French and German prelates, sustained by the princes of the North, strongly opposed this measure. Cardinal Aleman was active against this; and, having fortified himself with the alliance of the emperor Sigismund and the duke of Milan, he hurled against the pope the sentence of deposition, and placed in 1440 the tiara upon the head of Amadeus VIII, duke of Savoy, who took the name of Felix V. According to contemporary historians, Aleman delivered an address which divided the Catholics into Moderates and Ultramontanists, and stirred up a remarkable fermentation. Eugenius excommunicated the antipope, and declared Aleman removed from all his ecclesiastical honors. In order to make an end of the scandal of a schism, Felix V abdicated at the same council with Aleman. Nicholas V, who in 1447 succeeded Eugenius, restored Aleman to all his honors and sent him as legate to the Low Countries. On his return Aleman retired to his diocese, where he zealously devoted himself to the instruction of the people. He died at Salon in 1459. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alemant, LOUIS AUGUSTIN, a French writer of considerable note, was born at Grenoble in 1653, of Protestant parents, whose religion he abjured. He was admitted M.D. at Aix; and, having failed in his profession, went to Paris. He died at his native place in 1728; and left, among other works, Histoire Monastique d'Irlande (Paris, 1690, 12mo). See Gough, Typography, vol. ii; Le Clerc, Biographie Universelle, i, 481.

Alemanni, Arcangela, a Dominican nun of the Monastery of St. Niccolodi, was a native of Florence, and lived in the later half of the 16th century. She wrote, in the form of letters, the life of the celebrated Lorenza Strozzi, her friend and confidante. These letters were entitled Epistolæ ad Zachariam Montium de Pii Moribus et Felici Morte ejus Matertera dictæ Sororis Strozziæ, et Aliæ ad Alios. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alemanni (or Alamanni), Cosmo, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Milan about 1559, and entered the Society in 1575. He was a warm admirer of St. Thomas's writings. His death took place May 24, 1634; and he left, among other works, Summa Totius Philosophiæ et D. Thomæ Aquinatis Doct. Angel. Doctrina (Paris, 1618). See Alegambe, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jesu; Landon, Eccles. Dict., s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alemanni (or Alamanni), Giovanni Battista, an Italian prelate, was born at Florence, Oct. 30, 1519. He accompanied his father, the celebrated Luigi Alamanni, to France, where he became almoner to queen Catharine de' Medici. He afterwards became private councillor to king Francis I, who conferred on him the charge of the Abbey of Belleville. In 1555 he obtained the bishopric of Bazas, which he exchanged in 1558 for that of Macon. He died Aug. 13, 1581. He wrote, three Letters, addressed to Benedetto Varchi, which were inserted in the second volume of the Prose Fiorentine:—Sonnets, addressed to, and published with the poems of, Varchi (Florence, 1557):—La Anarchide, a poem on his father (ibid. 1570). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alemanni, Nicola. See ALLEMANNI.

Alemannus, a hero of the ancient Germans, whom they revered as a god.

Alemdar, an officer of some distinction among the emirs, or descendants of Mohammed. He may be called the standard-bearer; for when the sultan appears in public on any solemn occasion, the alemdar carries Mohammed's green standard, on which is inscribed Nazrum-nim-Allah ("Help from God").

Alemōna, in Roman mythology, was the tutelary goddess who presided over children prior to their birth.

Alen (or Allen), EDMOND, an English clergyman, was a native of Norfolk. He was elected fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1536; proceeded A.M. the year following; and became the steward in 1539. He shortly after went abroad for the sake of study, and became a great proficient in the Greek and Latin tongues. He was obliged to remain in exile during the reign of queen Mary; but no sooner was Elizabeth queen than she appointed him one of her chaplains, gave him a commission to act as an ambassador, and nominated him to the see of Rochester. After a long absence he died, either on his return or soon after, and never became possessed of the bishopric. It is said that he was buried in the Church of St. Thomas Apostle, in London, Aug. 30, 1559. He translated into English, Alex. Alesius de Autoritate Verbi Dei (12mo):—Phil. Melanch. super Utraque Sacramenti Specie et de Autoritate Episcoporum (1543, 12mo):—and Conradus Pellicanus super Apocalipsin. He published, A Christian Introduction for Youth (1548; 1550, 12mo; 1551, 8vo). See Masters, Hist. of Corpus Christ. Coll. (Cambridge).

Alençon, GUILLAUME, a martyr who did much good in the provinces of France, in 1554, by colportage. Coming to Montpellier, he was there circumvented by false brethren, detected, and put in prison. In his faith he was firm and constant to the end of his martyrdom; being burned Jan. 7, 1554. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 416.

Aleni, TOMMASO, an Italian historical painter, was born at Cremona in 1500. He executed some works, in competition with Galeazzo, in the Church of Santo Domenico at Cremona, which are difficult to distinguish from those of that master. He died in 1560.

Alenio, GIULIO, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Brescia in 1582. He travelled in the East, and arrived at Macao in 1610, where he taught mathematics. Thence he went to China, where he propagated Christianity for thirty-six years, travelling over the country in Chinese costume, and built several churches in the province of Fo-kien. He died in August, 1649, leaving several works in Chinese: The Life of Jesus Christ (8 vols.):—The Incarnation of Jesus Christ:—Of the Sacrifice of the Mass:—The Sacrament of Penance:—The Origin of the World:—Proof of the Existence of a Deity:—The Dialogue of St. Bernard between the Soul and Body, in Chinese verse:—The Life of Dr. Michael Yam, a Chinese convert. See Sotwel, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jesu.

Aler, PAUL, a learned German Jesuit, was born at Saint Guy, in Luxemburg, Nov. 9, 1656. He studied at Cologne; and in 1676 entered the Order of St. Ignatius. He was professor of philosophy, theology, and belles-lettres at Cologne until 1691. In 1701 he was invited to the University of Treves, where he gave a course of lectures on theology; and in 1703 was appointed regent of the gymnasial school. About the same time he was employed in the organization and direction of the gymnasial academies of Münster, Aix-la-Chapelle, Treves, and Juliers. He died at Duren in 1727, and left as his principal works, Tractatus de Artibus Humanis (Treves, 1717, 4to):—Philosophiæ Tripartitæ Pars I, sive Logica (Cologne, 1710); Pars II, sive Physica (1715); Pars III, seu Anima et Metaphysica (1724):—and some classic annotations, etc. See Biog. Universelle; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ales, a term applied in England to certain festivals, which were variously distinguished as the bridal-ale, Whitsun-ale, lamb-ale, leet-ale, etc. But the church-ales and clerk-ales (sometimes called the lesser church-ales) were among those authorized sports which, at the time of the Reformation, caused great contention between archbishop Laud and the Puritans. The people, on the conclusion of afternoon prayers on Sundays, were in the habit of going to their "lawful sports and pastimes," in the churchyard or neighborhood, or in some public-house, to drink and make merry. It was claimed that the benevolence of the people at their pastimes enabled many poor parishes to cast their bells, beautify their churches, and raise stock for the poor. Sometimes these were held in honor of the tutelar saint of the church, or for the express purpose of raising contributions for its repair. Clerk-ales were festivals for the assistance of the parish clerk with money or with good cheer, as an encouragement in his office.

Aleshdan, in Persian religion, is the vessel in which the holy fire of the Guebres burns. It stands on the stone called Adosht, in the chapel of fire Atesh-gat.

Alesio, MATTEO PEREZ D', an Italian artist, born at Rome, flourished about 1585, and was skilful both with pencil and graver. He went to Spain, where he executed many fresco paintings for the churches of Seville; the principal one being a colossal picture forty feet high, in the cathedral, representing St. Christopher carrying the infant Saviour on his shoulder. It is highly praised by Palomino Velasco. After a few years he departed from Spain and went to Rome, where he died, in 1600.

Alessandro, Benjamin, of REGGIO, a Jewish rabbi who flourished towards the latter part of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th century, is the author of, אֵלֶיךָ בְּכוֹר, a commentary on Lamentations (Venice, 1713): פֶּרוֹשׁ קְצַת מִקְוִימוֹת בְּרֵיכָה רַבֵּי, comments on some passages of the Midrash Echa, printed with his commentary (ibid.), together with שֵׁרֵי הַמִּצְוֹת, a commentary on the songs of degrees: אֲבוֹת עוֹלָם, a commentary on the sayings of the fathers (ibid. 1719). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 33; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 36. (B. P.)

Alessandro, Innocenzio, an Italian engraver, was born at Venice in 1740. He engraved several plates in aquatinta and in the crayon manner, of which the following are the principal: The Annunciation:—The Flight into Egypt, after F. Le Moine:—The Virgin Mary, with a glory of angels, after Piazzetta:—The Virgin Mary, with guardian angels releasing the souls in Purgatory, after Sebastian Ricci:—two landscapes, and a set of twelve landscapes after Marco Ricci:—four prints representing Painting, Music, Astronomy, and Geometry, after Domenico Majotto.

Alethea (truth), in Greek mythology, was (1) the goddess of truth, daughter of Jupiter; according to others, of Saturn. (2) A nurse of Apollo.

Aletrides, a name given in Greece to the young women of honor who prepared the flour for the sacrificial bread.

Aleuromancy, in the service of Greek deities, was the prophesying which was done during the baking of the sacred flour.

ALEUROMANTIS was also a surname of Apollo, because these sacrifices were made to him.

Aleutian Version. See RUSSIA, VERSIONS OF. For linguistic purposes, comp. Wenjaminoff, Opyt Grammatiki Aleutsko-Lisjevskago Jazyka (St. Petersburg, 1846).

Aleworth, JOHN, a Christian martyr, suffered death in a prison at Reading in July, 1555. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 328.

Alexander, the name of a large number of saints in the early martyrologies: (1) Martyr under Decius, commemorated Jan. 30; (2) commemorated Feb. 9; (3) son of Claudius, martyr at Ostia, Feb. 18; (4) bishop of Alexandria, Feb. 26 and April 10; (5) of Thessalonica, Feb. 27; (6) of Africa, March 5; (7) of Nicomedia, March 6; (8) with Gaius, March 10; (9) bishop of Jerusalem, martyr, March 18 [see ALEXANDER OF CAPADOCIA]; (10) martyr at Cæsarea in Palestine, March 28, March 27; (11) saint, April 24, April 21; (12) the pope ALEXANDER I, said to have been martyred at Rome under Trajan (or Hadrian), May 3; he is named in the Gregorian Canon; (13) martyr at Bergamo, Aug. 26; (14) bishop and confessor, Aug. 28; (15) "in Sabinius," Sept. 9; (16) commemorated Sept. 10; (17) "in Capua," Oct. 15; (18) Armenian patriarch, Nov. 7, April 17, and Aug. 11; (19) bishop and martyr, Nov. 26; (20) martyr at Alexandria, translated Dec. 12.

Alexander, bishop of ANTIOCH, succeeded Porphyrius, A.D. 413, as the thirty-eighth bishop of the see. Before he was raised to the episcopate he had lived an ascetic life in a monastery. The influence of his mild words and winning character led to the healing of the schism which had lasted eighty-five years between the remaining partisans of the banished Eustathius and the main body of the Church. He restored the name of Chrysostom to the ecclesiastical registers. He excited the people of Constantinople to demand the restitution of their archbishop's name from the intruder Atticus. He was succeeded by Theodotus, A.D. 421.

Alexander, bishop of APAMĒA, in Syria Secunda, and metropolitan, accompanied his namesake and brother metropolitan, Alexander of Hierapolis, to the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. He is probably the Alexander despatched by the Oriental bishops to Alexandria with one of the many vain attempts to overcome the obstinacy of Cyril.

Alexander, bishop of BASILINOPOLIS, in Bithynia, of a noble family, early embraced the monastic life and took holy orders. Going to Constantinople, he made the acquaintance of Chrysostom, who was so highly pleased with him that, before 403, he ordained him bishop of the city of Basilinopolis. He shared the fall of Chrysostom, and, retiring to his native country, settled at Ptolemais, where Synesius found him in 410. He was afraid, however, to receive him in church or to appear with him in public on account of the malign influence of Theophilus of Alexandria. On the publication of the amnesty after Chrysostom's death, Alexander refused to avail himself of it or leave Ptolemais, deeming the peace a false one. See Synesius, Epistle lxi, lxxii.

Alexander (St.) CARBONARIUS (the charcoal-burner), a man of good family and wealth, left everything to embrace the lowly occupation of a charcoal-burner. The faithful in Comana having need, about A.D. 248, of a bishop, applied to St. Gregory of Neo-Cæsarea, called Thaumaturgus; he came to the city and rejected all the candidates who were presented to him. Upon this, a person present jeeringly named "Alexander the charcoal-burner" as a man such as the bishop desired. He sent for, conversed with him, and was so charmed with his singular fitness for the sacred office that he appointed him to the bishopric. It is believed that he suffered martyrdom under the emperor Decius; and the modern martyrology marks his festival on Aug. 11. See Gregorius Nyssenus, Life of St. Greg. Thaum.; Baillet, Aug. 11.

Alexander THE CARPENTER, so called from his father's trade, was an Englishman, and flourished about 1430. He composed a treatise, Destructorium Vitiolum (Venice, 1582), which has been by some attributed to Alexander of Hales. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 129.

Alexander OF CARPINETO, in the Roman territory, flourished about 1196, and wrote a Chronicle of the Abbey of St. Bartholomew, at Carpineto, in six books (given by Ughelli in the Italia Sacra, x, 349). See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 258.

Alexander OF (St.) ELPIDIUS, in Italy, near Rome, was general of the order of Augustinian hermits in 1312, and in 1325 was made archbishop of Ravenna. The time of his death is uncertain. He wrote a treatise on The Imperial Jurisdiction and the Authority of the Roman Pontiff, by order of pope John XXII (Lyons, 1498, in 2 books; Rimini, 1624):—also two other works. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 16; Pamphilus, Chron. Ord. Erem.

Alexander ESSEBIENSIS, an English poet and theologian, flourished about 1220. He wrote, A Chronicle of England:—A Medical Compendium of Bible History:—A Life of St. Agnes:—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Alexander, bishop OF GALLOWAY, in Scotland, was elected to that see in 1426, and was employed in an embassy into England in 1428. He was still bishop in 1444, and is said to have resigned the see in 1451. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 275.

Alexander OF IMOLA, a lawyer, taught the law for thirty years at Pavia, Ferrara, and Bologna, and died in 1487, leaving Commentaries on the Decretals and Clementines (Venice, 1571). See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 185; Dupin, Bibl. Eccles.

Alexander, bishop OF LINCOLN, was born at Blois, France, and was a nephew of Roger, bishop of Salisbury, who secured for him the bishopric of Lincoln, to which he was consecrated July 22, 1123. He rebuilt (in 1124) the greater part of the cathedral, which had been nearly destroyed by fire. In 1142 he went to Rome, and returned invested with legitimate authority. He also visited Rome in 1144, and in August, 1147, made a journey into France to see the pope, then residing there, but fell sick, and, setting out for home, died soon after his return. See Biog. Universelle, i, 528; Godwin, Life of Alexander.

Alexander OF LYCOPOLIS wrote a short treatise against the Manichæans, printed in Galland, Biblioth. Veterum Patrum, iv, 73-87. Its title is 'Ἀλεξάνδρου Λυκολιπολίτου ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς τὰς Μανιχαίων δόξας. Photius (Contra Man. i, 11) calls him the archbishop of Lycopolis. He must have flourished early in the 4th century, as he says (c. 2) that he derived his knowledge of Manes' doctrines ἀπὸ τῶν γνωρίμων τοῦ ἀνδρός. It has been disputed whether he was a Christian when he wrote the book, or even became one afterwards; but the testimony of Photius seems to settle the latter point.

Alexander OF LYONS, a physician and martyr, was a native of Phrygia. During the persecution of the churches of Lyons and Vienne, he was exposed with another Christian to be devoured by the wild beasts in the amphitheatre, which suffering was endured with great fortitude. The death of Alexander took place A.D. 177, and his memory is celebrated June 2, the same time as that of the other martyrs of Vienne and Lyons. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alexander THE PARGITER, an Englishman and abbot of the Benedictine monastery of St. Augustine at Canterbury, who lived at the beginning of the 13th century, was distinguished for his steady adherence to king John, for which he was excommunicated. He wrote various treatises, among them De Ecclesia Potestate. He died either in 1217 or 1220.

Alexander, bishop OF ROSS, in Scotland, was promoted to that see in 1357, and was bishop there in the thirtieth year of king David II (1359). He was bishop when king Robert II came to the crown. In August, 1404, he was witness to a charter by Isabel, countess of Mar and Garrioch, to Alexander Stewart, eldest son to Alexander earl of Buchan, granted upon the contract of marriage between them, and to an instrument in consequence thereof on Sept. 9 following; also to a charter and precept of seisin relative to the same on Dec. 9. Alexander was contemporary with Alexander bishop of Aberdeen and William Keith. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 188.

Alexander SEVERUS, a Roman emperor, was born at Acre in Phœnicia, in 205. He was carefully educated by his mother, and was adopted and made Cæsar by his cousin Heliogabalus, at whose death Alexander was raised to the throne in his seventeenth year. The young emperor followed the noble example of Trajan and the Antonines; and, on the whole, governed ably both in peace and in war. He was murdered in 235, in an insurrection of his Gallic troops headed by the barbarian Maximin. Alexander was favorable to Christianity, following the predilections of his mother Mammæa; and he is said to have placed the statue of Jesus Christ in his private temple, in company with those of Orpheus and Apollonius Tyaneus. For a glowing account of his reign, as well as his studies in history, philosophy, and literature, see Gibbon, Decline and Fall, cii. iii.

Alexander OF SOMERSET was bishop of the diocese

tery of Regular Canons at Ashby in the 13th century. He wrote many Lives of Saints and a Calendar in verse, books which remain unprinted.

Alexander OF (St.) THERESA was a learned Carmelite, and was born at Brussels in 1639. He taught theology at Louvain, and left several works, viz. Clypeus Religiosis (Cologne, 1679, 2 vols. 4to):—Preco Marianus Denuncians Illustrissima Uberrimaque Eulogia et Preconia, etc. (ibid. 1681, 4to):—Regula Fidei (Ypres, 1682):—Confutatio Justificationis Præzeos qua Nonnulli sub Nomine Patrum in Belgio Consequeruntur (ibid. 1683):—Hydra Profanorum Noviatum (Cologne, 1684, 4to):—Tempestas Novaturiensis (ibid. 1686, 4to):—Sacrarium Reclusum (Ypres, 1690, 12mo):—Sanctum Sanctorum Conclusum (ibid. eod. 12mo); against the use of the mass in the vulgar tongue. The last two have been printed in Dutch.

Alexander, a Valentinian with whom Tertullian entered into a controversy on the incarnation (De Carne Chr. 16 sq.). It is impossible to say whether he is identical with "Alexander the old heretic" whom Jerome names as a commentator on the Epistle to the Galatians (Præf. ad Gal.).

Alexander, Ann, a minister of the denomination of Friends, was the daughter of William and Esther Tuke, and was born at York, England, May 16, 1767. Her first journey in the work of the ministry was a visit to Scotland in 1788, in which country she contributed much to religious progress. Her removal to Ireland, in 1791, was the cause of increased religious awakening in many parts of that country. She came to America in 1803, where she remained two years, preaching in various parts of the country. About 1811 she began the publication of a periodical devoted to the interests of the Society, which has appeared annually since 1813 under the title Annual Monitor. She died near Ipswich, England, Oct. 19, 1849. See Annual Monitor, 1850, p. 124.

Alexander, David, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ireland, and was ordained in 1738. He may have been educated at the Log College, and licensed by Newcastle Presbytery. When called in 1740 to answer for his neglect to attend the stated meetings, he excused himself on account of his bodily weakness, and because the Presbytery were too superficial in examining candidates and opposed the work of God, and the ministers chiefly instrumental in carrying it on; and also because they opposed the crying-out during sermons. The Presbytery met at his church to consider a charge against him of intoxication. He took the pulpit and preached. He acknowledged the intoxication, and the Presbytery judged it not so heinous as had been represented; but they suspended him till satisfaction was given for his disregardful conduct, yet he was suffered to sit in the synod of 1741 and then withdraw. The conjunct presbyteries of New Brunswick and Newcastle appointed him, on account of "the necessity in the Great Valley," to supply there. He then passes out of sight. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in America, 1857.

Alexander, James (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Bradford, Wiltshire, in 1768. He was converted early in life. When he was taken into the ministry, in 1794, he was sent to preach to the negroes of the West Indies, among whom he labored for six years. He then returned to England, where he ministered for nineteen years. In 1819 he became a supernumerary, and died at Wimborne, Jan. 26, 1829. See Minutes of British Conference, 1829.

Alexander, James (2), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Mercer County, Pa., Sept. 25, 1798. He studied for a time in Mercer Academy, and graduated from Jefferson College in 1826. His theological studies were pursued in private. He was licensed by the Presbytery of Erie, April 9, 1828; and in October of the same year was ordained and installed pastor of the churches of Greenville, Salem, and Big Bend. This relation was dissolved June 25, 1834; and in the following year he was dismissed to the Presbytery of Ohio. He labored faithfully in churches in Ohio and Virginia, and died July 26, 1879. See History of the Presbytery of Erie.

Alexander, John (1), a Scotch Episcopalian, was born in 1703. He was ordained deacon and priest in the Scottish Church, and officiated at Alloa. In 1743 the clergy of Dunkeld elected him to be their diocesan, and he was consecrated bishop Aug. 9. In the persecution of the Episcopalians, the chapel of Alexander was razed to the ground, his house was plundered, and he was obliged to conceal himself. He resumed his duties, in spite of the penalties, after the first violence of the persecution ceased, and died in 1776. See Lawson, Hist. of the Scottish Episcopal Church; Keith, Catalogue (Russell's ed.); Skinner, Annals.

Alexander, John (2), a Scotch engraver, who worked at Rome in 1718. His plates were chiefly after Raphael. He engraved a set of six middle-sized plates lengthways, dedicated to Cosmo III, grand-duke of Tuscany, as follows: The Benediction of Abraham (1717):—The Sacrifice of Abraham (1718):—The Angel Appearing to Abraham (eod.):—The Departure of Lot from Sodom (eod.):—Jacob's Ladder (eod.):—Moses and the Burning Bush (1717).

Alexander, John (3), an English Unitarian minister, was born in Ireland, of English parents, in 1736. After receiving a grammar-school education, he was sent to the Dissenting Academy at Daventry, from which he went to Dr. Benson. He afterwards entered the ministry, preaching in or near Birmingham, but principally at the small village of Longdon. He died suddenly, Dec. 28, 1765. After his death, the Rev. John Palmer of London published a work of his entitled A Paraphrase upon Ch. xv of 1 Cor., with notes:—Commentary on Ch. vi, vii, and viii of Rom.:—and a Sermon on Eccles. ix, 10 (1766, 4to).

Alexander, John (4), an English Congregational minister, was born at Lancaster, Dec. 13, 1792. He learned to love and serve God in the family circle. In 1812 he was received into fellowship with the Church, and immediately began to preach. Mr. Alexander entered Hoxton Academy in 1814, and in 1817 was sent as a supply to the Tabernacle, in Norwich. In 1820 he was ordained over that charge, and there labored for nearly fifty years. Upwards of a thousand persons were received into Church fellowship as the result of his ministry, and ten entered the ministry. Much of his success was owing to the love and attention he gave to the young people. As a preacher, Mr. Alexander was deliberate at the beginning of his sermons, waxing into great earnestness and fervor at its close; rather rhetorical in style; and apt in illustration, anecdote, and quotations from Scripture and sacred song. His efficiency both as preacher and pastor resulted greatly from thorough and prayerful preparation. His prayer-meeting addresses, week-day sermons, public prayers and speeches, Bible-class lectures, and visitations of the sick were as carefully thought over, written out in a marvellously neat hand, and prayed over, as were his three Sunday sermons. In 1866 Mr. Alexander resigned the care of his charge. He died July 3, 1868. Mr. Alexander published, by request, several single discourses and pamphlets:—also 2 vols. of sermons entitled The Preacher from the Press:—brief Memoirs of bishop Stanley and of Joseph John Gurney:—and a Life of his father, the Lancashire Apostle. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 234-236.

Alexander, Joseph, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1760. He was licensed by the Newcastle Presbytery in 1767, and in October of the same year presented his credentials to the Hanover Presbytery, and accepted a call to Sugar Creek, N. C. He subsequently removed to Bullock's Creek, S. C., where he exercised his ministry and taught a school of high order, as he had also done in North Carolina. He was a man of small stature, but of fine talents and accomplishments, and an uncommonly animated and popular preacher. He died July 30, 1809. A volume of his sermons was published after his death. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 331; Index to Princeton Rev. s. v.

Alexander, Michael Solomon, D.D., a missionary bishop of the Church of England, was born of Jewish parents, in the grand-duchy of Posen, in May, 1799. Very little is known of his youth and education. He was baptized a Christian at Plymouth, June 22, 1825, by the Rev. Mr. Hatchard, inducted to a curacy in Ireland, and ordained shortly after by the archbishop of Dublin. He was subsequently a home missionary of the Society for the Propagation of Christianity among the Jews, and professor of Hebrew in King's College. In 1841, when Chevalier Bunsen went to London on a mission for the establishment of a Protestant bishopric at Jerusalem, under the joint auspices of the sovereigns of England and Prussia, Dr. Alexander was consecrated to that important charge. Palestine, Chaldæa, Egypt, and Ethiopia were the four component countries of his diocese, and Egypt, being the least distant, claimed his first attention. Leaving Jerusalem for Cairo, he had proceeded as far as Ras el-Wady, a place within five hours' journey of the once populous city of Belbeis. Here the tents were pitched, Nov. 22, 1845, and the bishop retired to bed, but at one o'clock he was taken very ill and suddenly passed away. Dr. Alexander is described, by those who knew him well, as a Talmudist and Hebrew scholar who had few superiors, and who, in the relations of private life, was the most amiable of men. See Christian Guardian and Church of England Magazine, March, 1846, p. 137.

Alexander, Neckam, an English abbot, was born at St. Alban's, in Hertfordshire, and was educated in different universities. Returning to England, he took up his abode in the abbey of St. Alban's, but shortly after removed to Exeter, where in 1215 he became abbot of the Regular Canons of St. Augustine in that church. He died at Worcester in 1227, leaving the following works: Comment. in IV Evangel. (MS. in Oxford);—Expositio super Ecclesiasten (MS. in the Cotton Library);—Expositio super Cantica (MS. in Oxford and Cambridge);—Laudes Divini Sapientie (MS.);—De Naturis Rerum (MS.);—Elucidarium Bibliothecæ (MS. at Caius College, Cambridge). See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 286.

Alexander, Nicholas, a Benedictine monk of the Congregation of St. Maur, was born at Paris in 1654, and died at St. Denis in 1728. He wrote, La Médecine et la Chirurgie des Pauvres (Paris, 1738, 12mo);—Dictionnaire Botanique et Pharmaceutique (ibid. 1716, 8vo). See Hist. Lit. de la Congrégation de St. Maur; Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alexander, Robert R. R., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Allen County, Ky., Oct. 3, 1831. He experienced conversion in 1849, and in 1851 was licensed to preach and admitted into the Louisville Conference. In 1855 he was transferred to the Louisiana Conference, and in it continued laborious until his death at Jefferson, Tex., April 11, 1867. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1867, p. 136.

Alexander, Samuel, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born Feb. 16, 1836. He professed religion in 1853; moved to Missouri from Tennessee in 1857; and was licensed to preach and received into the Missouri Conference in 1860. In 1872 he removed to Marion, Va., to recover his health, and in the following fall was transferred to the Holston Conference, and remained in its active ranks until he died, Feb. 15, 1874. As a preacher, Mr. Alexander was industrious and eloquent; as a Christian, pious, cheerful, dignified; as a father, devoted and kind. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1874, p. 15.

Alexander, Thomas, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1815. His early history is unrecorded. In 1873 he was transferred from the Indiana to the Nebraska Conference, and entered upon his duties with great zeal. He died suddenly in Wahoo, Neb., June 4, 1874. Mr. Alexander had been in the travelling connection over twenty years, and had established a reputation for piety and devotedness. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 135.

Alexander, William (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Stranraer, Wigton, Scotland, Feb. 21, 1763. He was apprenticed to his uncle in Newton-Stewart to learn the trade of a carpenter. For several years he worked at his trade in Lancaster, England. "Visiting the widow of a friend at Golgate in 1797, he was induced to speak to the family on the subject of religion. The neighbors hearing of this, came also to hear this good man and 'rare talker.' He thus involuntarily became a village preacher, working at his business all the week, and devoting his Sabbaths to the instruction of multitudes in the vicinity of Lancaster, preaching often four times on the Lord's day and walking thirty-two miles." In 1802 he preached at Prescott, and finally became their pastor, preaching also in the neighboring villages. He left Prescott and collected a congregation at Leigh, commencing his ministry here in 1811. He had to face much opposition, but his prudence, decision, and piety enabled him to bear as well as to disarm hostility. After fourteen years, he removed to Churchtown, where he labored for twenty years, when old-age compelled him to resign. He died at Southport, in January, 1855. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1856, p. 207.

Alexander, William (2), a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Philadelphia, Aug. 6, 1797. When about seven years old his father took him to England, where he remained about thirty years. He became a Methodist at Dublin, Ireland, in June, 1815, and was licensed to preach at London in 1820 by the Rev. Richard Watson. In 1835 he returned to Philadelphia, and for nearly six years he was moral instructor in the Moyamensing Prison. Subsequently he was ordained a deacon in the Protestant Episcopal Church, and for a few years before his death was assistant rector of the Church of the Atonement. He died in Philadelphia, March 13, 1859. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1859, p. 352.

Alexander, William (3), a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Concerning his birth and life we have no other record than that from 1852 until his death, Dec. 5, 1872, he served the Church as a travelling preacher in the St. Louis Conference, and that he possessed good preaching abilities and was always a hopeful, cheerful, and devoted Christian and father. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1873, p. 869.

Alexandria, the modern city, stands, not exactly on the site of the old one, but partly on what was the island of Pharos, now a peninsula, and mostly on the isthmus by which the island is connected with the mainland. This isthmus was originally an artificial dike connecting the island with the shore; but through the accumulated rubbish of ages it has now become a broad strip. The principal public and government buildings are on the peninsula, but the residences, squares, and business part are on the mainland. The general appearance of Alexandria is by no means striking; and, from its situation, its environs are sandy, flat, and sterile. In the Turkish quarter the streets are narrow, irregular, and filthy, and the houses mean and ill-built; the Frankish quarter, on the other hand, presents the appearance of a European town, having handsome streets and squares and excellent shops. Great improvements have taken place under the native Egyptian rule. The principal hotels, shops, and offices are situated in the Great Square, which is planted with trees and contains a fountain. In the suburbs are numerous handsome villas and pleasant gardens.

The only surviving remains of the ancient city are a few cisterns still in use; the catacombs on the shore west of the city; the red granite or syenite obelisk of Thothmes III, with its fallen fellow, brought thither from Heliopolis, and usually called Cleopatra's Needles (lately removed, the one to London and the other to

New York); and the Column of Diocletian, more commonly known as Pompey's Pillar. In 1854, while preparations were going on for the erection of new buildings, the workmen came upon ancient massive foundations which are supposed to have been the remains of the building of the celebrated Alexandrian Library. See Murray, Handbook for Egypt, p. 75 sq.; Bädcker, Lower Egypt, p. 201 sq.

ALEXANDRIA, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Alexandrinum). In addition to the information already given under this head, a fuller account of some of these councils may be found below.

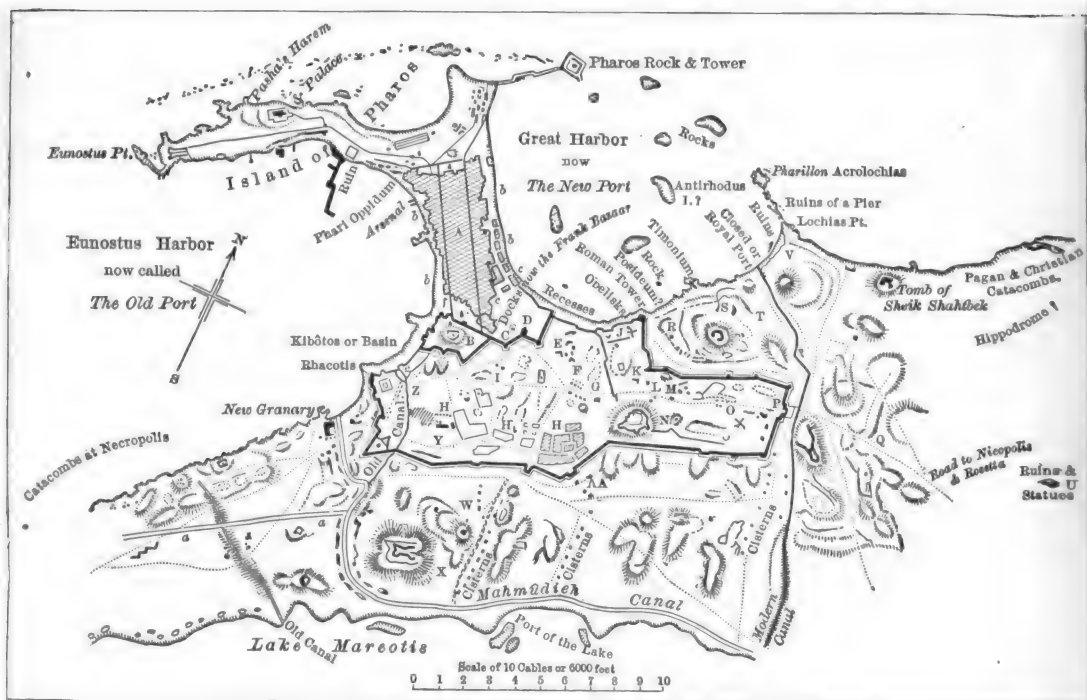

I. Held in 806, under Peter, bishop of Alexandria. Meletius, bishop of Lycopolis, was deposed, having been convicted of sacrificing to idols and many other crimes.

II. This council was held in the year 819 by the celebrated Hosius, bishop of Cordova, sent by Constantine to appease the troubles to which the heresies of Arius and the schism of Meletius had given rise, and to restore the peace of the Church. Hosius conducted himself in the business with fidelity and care worthy of his piety and of the confidence placed in him. In this council everything relating to the doctrine of the Trinity and to the condemnation of the heresy of Sabellius, who denied the distinction of persons in the sacred Trinity, was thoroughly discussed. Very little, however, is known of what passed here. See Labbe, Concil. i, 1493.

III. Held in 321, by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, attended by all his clergy, on account of the heresy of Arius, which was there condemned. Arius was the curate of a Church in Alexandria; he was a man of very considerable talent, with all the external appearance of inward excellence. Jealousy at seeing Al-neous with fidelity and care worthy of his piety and of the confidence placed in him. exander promoted to the throne of Alexandria betrayed him into heresy. The unimpeachable life of his bishop affording him no handle for attacking his character, he determined to accuse him on the score of doctrine; and as Alexander taught, according to the faith of the Church, that our Saviour Jesus Christ is truly God, Arius dared—first in private conversation, and afterwards publicly—to assert that the bishop was in error and had fallen into the heresy of Sabellius; that our Lord was but a creature, however exalted. Alexander, having sent for Arius, endeavored to win him back by mildness, advising and exhorting him to open his eyes to the enormity of his error; but the latter persisted in his opinions. At last this council was convoked, in which Arius and nine others of the clergy of Alexandria were condemned and deprived; also a synodical letter was addressed by Alexander to his brother bishop, Alexander of Byzantium. See Cave, Apostolici, p. 349.

Another council was held later in the same year by Alexander, composed of one hundred Egyptian bishops, exclusive of the priests who were present. After hearing Arius, it proceeded to anathematize him and twelve of his followers, both priests and deacons; also two bishops, Secundus and Theona; and to pass censure upon Eusebius of Nicomedia.

IV. Held in 340, in support of Athanasius, and after the death of Constantine. There were present at it eighty or one hundred bishops, from Egypt, the Thebaid, Libya, and Pentapolis. All the calumnies advanced against Athanasius by the Eusebians were refuted. Everything at this council was done according to rule, and altogether in a manner very different from what had been done two or three years before at the Council of Tyre. Athanasius was fully justified. These same bishops also wrote a synodical letter to all the orthodox prelates in order that, by union among themselves, they might be strengthened against the heresy. Complaint was made that the Eusebians continued to persecute Athanasius; that they had caused him to be exiled; and that they had sent to the three emperors a letter filled with fresh calumnies against him. This council justified his conduct; it went back to the origin of the persecutions which Athanasius had suffered, and showed that the Arians had hated him, even when he was only in deacon's orders; it proved that his ordination was strictly according to rule; it observed that Eusebius of Nicomedia had changed his see several times, forgetting that he who is once bound to a Church by the episcopate may not seek to change, lest he be found guilty of adultery according to the teaching of the Holy Scriptures. It showed, further, that the proceedings of the Council of Tyre were invalid, both because the party of Eusebius was dominant there, and the secular power prevented all freedom of action; again, it exonerated Athanasius of the murder of Arsenius, alluded afresh to the irregularity of the proceedings in the Mareotis, accused the Eusebians of dividing the Church by menaces and terror, and finally exhorted the bishops to give no credit to anything written against Athanasius. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 532.

V. Held in 362, by Athanasius, in concert with Eusebius of Vercelli, to deliberate with him and the other bishops upon the affairs of the Church, and particularly upon the means to be adopted for restoring peace and union to the Church of Antioch. The "orthodox" Christians could not induce the Eustathians (q. v.) to unite with them. The council settled that leaders and defenders of heresy should be admitted to penance, but not to retain their clerical office; while those who had been led away should be allowed to retain their rank, provided they subscribed the acts of the Council of Nicea. See Athanasius, De Ant. p. 575; Baronius, Annal. p. 362, § 235; Cave, Apostolici, p. 444.

VI. In the council held in 401, the writings of Origen were condemned. Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, who there presided, condemned also the promoters of the Arian heresy. See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1219.

ALEXANDRIA, JEWS IN. Whether the founder of Alexandria transplanted a Jewish colony into Egypt, or the first Ptolemy removed many Jewish prisoners to Egypt who received their freedom from his successor, or even a remnant of those emigrants who sought refuge in Egypt after the destruction of the first Temple had preserved themselves there, it is certain that the Jewish population was very numerous, numbering in Philo's time as many as a million (see Philo, In Flaccum, § 6; ed. Mangey, ii, 523).

1. Employment and Institutions.—The Jews had spread all over Egypt, from the Libyan desert in the north to the borders of Ethiopia in the south. In Egypt and Cyrene the Jews enjoyed the same privileges as the Greek inhabitants, and, because both having settled there at the same time, they were even preferred to the Egyptian aborigines, who, being once vanquished, were treated as such by their rulers. The Alexandrian Jews felt very proud of this equalization (ισοπολιτεια). The greatest number of Jews resided at Alexandria, which was, next to Rome, the second town for commerce and political importance, and, in the same manner, next to Athens, the second for arts and sciences. Of the five parts of Alexandria the Jews occupied almost two; especially the quarter called Delta (Josephus, War, ii, 18, 8), situated on the sea-shore, was entirely inhabited by them. As an Egyptian ruler had granted them the right of inspection over the navigation of both sea and river, they availed themselves of the opportunity thus offered to carry on a large trade by sea; and prosperity, together with a refined mode of life, was the fruit of activity. But commerce was in nowise their exclusive occupation. There were among the Alexandrian Jews tradesmen and artists; if any artists were wanted for the Temple in Jerusalem, they were always called from Alexandria (Talm. Yoma, 38 a; Erachim, 10 b), just as they were formerly obtained from Phœnicia. They acquired also the Grecian art of war and policy, as well as the melodious Greek language, and at length absorbed themselves in Grecian erudition and philosophy, so that many of them understood Homer and Plato quite as well as they did Moses and Solomon; while others, as statesmen and generals, rendered great services to the rulers of Egypt. Thus the Jewish congregation of Alexandria was admitted to be a strong pillar of Judaism. At the head of the Egyptian Jews was a chief president, who was of priestly descent, with high judicial powers, bearing the Grecian name Alabarch; he had to see to the proper payment of taxes of all the Jews, whom he was bound to protect under all circumstances. Besides him, there existed also a High Council (γερουσια), a fac-simile of the Jerusalem one, being composed of seventy members, who managed all religious affairs (Philo, In Flaccum, ed. Mangey, ii, 528).

In every part of the town houses of prayer, called προσευχαι, were erected, among which the building occupied as the chief synagogue was noted for its artistic style, elegance, and beautiful endowments. Each guild had its own place, in order that every stranger entering the synagogue might at once recognise his guild and be able to join his colleagues. In the Talmud treatise Sukkah, fol. 10, col. 2, we find the following graphic description of the synagogue in Alexandria: "He who has never seen the double hall of Alexandria has never beheld the majesty of Israel. It rose like a great palace (basilica); there was colonnade within colonnade; at times a throng of people filled the building twice as great as that which went out of Egypt with Moses. There were seventy golden chairs within inlaid with precious stones and pearls, according to the number of the seventy elders of the Sanhedrim. Each of these cost twenty-five millions of golden denarii. In the midst arose an alhamra of wood, on which stood the choir-leader of the synagogue. When any one rose to read in the law, the president waved a linen banner, and the people answered 'Amen.' At every benediction which the president spoke he waved the banner, and the people answered 'Amen.' They did not sit promiscuously," etc. The houses of prayer in Alexandria were also houses of instruction, for on all Sabbaths and festivals discourses were held by those well versed in Scripture, who explained in the Greek language the appointed portion of the Pentateuch which had previously been read to the congregation. During the Syrian oppressions, many prominent Jewish emigrants came from Judæa to Alexandria, and the most eminent among them was Onias, the youngest son of Onias III, the last legitimate high-priest, who, when his aged and venerable father was murdered, thought himself no longer safe in the mother country. The king of Egypt received him very favorably, and Onias rendered him, as general, many important services.

When, soon afterwards, the Temple was defiled by the Syrians, and especially when Alcimos was illegally made high-priest, Onias resolved to erect a lawful temple in Egypt in place of the one defiled in Jerusalem, and whose high-priest he himself should be. In order to obtain the consent of the Jews, he backed his proposition by referring them to the prophecy in Isaiah (xix, 19), which should thus become fulfilled: "One day an altar of the Lord will stand in Egypt." The then reigning king, Ptolemy Philometor, gave him for the purpose a plot of land in the neighborhood of Heliopolis, four and a half geographical miles north-east of Memphis, in the land of Goshen, where once Jacob's descendants had dwelt till the departure from Egypt. In the small town Leontopolis, on the ruins of an Egyptian idol-temple, where once animals had been worshipped, Onias built a sanctuary for the only one God. Its exterior did not entirely correspond with the Jerusalem Temple, but was more in the form of a tower, and built of fire-bricks, while the interior contained the vessels of the temple after the model in Jerusalem, except that the standing candlestick of seven branches was replaced by a golden chandelier, fixed on a golden chain. Priests and Levites who had escaped the persecution in Judæa served in Onias's temple. For the support of the temple and the priests, the king resigned, in the most generous manner, all the revenues of the Heliopolitic country. This happened about the year 160. Although the Egyptian Jews considered the temple of Onias as their centre, whither they all went on pilgrimage during festivals and took their sacrifices, yet they never placed it on a par with the one in Jerusalem. They, on the contrary, honored Jerusalem as the most sacred capital of all Judaism and its Temple as a divine place. As soon as the latter received its former dignity after the Syrian wars, they fulfilled towards it all their religious obligations in sending yearly their contributions by their own deputies, and also sacrificed there now and then. But the Jews of Jerusalem were, nevertheless, dissatisfied with this foreign temple; and although they did not exactly condemn it, yet they maintained that it was opposed to the express determination of the law (Deut. xii, 13). The priests of the temple of Onias were not permitted to do service in Jerusalem; but they were not deprived of their priestly dignity, and received their share of contributions belonging to the priests (Menachoth, 109 a).

II. Literary Productions.—On account of many refugees coming from Judæa to Egypt, who, owing to their great attachment to the Mosaic law, gave up their fatherland, after suffering innumerable afflictions, a desire arose in the Egyptian king to become acquainted with this so much honored law, especially as Antiochus, the persecutor of the Jews, was also his enemy. He ordered, therefore, that seventy-two theologians should come from the Holy Land, to whom he gave the commission of translating for him the law of Moses into Greek. In order that they should be undisturbed in this important work, and that no communication should take place between them, he brought them to the isle of Pharos, situated at a short distance from Alexandria, where he placed each of them in a separate apartment; yet their separate labor is said to have agreed, proving to the king the correctness of their interpretation. This translation is therefore generally called the translation of the Seventy. See SEPTUAGINT. In course of time, also, the remaining books of Holy Writ were translated; nay, even independently of these, some other books, fac-similes of the Biblical ones, were composed, such as the Book of Wisdom, and mostly the so-called Apocrypha, except the Book of Sirach, which was originally written in the sacred tongue. The completion of this work caused great joy among the Jews of Alexandria and Egypt. They were proud that the Greeks, boasting so much of their wisdom, at length perceived how much more sublime and ancient the wisdom of Judaism was than the doctrines of Grecian philosophers. It pleased them to be able to say, "Behold, Moses is greater than your philosophers." Therefore, in remembrance of this event, the day on which the king received the translation was kept as a jubilee on the isle of Pharos.

The Alexandrian Jews, however, were not satisfied with merely translating the books of their ancestors, but they produced a number of works of their own, the authors of which, together with fragments, are known to us from quotations preserved in Eusebius, or rather Alexander Polyhistor. The latter, who flourished between B.C. 90 and 80, is the author of a work, Περὶ Ἰουδαίων, in which he gives extracts from Jewish Hellenistic writers. Some of these excerpts, again, have been quoted by Eusebius in his Præparatio Evangelica (ix, 17-39). These authors are in part historians, viz.:

1. Ennoplemus (Eusebius, Præpar. Evangel. ix, 17, 26, 30-34, 39), the author of Περὶ Ἰουδαίων τῆς Ἀσσυρίας and Περὶ τῆς Ἡλίου Προφητείας, and, according to Clem. Alex. (Strom. i, 343, ed. Sylburg), also the author of Περὶ τῶν ἐν τῇ Ἰουδαίᾳ Βασιλέων. Josephus, who also mentions this author (Apion, i, 23), did not regard him as a Jew; but from the preserved fragments there can be no doubt as to his Jewish origin.
2. Artapanus (Eusebius, Præpar. Evangel. ix, 18, 23, 27) wrote Ἰουδαϊκὰ, or Περὶ Ἰουδαίων. The preserved fragments speaking of Abraham, Joseph, and Moses, also lead us to the conclusion that he was of Jewish descent.
3. Demetrius (Eusebius, ibid. ix, 21, 29) treats in his history (the title of which is unknown) of Jacob and Moses. That he was a Jew there can be no doubt.
4. Aristæus (Eusebius, ibid. ix, 25) wrote a historical work, Περὶ Ἰουδαίων. His fragments, which indicate his Jewish origin, speak of Job.

Eusebius cites also some poets, viz.:

5. The tragedian Ezekiel (Præpar. Evangel. ix, 28, 29), who wrote a drama entitled Ἐξαγωγή, which treats of the Exodus from Egypt. In the first fifty-nine lines (the Greek text is given by Delitzsch in his Geschichte der jüdischen Poesie, p. 211 sq.) Moses is introduced conversing with Zipporah, to whom he describes the fate of Israel in Egypt and his own history. He questions her about the seven virgins whom he sees in her company (ὁπῶς δὲ ταύτας ἐπὶ παρδόνους τινάς). After her reply there follows a description of the watering of the flock, of the marriage of Moses and Zipporah, and a fragment of a dialogue between the latter and Chonm. In another fragment Moses relates a dream to his father-in-law. In another Moses is introduced as standing before the burning bush, and God is represented as speaking unto him. Then follow Moses' objections, God's commission to Aaron, and the gift of the rod, whose wonder-working powers are described at great length. The whole concludes with a description of the drowning of Pharaoh's army in the Red Sea, as given by an escaped Egyptian. (For Ezekiel's tragedy and the following writer's work, comp. Philippson, Ezekiel, des jüdischen Trauerspieldichters Auszug aus Aegypten, und Philo, des älteren, Jerusalem [Berlin, 1830]).

6. Philo (Eusebius, Præpar. Evangel. ix, 20, 24, 37), who wrote Περὶ τῆς Ἱερουσόλυμης; and
7. Theodotus (Eusebius, ibid. ix, 22), the author of an epic poem Περὶ Ἰουδαίων. He seems to have been a Samaritan, since he calls Sichem "the holy city."

III. Alexandrian Philosophy of Religion.—"A philosophy of religion among the Jews appears, at first thought, an unwarranted expression. How could they, who, on the intellectual and religious side, secluded themselves so sedulously from all intercourse with neighboring peoples and were fully determined to give no admission to their sacrilegious notions concerning God and religious matters, come to feel any need of a religious philosophy or to have any inclination for it. The reason was that the attempted seclusion, especially in Alexandria, was far from complete, the spiritual blockade being inadequate to accomplish its purpose. It was inevitable that Greek ideas would follow the Greek language, and as soon as the doors were opened wide enough to admit the Sept. version some other means of defence than simple attempts to exclude and ignore the supposed hostile force were imperative. Hence began the period of compromise. Hellenism and the Hellenistic philosophy were an effort to harmonize the revelation of the Old Test. with the current and dominant teachings of Plato, Aristotle, and Pythagoras. Jewish scholars, like the author of the Book of Wisdom, like Aristobulus, and Philo, did not intend by any means to surrender anything essential to their faith, but, on the contrary, to win for their own prophets and wise men, even among the Greeks, a position higher than that held by their most admired philosophers. They hoped to beat the enemy on his own ground."

The main seat of this Judæo-philosophic activity was Alexandria; but it would be erroneous to think that outside of Alexandria Jewish philosophy was not cultivated. Alexandria, however, was naturally the central place for this branch of science. Thus the oldest Jewish philosopher whom we know, Aristobulus, was an Alexandrian. He lived in the time of Ptolemy Philometor, about B.C. 160, and wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch, fragments of which have been preserved by Eusebius (Prepar. Evangel. vii, 14; viii, 10; xiii, 12) and Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i, 342; v, 595; vi, 632, ed. Sylburg). His elucidations consist mainly in the endeavor to avoid anthropomorphisms. His philosophical tendency may be learned from the fact that he was known as a Peripatetic. The special object of his commentary was to prove that the true source of wisdom was the Old Test., and that this was also the source of Greek philosophy. Plato, Pythagoras, and the other philosophers have derived their wisdom only from Moses. Even the doctrines of the Greek poets, like Orpheus, Hesiod, Homer, and Linus, agree with those of Moses. He supports his assertion by quoting from these authors. These quotations, it is true, agree entirely with Jewish ideas, which make it certain that they were written by a Jew, whether falsified by Aristobulus or by some one else. While Aristobulus represented the Peripatetic school in the so-called fourth book of the Maccabees (formerly ascribed to Josephus, and found in his works under the title Εἰς Μακκαβαίους), the influence of the Stoic philosophy is perceptible. We know nothing of its author, nor of the time of its composition. It is a philosophical treatise or a discourse on the subject "Whether pious reason is master over the inclinations" (εἰ αὐτοδέσποτός ἐστι τῶν παθῶν ὁ εἰσερχόμενος λογισμός). From history, especially from the example of Eleazar and the seven Maccabæan brothers and their mother, the author tries to show the affirmative, ὅτι περικρατεῖ τῶν παθῶν ὁ λογισμός (i, 9). So far as he makes use of philosophical suppositions and ideas, they all belong to the Stoic school, as is indicated by the theme itself. Of greater import than those already mentioned is the Wisdom of Solomon. That the author of this hymn on divine wisdom was a philosophically learned Jew, probably an Alexandrian and belonging to the age before Philo, may be seen from the contents of his work, little as we otherwise know of him. He combines in his ideas Platonic and Stoic elements with those beginnings of theosophic speculations which grew on the soil of Palestinian Judaism. It is known that already in the Book of Job (xxviii, 12 sq.) and the Proverbs of Solomon (viii-ix), and more especially in Ecclesiasticus, the traces for a discernment between the divine wisdom and God himself are found, though the former is not yet actually hypostasized. But in the Book of Wisdom this hypostasizing of the divine wisdom is more freely carried out (comp. vii, 22-viii, 5; ix, 4, 9). The epithets given to wisdom are such as are only applied to God: thus she creates everything (viii, 5), governs everything (ver. 1), renews everything (vii, 27). He also distinctly discriminates wisdom from God, and places her in opposition to him as an independent being. She is a breath (ἀρμύς) of the power of God, a pure effluence (ἀπόρροια) from the glory of the Almighty, a reflection (ἀπαύγασμα) of the everlasting light (vii, 25-26); she liveth together with God (συμβιωσάν Θεοῦ ἔχουσα), is initiated into the mysteries of the knowledge of God (μυστήριος τῆς τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐπιστήμης), and is chooser of his works (αἰρέτις τῶν ἔργων αὐτοῦ), i. e. wisdom chooses among God's works what shall be carried into execution (viii, 3-4); she sitteth on God's throne (ix, 4, ἡ τῶν σῶν θρόνον παρέδρος); she knoweth God's works, and was present when he created the world, and knoweth what is acceptable in his sight, and right according to his commandments (ver. 9). All this shows a strong inclination to hypostasizing, although it cannot be said, considering the poetical and rhetorical character of the book, that the author presents the doctrine of hypostasizing the divine wisdom as a fixed formulated dogma. The expressions which he uses in order to designate the work of wisdom in the world (vii, 24, δύκει, χωρεῖ; viii, 1, διοικεῖ, etc.) remind us of the analogous formulas of the Stoical school. More distinctly we perceive the influence of the Stoical doctrine in the mentioning of four cardinal virtues (ver. 7, σωφροσύνη, φρόνησις, δικαιοσύνη, ἀνδρεία). On the other hand, however, the doctrine of the pre-existence of the soul (ver. 19-20), and that of the body as being the prison of the soul (ix, 15), show the Platonic influence. The real classical representative of Jewish Hellenistic philosophy is Philo, for whom and his system see the arts. PHILO; PHILOSOPHY, GREEK.

We need not resume the thread of history. The Jews of Alexandria had to undergo the same fate as their brethren in Jerusalem. Like the Temple in Jerusalem, so the famous Alexandrian synagogue was destroyed (between A.D. 115 and 117), and the glory of the Alexandrian Jews disappeared, never to be seen again. See Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, iii, 27, 180, 258-264, 271, 349, 411 sq.; Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. u. s. Sekten, i, 344 sq.; Schürer, Lehrbuch der Neutestamentlichen Zeitgeschichte, p. 349, 622 sq., 631 sq., 642 sq., and especially 648 sq., where the literature on Jewish philosophy is given. (B. P.)

Alexandrian Liturgy is a title given to that ancient liturgy to which the name of Mark the Evangelist is usually prefixed, believed to be at least as early as the 2d century. Its liturgical peculiarity is the prefixing the Great Intercession for the living and departed to the words and Institution, instead of affixing them to the Invocation of the Holy Ghost, as is the case in liturgies of the Antiochene family, or inserting them between the words of Institution and Invocation, as is the case with the Nestorian. On this liturgy were subsequently founded those of St. Cyril, St. Gregory, and the Coptic community; all of which bear a certain resemblance to the more simple liturgy of Alexandria. See LITURGY.

Alexicæcus was an appellation under which Neptune was worshipped by the tunny-fishers, that their nets might not be torn by the sword-fish. It was also an epithet of Apollo in Athens, given him for having freed the city from a spreading pestilence.

Alexirhœe, a nymph who was wife to Pan.

Alexis, GUILLAUME, a learned French Benedictine who lived near the close of the 15th century and at the commencement of the 16th. He was surnamed the good monk of the Abbey of Lyre, in the diocese of Evreux, and became prior of Bussy in Perche. He is supposed to have died in 1486, though the precise dates of his birth and death are unknown. Alexis made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and there fell a victim to the persecution of the Turks. He wrote, Le Passe-temps de Tout Homme et de Toute Femme, avec l'A, B, C, des Doubles (Paris, s. a.), in verse:—Le Grand Blason des Fautes Amours (ibid. s. a.; also in 1493; Lyons, 1506):—Le Contre-blason des Fautes Amours, entitled Le Grand Blason d'Amours Spirituelles et Divines, avec Certaines Épigrammes (Paris, s. a.):—Le Dialogue du Crucifix et du Pèlerin (ibid. 1521):—Le Loyer des Folles Amours et le Triomphe des Muses contre Amour, together with Quinze Joies du Mariage, in the two editions already cited:—Le Puisse-temps du Prieur de Bussy et son Frère le Cordelier, etc. (Rouen, s. a.):—Le Miroir des Moines (ibid. s. a.):—Le Martyrologe des Fausses Langues et le Chapitre Général d'Icelles tenu au Temple de Danger, faits par Couplets, etc. (ibid. and Paris, 1493):—Quatre Chants Royaux, which are found with the Palinodes, etc. (published at Paris, Rouen, and Caen). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alexius of the monastery of Studius was patriarch of Constantinople from 1025 to 1043. Some of his decrees are extant.

Alexius, Sr., was born at Rome about A.D. 350, and compelled by his parents to marry a lady of high rank, but escaping from her on the wedding evening, he spent the night in the porch of the Church of Our Lady of Edessa, where he lived on the charity of others for seventeen years. Having embarked for Tarsus, he was driven by contrary winds to Rome, and, unrecognised, took up his abode in a corner of his father's house. After his death a paper was found in his hand, on which were written his name and that of his family, and an account of his marriage, etc. The Romans celebrate his memory on July 17, and the Greeks on March 17. He is probably a mythical person, and his history should, without doubt, be applied to St. John Calybites. It may be that the Greeks gave him the sobriquet of Alexius (healer) because of the many miraculous cures attributed to him. See Baillet, July 17.

Alexius Aristenus was oconomus of the Church of Constantinople, and was present at the Council of Constantinople in 1166. He left Notes upon a Collection of Canons, printed by Justellus in his Library of the Canon Law (ii, 673); also by Beveridge, in Greek and Latin, with notes, in the Pandects of the Canons. See Cave, Historia Literaria, ii, 238.

Alexius, Nicolas, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Perugia, and at the age of twenty became a Dominican. Subsequently he ranked among the first preachers of Italy, and was a canon of the cathedral of his birthplace. Having filled the offices of first professor of the College of Perugia and inquisitor, he died, Feb. 28, 1585. He published a small Latin poem, On the Plague, and left several MSS.

Alexy, GUSTAV, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Rosenau, Austria, in 1833. He was a student in the University of Milan, Italy, where he graduated in 1867. The following year he came to New York, and, having been early intended for the ministry, he entered the Union Theological Seminary, and graduated in 1871, when he became a resident graduate. Seeing the destitute condition of the thousands of Hungarians and Bohemians in the city, he began the study of the Bohemian language, and was ordained by the Presbytery of New York as a missionary to the same. Prior, however, to entering upon that work, he served as a missionary two years in Barcelona, Spain. He then returned to New York, and founded a Bohemian mission in East Fourth Street, near Avenue C. His labors were unceasing in preaching and pastoral visitation; and he was entirely successful in building up a Church and a flourishing Sunday-school. He died suddenly in the street, on Jan. 29, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Alfabet, in Norse mythology, was a festival at which offerings were made to the elves at night by the inhabitants of the Scandinavian peninsula.

Alfadur (Father of all), in Norse mythology, was the supreme god of Norse antiquity. The same attributes which the Mosaic economy ascribes to the "unspeakable," and which the Christian ascribes to the "only God," are found here also. He is creator and preserver of the universe; his breath is felt in all ages; his greatness is unsearchable; he has never shown himself to a mortal; and when his spirit comes upon the earth, he dwells in the shade of quiet, sacred woods. His will is over all, and everything is subject to his might. This supreme being, who existed before the world, and will exist eternally, is often mistaken for Odin.

Alfani, DOMENICO DI PARIS, an Italian painter, was born at Perugia in 1483. He was a scholar of Perugin, whose style he excelled. His reputation has suffered from that of his son Orazio; and even in Perugia some fine works were long ascribed to the latter which are now restored to Domenico. They painted together some fine altar-pieces, especially one in the Church of the Conventuals at Perugia, mentioned by Mariotti. The same writer says he was living in 1536; but Zani says he painted as late as 1553.

Alfaquis (or Alfaquins) is the term generally applied among the Moors to signify their clergy, or those who give instruction in the Mohammedan religion.

Alfaro y Gomez, Don JUAN, a Spanish painter, was born at Cordova in 1640. He studied under Antonio de Castillo and Velasquez. In the Church of the Carmelites is a fine picture of The Incarnation by Alfaro, and in the Church of the royal College at Madrid is his famous picture of the Guardian Angel. He also painted the portrait of Calderon de la Barca, which was placed upon the tomb of the poet in the Church of San Salvador at Madrid. He died in 1680.

Alfasi. See ALFEZ.

Alfenfuss (or Alfenkreuz), in Scandinavian mythology, is the noted Pentagram, or five-pointed star.

Alferius, Sr., flourished about the middle of the 11th century. A dangerous illness led him to embrace the ecclesiastical state; and he assumed the Benedictine habit at Cluny, under Odilo, about 991. His reputation for sanctity was such that Gaimarus III, prince of Salerno, sent for him to superintend the monasteries in that place. He afterwards retired to the side of Mount St. Elias, and thence to a solitary and dismal cavern, where he was followed by a number of persons. Out of these he chose twelve. The place of his retirement was called the Cave, and became the site of the celebrated monastery Cenobium Cavanese. The saint died in 1050. See Bollandus, Jan. 17, Feb. 17, Mar. 14; Italia Sacra, vii, 367.

Alfez (or Alfasi), ISAAC BERABBI JACOB, a Jewish rabbi, was born near Fez in 1013. At the age of sixty-five he was obliged to retire to Cordova on account of a quarrel. He died at Lucena, Spain, in 1103. While at Cordova he composed a work on practical Jewish ceremonies (ספר החיכות, Book of the Halachoth), which the Jews highly esteem and popularly call "The Little Talmud." This work had a large number of editions, the first and most rare is that published at Constantinople in 1509. Sabioneta published another at Venice in 1552, more complete and more highly valued. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Fürst, Biblioth. Jud. i, 35 sq.

Alfheim, in Norse mythology, is the place of habitation of the elves, presented to the god Frey by the Asas when he got his first tooth. As Frey is the god of fruitfulness, the sunbeams must be subject to him, therefore the elves of light and their habitation must be long to him. Alfheim lies adjoining to Thrudheim, the kingdom of the thunder-god, Thor.

Alfhild, in Norse mythology, is an honored and famous name of women, e.g. of the wife of king Wal-dar, the daughter of Iwar Widfámés, and the mother of the powerful Ragnar Lodbrog, etc.

Alfhun. See ALHUN.

Alfonso DE ESPINA, OR SPINA, a celebrated Spanish theologian and preacher, lived near the middle of the 15th century. He was, it is said, of Jewish origin, and entered the Order of Franciscans; became rector of the University of Salamanca, and bishop of Orense, in Galicia. He published a large anonymous work, entitled Fortalitium Fidei contra Judeos, Saracenos, aliosque Christianæ Fidei Inimicos (first published in 1487, then in 1494 at Nuremberg; among other editions are those of Totanus, published at Lyons, 1511 and 1524). In the third part may be found violent accusations against the Jews which served as a pretext for their persecution. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. See also ALPHONSO.

Al-forcan (Arab. distinction), a name given by the Mohammedans to the Koran, because, as they claim, it distinguishes truth from falsehood, and what is just from what is unjust. The term may have been applied to the Koran as being a book distinct or separate from every other book.

Alford, Henry, D.D., an English prelate, preacher, poet, and commentator, was born in London, Oct. 7, 1810. His father was a clergyman of the evangelical party in the Church of England. Henry was an only child, and remarkably precocious and studious. Having left Ilminster School, he was sent as a private pupil to the excellent Mr. Bickersteth, of Acton, in Suffolk, where, in addition to thorough mental training, he was carefully instructed in the principles of evangelical religion. From Acton he went to Cambridge and entered Trinity College, in which his course was one of the highest distinction. In 1835 Mr. Alford obtained the presentation to the small vicarage of Wymes-wold, in Worcestershire. When he took charge of the parish it was in a deplorable state of disorder and neglect; but through the indefatigable industry of the new vicar, the church was renovated and the spiritual wants of the people attended to with unceasing fidelity. In addition to his work as a clergyman, he engaged in teaching and in literary pursuits. One of his pupils whom he had prepared for Cambridge entered the Church of Rome, and he was charged with culpable negligence in having failed to counteract his Romish tendencies. This incident caused so much unpleasantness that Mr. Alford sought a fresh field of labor; and through the friendship of the Rev. J. H. Gurney, Quebec Chapel, London, became the scene of his ministrations (1853). It was a post for which he was singularly qualified, and in which he had ample opportunity of making full proof of his ministry. But ere long his reputation as a scholar and preacher won for him preferment to the deanery of Canterbury (1857). In this position he was in his element; here he found all that could please the eye, delight the ear, and fascinate a soul peculiarly open to æsthetic enjoyment. There was a halo of poetry and romance cast around even the historical associations of the fabric and the city most congenial to the temperament of the new dean. He became B.A. in 1832, M.A. in 1835, and B.D. in 1849. He died Jan. 12, 1871. Dean Alford's poetical works are, Poems and Poetical Fragments (Camb. 1831):—The School of the Heart, and Other Poems (1835, 2 vols.):—Abbot of Muchelney, and Other Poems (12mo):—Chapters on the Poets of Ancient Greece (1841, 8vo):—Psalms and Hymns Adapted to the Sundays and Holydays throughout the Year (Lond. 1844), to which are added some occasional hymns:—Poetical Works (2 vols. 12mo):—Select Poetical Works (Boston, 1853, 12mo, pp. 424). Among his many hymns which are found in different hymn-books, there is also a rendering of the famous Dies Iræ ("day of anger, the dread day"). In general religious literature, besides his contributions to the Contemporary Review, Dean Alford wrote, The Consistency of the Divine Conduct in Revealing the Doctrines of Redemption (Camb. 1842; pt. ii, 1843), being the Hulsean Lectures for 1841; to which are added two Sermons preached before the University of Cambridge:—Sermons (8vo):—Sermons at Quebec Chapel (2 vols. 8vo):—Village Sermons (12mo):—The State of the Blessed Dead (1870):—The Coming of the Bridegroom (eod.):—Easteride Sermons (1866):—Advent Sermons (1872):—The Sons of God; the Known and the Unknown (1875):—Truth and Trust (1871):—Fireside Homilies (edited by his widow, 1875):—Meditations in Advent (1865):—The Year of Prayer (1867):—Life, Journal, and Letters (ed. by his widow, Phila. 1873). His exegetical works are as follows: in 1849 he published the first volume of The Greek Testament, with a Critically Revised Text, a Digest of Various Readings, etc., and a Critical and Exegetical Commentary, and the whole was completed in 1861; since that time it has been published in different editions:—How to Study the New Testament (Lond. 1865–69, 3 vols.):—The New Testament for English Readers, Containing the Authorized Version with Marginal Corrections of Readings and Renderings, etc. (1868, 4 vols.):—The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, after the Authorized Version; Newly Compared with the Original Greek and Revised (1870):—The Book of Genesis and Part of the Book of Exodus (a revised version, etc. 1872). See (Lond.) Christian Observer, May, 1873, p. 387; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Alford, Michael (Griffith), an English Jesuit, was born at London in 1582. He studied philosophy at Seville, and theology at Louvain. He was five years penitentiary at Rome, then coadjutor of the superior of the English College at Liege, and finally rector of the house of the Jesuits at Ghent. Being sent to England, he was arrested on his arrival at Dover and cast into prison, from which he was released by Henrietta, queen of France. He retired to the province of Lancaster, where he occupied himself in collecting material for his Annales Ecclesiastiques et Civiles d'Angleterre. He was called back to the Continent in 1652 by the head of the order, and died the same year at St. Omer. He is the author of three learned works, Vie de Saint Winifrid traduite du Latin de Robert, prieur de Shrewsbury (1635), under the name of John Flood:—Britannia Illustrata, sive Lucii, Helenæ, Constantinii Patria et Fides (Antw. 1641):—Annales Ecclesiastici et Civiles Britannorum, Saxorum, etc. (Liege, 1663): Hugh Cressy made use of this work in his Histoire l'Eglise d'Angleterre. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alfred. See ALRED.

Alfred, WILLIAM, a Bible Christian minister, was born in Cornwall, England, July 15, 1842. He was converted when seventeen years of age; was accepted on trial by the conference in 1864; and in the year 1867 received an appointment to Victoria, Australia, at which place he arrived June 28. After laboring with great acceptability and usefulness for nearly five years, he died, April 27, 1872. See Minutes of the Conference, 1872.

Alfrio (AIFRIC, ALVRIC, ALVRID, ELFRIC, OR ALERIC), an English prelate, lived in the beginning of the 11th century, and was brought up in the school established at Winchester by the bishop St. Ethelwold. In 987 he was appointed by St. Elphegus to govern the abbey of Cerne, in Dorsetshire; afterwards he became abbot of Medehampton (or Peterborough), eventually bishop of Worcester, and in 1023 archbishop of York. He obtained from king Ethelred many privileges for his order, and died in 1050. On account of his great knowledge he was called "the grammarian," and his sermons were so highly esteemed that they were translated into Saxon, and read publicly in the churches. He is often confounded with Aelfric of Canterbury (A.D. 996–1006), Aelfric of Abingdon (963–1005), Elfric of York (1023–1051), Alfric Bota the Anglo-Saxon scholar (11th century), Alfric of Hereford (941), Alfric of Bamsbury or (?) Malmesbury (942), and Alfric of Westminster (956). See Cave, Historia Literaria, ii, 108; Rose, New General Biographical Dictionary, s. v.

Alfroedull, in Norse mythology, is the first ray of light announcing the coming of day, at whose appearance all spirits of darkness flee.

Algardi, ALESSANDRO, an Italian sculptor, was born at Bologna about the year 1600. He was employed at Rome through the influence of Domenichino, and achieved a reputation as the first sculptor of his time by a statue of St. Philip Neri, in the sacristy of the Oratorian Church in that city, and a colossal group representing The Decapitation of St. Paul, in the Church of the Barnabites at Bologna. He executed the bronze statue of Innocent X, erected to commemorate the completion of the Capitol at Rome, the monument of Leo XI in St. Peter's, and a bass-relief representing Attila checked by St. Leo for one of the altars in the same church—the largest work of the kind in the world.

Alger (Lat. ALGERUS) OF LIEGE (or OF CLUNY), a learned French priest, was born about 1055 at Liege. He studied at his native place, where he was appointed deacon of St. Bartholomew's. About 1100 bishop Otbert made him canon of the Cathedral of St. Mary and St. Lambert, where he labored for twenty years. In 1121 he retired to the monastery at Cluny, where he died about 1132. As an ecclesiastical writer he was very prominent. He wrote, Tractatus Ecclesiasticis Negotiis et Catholicæ Fidei Valde Utiles:—De Sacramentis Corporis et Sanguinis Domini Libri III (published by Erasmus, who called this work "Opus pium juxta ac doctum" [Basle, 1530, and reprinted in the Bibl. Patr. Lugd. xxi, 251 sq.]);—Tractatus de Misericordia et Justitia (published by Mabillon in his Vetæra Analecta [Paris, 1723], p. 129 sq.; by Martène in his Thesaur. Nov. Anecd. v, 1019; and reprinted by Migne in vol. clxxx of his patrology);—Tractatus de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio (published in vol. iv of the Thesaur. Anecd. pt. ii, p. 114 sq.). A part of his Letters and his History of the Church of Liege have been lost. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Richter, Beiträge (Leips. 1834), p. 7–17; Hüffer, Beiträge (Münster, 1862), p. 1–66; Schulte, in Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v.; Wagenmann, in Herzog's Real-Encyklop. (2d ed.), s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. Algerius, POMPONIUS, a martyr, was an Italian by birth, and a man of great learning. He became a student in the University of Padua, where he ceased not, both by doctrine and example of life, to inform as many as he could in the evangelical doctrine and bring them to Christ. For this he was accused of heresy to pope Paul IV, who had him imprisoned at Venice, and afterwards sent to Rome. Resisting all persuasions and allurements to change his mind, he was burned alive in 1555. While in prison at Venice, he wrote several letters to his friends, indicative of his firm faith. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 467.

Al-Ghazzali (or Ilgazel), ABU HAMED MUHAMMAD, a Moslem theologian who met the heretical Arabian philosophers on their own ground, was born in 1058, and belonged to the sect of the Ascharites. At the age of thirty-three he became the head of a theological college at Bagdad, where his lectures were thronged with eager crowds, including all the imams of the country. His mind having revolted against the orthodox Mohammedan creed, he escaped from Bagdad on the plea of making a pilgrimage to Mecca, but went to Syria, and spent ten years in seclusion and meditation at Damascus. While on a journey to Egypt, his private affairs induced him to return to Bagdad, where he reluctantly resumed teaching. There he continued for fifteen years, then retired to Tus, in Khorassan, his native town, and devoted his remaining years to the contemplative life of the Sûfis, who had been his earliest instructors. He died in 1111. He attacked the accepted Aristotelianism of the time in a work entitled The Destruction of the Philosophers. For information concerning his philosophical opinions, see Averrhoës, Works, vol. x, but more especially his spiritual autobiography, translated by Schmölbers in his Essai sur les Écoles Philosophiques chez les Arabes. See also Von Hammer, introduction to O Kind; Munk, Mélanges; and Gosche, in Abhandlungen der königl. Akad. der Wissenschaften zu Berlin, 1858.

Algheard. See ALHEARD.

Algos (pain), in Greek mythology, was the daughter of Eris, a granddaughter of Night.

Algrin (or Malgrin), JOHN, a French prelate and theologian, was born near the close of the 12th century. Nothing definite is known concerning the first part of his life. He was prior of Abbeville, and afterwards went to the University of Paris, where he gained the reputation of being a learned man and an able preacher. In 1225 he was appointed archbishop of Besançon, and in 1227 Gregory IX made him cardinal. He was sent as legate to Arragon in order to stir up the crusade against the Saracens, and afterwards brought about a reconciliation between the pope and emperor Frederick II. He died Sept. 28, 1237. Manuscripts of sermons and commentaries upon the Psalms, written by him, are found in the National Library at Paris. He also wrote, Commentaire sur le Cantique des Cantiques (Paris, 1521). See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Al-hakem IBN-ATTA. See ATHA BEN-HAKEM.

Alheard (Alchardus, Algheard, or Ealheard, Ealghæard), a bishop of Elmham, was present at the Legatine Council of A.D. 786, and at that of Clovesho in 803, the decree of which he signed. He attested several charters drawn up in councils (788–805), and is doubtless the person called Alchbertus in the charter of Winchelcomb, granted at the consecration of that abbey in 811. Alcuin's 217th letter is addressed to him and Tidfrith of Dunwich.

Alhun (Alfhun, Aelhun, or Aelfhun), the eighth bishop of Dunwich, was consecrated about A.D. 790. He subscribed several charters of Offa between that year and 793. He died in 797 at Sudbury, and was buried at Dunwich.

Alhunig. See ALWIG.

Ali (or Wali), in Norse mythology, was a god of spring, the symbol of the growing light in the north. He was the son of Odin and Rinda. He slew the wicked giant Hödhr to avenge the death of the beautiful Baldur, the beloved of gods and men. Walaskialf is the name of his crystal palace.

Aliamet, FRANÇOIS GERMAIN, a French portrait and historical engraver, was born in 1734. He studied in Paris, and afterwards went to London, and was for some time under Sir Robert Strange. His works are said to be fine, but they do not equal those of his brother Jacques. A few of the principal ones are, the Adoration of the Shepherds, after Caracci;—the Circumcision, after Guido;—and the Stoning of St. Stephen, after Le Sueur.

Aliberti, GIOVANNI CARLO, an Italian painter, was born at Asti, in Piedmont, in 1680. Lanzi says he executed some important works in fresco in the churches of Asti, as in the Church of Sant' Agostino, representing that saint taken up to heaven surrounded by angels, also another of Sant' Agostino baptizing a number of children, and other figures. He died in 1740.

Alien Priories are cells belonging to foreign religious houses in England. They were dissolved by stat. 2 Henry V. One of the most perfect is that of Wilmington, Sussex.

Alienation of Church Property. The transference by gift, sale, exchange, or perpetual emphyteusis (renting) of Church property was from early times restrained by special enactments. It is a much debated question among canonists whether alienation, except in extraordinary cases, was not absolutely prohibited in the first ages of the Church. This was by reason of the sacred character impressed upon property given for ecclesiastical purposes, and by that act dedicated to God. The oath now taken by Romish bishops contains a clause relating to the alienation of Church property. The words of this clause, as well as the time at which it was first introduced, have given rise to much controversy.

The general law of the Church makes all vessels and the like which have been consecrated to God, all immovable possessions, inalienable; the bishops to be ordinarily the administrators responsible to God. Its history, as it is found in the councils of different churches, has now to be traced.

The earliest canon on the subject is the fifteenth of the Council of Ancyra (A.D. 314), which provides that the Church may resume possession of whatever property the presbyters of a diocese may have sold during the vacancy of the see. But this canon does not limit any power which the bishop himself may have previously possessed.

The Council of Antioch (A.D. 341) has two canons bearing upon this subject. The twenty-fourth directs that Church property should be distinguished in such a way that the presbyters and deacons may know of what it consists, so that at the bishop's death it may not be embezzled, lost, or mixed up with his private property. By the twenty-fifth canon it is provided that the provincial synod should have jurisdiction in cases where the bishop is accused of converting Church property to his own use, or managing it without the consent of the presbyters and deacons, and also in cases where the bishop or the presbyters who are associated with him are accused of any misappropriation for their own benefit.

The seventh and eighth canons of the Council of Gangra prohibit, under anathema, all persons from alienating produce belonging to the Church except they first obtain the consent of the bishop or his oeconomus, or officer intrusted with the care of Church property.

The fourth Council of Carthage, can. 31, enjoined the bishop to use the possessions of the Church as trustee; and by the next canon pronounced invalid all gifts, sales, or exchanges of Church property made by bishops without the consent in writing of their clergy.

By the twenty-ninth canon of the African code (A.D. 419) it is ordained that no one sell the real property belonging to the Church; but in case of urgency the primate of the province is to determine in council with bishops (twelve) whether a sale is to be made or not. In case the necessity for action is so great that the bishop cannot wait to consult the synod, then he is to summon as witnesses the neighboring bishops at least, and to report afterwards to the synod. The penalty of disobedience to this canon is deposition. By the thirty-third canon, presbyters are forbidden to sell any Church property without the consent of their bishops, and in like manner the bishops are forbidden to sell any Church lands without the knowledge of their synod or presbyters.

Passing to Italy, we find that in A.D. 483, the clergy being assembled in St. Peter's upon the death of pope Simplicius, Basilus, the patrician and præfect of Rome, acting as vicegerent of Odoacer, the barbarian king, proclaimed the following edict: "That no one, under the penalty of anathema, should alienate any farm, buildings, or ornaments of the churches; that such alienation by any bishop present or future was null and void." This decree was declared invalid at the Council of Rome held by Symmachus (502), on the ground of its being, contrary to the usages of the fathers, enacted on lay authority, and as not being ratified by the signature of any bishop at Rome. The same council, however, re-enacted its ordinances against the alienation of Church property. Previously to this, Leo the Great (447) had written to the bishops of Sicily and forbidden the alienation of Church property. Pope Geladius (492-496) took action in the same direction.

In the Gallican Church, the earliest reference to alienation is to be found in a letter from pope Hilary (A.D. 462) to the bishops of the provinces of Vienne, Lyons, Narbonne, and the Maritime Alps, which prohibits the alienation of such Church lands as are neither waste nor unproductive, except with the consent of a council.

The Council of Agde (A.D. 506) contains several canons on alienation, and the first Council of Orleans (511) places all the immovable property of the Church in the power of the bishop. By the first Council of Clermont (535) all persons are excommunicated who obtain any Church property from kings. The twelfth canon of the third Council of Orleans (538) allows the recovery of Church property within thirty years, while the twenty-third canon renews the prohibition against the alienation of Church property by abbots, etc., without the written consent of the bishop. Canons against alienation were promulgated by the councils of Paris (the third), Narbonne, and the third, fourth, and ninth of Toledo. Similar provisions were made in England by archbishop Theodore of Canterbury, and in the Exceptions and the Pœnitentiale.

The provisions of the civil law have been arranged as follows: Immovable property belonging to the Church cannot be alienated under any circumstances if it fall within the following classes: (1) if it had been given by the emperor; (2) if the thing to be alienated is the Church or monastery itself; (3) when the proposed transferee is the oeconomus or other Church officer, or a heretic; (4) when the property was given to the Church on the condition that it should not be alienated. Subject to the above restrictions, immovable property may be alienated either for (1) debt, (2) by way of emphyteusis for a term, (3) in exchange with another Church, (4) if the transferee be the emperor, (5) or for the redemption of captives. We also find laws directed against the alienation of Church property in Leges Visigothorum, bk. v, ch. iii (about A.D. 700); Lex Alamannorum, ch. xx; and Capitularia Regum Francorum (814). So it is found that the utmost precaution was taken lest, under the pretence of necessity or charity, any spoil or devastation should be made of the goods and revenues of the Church. See Bingham, Christ. Antiq. bk. v, ch. vi, § 6, 7; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v.

In the United States the laws relating to the sale of Church property, especially real estate, differ somewhat in the several states; but they all include a reference to the appropriate Church authority in the respective denominations, and generally require a special application to the civil court. See CORPORATION, ECCLESIASTICAL.

Alignan, BENOIT D', a learned French Benedictine and a traveller in Palestine, was priest of Notre Dame of Grasse, in the diocese of Carcassonne, until, in 1229, he was appointed bishop of Marseilles. This city was at that time agitated by internal dissensions, occasioned by both the viscounts and the monks laying claim to civil jurisdiction. In 1239 D'Alignan associated himself at Thibet with the king of Navarre and the count of Champagne in order to make a journey through the Holy Land, and while in the East he contributed towards the construction of a castle. In 1248 he assisted at the Council of Valencia. Under his prelaty, he introduced a new religious order called the "Brothers of the Holy Mary, the Mother of Christ," which Clement confirmed in 1266, and which the Council of Lyons suppressed in 1276. In 1260 he again visited the Holy Land, where he remained three years. He died in July, 1268. He left some works printed and others in MS. Among those published we find, Profationes Benedicti, Episcopi Masiliensis, in Commentarium suum de Sancta Trinitate et Fide Catholica (by Baluze):—Sententia Lata in Synodo, de Decimis:—Epistola ad Innocentium Papam IV, in the Spicilegium of D'Achery:—De Constructione Castris Saphet, a work also inserted by Baluze in his Miscellanea. This is concerning the building of the fortress of Saphet in the Holy Land, in which he asserts that its power extends over two hundred and seventy villages, the site of which villages he claims to have been the place where Joseph was sold, where Christ first preached, where Peter paid the tribute-money, and many other events of sacred history transpired. This castle, the boulevard of the Christians of the Holy Land, fell into the hands of the Babylonians in 1266, and the templars were driven out. Great effort was made to regain this, but two of their number proving traitors led to their defeat. The MS. (Bibliothèque Nationale, No. 4224) which contains the principal work of D'Alignan is a large volume in parchment. The title of the work is Tractatus Fidei Diversos Errores super Titulum: De Summa Trinitate et Fide Catholica in Decretalibus. This is a great exposition of Christian doctrine, or a treatise on practical theology. In connection with this the author has several brief treatises, as, Exposition de l'Oraison Dominicale:—Salutation Angélique. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alilat, an ancient Arabian goddess, possibly a form of the moon.

Alinard (or Halynard), a French prelate, was born in the last half of the 10th century. He joined the Benedictine friars at the monastery of St. Bénigne, at Dijon. His parents, who belonged to the first families of Burgundy, attempted by persuasion and derision to deter him from this purpose, but in vain. Alinard was made priest at St. Bénigne; and his wise administration, together with his saintly life, won for him the esteem of kings Robert and Henry I, as well as of the emperors of Germany, Conrad and Henry III. The position becoming vacant, the people of Lyons demanded Alinard for their archbishop, but he modestly refused until ordered by pope Gregory VI to accept. When he presented himself to receive the investiture, the emperor wished him to take the oath of fidelity, but he refused, asserting that his promise was sufficient, and that he preferred to remain a priest rather than take an oath. This firmness pleased the monarch, who wished to assist at the consecration of Alinard (1046). In 1047 the emperor went to Rome, taking with him the new archbishop, who, by his affability and eloquence, won the regard of the Romans. After the death of Clement II, the people demanded him for pope, but he secreted himself until Leo IX had been raised to the position. At the request of the new pontiff, Alinard accompanied him to France, Rome, and Monte-Casino, and was employed in the negotiations which preceded the treaty of peace between the Normans and the inhabitants of Lower Italy. The pope, invited to visit the emperor, desired Alinard to remain at Rome in order to take part in the administration of the affairs of the Church. Hugh, who for bad conduct had been deposed from the bishopric of Langres, came to the court of Rome to solicit his re-establishment. As he was about to return to France, Alinard joined him, with his companions, and dined with him. -At the dinner some one administered poison to Alinard, who died in consequence, July 29, 1052, and was interred with high honor in the Church of St. Paul. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alipes, in Roman mythology, was a surname of Mercury, because he had wings on his feet.

Alison, Archibald, an English divine, was born in 1757, and matriculated at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1775, where he proceeded to the degree of B.C.L., March 23, 1784. At the time of his decease he was senior minister of the Episcopal Chapel, Cowgate, Edinburgh. In 1790 Mr. Alison published Essays on the Nature and Principles of Taste, which work has attained a wide celebrity. He gave to the world a number of Sermons (1809-15), also a Memoir of the Life and Writings of Lady Woodhouslee (Trans. Edinb. R. Soc. 1818, vii, 515). See Christian Remembrancer, July, 1839, p. 440; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Alison, Hector, a Presbyterian minister, was examined by the Synod's committee and approved May 28, 1745. He was ordained by the Newcastle Presbytery in 1746 at White Clay, and settled at Drawyers. In 1750 he was sent for eight Sabbaths to Western Virginia. In 1753 he asked for a dissolution of his pastoral relation, but it was not granted for obvious reasons. In 1760 he was allowed to go as chaplain to the Pennsylvania forces, and, in answer to a pressing application made to the Synod in that year by the Church at Albany, N. Y., he was directed to supply the same. He joined the Newcastle Presbytery in 1761. An application from Baltimore on his behalf was not placed in his hands, it being deemed inexpedient. He was dismissed from the presbytery in December of that year with a view to join the South Carolina Presbytery, and was settled at Williamsburg, S. C., where he remained till his death, the date of which is not known. (W. P. S.)

Alison, Hugh, a Presbyterian minister, was a native of Pennsylvania. After his graduation from Princeton College, he was for some time engaged as a teacher in Charleston, S. C. He removed to James Island, taking with him a number of young men, with a view to superintend their education. He also became pastor of the Presbyterian Church on that island, where he died in 1781. See Alexander, Princeton College in the 18th Century.

Aliterius and Aliteria. Jupiter and Ceres were thus called for preventing millers from stealing meal.

Alitta, in Arabian mythology, was a goddess of the Bedawin, whom Herodotus compares with Venus and Urania of the Greeks, the Myliuta (q. v.) of the Assyrians, Mitra of the Persians, perhaps also with Astarte of the Phenicians, and Anaitis of the Armenians. The Arabians have always represented this goddess by a black, three-cornered, four-foot-high and two-foot-broad stone, which rested upon a golden frame, in Mecca. They affirm that this stone came from Abraham's feet—when he again built the holy Kaaba according to the original plan—which had been carried by the angels into heaven at the time of the Flood.

Aliz, Ferdinand, a French theologian, was born at Frasné in 1740. He was brought up by one of his uncles; studied theology at Besançon; emigrated during the Revolution, after which he returned and became rector of Vercell, near Pontarlier. He died there, Feb. 4, 1825, leaving, Le Manuel des Catholiques, ou Recueil de divers Entretiens Familiers sur la Religion:—Les Impies Modernes:—Le Dernier Prône d'un Prêtre du Jura. These three works were published in Switzerland from 1794 to 1796. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aliz, Jean, a French painter and engraver, lived in the 17th century, and was a scholar of Philip de Champagne. There is an etching by this artist of a Holy Family, after Raphael, executed in a pleasing style. It is marked "R. V. P.," i. e. "Raphael Urbino pinxit."

Alix, Pierre, a French ecclesiastical historian, was born at Dole in 1600. He was canon at Besançon, and priest of St. Paul's in 1652. He sustained firmly the laws of the metropolitan chapter against the pope, Alexander VII. He died July 6, 1676. He wrote a treatise entitled Pro Capitulo Imperiali Bisuntino, super Jure Eligendi suos Archiepiscopos ac Decanos Commentarius (Besançon, 1672):—also Refutatio Scripti Roma nuper Transmissi contra Jura Capituli Bisuntini. This again aroused the censure directed against him by father Simard, inquisitor of Besançon; but he responded to him in a small treatise, entitled L'Éponge pour Effacer la Censure du Père Simard, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Al-Jahedh, the founder of a sect among the Mohammedans, which maintained that the Koran was an animated being, sometimes a man, sometimes a beast. This opinion has sometimes been supposed to be an allegory, signifying that the Koran becomes good or bad according to the true or false exposition of it; and in this sense the most orthodox Mussulmans often say that the Koran has two faces, that of a man and that of a beast, meaning thereby the literal and spiritual sense.

Alkabaz (or Alkabets), SOLOMON BEN-MOSES, a Jewish writer of Safed, in Upper Galilee, who flourished from 1529 to 1553, is the author of a commentary on the Song of Songs, entitled אילנה אהבים (Venice, 1552):—on Esther, entitled מנוח הלוי (ibid. 1585):—on Ruth, called שרש ישע, The Root of Jesse (Const. 1561). He also wrote religious hymns, שירים, of which the hymn for the Sabbath eve, לבה דורי, "Come, my beloved," is best known. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 39; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 38. (B. P.)

Al-kaḍba, a term used by Mohammedans to denote the visit of consummation or accomplishment and pilgrimage to Mecca which Mohammed and his followers performed in the seventh year of the Hegira. At the distance of six miles from the town they all took an oath to perform religiously all the ceremonies and rites prescribed in that visit. Leaving their arms and baggage outside, they entered the holy city in triumph, devoutly kissed the Black Stone in the Kaaba, and went seven times round the temple. The first three rounds they went running, jumping, and shaking their shoulders, to show that they were still vigorous after their journey; the other four rounds they walked, so as not to exhaust themselves. This custom is still observed by the Moslems making pilgrimages to Mecca. Having finished their seven rounds, prayer was proclaimed, and the prophet, mounted on a camel, rode seven times between two hills, in which at that time were to be seen two idols of the Koreishites. The whole concluded with a sacrifice of seventy camels, and the Mussulmans shaved themselves.

Al-kelam (Arab. the knowledge of the word) is the scholastic and metaphysical theology of the Mohammedans. It treats of speculative points, such as the attributes of God, and is full of subtleties in reference to abstract notions and terms. It is divided into four heads. The first treats of the nature and attributes of God; the second discusses predestination, free will, and other kindred topics; the third contains the questions about faith and its efficacy, repentance, and other doctrines; the fourth inquires into the evidence of history and reason, the nature and force of religious belief, the office and mission of prophets, the duty of the imams, the beauty of virtue, the turpitude of vice, and other kindred themes. The various disputes which have from time to time arisen on all the different points of their scholastic theology have given rise to a large number of different sects and parties, all of whom adhere to the Koran as the standard of their faith. Among these may be enumerated the Asharians, the Keramians, the Motazales, the Cadharians, the Nadharians, the Giabarians, and the Morgians.

Al-kitab (Arab. the book), a name given to the Koran as "the book" by way of eminence, after the manner of the English expression "the Bible."

Allah akbar is the prayer with which the Mohammedans begin their religious service. See MUEZZIN.

Allah Mapraha was an ancient Indian teacher of religion, a holy priest, who commanded the carrying of the Lingam, and promised the forgiveness of sins as the result of obedience.

Allah Taala is the name given to the almighty being who was worshipped by the ancient Arabs before the introduction of Mohammedanism. He is the only true god, and stands above all the deities, who are companions of his power, but over whom he is supreme ruler.

Allamu, a Chaldean name of the deity Nergal.

Allan, a Scottish bishop, was a native of Gallogway, and became bishop of the Isles in 1805, and was one of the Scotch clergy who recognised king Robert Bruce's right to the crown in 1309. He died Feb. 15, 1821, and was buried at Rothsay, in the Isle of Bute. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 301.

Allat. See ALITTA.

Allcott, JOHN, an English Congregational minister, was born in Warwickshire in 1764. He was designed by his friends for a carpenter; but he became an artist in Scagliola, under the tuition of the celebrated Wyatt. He established himself in business as a statuary and dealer in marble. Having acquired much wealth, he retired from trade, and gave himself to the ministry. He had been awakened to a sense of his spiritual danger in his eighteenth year by a sermon preached after a terrific thunder-storm which occurred in London. He united with the Church at Tottenham Court Chapel, London. Most of his Sabbaths he spent in preaching in connection with the London Itinerant Society. He was ordained as an evangelist, in order that he might administer the sacrament to the suburban villages. He preached at Berkhamstead for a short time on retiring from business; but in 1814 he settled at Epping, and became pastor of the Independent Church. His labors were continued for nearly eighteen years. Paralysis having disabled him for service in 1832, he retired to his house, where he died Feb. 19, 1853. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 217.

Alle, GIROLAMO, an Italian friar, was a native of Bologna, and lived in the first half of the 17th century. He entered the Brotherhood of St. Jerome at Fiesola, taught theology at Bologna, and succeeded to the highest honors of his order. He studied literature, together with the ecclesiastical sciences. He distinguished himself as a preacher, and published his sermons, together with certain works of poetry, among others four representations, a species of sacred drama, which were printed successively at Bologna from 1641 to 1650. Another ethical work has its title, Il Concatenato Sconcatenamento de' Pensieri, Parole et Attioni Umame ch'è Letto e Practicato Concatena le Virtù nell' Animo, e li Sconcatena i Viti, etc. (Bologna, 1653). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Allegation, in ecclesiastical law, denotes articles drawn out in a formal manner to establish the complainant's cause against the person injuring him. The defendant answers the allegation upon oath, and this is called a defensive allegation. When issue is thus joined, both parties proceed to their respective proofs.

Allegri, Antonio (better known as da Correggio), an illustrious Italian painter, was born at Correggio, a town in the duchy of Modena, in 1494. Some Italian writer says he was instructed by Francesco Bianchi and Giovanni Murani. Others say that he was pupil to Leonardo da Vinci, and others still, to Andrea Mantegna. It is most probable that he learned the rudiments from his uncle, Lorenzo Allegri, a painter who was very fond of him, and at his death left him most of his property. His wonderful genius created such an admirable system of harmony, grace, and grandeur as his successors have never equalled. The principal work of Correggio is the great fresco painting in the cupola of the cathedral at Parma, completed in 1530. The cupola is octangular, and the subject the Assumption of the Virgin. In the lower part he has represented the apostles admiring the event. The dome of the Church of San Giovanni (of the Benedictines) at Parma is another of his wonderful works, which represents the Ascension of our Saviour, with the twelve apostles and doctors of the Church. Among his oil-paintings, one of the most celebrated is the St. Jerome at Parma, including the Virgin seated with the Infant on her knee. For the Church of San Giovanni he painted two altar-pieces—one representing the Descent from the Cross, and the other the Martyrdom of San Placido. Correggio's famous work, called La Notte, representing the Nativity, may be seen in the Gallery at Dresden, and also a beautiful little picture of the Magdalen reading. Writers differ widely as to whether Allegri engraved any plates. This great artist passed some time in Mantua, on two occasions, with the marchese Manfredi, and the celebrated patroness of arts and letters Veronica Gamba, relict of Gilberto, lord of Correggio. Here he had the advantage of examining the works of Andrea Mantegna, the frescos of Cosso, Lionardo Bruno, and Dosso, and also the grand collection of pictures, medals, cameos, and antiquities of Isabella da Este. He died March 5, 1534.

Allegri, Gregorio, an Italian ecclesiastic and composer of Church music, was born at Rome about 1580. He studied under Nanini and was intimate with Palestrina. He was thoroughly acquainted with harmony, and, although he did not possess a remarkable voice, was made one of the singers in the pope's chapel in 1629. He composed the famous Miserere, which is performed there yearly on Wednesday and Friday of Passion-week. He died at Rome, Feb. 18, 1652.

Allegri, Pomponeo, an Italian painter, was the son of Correggio, and was born in 1522. He learned the rudiments of the art from his noted father, who died, however, when Pomponeo was only twelve years of age. He continued his studies under Francesco Maria Rondani, the most talented of Correggio's scholars. Pomponeo executed a fresco painting in the cathedral at Parma, representing Moses Showing the Israelites the Tables of the Law, which is finely colored, with beautiful parts, and heads expressed entirely in the style of Correggio.

Allegrini, Francesco (called Da Gubbio), a Roman historical painter, was born in 1587, and was a scholar of Arpino. He executed some works for the churches and palaces of Rome, both in oil and fresco. He died in 1663.

Allegrini, Giuseppe, a Florentine engraver, lived in the early part of the 18th century. The following are his principal works: the Virgin Mary with the Infant:—the Circumcision:—and the Stoning of St. Stephen.

Alleine (or Allein), RICHARD, an English Non-conformist and Puritan, was born in Somersetshire in 1611. He was educated at St. Alban's Hall, Oxford, and became rector at Balcombe, Somersetshire, but was rejected in 1662. He was noted for piety and zeal in labors. He died Dec. 22, 1681. He published Vindiciæ Pietatis (1663), a work still held in considerable estimation.

Alleluia. The singing of this Hebrew word, meaning Praise the Lord, like Amen and Sabaoth, has been derived from the use of the Church of Jerusalem. It is attributed to pope Damasus. Pope Gregory allowed it to be sung out of Eastertide. The Alleluia inclusio was the close of the time for singing Alleluia, from Christmas to Epiphany. The famous Alleluia Victory was won by St. Germanus and the Britons chanting Alleluia (A.D. 492) at Easter-time over the Saxons and Picts. The Saturday before Septuagesima was called "Alleluia Saturday," because the Alleluia was then sung for the last time until Eastertide. Gregory ordered the Alleluia to be sung not only at Easter, but throughout the year. It was allowed at funerals. Alexander II prohibited the Alleluia in the liturgy in the interval between Septuagesima and Easter-eve, and the fourth Council of Toledo forbade it on all fast-days. It was used in the mass to represent the Hebrew title of the cross, as Kyrie eleison was a reminiscence of the Greek. Victor of Utica called it the Alleluatic Melody. On the Circumcision, which was a fast-day as a protest against heathen revelry, the Alleluia was not sung. The people sang it together in divine service, monks assembled to its sound, and the laborer in the field and the seaman on shipboard chanted it in the early days of the Church. As early as the 4th century, Alleluia seems to have been well known as the Christian shout of joy or victory, and as an expression of encouragement. A special use of the Alleluia is found in the liturgies both of East and West. In most Eastern liturgies it follows immediately upon the Cherubic Hymn, which precedes the greater Entrance, as, for instance, in those of St. James, St. Mark, and St. Chrysostom. In the Mozarabic it is sung after the gospel, while the priest is making the oblation; while in the West it immediately precedes the reading of the gospel. In early times it seems to have been simply intoned by the cantor who had sung the gradual, standing on the steps of the ambo, and repeated by the choir. Before the 8th century the custom arose of prolonging the last syllable of the Alleluia, and singing it to musical notes. This was called jubilatio. In the Roman arrangement of the ordinary offices, the Alleluia follows the Invocation, but from Septuagesima to the Thursday of Holy-week the verse "Laus tibi, Domine, Rex æternæ gloriæ" is substituted.

Alleluia Saturday. See ALLELUIA.

Alleluatic Psalms, the five last psalms in the Psalter of David, which commence with terms in English which are equivalent to the Hebrew Alleluia.

Alleluatic Sequence, that ancient hymn of which the burden corresponds with the Hebrew term from which it is named. In English hymnals the translation commences, "The strain upraise of joy and praise, Alleluia."

Allemanni (or Alemanni), NICOLÒ, a celebrated Italian antiquary, was born of Greek parents at Ancona, Jan. 12, 1583, and educated in the Greek College founded by Gregory XIII. He afterwards entered holy orders, and was ordained subdeacon by a Greek bishop, but, changing his mind, he received the other orders from Romish bishops. He taught Greek to several persons of rank, and gained the friendship of Scipio Cobellutius, which paved the way for his obtaining the post of secretary to cardinal Borghese. He was afterwards made keeper of the Vatican Library, and died July 24, 1626. His death is said to have been occasioned by too close attendance on the erection of the great altar of St. Peter's at Rome. He published, among other works, Procopii Historia Arcana, etc. (Lugd. 1623; Paris, 1663, fol.), and Dissert. Hist. de Lateranensibus Parietinis (Rome, 1625).

Allemanno, JOCHANAN, a learned Jew of Constantinople, who flourished in Italy towards the end of the 15th century, where he instructed the famous Pico della Mirandola in Hebrew, is the author of שולחן שלמה, a commentary on the Song of Songs. The introduction to this commentary, שער החשק, was published separately by Baruch ben-Moses Chajim (Leghorn, 1790). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 39; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 38 sq. (B. P.)

Allen, Amos, a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about 1775. In 1807 he was licensed to preach by the First Church in Bluehill, Me. Three years afterwards he received ordination; and for eight years he devoted himself to evangelical labors among the destitute churches of his native State. In 1818 he was chosen pastor of the Church in Brookville, where he remained till 1833. For the next four years he supplied destitute churches. In 1837 he was called to the pastorate of the Second Church in Bluehill. Here he remained till 1842, when he resigned and returned to his work as an evangelist. The exact date of his death we have not been able to ascertain. See Millett, Hist. of the Baptists of Maine, p. 433. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Asa Smith, a Congregational minister, was born at Medfield, Mass., June 21, 1797. He studied theology at Angelica, N. Y., with Robert Hunter, D.D., and was ordained March 2, 1837, by the Presbytery of Angelica. At Cuba, N. Y., he became acting pastor of the Congregational Church in 1837, in which position he remained until 1846, when, in the employment of the American Home Missionary Society, he went to Wisconsin. Afterwards he became pastor, for nine years, of the Church in Dodgeville. From 1855 to 1868 he was pastor of the Church at Blue Earth; and in the latter year removed to Clear Lake, Ia., as pastor of the Church in that place, where he died, Nov. 7, 1876. See Cong. Quar. 1877, p. 407.

Allen, Benjamin Russell, a Congregational minister, was born at Newport, R. I., in 1805. He commenced his ministry among the Baptists; but subsequently became a Congregationalist. His ordination took place Sept. 10, 1829. From Aug. 13, 1831, to Jan. 4, 1838, he was pastor in North Scituate, R. I.; and from Sept. 26, 1838, to some time in 1842, he was settled in Barrington. Shortly after leaving Barrington, he was called to South Berwick, Me., as the successor of the lamented William Bradford Horner. Here he remained twelve years. Immediately on resigning his office in South Berwick, he accepted a call to Marblehead, Mass., where he remained from 1854 until his death, which took place June 2, 1872. Mr. Allen was a minister of marked ability in his denomination, and left his impress on the communities in which he lived as a minister of the Gospel. See Memorials of Deceased Congregational Ministers in R. I. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Beverly, a Methodist Episcopal minister, concerning whose birth, early life, and conversion there is no accessible record. He entered the itinerancy in 1781; was elected for ordination at the Christmas Conference; and in 1785 was commissioned to introduce Methodism into Georgia, where he became very prominent, having an almost unparalleled popularity as a preacher; but, like David, in an evil hour, fell into sin, violated the laws of the country, and a writ was issued for his apprehension. He warned the sheriff not to enter his room, with the threat of death if he did. The sheriff rushed in and Allen shot him, fled the country, and settled in Logan County, Ky., then called "Rogue's Harbor," where his family followed him, and where he resided until his death, practicing medicine. He ever remained a warm friend to the Methodist Church, which struck his name from her list of workers in 1792; but, to ease his troubled conscience, he drank in the doctrine of Universalism. Peter Cartwright, in his schoolboy days, boarded some time with Mr. Allen; and, on becoming a preacher, visited the doctor on his dying-bed, and records Mr. Allen's last sentiments as being a belief in the salvation of all but himself. We are unable to find the date of his decease. Mr. Allen was in his early career an earnest and devout preacher, and a man of extraordinary talents and zeal. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vii, 113; Stevens, Hist. of the M. E. Church, ii, 165, 249, 301; iii, 101, 336; Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1781-92.

Allen, Carey, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Cumberland County, Va., in 1767. He entered Hampden Sidney College at the age of seventeen. In 1789 he was received by the Hanover Presbytery as a candidate for the ministry; was licensed to preach in 1790; and spent the two succeeding years as a missionary in Virginia and Kentucky. In 1794 he settled in Kentucky, and was installed pastor of Paint Creek and Silver Creek churches. He died Aug. 5, 1795. He was remarkable for a kindly disposition, and a great propensity to drollery without seeming to be aware of it. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 563.

Allen, Charles, a Congregational minister, was born in the north of Ireland, Aug. 7, 1843. He was converted during the great Ulster revival, joined the Wesleyans, and became a class-leader and local preacher. On Mr. Allen's removal to Queensland, he joined the Congregationalists; studied four years at Camden College; and in 1871 was ordained in Newtown Congregational Church. He now entered upon his labors at Ulladulla, New South Wales, and continued with great earnestness until his death, May 3, 1872. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1873, p. 314.

Allen, David J., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born at Charleston, S. C., Aug. 24, 1808. He professed conversion in his nineteenth year, and entered the South Carolina Conference in 1829. On account of ill-health he located in 1836, and settled in Western Tennessee. In 1840 he joined the Memphis Conference, and, with a short intermission, remained in its ranks until his death, in 1868. Mr. Allen possessed an extensive and accurate knowledge of general literature. He filled acceptably the appointments assigned him, and was twice elected as a delegate to the General Conference. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1868, p. 246; Simpson, Cyclopaedia of Methodism, s. v.

Allen, Diarca Howe, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, who died Nov. 9, 1870, was a member of the Presbytery of Cincinnati; and was for a number of years professor in Lane Theological Seminary at Walnut Hill, O., having been previously a professor in Marietta College. In the Theological Seminary he occupied the chair of sacred rhetoric and pastoral theology, and afterwards the chair of systematic theology. See Presbyterian, Nov. 19, 1870.

Allen, Edmund. See ALLEN, EDMOND.

Allen, Edward E., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Accomac County, Va., Aug. 15, 1804. He was converted at the age of seventeen; soon began to preach; and in 1827 was admitted into the Baltimore Conference. In 1865 he supernumerated; and died at Shrewsbury, Pa., May 28, 1872. Mr. Allen was practical, scriptural, tender, affectionate, fervent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 21.

Allen, Edwin Halsted, an English Congregational minister, was born at Chichester, June 17, 1836. Surrounded by the influences of a holy parentage, he was one of those who grow up "as children of the kingdom." In 1859 Mr. Allen entered Spring Hill College; but college duties proved too much for his strength, and he was compelled to return home, where he died, Sept. 1, 1860. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 198.

Allen, Eli W. R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, of whose birth and early life no record is accessible, joined the Genesee Conference in 1825; the Oneida Conference in 1830; and the Black River Conference in 1836. He superannuated in 1843, for one year, and again in 1863; and died at Amber, N. Y., March 3, 1864. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 105.

Allen, Elizabeth, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born at Bristol, England, Dec. 11, 1787. She had a sweet disposition, was well educated, and was carefully instructed by Christian parents. In 1828 she appeared as a public minister. Her preaching was very pathetic and affecting. In 1863 a serious fall caused a lameness for the rest of her life. She died Aug. 29, 1871. See Annual Monitor, 1872, p. 13.

Allen, Ethan (1), an American general and infidel, was born at Roxbury, Conn., in 1739. He first became conspicuous in resisting the laws of New York in behalf of those who held land grants under New Hampshire. He led the attack against Ticonderoga in 1775, and did other valiant service in the American cause during the Revolution; and died in 1789. He published a number of controversial pamphlets:—a Narrative of his observations during his captivity from 1775 to 1778:—and Allen's Theology; or, The Oracle of Reason (1786). The object of this last work was to ridicule the doctrine of Moses and the prophets. Allen had some very absurd notions as to the future state of man; e. g. that man would, after death, transmigrate into beasts, birds, etc.; and that he himself would live again in the form of a large white horse. See Allen, Amer. Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Allen, Ethan (2), an Episcopal minister, was born at Londonderry, Vt., Nov. 25, 1794, and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1823. For some years after his graduation he was engaged in teaching in Millwood, Va. In 1828 he became principal of the academy in Hanover, Mass., where he remained five years, and then removed to Rochester, N. Y. Here he had charge for some time of St. John's Parish School. While engaged in teaching, he had directed his attention to the study of theology, and, having been ordained, his first settlement was in Otis, Mass., where he remained ten years (1836-46), and then removed to Nantucket, Mass., and was rector of Trinity Church in that place for nine years (1846-55). His next parish was in Guilford, Vt., for twelve years, and he died there May 19, 1867. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Ethan (3), D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Maryland, and historiographer of the diocese, was rector in Dover, Md., in 1853; in 1857 was assistant minister in Baltimore; and in 1859 was agent for diocesan missions, and rector of St. Thomas's Church, Homestead, Baltimore Co., Md., which offices he continued to hold until 1862, when, retaining the agency, he officiated in Ellicott Chapel, Baltimore. In 1864 he resumed his rectorship in Homestead; in 1867 he became rector of the Church of the Messiah, as well as of St. Thomas's; in 1870 was rector of St. Thomas's only; in 1873 was appointed historiographer, and subsequently was associate rector of St. Thomas's. In 1878 he removed to Newport, Ky., where he died Nov. 28, 1879, aged eighty-two years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1881, p. 172.

Allen, Harrison, a Congregational minister, was born at Chilmark, on Martha's Vineyard, April 26, 1792. In 1815 he entered upon the preparatory studies for college, and completed them at the academy in Bloomfield. In the fall of 1820 he became a member of Bowdoin College. He taught a portion of his time while in college, graduated in September, 1824, and soon commenced a course in theology. For a time he took charge of the academy during his connection with Bowdoin College. He attended the Andover Theological Seminary, completing his course in 1828, and during the subsequent year was employed as agent for the American Board in parts of Maine and Massachusetts, where he was instrumental in forming several associations auxiliary to the Board. On Sept. 24, 1829, he was ordained in Boston, from which place he embarked Dec. 1 of the same year, and arrived at Elliot, the scene of his mission work, Jan. 26, 1830. He describes the Choctaws as kind and friendly to strangers, and he speaks of the interest they manifested. He died Aug. 19, 1831. See Memoirs of Amer. Missionaries.

Allen, Henry, an English Wesleyan Missionary, was proposed to the Conference in 1823, sailed for the mission field in Jamaica, W. I., in March, 1824, and ere a month had elapsed, died of pneumonia, April 17. He was a young man of considerable promise. See British Minutes, 1824.

Allen, Isaac, a Unitarian minister, was born at Weston, Mass., Oct. 31, 1770. He graduated at Harvard College in 1798, was ordained and installed pastor of the Church in Bolton, Mass., March 14, 1814, and died in 1844. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 178.

Allen, Jacob, a Congregational minister, was born at Columbia, Conn., Aug. 18, 1781. When about twenty-three he went to North Coventry, where he was converted, and where he studied under Rev. E. T. Woodruff. After teaching, he entered Dartmouth College, graduating in 1811; studied theology with Dr. Burton of Thetford, Vt.; was ordained pastor at Tunbridge, Vt.; labored there and at Eastbury, Conn., at Voluntown, Sterling, and Preston; in 1851 he returned to Voluntown, preaching there until his death, March 13, 1856. Rev. Henry Robinson, in a sermon at his funeral, described him as "a sound and able theologian, an earnest and instructive preacher; eminently gifted in prayer; a faithful and devoted pastor, a wise and safe counselor," etc. Mr. Allen was a frequent contributor to periodicals. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 261.

Allen, James (1), a Congregational minister, was born at Roxbury, Mass., in 1692, and was a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1710. His ordination took place Nov. 5, 1718, and he was the first minister of the Church in Brookline, Mass. His ministry continued twenty-eight years, being terminated by his death, which occurred Feb. 18, 1747. His published sermons were seven in number, one of them being The Election Sermon Preached before the Massachusetts Legislature in 1744. His parish shared largely in the revival which so generally pervaded New England in the middle of the century in which he lived. See Pierce, Centen. Discourse; Allen, Amer. Biog. Dict. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Allen, James (2), an English Methodist minister, was born in Yorkshire, June 14, 1734. It was the purpose of his father to educate him for the ministry in the Established Church. To fit his son for his profession, he placed him under the tuition of a clergyman, whose immoral character so dispirited the young candidate for holy orders that he withdrew from a Church which harbored in its communion men so dissolute as his tutor. Having received spiritual benefit from the ministry of Mr. Ingham, a Methodist preacher, he joined his connection, and for nine years he was a popular minister in that denomination. Having the means to build a house of worship, he erected a meeting-house for himself, in which, with a good degree of success, he preached during the remainder of his life. Mr. Allen was the author of the hymn commencing "Sinners, will you scorn the message?" He died Oct. 31, 1804, in the village in which he was born. See Belcher, Historical Sketches of Hymns, p. 75. (J. C. S.)

Allen, James (3), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Burslem, Sept. 28, 1787. He became a member of the class-meeting at the age of twelve; was called into the work of the itinerancy in 1806; retired from its activities in 1854; went subsequently to Bramley, and died there, Sept. 20, 1863. Deep spirituality of mind, coupled with modesty and a constitutional reserve, made this benevolent and affable man appear distant and taciturn. "His character was without a blemish, and the consistency shown in his youth was manifested in old-age" (Isaac Keeling). "I have known many Wesleyan ministers, but I never knew a holier man" (John Farrar). He was characterized by an eminent and unostentatious liberality, sometimes denying himself of even the necessities of life in order to give the more. See (Lond.) Wesleyan Meth. Magazine, Aug. 1865, p. 682-693; Minutes of British Conference (Lond. 1864), p. 11.

Allen, James (4), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Worcester County, Md., Dec. 22, 1811. He became an orphan in early youth; experienced religion in 1832; acquired a good education; and in 1837 entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he labored faithfully until death, Aug. 27, 1850. Mr. Allen was greatly devoted to the Church, and much beloved by all. As a preacher, he was studious and zealous; as a parent, affectionate and devoted; as a Christian, cheerful and spiritual. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1851, p. 558.

Allen, James (5), an English Wesleyan minister, son of James (3), was born at Uttoxeter, Aug. 30, 1822. He was educated at Kingswood School, entered the Didsbury Theological Seminary in 1844, the ministry in 1846, and died at Bramley, Aug. 30, 1873. "He was one of the best men," says a minister, "I ever knew. So unostentatious; so content to be good without popularity; so single-minded in living for Christ; so indefatigable as a minister; so true and kind and affectionate to his colleagues." Says another, "His sermons, his counsels, his prayers, his wit, his cheerfulness, his very presence, always charmed me into kindness and love. And I am speaking very moderately when I say there are scores of ministers and officers in the Church who owe their position and influence mainly to his efficient training and oversight." "His life was radiant with all manner of goodness." Mr. Allen was a diligent student, and very successful in conducting theological classes. See Bunting's sprightly Memoir of him, with extracts from his journal, in Wesleyan Meth. Magazine, Jan. and Feb. 1875; also Minutes of British Conference, 1874, p. 9.

Allen, James Wilburn, M.A., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Virginia, Jan. 10, 1804. He was converted in 1822, and in the same year united with the Tennessee Conference. In 1827 he located on account of ill-health; but was again admitted into Conference in 1847, though unable to do any regular work, and was continued on the supernumerary list until his death, Oct. 1, 1858. He was an industrious and able writer, and during his latter years, when unable to preach, wrote largely for the Church periodicals. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1858, p. 20.

Allen, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Chapel-en-le-Frith, Derbyshire, June 10, 1787. He joined the Methodist Society in 1759, and in 1766 was appointed to the Manchester Circuit, and successively to the Sussex Circuit, in Staffordshire, and others, including London, 1769; Bristol, 1772; Keighley, 1777; Leeds, 1794; Liverpool, 1795; and Bolton, 1797. In 1799 he became a supernumerary, and took up his residence in Liverpool, where he died, Feb. 20, 1810. "He had all the marks of a man of God." See Wesleyan Meth. Magazine, 1812, p. 2, 61; Minutes of British Conference, 1810.

Allen, John D., an English Wesleyan missionary, entered the ministry in 1813, and was appointed to the island of Nevis, W. I. He labored with much zeal until June, 1817, when he was compelled to return to his native land to save his life. But it was too late. He gradually sank until he died, in November, 1817. He was a young man of an amiable disposition and genuine piety. See Minutes of British Conference, 1818.

Allen, Jonathan, a Congregational minister, was born at Braintree, Mass. He graduated at Harvard in 1774; studied theology with Rev. Ephraim Judson, of Taunton; was ordained over the First Church in Bradford June 8, 1781; and died March 6, 1827. See Cong. Quarterly, 1859, p. 47; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 483.

Allen, Laban Wheaton, a Congregational minister, was born at Pelham, N. H., Dec. 11, 1843. After a preparatory course at Phillips Academy at Andover, he entered Amherst College, at which he graduated in 1866, and three years afterwards graduated at Andover Theological Seminary. In 1869 he was ordained pastor at South Braintree, Mass., but left in 1872, going to Greeley, Col., where he was acting pastor until 1873. On account of failing health, he sailed for Europe, residing there a year, then went to Los Angeles, Cal. Returning to his father's house in Hanover, Mass., he died there Aug. 23, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 418.

Allen, Lemuel Q., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Habersham County, Ga., June 1, 1825. He experienced conversion in 1849; received license to preach in 1851, and in 1852 united with the North Georgia Conference. He was not equipped with any of the aids that early culture and mental discipline afford, but he consecrated a vigorous mind and an honest, noble heart, and soon became a powerful herald of the Cross. He died of cancer, Aug. 11, 1868. Mr. Allen's pulpit ministrations were characterized by simplicity of manner and solidity of matter. He was zealous and devoted; was endowed with high social qualities, and was peculiarly happy in his domestic relations. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1868, p. 220.

Allen, Lorenzo Bickford, D.D., a Baptist minister, was born at Jefferson, Me., June 4, 1812, and was a graduate of Waterville College in the class of 1835. For the next four years he was engaged in teaching, a part of the time at Richmond and a part of the time at Waterville. He pursued his theological studies at Thomaston under Prof. Calvin Newton, and was ordained pastor of the First Baptist Church at Thomaston on May 27, 1840, where he remained four years, and then became pastor of the Second Church in the same place, sustaining the relation until July, 1849. During most of the years from 1845 to 1856 he was employed as secretary of the Maine Baptist Missionary Society. From November, 1849, to November, 1856, he was pastor of the Baptist Church in Yarmouth. In April, 1857, he entered upon his duties as professor of ancient languages in Burlington University, of which he was for a time the president, resigning his position in 1865. For the next three years he was pastor of the First Baptist Church at Minneapolis, Minn., and for the next three years and more he preached and taught at Wasioja, where he died, Aug. 20, 1872. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Morrill, a Unitarian minister, was born at Dover, Mass., April 3, 1776, and was a graduate of Brown University in the class of 1798. Having studied theology, he was ordained as pastor of the First Congregational Church and Society at Pembroke, Mass., and there remained from Dec. 9, 1801, to Dec. 9, 1841. After resigning his office, he continued to preach for his parish and perform ministerial functions as his services might be needed. He was fond of agricultural pursuits, and acquired a wide reputation as an agriculturist. For several years he was president of the Plymouth Agricultural Society, which he had been largely instrumental in establishing. Although never seeking office, he was twice elected to the Senate of Massachusetts from Plymouth County, and was a member of that body in 1844 and 1845. He lived to the very great age of ninety-four years, four months, and fourteen days. See Necrology of Brown University, 1871. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Nathan, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Lansing, N. Y., March 9, 1820. In 1842 he entered Western Reserve College, where he remained until 1844, when he went to Hamilton College and completed his college course. In 1847 he entered Auburn Theological Seminary, and he spent two years in that institution. Having completed his studies, he was licensed by the Auburn Presbytery, and became pastor of the Congregational Church at Castile, N. Y. He was ordained by the Angelica Presbytery, and became pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Cuba, N. Y. He died in 1864. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 159.

Allen, Peter, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in Columbia County, N. Y., in 1808. He graduated at the New Brunswick Seminary in 1837, and was licensed by the Classis of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in the same year. He served as pastor at West New Hempstead and Ramapo from 1837 to 1853—the former in Rockland County, N. Y.; the latter in Bergen County, N. J. After 1853 he again served the former place until his death, which occurred in 1862. He was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost and of faith. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 164.

Allen, Phoebe, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born Dec. 4, 1769, at Hitchin, England. She had a careful religious education. Possessing a lively disposition and superior tastes, she was both loved and admired. The power of true religion soon shed its influence upon her, and she dedicated her powers to the Master. In 1794 she made a journey into Yorkshire in the interest of the Society. She did not appear regularly in the ministry until 1797. From 1798 until 1801 she attended various meetings of the Society, and held some important positions. She lived a retired life until 1839, in which year she and her husband started on a journey through their own country and adjoining provinces. She died Oct. 2, 1856. See Annual Monitor, 1858, p. 5.

Allen, Reuben, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Rhode Island in 1794. He was one of the most laborious and successful ministers of his denomination. He confined his labors to the New England States, because, as we are told, he found the inhabitants more congenial to his tastes and sooner impressed by his methods. He is said to have baptized at least fourteen hundred converts. He was especially gifted in revivals and protracted meetings. After many years of rare devotion to the cause of Christ, he died at North Scituate, R. I., May 30, 1872. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1873, p. 84. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Richard (1), an English Baptist minister, who flourished at the close of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th century, is said to have been a man of good endowments; and though he had not the advantages of a learned education, yet by constant application he became a good Oriental scholar. His public ministry began in the reign of Charles II, and he was a victim to the persecuting spirit which brought such discomfort to the Dissenters. He was fined and imprisoned and subjected to innumerable annoyances. On one occasion, as he was preaching a Thursday lecture, he, with ten other persons, was seized and thrown into Newgate, where he remained until some of his friends paid his fine and secured his release. In 1695 he became pastor of a church, meeting in Paul's Alley, London, and continued in that relation for nearly twenty-two years. His death occurred Feb. 20, 1717. He was the author of the following works: An Essay to Prove Singing of Psalms with Conjoined Voices a Christian Duty, and to Resolve the Doubt concerning it (1690, 8vo):

—A Brief Vindication of an Essay to Prove Singing of Psalms, etc. (1696, 8vo):—A Gainful Death: the End of a Truly Christian Life (1700, 8vo), a sermon at the funeral of Mr. John Griffith:—A Discourse on the Death of King William III (1702, 4to):—A Sermon on the Union of England and Scotland (1707, 8vo):—Biographia Ecclesiastica (2 vols. 8vo), or the lives of the most eminent fathers of the Christian Church who flourished in the first four centuries and part of the 5th. See Haynes, Baptist Cyclop. i, 18–20. (J. C. S.)

Allen, Richard (2), a minister of the denomination of Friends, was born at Cork, Province of Munster, Ireland, in 1786. He was one of the first pupils admitted into the Waterford School, and for many years was connected with that institution. His services were not limited to the education of the young, but for upwards of half a century he was a useful minister among the Friends. He often travelled as a messenger of Christ through his own country and Great Britain, and once visited Canada. He died Jan. 5, 1878. See Annual Monitor, 1874, p. 1.

Allen, Samuel (1), a minister of the denomination of Friends, was born in London, England, Nov. 15, 1771. His ministry did not extend beyond the central and southern counties of England. His standard of right in religious and social and commercial affairs was a high one. His appeals to others were not always made in that spirit of charity which "hopeth all things." Towards the end of his life he suffered with many bodily infirmities, which often induced mental depression. He died at Hitchin, Oct. 22, 1868. See Annual Monitor, 1870, p. 2.

Allen, Samuel (2), brother of two other ministers in the British Wesleyan Methodist Conference, was born at Fetcham, Surrey, in March, 1800. He was converted at the age of fourteen, ordained in 1818, and appointed to Ceylon, where he labored with much success for fourteen years, when failing health compelled his return to England. He retired from circuit work in 1863, and died at Wavertree, April 11, 1878. He was a faithful and discriminating pastor, and his ministry was valued for its thoughtful exposition of Scripture. He was a diligent student of the Scriptures in the original, and collected and collated various versions with reverent and scholarly care. See Minutes of British Conference, 1878, p. 37.

Allen, Stephen Thompson, a Protestant Episcopal minister of the diocese of Quincy, Ill., was ordained, and soon after began his ministry, at Aurora. In 1865 he removed to Muscatine, Ia., as rector of Trinity Church, and held this position until 1868, when he returned to Aurora as rector of his former parish, Trinity. In 1871 he became rector of Grace Church at Galesburg, Ill., and continued to officiate in that parish until the date of his death. He died in Aurora, May 3, 1878, aged sixty-nine years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1879, p. 168.

Allen, Thomas, an English clergyman and writer was born in 1572. He was educated at, and became fellow of, Merton College, Oxford; became the literary friend and assistant of Sir Henry Saville; and died in 1636. He published Observations in Libellum Chrysostomi in Esaiam. See Wood, Athenæ Ozonienses; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Allen, Thomas D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Accomac County, Va., Dec. 26, 1801. He was taught the fear of the Lord from childhood; experienced conversion about 1820; and subsequently emigrated to Ohio, where, in 1829, he united with the Ohio Conference. In 1834 he was transferred to the Baltimore Conference, in which his burning zeal overcame his constitution, and he died, June 25, 1835. Mr. Allen was a man of thorough devotion and unflagging energy. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1836, p. 408.

Allen, Thomas G., a Protestant Episcopal minister of the diocese of Pennsylvania, served as missionary in Philadelphia during the most of his ministerial life. He died Aug. 11, 1868, aged seventy-four years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1869, p. 109.

Allen, Timothy, a Congregational minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., Sept. 1, 1715, and graduated at Yale College in 1736. He was ordained pastor at West Haven in 1783, but four years after was dismissed by the Consociation for some little imprudences of speech. This was at the time of the great awakening, and Mr. Allen was one of the most stirring preachers. He was for a while teacher of a kind of theological school in New London called "The Shepherd's Tent." He was settled in Ashford in 1757, remaining there seven years. His next charge was Chesterfield, Mass., from which he was not dismissed until he was eighty-one years of age. He died there, Jan. 12, 1806. Mr. Allen was somewhat eccentric in his manners, but was a man of genius and talents, of strict morals, and a powerful preacher. He published several Sermons, and two pamphlets, entitled, respectively, Salvation of All Men Put Out of All Dispute, and An Essay on Outward Christian Baptism. See Cong. Quar. 1859, p. 267.

Allen, Wilkes, a Unitarian minister, was born at Sterling, Mass. He graduated at Harvard College in 1801; was ordained pastor of a church at Chelmsford, Nov. 16, 1803; and died in 1845. He published several single Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, viii, 58.

Allen, William (1), a Christian martyr, was a laboring man, and lived at Somerton, England. He was burned at Walsingham in September, 1553, because he would not adhere to the rules and regulations of the Romish Church. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 381.

Allen, William (2), a Baptist minister, was born in Maine about the year 1780. He received a license to preach from the Church in Columbia, and not long after received a call from the First Church in Jefferson, of which he was ordained pastor in 1809. During the long period of twenty-seven years he was the devoted and faithful minister of this church, his pastorate closing with his death in 1836. See Millett, Hist. of the Baptists in Maine, p. 433. (J. C. S.)

Allen, William (3), D.D., a Congregational minister and writer, son of Thomas Allen, was born at Pittsfield, Mass., Jan. 2, 1784. He graduated at Harvard College in 1802; and studied theology under the Rev. Dr. Pierce, of Brookline. He began preaching in Western New York in 1804; after some months he returned to Massachusetts, and was made a regent of Harvard and assistant librarian. In 1809 appeared the first edition of his American Biographical Dictionary, containing notices of some 700 Americans—the first work of the kind published in this country. The second edition of this Dictionary was published in 1832, and contained over 1800 names; and the third edition, published at Boston in 1857, contains about 7000 biographies. In 1810 he was ordained pastor of the Church in Pittsfield, as his father's successor. In 1817, when Dartmouth College was organized as a university, Dr. Allen was appointed president; but when the Supreme Court declared this organization illegal in 1819, he was compelled to retire; and in 1820 became president of Bowdoin College, Me., where he remained until 1839, when he retired to Northampton, Mass., and spent the remainder of his life in literary pursuits. He died July 16, 1868. He contributed largely to Worcester's and Webster's dictionaries; and published, among other works, Junius Unmasked:—Accounts of Shipwrecks:—Psalms and Hymns (1835):—Christian Sonnets (1860):—Poems of Nazareth and the Cross (1866):—Sacred Songs (1867).

Allen, William (4), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Sussex County, Del., in 1790. His early life and conversion are unrecorded. In 1819 he was received into the Philadelphia Conference, in which he served diligently until his sudden death, May 28, 1841. Mr. Allen was esteemed for his literary ability, and the simplicity and meekness of his Christian character. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1842, p. 308.

Allen, William (5), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Fetcham, Surrey, Feb. 25, 1804. He united with the Church at the age of thirteen; entered the ministry at nineteen (1823); became a supernumerary in 1864; and died March 14, 1866. He was an earnest and conscientious minister; labored on important circuits; was chairman of a district; and was an example to believers in word and in spirit. See Minutes of Conference (Lond. 1866), p. 25.

Allen, William G., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born Sept. 5, 1824. He received a careful religious training; experienced religion in his sixteenth year; began to exhort in 1851; was licensed to preach in 1852; and in 1853 entered the Georgia Conference, in which he served efficiently until his death, Sept. 13, 1866. Mr. Allen was an industrious and careful student, a model preacher, a devoted pastor, and a devout Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1867, p. 118.

Allendorf, JOHANN LUDWIG CONRAD, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Feb. 9, 1693, at Jobbach, near Marburg. He studied at Halle; was appointed court chaplain at Köthen in 1724; and at the time of his death was school-inspector and pastor of St. Ulrich's, in Halle, where he died, June 6, 1773. He was a fertile writer of hymns, of which he composed one hundred and forty, full of religious sentiment. Some of these were translated into English, as Die Seele ruht in Jesu Armen ("Now rests the soul in Jesus' arms," in Lyra Germ. i, 250):—Das Brümlein quillt, das Lebenswasser ("The fountain flows! its waters all are needed," in Mill, Horæ Germanicæ, No. 21). See Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, iv, 416, 434 sq., 441 sq. (B. P.)

Allerstain (or Hallerstain), a German Jesuit and missionary to China, was born near the commencement of the 18th century. His knowledge of mathematics and astronomy led to his being called to the court of Pekin, where he obtained the esteem of the emperor Khien-loung. He was made mandarin and appointed president of the tribunal of mathematics. We are indebted to him for a census of the inhabitants of each province of China for the twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth years of the reign of Khien-loung (1760 and 1761). He obtained these statistics from Heouppou, and translated them into Chinese. The original and the translation were found in Europe in 1779. The conquering Tartars for a time suppressed this census-taking, fearing that it would reveal the secret of their forces to the Chinese. He confirmed all the calculations of the celebrated missionary Amiot, and gave the proof of the progressive augmentation of the Chinese population. The census obtained by Allerstain is found in the Description Générale de la Chine, 4th ed. p. 283. In the twenty-fifth year of the reign of Khien-loung the population numbered 196,837,977, and the following year 198,214,624. Allerstain died in 1777. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Allerton, RALPH, a Christian martyr, suffered under the reign of queen Mary, being burned at Islington Sept. 17, 1557, for rejecting the Romish priests. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 405.

Allesbrook, ROBERT, an English Congregational minister, was born at Darley Oaks, Needwood Forest, Staffordshire, in 1835. Subsequently his parents moved to Worcestershire, where he was converted. He removed to London, and was engaged in Ragged-school teaching and out-door preaching. From London he went to Spring Hill College, to better prepare himself for the ministry. In 1863 he was ordained at Ilkeston, Derbyshire, where he labored but a few months; and on Dec. 27 of that year died. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 218.

Allet, JEAN CHARLES, a French designer and engraver of portraits and sacred history, was born in Paris about 1668. He lived many years in Italy, and probably died at Rome in 1732. The following are some of his principal works: The Crucifixion, after Andrea Pozzo:—The Adoration of the Shepherds:—The Virgin Mary and St. Joseph Adoring the Infant Jesus:—The Saviour Brought before Pilate:—Ananias Restoring Sight to St. Paul:—The Vision of St. Paul. The last two are considered Allet's best works on historical subjects.

Alley, Miss ISABELLA T., a missionary of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who died at Cavalla, Africa, Sept. 29, 1856, left a comfortable home in Virginia in October, 1855, going out in company with Rev. Robert Smith to identify herself with the mission at Cape Palmas. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1857, p. 144.

All-fools-day, a name given to the first day of April, on account of an absurd custom, which prevails in various parts of the world, of ridiculing people and imposing on them in a variety of ways. Numerous explanations of the origin of this custom have been attempted. Among them are the following: (1.) In France the person imposed upon is called poisson d'Avril, "an April fish," which is thus explained. It is contended that the word poisson, through the ignorance of the people, is corrupted from passion, and through the lapse of time the original idea was almost entirely lost. The intention, it is contended, is to commemorate the mocking of our Lord by the Jews. As the passion of Christ took place about this time of the year, and as the Jews sent him backwards and forwards, from one officer to another, to mock and torment him, so we send about from one place to another such persons as we think proper subjects for our ridicule (see Bellingham, Etymology of French Proverbs, 1656; and Gentlemen's Magazine for July, 1783). (2.) Another attempt to explain it has been made by referring to the fact that the year formerly began in Britain on March 25, which was supposed to be the day of the incarnation of our Lord. So April 1, being the octave of March 25, and the close of the festival both of the Annunciation and the New Year, became a day of extraordinary mirth and festivity. (3.) It has also been explained as having a Jewish origin. It is said to refer to the mistake of Noah in sending the dove out of the ark before the water had abated on the first day of the Hebrew month, answering to our month of April; and, to perpetuate this deliverance, it was thought proper that whoever forgot so remarkable an event should be sent on some fruitless errand similar to the ineffectual message upon which the bird was sent by the patriarch. (4.) It has been shown that the practice of making April-fools on the first day of that month has been an immemorial custom among the Hindûs at a celebrated festival held about the same period in India, called the Huli festival (see Pearce, Asiatic Researches, vol. ii.). (5.) Maurice, in his Indian Antiquities, says that the custom, prevailing both in England and in India, had its origin in the ancient practice of celebrating with festival rites the vernal equinox, when the new year of Persia anciently began.

Allibond, John, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in Buckinghamshire, and educated at Magdalen College, Oxford. He was for some years head-master of the free-school adjoining Magdalen College, and afterwards became rector of Bradwell, in Gloucestershire, where he died, 1648. He was an excellent Latin poet and philologist. See Allibone, Dict. of B. and A. Auth. s. v.

Allibond, Peter, an English clergyman, was born at Wardenton, near Banbury, Oxfordshire, about 1560. He was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and travelled for some time beyond the seas, after which he became rector of Cheyneys, Bucks. He died in 1629. He translated several religious works from the French and the Latin. See Wood, Athenæ Ozonienses, s. v.

Allin, Edmund, a Christian martyr, was a miller, dwelling in the parish of Frittenden, Kent, England. He read and explained the Scriptures to his friends, and in this way was the means of bringing many souls to Christ. His course was soon found out by some popish priests, and he was arrested, examined, and cast into prison, where he suffered miserable torments. He was afterwards burned at Maidstone, in 1557. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 321.

Allin, Frederick, an English Congregational minister, was born at Lancing, Sussex, Jan. 25, 1821. While at school at Portsea, he was converted under the ministry of the Rev. T. Cousins. He received private instruction from the Rev. Joseph Turnbull at Brighton, and afterwards at Boulogne. He was admitted as a student at Highbury College in 1839, and left in February, 1843, to commence his ministerial labors at Hanover Chapel, Brighton. After officiating here a few months, he removed to the Public Rooms, and afterwards to the Grand Parade Chapel, where he was ordained July 8, 1846. Upon the failure of his health, he left Brighton in March, 1848, and went to the vicinity of London. Having recovered strength, he preached for a time at Highgate, but found it necessary soon to remove to the more genial climate of Penzance, in Cornwall, at which place he became, in the summer of 1850, co-pastor with the venerable John Foxell. He died March 29, 1852. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1853, p. 204.

Allin, John (1), a Congregational minister, was born in 1596. After graduating, as is supposed, at the University of Cambridge, he entered the ministry of the Church of England. It is thought that he is the man who was silenced at Ipswich by bishop Wren, on account of his Nonconformity, and removed to London. In 1637 he removed to New England, being obliged to escape thither in disguise. Immediately after his arrival he became a resident of Dedham, Mass., and afterwards was teacher there. On April 29, 1639, he was ordained as pastor of the Congregational Church in that place. In 1646, when an attempt was made to bring the colonists into subjection to the British Parliament, he was chosen spokesman for his Church, and presented a paper sustaining the magistrates of the colony who were determined on resistance. One of the leading controversies of this period grew out of the decision of the Synod in 1662 that persons who had been baptized in infancy, and whose lives were moral, might claim baptism for their children. President Chauncy, of Harvard College, wrote a work in opposition to this view, to which Mr. Allin replied, supporting the Synod. The controversy was a protracted one, and Mr. Allin took a prominent part in it. Though not elegant, his written style is marked by simplicity and force. Occasionally he shared the labors of Eliot in his benevolent visits to the Indians. He died at Dedham, Mass., Aug. 26, 1671. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 108.

Allin, John (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Sutcombe, near Holsworthy, Aug. 19, 1809. He united with the Church in his eighteenth year, with the ministry in 1834, became a supernumerary at Bristol in 1876, and died April 24, 1878. His aim was to do his Master's work in his Master's spirit. In pastoral duties he was diligent (being especially attentive to the sick and needy), amiable, and judicious. See Minutes of British Conference, 1878, p. 41.

Allin, Rose, a Christian martyr, was one of the five who were burned at Norwich in the middle of the 16th century for the testimony of Christ and his Gospel. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 381.

Allin, Thomas, one of the most honored ministers in the Methodist New Connection, and one of the most venerable for years and attainments, was born at Broseley, Shropshire, England, Feb. 10, 1784. He had but a moderate education, but was converted at thirteen, and then saw the advantages of mental culture. Removing into Staffordshire, he became a useful local preacher, and in 1808 began to itinerate, though with distrust and hesitation. He had fine natural graces, exalted piety, and an affectionate disposition. His circuit life extended only to twenty-five years. A delicate constitution obliged him to become a supernumerary in 1833, having travelled in only twelve circuits, but for more than thirty years he rendered greater service to the cause of God in his retirement than he had done in his activity. He became distinguished as a preacher, and men of culture gathered from various churches to hear him in his later years; yet he was as diligent and faithful as a pastor as he was eminent as a preacher. For many years he was corresponding member of the annual committee which gave him the authority of a perpetual president in the Connection. He was president of the Conference in 1822 and 1846, and for many years secretary of the missions. In addition to these important duties, for some years before any college was established in the body, Mr. Allin guided the studies of a succession of young men who had been chosen for the ministry, and he was theological tutor to the Connection. He was also the author of several polemical publications, which were of great value when written, and a volume of chaste and elegant sermons, published after his death, was soon bought up. Paralysis overtook him at the age of eighty-one; but the serene, luminous atmosphere in which he lived enabled him to rally, and the childlike simplicity of his life made old-age delightful, even beautiful. His earthly pilgrimage closed at Cheadle, in all the calm of a summer sunset, Nov. 7, 1866.

Allio, Matteo, an Italian sculptor, lived in the 17th century. He executed some works in the Church of Sant' Antonio at Padua in 1653, and some very elegant pilasters, which are highly praised by Cicognara. In the chapel of the Dominican Church at Padua there is a statue of San Lorenzo Giustiniano by Matteo, which, being inferior to one of Sant' Antonio by Brunelli, placed by the side of it in 1667, is said to have caused the artist's death, owing to the serious way in which he took the matter to heart.

Allio, Tommaso, an Italian sculptor, lived in the 17th century, and was brother to Matteo. In the chapel of the Dominican Church at Padua there are two statues by Tommaso—one of Faith and the other of Hope; in the Church of Sant' Antonio also, one of Hope and one of Charity; and some statues in the chapel of the Church of San Benedetto.

Allioli, Joseph Franz, a Roman Catholic prelate of Germany, was born at Sulzbach, Aug. 10, 1793. He studied at Munich, Amberg, and Landshut; received holy orders in 1816; and went to Vienna, Rome, and Paris for the sake of studying Oriental languages. In 1821 he was appointed Privatdocent at Landshut, and advanced in 1823 to the chair of exegesis and Oriental languages. In 1826 he went to Munich, where he lectured until 1835. He was next called to Ratisbon, to leave this place again in 1838 for Augsburg, where he died, May 23, 1873, as cathedral provost. Of his many works, the most important is Die heilige Schrift des Alten u. Neuen Testaments. Aus der Vulgata, mit Bezug auf den Grundtext, neu übersetzt und mit kurzen Anmerkungen erläutert (6 vols. Nuremb. 1830-35, and often since). Besides, he published, Häusliche Alterthümer der Hebräer nebst biblischer Geographie (Munich, 1821):—Ueber die inneren Motive der kanonischen Horen (Augsburg, 1848; French transl. by Dodille, Des Motifs Intrinsèques des Heures Canoniques, Châlon-sur-Saône, 1865). See Literarischer Handweiser für das kathol. Deutschland, 1873, p. 240. (B. P.)

Alliott, Richard, LL.D., an English Congregational minister, was born at Nottingham, Sept. 1, 1804. He was thoughtful and serious from early childhood, and mental exercises were more pleasurable to him, when a boy, than physical. He joined his father's (Rev. Richard Alliott) Church, and became exceedingly useful in teaching young men both in the Bible and in general knowledge. His convictions and tastes led him to seek the ministry as his profession and joy. Mr. Alliott completed a course at Homerton College, and studied for two sessions (1826-27) at the University of Glasgow. He became assistant minister to his father in 1827, and in 1830 was ordained as co-pastor. On the death of his father, in 1840, he succeeded to the entire pastorate. In 1843 Mr. Alliott accepted the pastorate of the Church in York Road, Lambeth. In 1849 the Western College invited him to its presidency, which he accepted. In 1856 Chestnut College pressed its claims on his attention, and he exchanged the provincial for a metropolitan chair. In 1860, because of his wife's ill-health, Mr. Alliott removed to Birmingham, and occupied the theological and philosophical chairs at Spring Hill. Soon after he connected with his professorship the pastorate at Acock's Green. But he was not privileged to occupy these posts of honor and usefulness long. He died Dec. 20, 1863. Mr. Alliott did not aspire to authorship to any great extent. Besides a few miscellaneous sermons and articles, he published only the Congregational lecture in 1854, an octavo vol. entitled Psychology and Theology. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 217.

Alliott, William, an English Congregational minister, brother of the Rev. Richard Alliott, Jr., was born at Castlegate Parsonage, Nottingham, July 22, 1807. He united with his father's church at Castlegate, and thence proceeded to Wymondley College and the University of Glasgow to study for the ministry. He was ordained to the pastorate of Howard Chapel, Bedford, in 1832, where for thirty-five years he made full proof of his ministry. His death occurred Aug. 12, 1867. Mr. Alliott was very wise, modest, and spiritual. His ambition was not fame, but usefulness. For more than twenty years he was engaged in preparing students for labor in connection with the London Missionary Society. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 248.

Allison, David, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Galefoot Farm, in Ochiltree, Ayrshire, Scotland, in 1799. He graduated at the University of Glasgow with the honors of his class. He was licensed in 1821, and died July 7, 1858. As a preacher he was clear and perspicuous. He was not a popular preacher, but was a useful one. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1860, p. 271.

Allison, John, an English Baptist minister, was born at Craven, Yorkshire, in 1788, and was converted in early life. Soon after his decision to enter the ministry, he pursued a course of preparatory study at the Academy in Bradford, and then settled in a village near that place, where he remained nine years. Subsequently he was pastor at Ogden fifteen years, and at Chapel-fold, near Dewsbury, for ten years. His life was a laborious one. He preached three times on the Sabbath, once or twice during the week, and conducted a day-school for the support of a large family. He died Jan. 17, 1852. See English Baptist Manual, 1852, p. 45, 46. (J. C. S.)

Allison, Matthew, a Presbyterian minister who died July 8, 1872, aged seventy-seven years, was a member of the Presbytery of Huntingdon, and was pastor of the Presbyterian churches of Mifflintown and Lost Creek, Pa. See Presbyterian, Aug. 3, 1872.

Allison, Thomas, a minister of the Associate Church, was born in Pennsylvania, June 3, 1771. He pursued his classical studies at Canonsburg Academy (now Jefferson College), and studied theology under the direction of the Rev. Dr. John Anderson. He was licensed early in the year 1800, and preached in various places until some time during the following year, when he was installed as pastor at Mount Hope, Pa. In this charge he continued to labor until near the close of his life, when failing health induced him to resign. He died in April, 1840. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 71.

Allōōsis (transmutation) is a term used by Zwingle, in his controversy with Luther, to indicate that the identification of the two natures of Christ is only figurative and nominal. See Hagenbach, Hist. of Doctrines, ii, 346.

Allogēnes (Ἀλλογενεῖς). (1.) Revelations of "Allogenes," as of Zoroaster and others, are mentioned by Porphyry (Vita Plot. § 16) as appealed to by the Gnostics contemporary with Plotinus. But it seems probable that he mistook for the name of an author the plural title of the following book. (2.) An apocryphal book or series of books bearing this name is said by Epiphanius to have been used by the Sethians, the Archontici, and, apparently, the sect which he calls "Gnostici."

Alloprosallōs (favoring now one, then another), in Greek mythology, was a surname of Mars, given because of the uncertainty of war.

Allori, CRISTOFANO (called Bronzino), an Italian painter, was born at Florence in 1577. He was the son of Alessandro, and by him was instructed in the art for a time. He became a good colorist by imitating the works of Ludovico Cardi, called Cigoli. He did several fine pieces of work for the churches and convents of Florence, and for the palace of the Medici; also many admirable portraits of the most eminent men of his time. The St. Julian of the Pitti Palace is the grandest of his productions, though his picture of Judith with the Head of Holofernes is better known. Many copies of his works are to be found throughout Italy. Owing to vicious indulgences that often seduced him from his labors, his works are extremely rare and he himself comparatively little known. He died in 1621.

Allouez, CLAUDE JEAN, an early Jesuit explorer of the Northwest, was born in France in 1620. He went to Quebec in 1658, and spent some years in the Algonquin missions on the St. Lawrence. In 1665 he founded the Mission of the Holy Ghost at Chegormegon, on Lake Superior. He then began collecting data concerning the Mississippi; explored Green Bay, where he founded the Mission of St. Francis Xavier; and labored among various tribes of Indians. In 1676 he permanently established at Kaskaskia, Ill., the mission begun by Marquette; but in 1679 retired at the approach of La Salle. His last field of labor was among the Miamis on St. Joseph's River, where he died in 1690. His contributions to the Jesuit Rélations, concerning the ideas and manners of Indians of that time, are said to possess great value.

Alloway, WILLIAM, an English Congregational divine, was born at Trowbridge, June 19, 1809. In his seventeenth year he was converted in the Tabernacle at Trowbridge. In 1830 he entered Hackney College as a student for the ministry. Having completed his course in 1834, he offered himself to the London Missionary Society to work among the freed blacks of Jamaica, and was immediately sent. Mr. Alloway occupied successively three stations of the mission—Dry Harbor in 1835, Porus in 1842, and Ridgemount, Mandeville, in 1856, where he died Jan. 19, 1877. Mr. Alloway's work was characterized by the intelligence and thorough devotedness of his converts, and his high standing as a counsellor among his fellow-ministers. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1878, p. 803.

Allston, WASHINGTON, an eminent painter, was born of honored parentage at Georgetown, S. C., Nov. 5, 1779, and was a graduate of Harvard College in the class of 1800. He developed early in life his enthusiastic love for the fine arts. Such was his desire to perfect himself in what he meant to make his profession that, having disposed of his patrimonial estate, he embarked in 1801 for the Old World, and became a pupil in the Royal Academy in London, of which Benjamin West was the president. Subsequently he spent several years in Paris and in Italy. During the eight years he was abroad, he made the acquaintance and secured the friendship of some of the most eminent painters and poets in Europe. Returning to America in 1809, he passed two years in this country, and then crossed the ocean again, and remained seven years (1811–18). Domestic afflictions were greatly blessed to him in leading his thoughts to more serious subjects, and he came back to his native land an altered man. Having built a studio in Cambridge, Mass., he devoted himself to religious art, producing some of the finest paintings in that department that have seen the light in modern times. The subjects of some of these were, The Dead Man Revived by the Bones of Elisha :—The Angel Liberating Peter from Prison :—Jacob's Dream :—Elijah in the Desert :—Saul and the Witch of Endor :—and Belshazzar's Feast, his last work, which he left in an unfinished state. His other works were, Spalatro's Vision of the Bloody Hand :—Gabriel Setting the Guard of the Heavenly Host :—Anna Page :—Beatrice, etc. He died suddenly at Cambridge July 8, 1843. In a sermon preached after his decease by Rev. Dr. Albroy, the religious character of Allston was portrayed in a most attractive light. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v. (J. C. S.)

All-sufficiency of God is that power or attribute of his nature whereby he is able to communicate as much blessedness to his creatures as he is pleased to make them capable of receiving. As his self-sufficiency is that whereby he has enough in himself to denominate him completely blessed as a God of infinite perfection, so his all-sufficiency is that by which he has enough in himself to satisfy the most enlarged desires of his creatures and to make them completely blessed. See ATTRIBUTES OF GOD.

We practically deny this perfection—1. When we are discontented with our present condition and desire more than God has allotted for us (Gen. iii, 5; Prov. xix, 3); 2. When we seek blessings, of what kind soever, in an indirect way, as if God were not able to bestow them upon us in his own way, or in the use of lawful means (Gen. xxvii, 35); 3. When we use unlawful means to escape imminent dangers (ch. xx, xxvi; 1 Sam. xxi, 13); 4. When we distrust his providence, though we have had large experience of his appearing for us in various instances (Josh. vii. 7, 9; 1 Sam. xxvii, 1; 2 Chron. xiv, 11; xvi, 8; Psa. lxxviii, 19); 5. When we doubt the truth or certain accomplishment of the promises (Gen. xviii, 12; Psa. lxxvii, 8, 9; Isa. xlix, 14); 6. When we decline great services, though called to them by God, under a pretence of our unfitness for them (Jer. i, 6, 8).

The consideration of this doctrine should lead us—1. To seek happiness in God alone, and not in human things (Jer. ii, 13); 2. To commit all our wants and trials to him (1 Sam. xxx, 6; 2 Cor. xii, 8, 9; Heb. xi, 19); 3. To be courageous in the midst of danger and opposition (Psa. xxvii, 1); 4. To be satisfied with his dispensations (Rom. viii, 28); 5. To persevere in the path of duty, however difficult (Gen. xvii, 1). See Ridgley, Body of Div. quest. 17; Saurin, Sermons, vol. i, ser. 5; Barrow, Works, vol. ii, ser. 11.

Allu, the Seven Stairs to the abode of Osiris, which are mentioned in ch. clxiv of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Alluno, NICCOLÒ, an Italian painter, was born at Foligno about 1450. In the Church of San Niccolò at Foligno is an altar-piece by this artist of the Virgin and Infant with saints, and also his picture of the Pietà, so highly praised by Vasari. He gained quite a reputation before his death, which occurred in 1510.

Allyn, Henry, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Windsor, Conn., about 1813. He emigrated to Illinois in 1832; was converted in his seventeenth year, and received license to preach in 1839. Six years later he was ordained deacon, in 1850 elder, and in 1851 entered the Southern Illinois Conference, wherein he labored until his death, Nov. 27, 1855. Mr. Allyn was laborious, zealous, spiritual. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1856, p. 165.

Allyn, Norman, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hartford, Conn., Jan. 23, 1810. No record of his life-work is accessible other than that he was a member of the Southern Illinois Conference, served the Church as an able and earnest minister for nearly thirty years, and that hundreds were added to the Church through his instrumentality. He died March 27, 1864. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 205.

Allyn, William (cardinal). See ALLAN.

Alma (bounteous, i. e. "the giver of food"), in Roman mythology, was a surname of several deities, but more especially of Ceres, goddess of food (or of plenty).

Almachius, a martyr at Rome, is commemorated as a saint on Jan. 1 in old Roman lists.

Almakab, a principal deity of the Himyarites of Southwestern Arabia.

Almali, NATHANAEL IBN, a Jewish physician of Saragossa, who flourished in the 13th century, is known only as the translator of Maimonides's Mishna-commentary on the Seder Kodashim. For the benefit of the Jews of Rome, he made the Hebrew translation from the Arabic. The translation was finished, together with a preface, by the translator in 1298. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 39; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, vii, 284. (B. P.)

Almaria (or Armaria), a name used in ancient English records for the muniments or archives of a church library.

Almarick, JOHN, a martyr, was in prison for some months in Turin, Piedmont, in 1558, where he sustained much cruelty, being racked to death. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 440.

Almaricus of CHARTRES. See AMALRIC.

Almery (or Aumbry), the mediæval hutch; a cupboard occasionally used for keeping broken meat; hence a confusion was made in calling the "almerny" the place of alms-giving, and the "almery" that where the dole of fragments from the conventual tables was daily made. The word is derived from armarium, and usually designates the wall-closet or locker for keeping the church books or altar-plate, the chrisam used in baptism and confirmation, and the holy oil for the sick. In many cases the eucharist reserved for the last communion was stored in an aumbry near the altar, as is still the case in Italy. In the cloister the books used in reading-time were kept in an aumbry placed either within the church close to the door, or else in a locker adjoining it at the north-east angle. The Greeks had an aumbry for holding the vestments of the religious—a sort of hanging wardrobe over the altar; from the 5th century presses for the same purpose were erected in the sacristies of the Western Church. The Carthusians had two aumbries, one on the right for the vessels, and another for books. Aumbries to contain processional crosses, the bier, taper-stands, and burial furniture occur in walls near the cloister and cemetery. All the keys were locked up by the sacristan at night in a master-aumbry until early in the morning. Usually the aumbry is provided with a slab. Up to the 13th century the piscina had a small upper shelf for the chalice; and even in later examples a little credence for holding the cruets and vessels is found. Sometimes a small ledge for the calamus appears; and until the 13th century the marks of holes for the hinges of doors are visible: after that date, however, the aumbry became common.

Almoli, SOLOMON BEN-JACOB, a Jewish physician, who flourished in the Levant at the beginning of the 16th century, is the author of הליכות שבה, or a grammatical treatise on the Sheva (Constantinople, 1520):—שרשרות גבלות, a Hebrew lexicon, only reaching to the letter Nun (ibid.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 39 sq.; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 89; Steinschneider, Bibliog. Handbuch, p. 5; id. Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibl. Bodl. p. 2282. (B. P.)

Almond-tree, the symbol of St. Mary, in allusion to Aaron's rod, which blossomed in a night; but M. Montalembert conceives the plant to be dedicated to the Holy Trinity.

Almonry, a room where alms were distributed, generally near to a church, or forming a part of it. See ALMERY.

Al-moshaf (Arab. the volume), one of the names of the Koran (q. v.).

Almoshtari, the planet Jupiter, was adored as a divinity by the ancient Arabians.

Almosnino, MOSES BEN-BARUCH, a Jewish rabbi, was born about 1500. He was the son of a Spanish family which was driven from the peninsula by the decree of 1492 and settled at Salonica. He received an excellent education in almost all branches of science and literature, and was one of the greatest pulpit orators of his age. He died about 1580. Besides a number of astronomical works, he wrote, ירי משה (Salonica, 1572; Venice, 1597), a philosophical commentary on the five Megilloth:—פרקי משה (Salon. 1563), a commentary on the Pirke Aboth:—הפלה למשה (ibid. eod. and often), an apology for the Mosaic law and the Shema prayer:—ס' מַטְעַן כָּהֵן (Venice, 1588), a collection of twenty-eight discourses delivered on different occasions, edited by his son:—Regimiento de la Vida (Salonica, 1564, and often), an ethical hand-book:—פֶּנִּי תַּשְׁבֵּחַ, a commentary on the Pentateuch, in the Oppenheimeriana:—a commentary on Joh (MS.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 40; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 39 sq.; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, ix, 41, 403, 417 sq.; Frankel, Monatsschrift, 1864, p. 29 sq. 57 sq.; Zunz, Zur Geschichte u. Literatur, p. 531. (B. P.)

Alms-bag, a small purse, of velvet or other cloth, used for carrying alms during divine service.

Alms-basin (or Alms-dish), a vessel of metal in which to receive the bags containing the "alms for the poor and the other devotions of the people" for presentation on the altar. They are made of brass, pewter, or more precious metals. Ancient examples frequently have representations in relief of the temptation of Eve or the return of the two spies from Canaan; modern specimens are commonly adorned with texts of Scripture.

Alms-dish of the 16th Century.

Alms-bowl, a vessel used by the priests of Buddha for the purpose of receiving the food presented as alms by the faithful. These priests are strictly forbidden to eat any food not given as alms, except it be water or some substance used to clean the teeth; and when in health, the food that a priest eats must be procured by his own exertions in carrying the alms-bowl from house to house in the village or city near which he resides. When going to receive alms, his bowl is slung across his shoulder, and is usually covered by the outer robe. It may be made either of iron or of clay, but of no other material. It must first be received by a chapter, and then be officially delivered to a priest whose bowl is found, on examination, to be in the worst condition. No priest is allowed to procure a new bowl so long as his old one has not been bound with five ligatures to prevent it from falling to pieces. When a priest visits a house with the alms-bowl, he must not do anything to attract the attention of the inmates, but remain silent until he is observed; then if anything is given, he receives it, otherwise he passes on. Buddha says, "The wise priest never asks for anything; he disdains to beg; it is a proper object for which he carries the alms-bowl; and this is his only mode of solicitation." The priest is forbidden to pass by any house, when going with the bowl to receive alms, on account of its meanness or inferiority. When he visits a village, house, or street three successive days without receiving anything, he is not required to go to the same place again; but if he receives only the least particle, it must be visited regularly. When his bowl is sufficiently filled, he is to return to his dwelling and eat the food he has received, of whatever kind it may be. The bowl is also carried by the priestesses, or chief female recluses, who go from door to door in the same manner as the priests, receiving the contributions of the faithful. See Hardy, Eastern Monachism.

Alms-box (or Alms-chest), a receptacle fastened to the wall or standing on a pillar in a church, for receiving the general offerings from the poor during public service. This usage is mentioned in the fourth Council of Carthage (where this receptacle is called sacrarium and gazophylacium), and by St. Augustine (De Diversis, serm. 50). It was appointed by canon 84 of the Synod of London (1603) to be provided in every parish, to the intent that parishioners may put into it their alms for their poor neighbors. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Alms-day (or Alms-Saturday), the Saturday before Passion Week, i. e. preceding Palm Sunday; so called because contributions for the poor during Lent are sometimes given out on that day, so as not to interfere with the solemnities of the coming Holy Week. The Secret in the Sarum office for the day referred both to the alms-giving and the alms-distribution.

Alms-dish. See ALMS-BASIN.

Alms-men, a name for male inmates of an almshouse, or house of charity. Some of the 16th-century almshouses were erected out of the spoils of the suppressed monastic institutions.

Almutium (or Amess) is often confounded with, but is wholly distinct from, the amice (amictus). The amess was a hood of fur anciently worn while reciting the offices by canons, and afterwards by other distinguished ecclesiastics, as a defence against the cold. At times it fell loosely on the back and shoulders, and was drawn over the head when occasion required; the ends, becoming narrower and usually rounded, hung down in front like a stole, for which, by some modern writers, it has been mistaken. The amess has a certain similarity to some of the academical hoods now in use. There are very many specimens of this vestment represented on memorial brasses, one of the best of which—a figure of Sir John Stodeley—remains in the Church of St. Mary Magdalen, Upper Winchendon, Bucks. This garment is still used in the Latin Church, some of the bishops and abbots of which wear amesses of ermine lined with purple. In the Church of England its use appears to have been wholly discontinued.

Almy, WILLIAM, an American philanthropist, a member of the Society of Friends, was born Feb. 17, 1761. He became a cotton-manufacturer at Providence, R. I., where he amassed a large fortune and endowed a large boarding-school. He died Feb. 5, 1836.

Alnense, CONCILIIUM. See ALCESTER, COUNCIL OF.

Aloa, a holyday observed by the heathen laborers of Athens, after they had received the fruits of the earth, in honor of Dionysus and Demeter.

Aloée (or Alwée), in the mythology of the inhabitants of the Andes, was an evil spirit which the Chilians regarded as the originator of all evil and destruction. They also believe that they would live forever if this spirit did not come to take them away in death. They affirm that the white people (Spaniards) brought this evil dæmon to their country, and that previous to his coming death was entirely unknown.

Alohim (the gods), the name of a group, or possibly triad, of Sidonian divinities, to whom temples were erected by Eshmonezer II, king of Sidon.

Alois, PIETRO, an Italian poet and theologian, was a native of Caserte. He entered the order of Jesuits, and became professor in the colleges of Naples and Lecca. He died in 1667. He wrote, Centuria Epigrammatum (Lyons, 1635; Naples, 1646):—Commentarii in Evangelia Quadragesimæ (Paris, 1658). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alowiochus. See ALWIG.

Aloysius, JOHANNES, a martyr, was sent down from Geneva to certain parts of Calabria in 1559, there to be their minister. He was subsequently sent for to Rome, and there suffered martyrdom. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 471.

Aloza (or Alozza) (the powerful) was the name of a goddess worshipped by several tribes in Arabia, especially at Nakla, near Mecca. A tree (Akazie) was dedicated to her. The Arab Dalem was the first to dedicate this tree to her. He also built her a temple, which was said to give out musical sounds when any one entered it. When Mohammed introduced Islam, he destroyed the temple and the tree, and slew the priestess.

Alpan, an Etruscan goddess who waits upon Turan, or Venus. She is winged, with ear-rings and necklace, and bears two palm branches, which she strikes together. She may be compared to the Greek Graces.

Alpanu (or Alpnu), an Etruscan goddess, with coronet, ear-rings, tunic, and mantle, and a star behind her head, who is represented on one mirror as embracing the goddess Akhuvitr, on another as embracing the goddess Thaur, and on a third as attracting the love of a youth called Famu.

Alpedrinha, JORGE DA COSTA, a Portuguese prelate, was born at Alpedrinha, in the province of Beira, about 1406. He is more commonly known by the name of cardinal de Alpedrinha, in remembrance of the place of his birth; but he was in reality cardinal of the capital of Portugal, and was one of the most able theologians of his time. Born of a noble family in the enjoyment of opulence, he received a brilliant education, became a priest, and was first bishop of Evora, from which he became archbishop of Lisbon. He was loaded with favors by Edward and his son, and it is said that he received more ecclesiastical revenue than any other prelate of his time. He was appointed counsellor of Alfonso V, and had charge of the education of Catharine, daughter of king Duarte. The credit of cardinal Alpedrinha became proverbial, and he maintained his influence in all the affairs during the reign of Alfonso V. In the time of João II he was prince-regent, and held the direction of affairs. Old causes of dissension still existing, however, eventually led to trouble between the youthful prince and the cardinal. At length, wearied of these dissensions, Alpedrinha betook himself to Rome, where he acquired as much influence as he had at Lisbon, and under Sixtus IV, Innocent VIII, Alexander VI, Pius III, and Julius II he served well the interests of Portugal. He died at Rome, Sept. 19, 1508, at an extremely old age. The fragments of his Letters still preserved bear evidence of great wisdom. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alphanus, an Italian ecclesiastic, was successively a monk of Monte-Casino, abbot of St. Benedict at Salerno, and archbishop of that city. He attended a council, held by Nicolas II, at Beneventum, and subscribed his own name immediately below his. Peter the deacon mentions some of his writings, as an Account of the Martyrdom of St. Christina:—and Hymns, all given in the Italia Sacra, tom. ii.

Alpheæa (also Alpheonia), in Greek mythology, was a surname of Diana, derived from Alpheus, god of the river from whose persecution she was compelled to hide among the nymphs of Letrina, and blacken her face with mud, that the god might not find her. A temple was erected here in her name, and also a statue of black marble in remembrance of this occurrence.

Alpheus (or Alypius) was bishop of Apamea, in Syria Secunda, and attended the councils of Neocæsarea (A.D. 315), Nicea (325), and Antioch (341). He was one of the bishops by whom Eusebius of Cæsarea was elected to the see of Antioch.

Alpheus, in Greek mythology, was a god of a river, the son of Oceanus and Tethys, famous for his love for the nymph Arethusa, who bathed in the river which he ruled over. She refused his proposal and fled, leaving her dress behind her. Alpheus was already close upon her, when she prayed to Diana, who covered her with a cloud. However, Alpheus followed the cloud, when it was suddenly changed into water. Alpheus now changed himself into his watery form and sought to mix his stream with hers, but Diana removed her to the island of Ortygia. Again Alpheus found a way to her, and Arethusa, not wishing to withstand such a passionate love, permitted him to mix his waves with hers. The ancients related some very wonderful things about these two streams. The Arethusa was said to become of a red color when the blood of the sacrifices at Olympia flowed into Alpheus. The latter is also said to have slain his brother, and in despair he threw himself into the Nyctimus River, which subsequently bore his name. The water was said to possess the virtue of giving to departed souls forgetfulness of all the past. The Alpheus River rises on the southern limit of Arcadia, and runs through Elis, in Peloponnesia.

Alphonso (Alfonso) OF SANTA MARIA, archbishop of Burgos, distinguished himself at the Council of Basle (1431-43), from which, with the other Spanish prelates, he withdrew when the synod proceeded to depose Eugenius IV. He left an abridged History of the Kings of France and Spain, the Emperors, and Popes.

Alphonso (Alfonso) DE SAN VICTOR was bishop of Zamora, and a Benedictine. He moved to the see of Toledo, thence to Orense, and lastly to Zamora, where he died, in 1660. He composed the Rule of St. Benedict, in Spanish (vol. i, Madrid, 1415; vol. ii, Toledo, 1651).

Alrich, WILLIAM P., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in 1807. His first pastorate was at Newcastle, Del. He was for many years connected with Washington College, Pa., filling the chair of mathematics and natural philosophy. He served several churches successively as pastor in the neighborhood of Washington. He died at Winterset, Ia., Dec. 31, 1869. As a student he was laborious and patient, an instructive and amiable gentleman. See Presbyterian, March 26, 1870; Gen. Catal. of Princeton Theol. Seminary, 1872. (W. P. S.)

Alrunen, in German mythology, are prophesying women, to whom the ancients paid the greatest respect and honor. The Gothic historian Jornandes relates the following: "The Gothic king Filimer found certain women among his people, whom he called Aliorunnes. As these women were somewhat suspicious-looking characters, he banished them from his kingdom, and compelled them to wander about in forsaken places. Thus they came in contact with other people of the woods, called Feigenfaunen, and thus originated this horrible generation of human beings." Tacitus says of them, "We have seen, during the reign of Vespasian, Weleda, a certain deity, universally worshipped as a goddess; but in earlier times also the Germans worshipped Aurinia and other women." It is not quite clear, however, that the name Aurinia is the same as Al-rune.

Alsace, THOMAS LOUIS DE HENIN LIETARD, cardinal d', a Belgian prelate, was born at Brussels in 1680. He was distinguished even more by his lofty character and the sanctity of his manner than by his illustrious ancestry, which ran back to Thierry of Alsace, count of Flanders. Although a younger son when he was consecrated to the ecclesiastical calling, he became the elder by the death of his brother, Charles Louis Anthony, prince of Chimay, and lieutenant-general in France and Spain, who died in 1740. Thomas, then cardinal-archbishop of Mechlin and primate of the Low Countries, immediately transmitted the principality of Chimay to his younger brother, Alexander Gabriel, governor of Oudenarde. After the taking of Brussels by the French, he addressed a letter to Louis XV, expressive of his faith in a Higher Power, and suggesting the sentiment contained in the Te Deum, which they were ordered to chant. He died Jan. 6, 1759. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Al-Sameri is the name of the person who, the Mohammedans allege, formed the golden calf for the worship of the Israelites in the wilderness. They represent him as a chief among the Israelites, and they believe that some of his descendants inhabit an island bearing his name in the Arabian Sea.

Alscheich, MOSES BEN-CHAJIM, one of the most distinguished Jewish commentators and preachers of the 16th century, was born at Safet, in Upper Galilee, about 1520. He was rabbi of his native place, where he died about 1595. "His merits as an exponent of Scripture consist chiefly in his having simplified the exegetical labors of his predecessors. He generally gives the literal interpretation first, and then endeavors to evolve the recondite and allegorical sense, so that his commentaries may be regarded as a useful synopsis of the various Midrashic and Cabalistic views of Scripture" (Ginsburg). He wrote, תורה בשוה, a commentary on the Pentateuch (Venice, 1601 and often):—שושנת העמקים (ibid. 1591):—רוב פנינים, a commentary on Proverbs (ibid. 1601):—רוממות אל, a commentary on the Psalms (ibid. 1605):—ציני בשוה, a commentary on Ruth (ibid. 1601):—בשואח משה, a commentary on Esther (ibid. eod.):—על חרי עשר, also מראות הצובאות:—פ, a commentary on the twelve minor prophets (Fürth, 1765):—מראות הצובאות הא, a commentary on the earlier prophets (Offenbach, 1719):—a commentary on the later prophets (Fürth, 1765):—דברים טובים, a commentary on Ecclesiastes (Venice, 1601):—דברים נתימים, a commentary on Lamentations (ibid. eod.):—חבצלת השרון, a commentary on Daniel (Amst. 1726):—and חלקת מחוקק, a commentary on Job (Sensitz, 1727). Alsentz, JOHN GEORGE, a German Reformed minister, emigrated to America in 1757; was pastor of a Church in Philadelphia, and while serving there accepted a call to Germantown in 1758, where he remained until 1762. From Germantown he was called in 1763 to Wentz's Church in Montgomery County, and was especially active in its erection. Here he labored seven years, and died in 1769. See Harbaugh, Fathers of the German Ref. Church, ii, 97.

Al-Sirat, the sharp bridge which the Mohammedans believe to be laid over the middle of hell, and which must be crossed by all at the close of the solemn judgment, whether destined for Paradise or torment. They believe that the just will pass over it like lightning, but that the wicked will be an age in passing it, and will fall into hell fire.

Alsop, VINCENT, a celebrated English Nonconformist divine, was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge. He received ordination at the hands of a bishop, and settled as assistant master in the free school of Oakham, Rutland. Here becoming dissatisfied with his former ordination, he was ordained "in the Presbyterian way," and afterwards presented to the living of Wilby, Northamptonshire, but was ejected by the Act of Uniformity in 1662. He then preached privately at Oakham and Wellingborough, and suffered persecution for his Nonconformity. He wrote a book against Sherlock, called Antisozzo, which procured him much celebrity as a wit, and, in addition, an invitation to succeed the venerable Mr. Cawton in Westminster. Here he drew great crowds to his chapel. His Mischief of Impositions, in answer to Stillingfleet's Mischief of Separation, and his Melius Inquirendum, in answer to Dr. Goodman's Compassionate Inquiry, remain historical landmarks in the history of Nonconformity. He died May 8, 1703. See Encyclop. Brit. s. v.

Alston, Nathaniel, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Preston, Lancashire, in 1812. He was converted young; became a local preacher at the age of sixteen; entered the ministry in 1834; became a supernumerary after forty-one years of active service; retired to Fareham, and died of paralysis, Aug. 7, 1878. He was a close student, an original, evangelical preacher, a man of penetration, although timid. See Minutes of Conference (Lond. 1879), p. 12.

Alston, Philip William Whitmel, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born on Fishing Creek, in Warren Co., N. C., Feb. 28, 1813. His mother dedicated him to the Lord from his birth, and took care that his education should be conducted accordingly. The family removed to Edenton, N. C., when he was about five years of age; and here, in process of time, he began his academic course under the Rev. John Avery, D.D. In 1822 he attended Shocco Springs Academy, in the same state. In January, 1826, he entered the University of North Carolina and graduated in 1829, but remained at the university as a resident graduate during the next year, when he removed to the neighborhood of Randolph, Tenn., and was occupied for two or three years in reading and study. In 1834 he joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, and in the following year was a deputy to the General Convention. In June, 1838, he was ordained deacon, and exercised his ministry at Randolph until February of the next year, when he became rector of Calvary Church, Memphis, a position which he held until the close of his life. He died at Columbia, Tenn., June 17, 1847. Mr. Alston was distinguished for his taste for the fine arts, possessing considerable skill in drawing. As a preacher, his manner was earnest, but quiet. His social qualities were of a high order. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 764.

Alston, William J., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of New York, entered the ministry in 1859, and in the following year became rector of St. Philip's Church, New York city; in 1862 he was rector of St. Thomas's Church (African), Philadelphia, in which rectorship he remained until 1872, when he returned to his former charge, St. Philip's. He died May 26, 1874, aged forty-seven years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 144.

Alsop, ASAPH H., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Wilson County, Tenn., Dec. 17, 1826. He professed conversion in 1848, and was admitted into the Tennessee Conference in 1850. Early in 1856 he retired to his native place, where he died, Aug. 31, 1856. Mr. Alsop was an excellent preacher and a devout Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1856, p. 669.

Alsvídur (swift), in Norse mythology, is one of the two horses that draw the wagon of the sun; the other is called Arvakur.

Alt, JOHANN KARL WILHELM, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 1, 1797, at Hoyerswerda, in Upper Lusatia. He studied at Leipsic and Halle, and after passing his theological examination in 1817, he became tutor in a noble family. In 1821 he was promoted as doctor of philosophy; was appointed deacon at Eisleben in 1823, and advanced to the pastorate in the same place in 1829. In 1835 he was called to Hamburg; was honored in 1836 with the degree of D.D.; and was appointed in 1860 as senior of the Hamburg ministerium. He died Dec. 23, 1869. His theology was that of vulgar rationalism. His publications are mainly sermons, a list of which is given by Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 18-20. See Hamburger Correspondent, Jan. 12, 1870, No. 10. Altamura, AMBROSE OF, a Dominican, published several works: Il Melchisedek (1658), in praise of the Holy Sacrament:—Praises of the Saints of his Order:—and commenced a new Dominican Library (vol. i, 1677—shortly after his death). See Echard, ii, 660.

Altan GATUSUN is an idol worshipped by the Kal-mucks, and is represented in the form of a snake with four feet. The carrying of such an idol is thought by them to be a sure protection against all dangers.

Altan JIDAKTI BURCHAN (the golden and imperishable), in the mythology of the Mongolians, was one of the holy prophets who came from heaven from time to time to warn men. He appeared in that period of the world's history when the ages of men had come down as low as thirty thousand years.

Altani, ANTONIO, an Italian prelate and diplomatist, was employed by pope Eugenius IV in several important affairs, especially as nuncio at the Council of Basle. Two new nunciatures—one in Scotland in the time of James I, the other in England in 1437—were intrusted to him by the same pontiff, who also made him bishop of Urbino. Nicholas V, successor of Eugenius, also sent Altani as nuncio to Spain in order to negotiate for the marriage of the emperor Frederick III and Eleanor, infant princess of Portugal. Altani died at Barcelona in 1450, after more than twenty years of service and labor. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Altanus, in Roman mythology, was a south-west-erly wind, believed to be a son of Tellus because he was thought to come out of the earth.

Altar, CHRISTIAN, the table or raised surface on which the eucharist is consecrated.

I. Names of the Altar.—1. Trapeza (τράπεζα, a table; as in 1 Cor. x, 21). This is the term most commonly used by the Greek fathers and in Greek liturgies; sometimes simply the table by pre-eminence, but more frequently with epithets expressive of awe and reverence. St. Basil in one passage (Ep. 73) appears to contrast the tables of the orthodox with the altars of Basilides. Sozomen says (Hist. Eccles. ix, 2, p. 368) of a slab which covered a tomb that it was fashioned as if for a holy table—a passage which seems to show that he was familiar with stone tables.

2. Thusiastērion (θυσιαστήριον, the place of sacrifice), the word used in the Sept. for Noah's altar (Gen. viii, 20), and both for the altar of burnt-sacrifice and the altar of incense under the Levitical law, but not for heathen altars.

This word in Heb. xiii, 10 is referred by some commentators to the Lord's table, though it seems to relate rather to the heavenly than to the earthly sanctuary. In Ignatius, too, it can scarcely designate the table used in the eucharist. But by this word Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. x, 4, 44) describes the altar of the great church in Tyre, and again (Panegyrr. s. f.), he speaks of altars erected throughout the world. Athanasius, or Pseudo-Athanasius (Disp. contra Arium), explains the word "table" by this term. This name rarely occurs in the liturgies. It not unfrequently designates the enclosure within which the altar stood, or bema (see Mede, Works, p. 382 sq.).

3. The Copts call the altar Hilasterion (ἱλαστήριον), the word applied in the Greek Scriptures to the mercy-seat, or covering of the ark; but in the Coptic liturgy of St. Basil they use the ancient Egyptian word Pimnershoûshi, which in Coptic versions of Scripture answers to the Greek thusiastērion.

4. The word Bomos (βωμός) is used in Scripture and in Christian writers generally for a heathen altar (so 1 Macc. i, 54, 59). The word is, however, applied to the Levitical altar in Ecclesiasticus (i, 12), the work of a gentileizing writer. It is generally repudiated by early Christian writers except in a figurative sense:

Clement of Alexandria (Stromata, vii, 717) and Origen (Contra Celsum, viii, 389) declare that the soul is the true Christian altar (bomos), the latter expressly admitting the charge of Celsum that the Christians had no material altars. Yet in later times it was sometimes used for the Christian altar.

5. The expression mensa Domini, or mensa Dominica, is not uncommon in the Latin fathers, especially Augustine. An altar raised in honor of a martyr frequently bore his name; as "mensa Cypriani." The word mensa is often used for the slab which formed the top of the altar.

6. Ara is frequently applied by Tertullian to the Christian altar, though not without some qualification. Yet it is repudiated by the early Christian apologists on account of its heathen associations. In rubrics, ara designates a portable altar or consecrated slab. Ara is also used for the substructure on which the mensa, or altar proper, was placed.

7. But by far the most common name in the Latin fathers and in liturgical diction is altare, a "high altar," from altus. This is the Vulgate equivalent of thusiastērion. So Tertullian, Cyprian, and Augustine. Yet Cyprian speaks (Ep. 59, § 15) of "diaboli altaria," so uncertain was the usage. In the Latin liturgies scarcely any other name of the altar occurs than altare. The plural, altaria, is also occasionally used by ecclesiastical writers, as invariably by classical authors, to designate an altar. The singular altarium occurs in late writers, but is also used in a wider sense for the bema, or sanctuary; so also altaria.

8. In most European languages, not only of the Romanesque family, but also of the Teutonic and Slavonic, the word used for the Lord's table is derived, with but slight change, from altare. In Russian, however, another word, prestol, properly a throne, is in general use.

II. Parts Composing Altars.—In strictness the table or tomb-like structure constitutes the altar—the steps on which it is placed, and the ciborium, or canopy which covered it, being accessories.

The altar itself was composed of two portions—the supports, whether legs or columns, in the table form, or slabs in the tomb-like, and the mensa, or slab which formed the top.

Table-altar. (From a Mosaic in the Church of St. Apollinare-in-Classa at Ravenna.)

The expression cornu altaris (horn of the altar), often used in rituals, appears to mean merely the corner or angle of the altar, no known example showing any protuberance at the angles or elsewhere above the general level of the mensa, although in some instances the central part of the surface of the mensa is slightly hollowed. By the cornu evangelii is meant the angle to the left of the priest celebrating; by cornu epistolæ that to the right. These phrases must, however, it would seem, date from a period subsequent to that when the Gospel was read from the ambo.

III. Tomb-altars.—The change from wood to stone as the material of altars in the early Church was not only for reasons of durability and elegance, but probably grew in part out of the necessities of the times, especially the celebration of worship in the catacombs of Rome; and this in turn gave rise to the custom, especially prevalent there, of combining an altar and a tomb together. Hence the form gradually changed from the flat table, or mensa, to the chest, or arca.

It was, however, not only in Rome that the memorials of martyrs and altars were closely associated. The eighty-third canon of the African Code (A.D. 419) orders that the altaria which had been raised everywhere by the roads and in the fields as memoriae martyrum should be overturned when there was no proof that a martyr lay beneath them, and blames the practice of erecting altars in consequence of dreams and "inane revelations." The most clear proofs of the prevalence of the practice of placing altars over the remains of martyrs and saints at an early period are furnished by passages in Prudentius. The practice of placing the altar over the remains of martyrs or saints may probably have arisen from a disposition to look upon the sufferings of those confessors of the faith as analogous with that sacrifice which is commemorated in the eucharist; and the passage in Revelation (vi, 9), "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the Word of God," no doubt encouraged or instigated the observance. The increasing disposition to venerate martyrs and their relics fostered this practice. See TOMB-ALTAR.

Combination of the Table and Tomb in an Altar. (From the Basilica of St. Alessandro on the Via Nomentana at Rome.)

It is difficult to find the date at which it became customary to incise crosses, usually five in number, on the mensa of an altar; but they are found on the portable altar which was buried with St. Cuthbert (A.D. 687). Two are to be seen on the oaken board to which the plating of silver was attached, and two on the plating itself, but it is quite possible that originally there were five on each. In the order for the dedication of a church in the sacramentary of Gregory the Great, the bishop consecrating is desired to make crosses with holy water on the four corners of the altar; but nothing is said of incised crosses.

The practice of making below the mensa a cavity to contain relics, and covering this by a separate stone let into the mensa, does not appear to be of an early date.

IV. Structural Accessories of the Altar.—Usually, though not invariably, the altar was raised on steps, one, two, or three in number. From these steps the bishop sometimes preached. Beneath the steps it became customary, from the 4th century, at least, at Rome and wherever the usages of Rome were followed, to construct a small vault called confessio. This was originally a mere grave or repository for a body, as in the Church of St. Alessandro, near Rome, but gradually expanded into a vault, a window or grating below the altar allowing the sarcophagus in which the body of the saint was placed to be visible.

In the Eastern Church a piscina is usually found under the altar. What the antiquity of this practice may be does not seem to be ascertained; but it may have existed in the Western Church, since in a Frankish missal, in consecrating an altar, holy water is to be poured ad basem.

The altar was often enclosed within railings of wood or metal, or low walls of marble slabs. These enclosures were often mentioned by early writers under the names ambitus altaris, circuitus altaris; the railings were called cancelli, and the slabs transemae.

Upon these enclosures columns and arches of silver were often fixed, and veils or curtains of rich stuffs suspended from the arches. Pope Leo III gave ninety-six veils, some highly ornamented, to be so placed round the ambitus altaris and the presbyterium of St. Peter's at Rome. For the canopy over the altar, see CIBORIUM.

V. Appendages of the Altar.—In ancient times, a feeling of reverence prevented anything from being placed upon the altar but the altar-cloths and the sacred vessels with the elements. Even in the 9th century Leo IV (De Cura Pastoralis, § 8) limited the objects which might lawfully be placed on the altar to the shrine containing relics, or perchance the codex of the Gospels, and the pyx, or tabernacle in which the Lord's body was reserved for the viaticum of the sick.

The book of the Gospels seems anciently to have been frequently placed on the altar. With regard to the relics of saints, the ancient rule was, Ambrose tells us (Ad Marcellinam, epist. 85), that they should be placed "under the altar;" and this was the practice of much later times. The passage of Leo IV quoted above seems, in fact, the first permission to place a shrine containing relics on the altar, and that permission was evidently not in accordance with the general religious feeling of that age.

In the early centuries of the Christian Church, the consecrated bread was generally reserved in a vessel made in the form of a dove and suspended from the ciborium, or perhaps in some cases placed on a tower on the altar itself. Gregory of Tours speaks distinctly (De Gloria Martyrum, i, 86) of the deacon taking the turris from the sacristy and placing it on the altar; but this seems to have contained the unconsecrated elements, and to have been placed on the altar only during celebration; nor does the reservation of the consecrated bread in the turris, capsas, or pyx on the altar appear to be distinctly mentioned by any earlier authority than the decree of Leo IV quoted above.

No instance of a cross placed permanently on the mensa of an altar is found in the first eight centuries. Crosses were seen in the sanctuary in the 4th century. The cross was found on the summit of the ciborium, as in the great Church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, and in some churches, both at Rome and in Gaul, suspended from the ciborium over the altar, but not on the mensa of the altar itself. A cross was, however, placed on the altar during celebration. The third canon of the second Council of Tours (A.D. 567) probably means that the particles consecrated should not be arranged according to each man's fancy, but in the form of a cross, according to the rubric.

Tapers were not placed on the altar within the period we are considering, though it was a very ancient practice to place lights about the altar, especially on festivals. Flowers appear to have been used for the festal decoration of altars at least as early as the 6th century. They appear as decorations of churches as early as the 4th century.

VI. Number of Altars in a Church.—There was in primitive times but one altar in a church. Augustine speaks (On 1 John, tract 3) of the existence of two altars in one city as a visible sign of the Donatist schism. But in the time of St. Basil there were more than one altar in Neocæsarea. The Greek and other Oriental churches have even now but one altar in each church; nor do they consecrate the eucharist more than once on the same day in the same place. They have had, for several centuries, minor altars in side-chapels, which are really distinct buildings. Such side-chapels are generally found where there has been considerable contact with the Latin Church.

Some writers rely upon the arcosolia, or altar-tombs in the catacombs, as proving the early use of many altars. Two, three, and more such tombs are often found in one crypt, and in one case there are as many as eleven arcosolia; but there is a deficiency of proof that such tombs were actually so used, nor is their date at all a matter of certainty in the great majority of cases.

The practice of considering the tomb of a martyr as a holy place fitted for the celebration of the eucharistic sacrifice, and such celebration as an honor and consolation to the martyr who lay below, probably led first to the use of several altars in a crypt in the catacombs where more than one martyr might rest, and then, when the bodies of several martyrs had been transferred to one church above ground, to the construction of an altar over each, from a wish to leave none unhonored by the celebration of the eucharist above his remains. Such ideas were prevalent as early as the beginning of the 5th century. At that period, and indeed long after, the disturbance of the relics of saints was held a daring and scarcely allowable act, and was prohibited by Theodosius and much disapproved of by pope Gregory the Great; nor was it until some centuries later that the increasing eagerness for the possession of such memorials was gratified by the dismemberment of the holy bodies.

It has been contended that more than one altar existed in the Cathedral of Milan in the latter part of the 4th century. Ambrose more than once uses the plural altaria in connection with the church, but altaria frequently means an altar. In the Theodosian Code altaria is probably equivalent to sanctuary. At the end of the 6th century we find distinct traces of a plurality of altars in Western churches. Gregory of Tours speaks (De Gloria Martyrum, i, 33) of saying masses on three altars in a church at Brains, near Soissons; and Gregory the Great says (Epist. v, 50) that he heard that his correspondent Palladius, bishop of Saintonge, had placed in a church thirteen altars, of which four remained unconsecrated for defect of relics. Moreover, the Council of Auxerre (A.D. 578) forbade two masses to be said on the same day on one altar, a prohibition that probably contributed to the multiplication of altars, which was still further accelerated by the disuse of the ancient custom of the priests communicating with the bishop or principal minister of the church, and the introduction of private masses, more than one of which was frequently said by the same priest on the same day. Bede mentions (Hist. Eccles. v, 20) that Acca, bishop of Hexham (deposed 732), collected for his church many relics of apostles and martyrs, and placed altars for their veneration, placing a separate canopy over each altar within the walls of the church. There were several altars in the church built by St. Benedict at Aniane. In the 7th and 8th centuries the number of altars had so increased that Charlemagne, in a capitulary (805-806) at Thionville, attempted to restrain their excessive multiplication. This was not very effectual, and in the 9th century the multiplication of altars attained a high point. In the plan of the Church of St. Gall, in Switzerland, prepared in the beginning of that century, there are no less than seventeen altars. The will of Fortunatus, patriarch of Grado (died cir. 825) also affords proof of the increase in the number of altars then in active progress. In one oratory he placed three altars, and five in another.

VII. Places of Altars in Churches.—From the earliest period of which we have any knowledge, the altar was usually placed, not against the wall, as in modern times, but on the chord of the apse, when, as was almost invariably the case, the church ended in an apse; when the end of the church was square, the altar occupied a corresponding position. The officiating priest stood with his back to the apse and thus faced the congregation. In St. Peter's at Rome, and a very few other churches, the priest still officiates thus placed; but though in very many churches, particularly in Italy, the altar retains its ancient position, it is very rarely that the celebrant does so.

Exceptions at an early date to the rule that the altar should be detached are of the greatest rarity, if we except the tombs in the catacombs, which have been supposed to have been used as altars. It is possible, also, that in small chapels with rectangular terminations, the altar may, for convenience, have been placed against the wall. When, however, it became usual to place many altars in a church, it was found convenient to place one or more against a wall; this was done in the Cathedral of Canterbury, where the altar enclosing the body of St. Wilfrid was placed against the wall of the eastern apse; another altar, however, in this case occupied the normal position in the eastern apse, and the original high altar was placed in the same manner in the western apse. In the plan of the Church of St. Gall, prepared in the beginning of the 9th century, only two of seventeen altars are placed against walls.

In a few instances the altar was placed not on the centre of the chord of the arc of the apse, but more towards the middle of the church. In some early churches at Rome, the altar occupies a position more or less advanced. In the time of pope Gregory IV (A.D. 827-844) the altar of Santa Maria in Trastevere stood in a low place, almost in the middle of the nave; the pope therefore removed it to the apse; so the altar of Santa Maria Maggiore in the time of pope Hadrian I (772-795). It is thought by some that in the large circular or octagonal churches of the 4th and 5th centuries the altar was placed in the centre.

In the churches of Justinian's period constructed with domes, there is usually a sort of chancel intervening between the central dome and the apse; when such is the case, the altar was placed therein.

VIII. Use of Pagan Altars for Christian Purposes.—Pagan altars, having a very small superficies, are evidently ill suited for the celebration of the eucharist; nor would it appear probable that a Christian would be willing to use them for that purpose. Nevertheless, traditions allege that in some cases pagan altars were so used; and in the Church of Arilje, in Servia, a heathen altar sculptured with a figure of Atya forms the lower part of the altar (Mittheil. der k.-k. Central-Comm. zur Erforschung und Erhaltung der Baudenkmale [Vienna, 1865], p. 6). Such altars, or fragments of them, were, however, employed as materials (particularly in the bases) in the construction of Christian altars.

ALTAR, DOUBLE, an altar so constructionally erected that it might serve for two chapels. In some old examples a pierced screen divided it from north to south, in which case the two officiating priests would have faced each other had they celebrated contemporaneously. In most cases, however, the division was made by a screen which stood east and west, that is, supposing the altar to have been placed in its customary position. A double altar still exists, and is used at Bologna, without any screen to separate it; at which altar the officiants face the congregation.

ALTAR, HIGH, is (1) that altar which is the chief, cardinal, or principal altar in a Christian Church; (2) the altar which is ascended by a large number of steps, and the level of which is raised, elevated, or heightened above that of other altars; (3) the altar which stands in the eastern part of the choir or chancel; (4) the altar at which high mass is commonly sung on Sundays and chief festivals.

ALTAR OF OUR LADY, that altar which stands in the lady-chapel of cathedrals, or in the side-chapel (one of which in most parish churches was anciently dedicated in honor of Mary). Here "Mary mass" was said.

ALTAR, PORTABLE, a small tablet of marble, jasper, or precious stone used for mass when said away from the parish altar, in oratories or other similar places. It was termed "super altare," because commonly placed upon some other altar, or on any decent and fitting construction of wood or stone. A special license was needed to enable a cleric to possess and use a portable altar, which license was anciently given by the diocesan, but was afterwards reserved to the pope. Examples of such licenses are common in certain mediæval documents, and are frequently referred to in the last testaments of the clergy.

ALTAR OF THE ROOD, that altar which, in England, anciently stood westward of the rood-screen in large churches, and at which ordinarily the parish mass was sung.

ALTAR STONE (or SLAB), that stone which should be without spot or blemish, and consequently entire, which forms the upper and chief part of a Christian altar. In the Church of England, the law requires that the lower portion of the altar be of wood. At Westminster Abbey, and in hundreds of other churches, the slab is found of stone or marble.

ALTAR, WOODEN, an altar made of wood. Anciently the altar was usually constructed in the form of a table, and hence was called the "divine" or "holy table." The wooden altar-table on which Peter is said to have offered the Christian sacrifice is still preserved at Rome. In the Eastern churches the altars are commonly of this material. The same has been the case in the Church of England since the religious changes of the 16th century. Slabs of stone should be, as they frequently are, placed on the top of the table, which slabs, being marked with five crosses, are that part which is specially consecrated with prayer and unction.

Altarage, a name for altar-dues, the offertory alms for a priest's maintenance.

Altar-bread, the bread made use of in the Christian communion. This was originally unleavened (see Luke xxii, 15), and this custom, which is a matter of discipline and does not touch the essence of the eucharist, is still observed by the whole Latin Church, by the Armenians, and by the Maronites. The Ethiopian Christians also use unleavened bread at their mass on Maundy-Thursaday, but leavened bread on other occasions. The Greek and other Oriental churches use leavened bread, which is especially made for the purpose with scrupulous care and attention. The Christians of St. Thomas likewise make use of leavened bread composed of fine flour, which by an ancient rule of theirs ought to be prepared on the same day on which it is to be consecrated. It is circular in shape, stamped with a large cross, the border being edged with smaller crosses, so that when it is broken up each fragment may contain the holy symbol. In the Roman Catholic Church the bread is made thin and circular, and bears upon it either the impressed figure of the crucifix or the letters I.H.S. Pope Zephyrinus, who lived in the 3d century, terms the sacramental bread "corona sive oblata spherice figuræ," a crown or oblation of a spherical figure (Benedict XIV, De Sacrificio Missæ, i, 6, 4), the circle being indicatory of the Divine Presence after consecration. The Orientals occasionally make their altar-breads square, on which is stamped a cross with an inscription. The square form of the bread is a mystical indication that by the sacrifice of Christ upon the cross salvation is purchased for the four corners of the earth—for north, south, east, and west; and, moreover, that our Blessed Saviour died for all men. In the Church of England unleavened bread was invariably made use of until the changes of the 16th century. Since that period, however, with but few exceptions, common and ordinary leavened bread has been used. The ancient rule has never been theoretically abolished, for one of the existing rubrics runs as follows: "It shall suffice that the bread be such as is usual to be eaten, but the best and purest wheat bread that conveniently may be gotten."

Altar-bread Box, a box to hold the wafers, or altar-breads, before consecration. Such receptacles were anciently of boxwood or ivory. The example given in the illustration is of ivory mounted in silver.

Altar-bread Box.

Altar-card, a modern term used to describe a printed or written transcript of certain portions of the service for holy communion; more especially those parts which, having to be said by the officiating priest in the midst of the altar, he requires to have placed immediately before him. The altar-card, therefore, is placed in that position.

Altar-carpet, a carpet spread in front of the altar, over the steps of the deacon and subdeacon, as well as over the whole of the upper platform, or predella, on which the officiant stands to minister. In mediæval times Eastern carpets were commonly used for this purpose. Modern changes have not as yet produced anything superior or more fitting. Green is the proper color for use, as harmonizing with any other shade of green, and as contrasting duly and well with all the other ecclesiastical colors.

Altar-cerecloth. See ALTAR-LINEN.

Altar-cloth (linteamen, palla; ἄμφιον, ἄπλωμα, etc.), an ordinary term for that covering of the altar which, made of silk, velvet, satin, or cloth, is placed over and around it. The altar-cloth is usually made in two portions: first, the antependium, which hangs down in front and is often richly embroidered; and, secondly, the superfrontal, which covers the slab and hangs down about six inches, both in front and at the sides. Such cloths, of different kinds and of various materials (originally of linen only), appear to have been in use in the earliest Christian times. See Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antig. s. v.; Lee, Gloss. of Liturg. Terms, s. v. See SUPERFRONTALE.

Altar-cross.

Altar-cross, a cross of precious or other metal placed behind the centre of an altar to signify that every grace and blessing bestowed upon the faithful is given for and through the death of our Lord upon the cross of Calvary. In recent times a figure of Jesus Christ has sometimes been affixed to the altar-cross. See CRUCIFIX.

Altar-curtains, hangings of silk, damask, satin, or other fitting material, suspended on rods so as to enclose the ends of an altar. In large churches they are found very convenient for protecting the altar-tapers from currents of air and draughts. Their color varies with the ecclesiastical season.

Altar-frontal, another name for an altar-cloth. Sometimes, however, frontals were made of wood in panels, richly painted, representing figures of saints or angels. In other cases the most elaborate mosaic-work was introduced for the permanent adornment of altar-frontals, on which symbols and representations of types of the blessed sacrament of the altar were appropriately placed. There were also frontals made of the precious metals, in which beaten-work, chasing, and embossing were discreetly and tastefully adopted for their greater beauty and richness.

Altar-herse, a term sometimes used to describe the frame on which a temporary canopy was erected over an altar on special solemnities and festivals of the highest rank. Altar-hersees were sometimes used at funerals of royal and noble persons. Their hangings were often adorned with heraldic devices. See HEARSE.

Precious Frontal.

Altar-horns, the horns or corners of the altar which are on its western side. The north corner is called the "gospel horn" (cornu evangelii), the south the "epistle horn" (cornu epistolæ).

Altaristæ, a term used to designate those priests other than the parochus who were specially appointed to say mass for specific intentions at private, chantry, or privileged altars.

Altarium, a word sometimes used to designate not merely an altar, but the space within which the altar stood. The plural is also used in a similar sense by St. Ambrose and in the Theodosian Code. The same extended sense is found in some modern languages, e. g. in Portuguese "altar mór" (great or high altar) is used in the sense of choir or chancel.

Altar-lantern, a term occasionally found in old records describing the lanterns which were used in lieu of simple wax-tapers for the altar when erected temporarily and out-of-doors. Abroad they are found in the sacristies of many churches, and are frequently used, carried on either side of the crucifix at funerals, solemn processions of the blessed sacrament, in those parts of the Church where reservation of the holy eucharist is practiced.

Altar-ledge, a step or ledge behind an altar on which the ornamenta, i. e. the cross, candlesticks, and flower-vases, are placed. Behind some altars there are more than one step, especially in those of Roman Catholic churches, from which benediction with the blessed sacrament is given.

Altar-lights, those lights which are placed either upon or immediately behind the altars of some churches to symbolize generally the light of the Gospel and the twofold nature of our Blessed Lord, who in the Nicene Creed is called "Light of Light," and is the true Light of the world. At the offering of the Christian eucharist two lights are commonly used; but the law of the Church of England is that they must not be placed upon the altar. They may stand behind it or at its sides. See CANDLESTICK.

Altar-linen, those linen cloths, three in number, which are used to cover the altar-slab. The first is a cloth duly prepared with melted wax (hence called the altar-cerecloth); the second is a cloth to protect this first cloth; and the last is the cloth of linen which, placed over the top of the altar, hangs down to the ground, or nearly so, at either end of the altar.

Altar-piece, a painting placed over the altar. The practice was unknown to Christians during the first three centuries, but it gradually crept in, particularly in the 4th century. In the Council of Eliberis in Spain, A.D. 305, it was decreed that pictures ought not to be in churches, lest that which is painted on the walls be worshipped and adored. In Romish churches, particularly in Roman Catholic countries, paintings of Scripture scenes and incidents by the most eminent artists are used as altar-pieces. The same custom has crept into some Protestant churches. In the Church of England, for instance, it is no uncommon thing to see paintings hung above the altar, although they are not to be found in other parts of the church. The English Reformers were violently opposed to the practice, and during the reign of Elizabeth a royal proclamation was issued prohibiting the use of either paintings or images in churches. The practice had become very general at the time of the Reformation, but was then checked by the Protestant movement. Even at this hour, however, Romish churches, and many Anglican churches, attach great importance to the altar-piece, not so much as an ornament, but as an encouragement to the practice of the invocation of saints. See IMAGES; INVOCATION.

Altar-protector, the name given to a covering of green cloth, baize, or velvet which, exactly fitting the top of the altar, is placed on it at all times when the altar is not in use, to protect the sacred linen from dust and defilement.

Altar-rails. The part of the church where the communion-table or altar stood in the ancient churches was divided from the rest of the church by rails. Eusebius says the rails were of wood, curiously and artificially wrought in the form of net-work, to make the enclosure inaccessible to the multitude. These the Latins called cancelli, and hence our English word chancel (q. v.). According to Synesius, to lay hold of the rails is equivalent to taking sanctuary or refuge at the altar. Altar-rails are almost uniformly found in Episcopal churches in England.

Altar-screen, the partition between the altar and the lady-chapel seen in large churches.

Altar-side, that part of the altar which faces the congregation. In correctly orientated churches this is, of course, the western side; but where altars are placed against the north and south walls of collegiate or cathedral churches, as is constantly the case on the Continent and in the Anglo-Roman communion, the altar-side will be that against which the priest stands when ministering at the same.

Altar-steps, the steps below and about the altar in a Christian church. They are usually at least three in number, independent of, and in addition to, the platform, predella, or dais on which the altar is actually placed. Sometimes there are more in number than three; if so, they are either five, seven, or fourteen. The latter would pertain to the high-altar of a collegiate church or cathedral.

Altar-stole, a mediæval ornament, in shape like the ends of a stole, hanging down over the front of the antependium of the altar, indicating that the altar itself is constantly used, and symbolizing the power and efficacy of the Christian communion.

Altar-taper (so called because they taper in shape), the wax candles used in those candlesticks which are placed on or about the altar; ordinarily those tapers which are lighted during the celebration of the Christian sacrament. Custom in the West expects that at least two be lighted, even at low celebrations; at high celebrations in the Latin Church, as also in some English churches, six tapers are then ordinarily lighted. They symbolize (1) the fact that our Blessed Saviour, "God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God," is the True Light of the World. They are also (2) symbols of joy and gladness on the part of the faithful that Christ is born into the world (α) naturally, i. e. by nature; (β) sacramentally, i. e. in the eucharistic mystery.

Altar-tomb, a raised monument resembling a solid altar. This is a modern term; the expression used by Leland is high-tomb. See TOMB.

Altar-tomb, Porlock, Somerset, cir. 1500.

Altar-vases, vases of latten, brass, china, or earthenware, specially made for holding flowers to decorate the altar. This custom does not appear to be of any very great antiquity, beautiful and appropriate as it is. Churches were anciently decorated with boughs and branches, and their floors strewn with rushes, bay and yew boughs; but the formal introduction of flowers in vases on the altar-ledge is of no higher antiquity than the early part of the last century.

Altar-vessels, those vessels which are ordinarily used in the sacrament of the altar; viz. (1) the chalice, (2) the paten, and (3) the ciborium. The chalice is a cup of precious metal, the paten a plain circular plate of the same, and the ciborium—used to contain the sacramental species under the form of bread—is a covered cup surmounted with a small cross, from which the faithful are communicated when the communicants are numerous, and in which the holy sacrament is reserved for the communion of the sick. The cruets for wine and water, and the bread-box, in which, or the plate on which, the breads are placed, are not actually "altar-vessels," being found on the credence-table, their proper place, during the Christian communion.

Altar-wall, the wall behind an altar against which the reredos or altar-piece stands. See ALTAR-PIECE; REREDOS.

Altar-wine, wine used in the sacrament of the altar; this should be of the pure juice of the grape. The twentieth canon orders it to be "good and wholesome." Tent-wine is ordinarily used in England, as being more appropriate in its symbolism; but light-colored wine is not uncommonly adopted. Claret, wanting in some particulars the true nature of wine, is forbidden by several Western decrees. See WINE.

Altdorfer (or Altorfer), ALBERT, a German painter and engraver, was born at Altdorf, in Bavaria, in 1488. He probably studied under Albert Dürer.

Altar-taper.

There are some of his paintings at Ratisbon which are much praised. He was quite distinguished among that class of engravers called "the little masters." He executed over one hundred and seventy prints, of which the following are a few of the principal ones: The Virgin and Infant, with two children, one holding a pot, dated 1507:—The Repose in Egypt:—The Virgin Standing, with the Child upon her knee, and St. Joseph standing by, with a staff in his hand:—Our Saviour on the Cross. There are many other historical and mythological subjects, and some wood-cuts. History gives no account of his death.

Al tehi ka-abothéka (אל תהי כאבוֹתֶהָ), i. e. Be not like thy Fathers, is the title of a satirical epistle written by Profiat Duran (q. v.), and published some years ago by rabbi Wise of Cincinnati, in an English translation, in his paper, the Israelite. The pompous heading given to the translation, by the Cincinnati rabbi—"A Relic of Great Significance," respectfully inscribed "to religion peddlers"—sufficiently indicates the animus of the publication, and is a poor apology for this effort to bring before modern readers a mediæval epistle full of invectives against Christianity. (B. P.)

Altenasochites, a Mohammedan sect, also called Munasichites; both names having reference to their belief in the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls. See METEMPSYCHOSIS.

Altenburg Conference. Altenburg is a city of Germany, capital of Saxe-Altenburg, twenty-six miles south of Leipzig. A conference of divines was held there in the year 1568, by order of Augustus, prince elector of Saxony, and John William, duke of Weimar. The occasion of the call was the disputes between the different parties of Lutherans in reference to the atonement of Christ. The subjects discussed were the Majoristic, Synergistic, and Adiaphoristic contests. The debaters were in part Misnian and in part Thuringian divines. As all the transactions were in writing, the conferences were protracted to a great length; and on one single expression in the article on justification the discussion lasted five months. See Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. iv, cent. xvi, sec. iii, pt. ii, ch. i; Sagittarius, Introductio ad Hist. Eccles. pt. ii, p. 1542.

Alten-Oetting (or Altötting), a village of Upper Bavaria, pleasantly situated in a fertile plain near the river Inn. It is frequented by thousands of Roman Catholics from Austria, Bavaria, and Swabia, on account of a famous image of the Virgin Mary (the Black Virgin) which it possesses. The Redemptorist fathers, invited here in 1838, have built an educational institution, virtually a revival of the old Jesuit college erected in 1773. It was formerly a villa regia, several kings having held their courts there, and various princes having made pilgrimages to it. It contains also the tomb of Count Tilly, called Tilly's Chapel, which is held in such veneration that Maximilian I and numerous others of the royal Bavarian family have had their hearts interred in it.

Altensteig (or Altenstaig), JOHANN, a German Catholic theologian, lived in the first half of the 16th century. He was for a time professor at Tübingen, and published, Vocabularium Vocum quæ in Operibus Grammaticorum Plurimorum Continentur (Tübingen, 1508; Hagenau, 1512 and 1515):—Vocabularium Theologicum (Hagenau, 1517):—Commentarius in Henrici Biblicii Triumphum Veneris (Strasburg, 1515):—Ars Epistolandi (Hagenau, 1512). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Altercatio, in Roman mythology, is the personified vice of dispute.

Alternate Presentation, THE RIGHT OF. In the Church of Rome the right of alternative consists in the power of presenting, alternately with the pope, to collative benefices; so that if the pope confers benefices which fall vacant in the month of January, the bishop confers those which become vacant in February, and so on. The exceptions with regard to the pope are benefices vacated by resignation, and those the patronage of which belongs to lay persons; and, with regard to bishops, benefices the collation to which, for other reasons, belongs to the pope: as, for instance, benefices becoming vacant in curia, i. e. by the death of the incumbents while within the precincts of the court of Rome. Cardinals are exempt from the reservation of the alternative, and collators in all countries possessing a concordat at variance with the alternative. The form of the alternative is given by Loterius, lib. ii; De Re Beneficiorum.

Alteserra, Antoine Dadin, a famous French historian and canonist, was born at Guyenne in 1602. In 1644 he was appointed professor of jurisprudence at the University of Toulouse, and died in 1682 as dean of his faculty. His extensive knowledge of the Greek and Latin Church fathers as well as of the history of the councils made him an authority in that department and acquired for him the high esteem in which he was held by the French clergy. Of his many works we mention, De Origine et Statu Feudorum pro Moribus Gallie (Paris, 1619):—Innocentius III P. M., seu Commentarius Perpetuus in Singulas Decretales hujus Pontificis, quæ per Libros V Decretalium sparsæ sunt (ibid. 1666):—Notæ in Epistolas Gregorii Magni (Tolos. 1669):—Ascticon, sive Originum Rei Monastica Libri X (Paris, 1674; Halle, 1782):—Notæ et Observationes in X Libros Historiæ Francorum Gregorii, Turonensis Episcopi, et Supplementum Fredegarii (Tolos. 1679):—Notæ et Observationes in Anastasium de Vitis Romanorum Pontificum (Paris, 1680):—In Libros Clementinum Commentarii (ibid. eod.; Halle, 1782):—Ecclesiastica Jurisdictionis Vindicia adversus Caroli Feoreti et aliorum Tractatus de Abusu (Paris, 1703, and often). A complete edition of his works was published at Naples in 1776–80. See Ingler, Beiträge zur juristischen Biographie (Leipsa. 1773–80), v. 51 sq.; Adelung, Fortsetzung und Ergänzung zu Jöcher's allgem. Gelehrten-Lexikon (ibid. 1784), i. 653 sq.; Michaud, Bibl. Univ. xviii, 571; Wetzler u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon (2d ed. 1881), s. v. (B. P.)

Alteserra, Flavius François, a brother of Antoine, professor of jurisprudence at Poitiers, who died about 1670, is the author of Notæ et Animadversiones ad Indiculus Ecclesiasticorum Canonum Fulgentii Ferrandii et Cresconii Afri (Poitiers, 1630):—Exercitatio ad Tit. Decretalium Gregor. IX de Etate, Qualitate, et Ordine Præficiendorum (Paris, 1635). Both works are also reprinted in Meerman's Thesaurus Jur. Civ. i. 133 sq.; vii, 825 sq. See Ingler, p. 59 sq.; Adelung, p. 654 sq.; Wetzler u. Welte, Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Altfrid, bishop of Hildesheim from 851 to 874, is said to have been a monk at Corvey before his elevation to the bishopric. The ordinations performed by his predecessor, bishop Ebbo, who died March 20, 851, he declared null and void, because he regarded the translation of Ebbo from Rheims to Hildesheim as in conflict with the laws of the Church. He took an active part in the affairs of Church and State, and was present at the synods held at Mayence in 852 and 857, at Worms in 868, and at Cologne in 873. He founded many monasteries, and through his efforts the cathedral at Hildesheim was built, which he dedicated in 872. He died Aug. 15, 875. See Lüntzel, Geschichte der Diocese und Stadt Hildesheim (Hildesheim, 1858), i. 16–35; Dümmler, Geschichte des ostfränkischen Reichs, vol. i; Simson, Jahrbücher des fränkischen Reichs unter Ludwig dem Frommen, ii, 286; Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, vol. iv; Müllenhoff u. Althiofi, in Norse mythology, was one of the original dwarfs, first created by the gods. He was famous for his skill in metallurgy.

Althofer, CHRISTOPH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Nov. 9, 1606, at Hersbruck. He studied at Altdorf, Wittenberg, Leipsic, and Jena. In 1629 he was called as professor of theology and deacon to Altdorf, but resigned his deanery in 1637. In 1639 the Jena University made him doctor of divinity, and in 1644 he was appointed general superintendent at Culmbach, where he died, May 11, 1660. A catalogue of his theological works, comprising a commentary on the Pauline epistles, a Gospel harmony, polemical writings against Calvinists and Catholics, sermons, etc., is given by Zeltner, Bibl. Theol. Altorf, p. 268 sq. See also Will, Nürnberg. Gel.-Lexikon, i, 26; v, 27; Witten, Mem. Theol. p. 1487; Tholuck, Das akademische Leben im 17. Jahrhundert, p. 26; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Alticherio (or Aldigieri), DA ZEVIO, an Italian painter, lived in the 14th century. He seems to have been the first Veronese painter of any note. Vasari says he executed, with great skill, a single picture of the history of the Jewish War, according to the account of Flavius Josephus, on the four walls of the great hall of the Palazzo de' Scaligeri. He painted also at Padua in the old Church of San Giorgio.

Altino, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Altinense). Altino is a city of Italy, situated on the Adriatic Gulf. It was formerly an episcopal see, but its destruction compelled the removal of the bishop's chair to Torcello. The council was held in 802; and in it Paulinus of Aquileia implored the help of Charlemagne against John, duke of Venice, who had thrown down from the top of a tower John, patriarch of Grado. See Labbé, Concil. vii, 1187.

Altius, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Jupiter, derived from Altis, the name of a sacred forest near Olympia.

Altman, a monk of HAUTEVILLIERS, in the diocese of Rheims, who lived about A.D. 850, wrote the Life of St. Sulpicius, the confessor (see Mabillon, Sac. Bened. i, 368). Sigbertus of Gemblours attributes to him a Life of Nivars, bishop of Rheims; also of the Empress Helena and others. See Cave, Historia Litteraria, s. v.

Altman, bishop of PASSAU, was born at Westphalia between 1010 and 1020. He studied at Paris, and for a number of years he stood at the head of the cathedral school at Paderborn. Here he became known to Henry III, who appointed him provost of Aix-la-Chapelle and made him one of his chaplains. In 1064 he accompanied the empress Agnes to Palestine, and succeeded Eigilbert, who died in 1065, in the bishopric of Passau. He entered upon his office in very troublesome times. Being one of the strongest promoters of the system of Gregory VII in Germany, and zealous for the glory of his Church, he built monasteries everywhere, and introduced ecclesiastical discipline. When in 1074 he published the papal bull concerning celibacy, he would have been killed by the married priests, were it not for the help of some of his servants who rescued him. This resistance, however, gave him the more courage, and he proceeded with inexorable severity against the disobedient ones, whom he deprived of their offices, and even excommunicated the cathedral provost Engilbert, who was at the head of the opponents. With Gebhard of Salzburg he fought for the cause of the pope, and they were the only ones of the bishops of South Germany who did not appear at Worms on Jan. 24, 1076, where the deposition of the pope was the subject of deliberation. He published the excommunication of the emperor, and was present at Ulm in 1076 as papal legate. In 1077 he was deposed by the emperor and driven away from his see. He went to Saxony and afterwards to Rome, where he reported to Gregory concerning the atrocities perpetrated at Passau by the king's adherents, and returned his bishopric to the pope because he had received it from the hands of the laity. The pope, however, confirmed him in his dignity, and invested him with full power for the election of an anti-king. In 1081 he again occupied his see, for Liupolt of Austria allowed him his protection while Henry had crossed the Alps. When Liupolt was beaten by the Bohemians in 1082 at Mailberg, Altman was again obliged to leave Passau, and went to Götting, where he died, Aug. 8, 1091. See Vita Altmani, Monumenta Germanica, xii, 226; Wiedeman, Altman von Passau (Augsburg, 1851); Stulz, Leben des Bischofs Altman (Vienna, 1853); Holzwarth, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Alto, an Irish missionary of illustrious family who arrived in Bavaria about A.D. 743. He lived a hermit life in a forest about midway between Augsburg and Munich. Pepin granted him a part of the forest for the purpose of erecting a monastery and a church. The latter was dedicated by St. Boniface, and the monastery was called, after him, Alto-Münster, corrupted afterwards into Alt-Münster. The exact date of his death is unknown, but his memory is revered Feb. 9. See Langman, History of Ireland, iii, 189.

Altobello, an Italian painter, was a native of Cremona, and lived in the early part of the 16th century. He is said to have studied under Bramante, and Vasari extols him as superior to most of the Lombard painters of his time. He painted frescos in the Church of Santo Agostino, and also in the cathedral of Cremona. History gives no account of his death.

Alton, ABEL, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Waterford, Vt., June 16, 1803. He began his Christian life at the age of ten; joined the New England Conference in 1823, and was immediately transferred to the Maine Conference. His latter years were spent laboring in the Providence Conference. He died in Marion, Mass., March 11, 1867. As a preacher, Mr. Alton was clear, methodical, instructive, earnest; as a pastor, devoted, zealous. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1867, p. 102.

Alton, WILLIAM OF, so called from the town of Alton, in Hants, was a Dominican who flourished some time before 1267. A MS. in the library of St. Victor of 1267 speaks of the postils of William of Alton upon Ecclesiastes and the Book of Wisdom. These latter postils were printed at Rome among the works of St. Bonaventura. He also left Commentaries on Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations.

Altor, in Roman mythology, was a surname of Pluto.

Altria, an Etruscan goddess, answering to one of the Greek Graces. She was represented as a nude and beautiful woman, with a crown and necklace, and generally in the company of Thalna and Euterpe.

Altschul, NAFTALI BEN-ASHER, a Jewish printer in the city of Prague (1649), where his father had carried on the same profession, is the author of a commentary on the Old Test., simple and grammatical, compiled from the best authorities, entitled אילנה שלוחה (in allusion to Gen. xlix, 21). The text is in Hebrew and the notes in Jewish-German (best ed. Amsterdam, 1777-78, 6 vols.). He also wrote a manual for preachers, אמרי שפר, Words of Beauty, in thirty-two sections of commonplaces, arranged in alphabetical order (Lublin, 1602). See Fürst, Bibliotheca Judaica, i, 44; Etheridge, Introduction to Hebrew Literature, p. 447; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 42. (B. P.)

Aluberht (1), the fifth bishop of the South Saxons at Selsea, is known only by the appearance of his name in the lists. His date must fall between 747, when his predecessor Sigga was at the Council of Clovesho, and 765, when his successor signs.

Aluberht (2) was consecrated bishop of the East Saxons, or of the Old Saxons, in 767. Simeon of Durham calls him Aluberht, and makes him bishop of the Old Saxons of Germany. If this be true, he was the last bishop consecrated in England for Germany, and identical with the missionary Alubert (q. v.). In the MS. (more authoritative) used by Hoveden, he is called Alberht and made bishop of Essex; and thus corresponds with Ealdberht, the ninth bishop of London in the ancient lists, and with an Aldberht who signs various charters between 775 and 785. As, however, there were contemporary bishops, Aldberht at Hereford and Eadberht at Leicester, he cannot be identified with certainty, but is, most probably, the bishop Eadberchtus who attests the proceedings of the legatine council of 787.

Alubert, an eminent Anglo-Saxon missionary, who went over from England and joined Gregory in the superintendence of his school at Utrecht. Persuaded by Gregory, he returned to England to seek episcopal consecration. During the year he spent there, he enjoyed the society of the celebrated Alcuin, then superintending his famous school at York. Having received consecration, he returned and continued to assist Gregory in training missionaries for the Frisians and ordaining them to that office. See Life of St. Liudger; Pertz, Mon. Germ. ii, 407.

Aluic. See ALWIG.

Aluphus, a monk of St. Martin, of Tournay, who lived at the end of the 11th century, composed a selection of thoughts and extracts taken from the works of St. Gregory, and entitled Gregorialis. Mabillon has given the preface in his Analecta (vol. i). Another work is attributed to him, Opus Exceptionum (Paris and Strasbourg).

Alumbrados (Span. the enlightened). See ILLUMINATI.

Alur (Old Eng. alours).

A. Alur. B. Parapet.
M. Machicolation.

This word appears generally to have signified the gutter, passage, or gallery in which persons could walk behind a parapet on the top of a wall, or in other situations, especially in military architecture, where the alur becomes of the highest importance. The term, however, was sometimes used for passages of various kinds. Lydgate used the word for covered walks in the streets. So in the form alure it signifies an alley or walk in a church or cloister. See AMBULATORY.

Alured of BEVERLEY. See ALRED.

Aluredus. See AILRED.

Alush. Mr. Rowlands (in Fairbairn's Dict. s. v. "Rephidim") regards this as identical with the Wady el-Eish reported by Dr. Stewart (Tent and Khan, p. 157) as "a large valley coming down from the hills to the east [north] and eventually falling into Wady Sheikh;" evidently the Wady el-Esh of the Ordnance Map, at the junction of the great wadies Berrar and el-Akhdar, north of Wady el-Sheikh, near the eastern termination of Wady Feiran at Wady Solaf.

Aluza. See ALOZA.

Alva (or Alba), FERNANDO ALVAREZ DE TOLEDO, duke of, a Spanish general and statesman, notorious for his persecuting cruelty, was born of an illustrious family in 1508. He was educated by the direction of his grandfather, Frederick of Toledo, who instructed him in military and political science. He carried arms when very young at the battle of Pavia, commanded under Charles V in Hungary, also at the siege of Tunis, and in the expedition against Algiers. In his earliest military efforts, his cautious disposition led men to believe that he had but little talent in that direction. His pride was offended at the low estimation in which he was held, and his genius was roused to the performance of exploits deserving of a permanent remembrance. In 1546-47 he was general-in-chief in the war against the Smalcaldian League, winning his greatest honors in the battle of Muhlberg, in which he totally routed the Protestant forces. The elector, John Frederick of Saxony, was taken prisoner, and the duke, who presided in the council of war, sentenced him to death, and strongly urged the emperor to execute the sentence. In 1554 he went with the Spanish crown-prince to England; and in 1555, shortly before the accession of that prince as Philip II, he was commissioned as commander-in-chief of the army sent to attack the French in Italy and pope Paul IV, the irreconcilable enemy of the emperor Charles V. He gained several victories, relieved Milan, advanced to Naples, where the intrigues of the pope had stirred up a rebellion, and confirmed there the Spanish authority. He afterwards conquered the States of the Church and frustrated the efforts of the French. Philip, however, compelled him to contract an honorable peace with the pope, whom Alva wished to humble. A few years later the Netherlands revolted, and Alva advised the king to suppress the insurrection by severity and force. The king intrusted him with a considerable army and unlimited power to reduce the rebellious provinces. Scarcely had he reached Flanders when he established the Council of Blood, at the head of which stood his confidant, Juan de Vargas. This tribunal condemned, without discrimination, all whose opinions were suspected and whose riches excited their avarice. The present and the absent, the living and the dead, were subjected to trial, and their property confiscated. Many merchants and mechanics emigrated to England, more than 100,000 men abandoned their country, and others resorted to the standard of the proscribed prince of Orange. The cruelty of Alva was increased by the defeat of his lieutenant, the duke of Aremberg, and he caused the counts of Egmont and Horn to be executed on the scaffold, June 5, 1568. He afterwards defeated the count of Nassau on the plains of Jemmingen. William of Orange soon advanced with a powerful army, but was forced to withdraw to Germany. The duke stained his reputation as a general by new cruelties; his executioners shed more blood than his soldiers. The pope presented him with a consecrated hat and sword, a distinction previously conferred only on princes. Holland and Zealand, however, resisted his arms. A fleet, which was fitted at his command, was annihilated, and he was everywhere met with insuperable courage. This and perhaps the fear of losing the favor of the king induced him to request his recall. Philip willingly granted it, as he perceived that the resistance of the Netherlands was rendered more obstinate by these cruelties, and was desirous of trying milder measures. In December, 1573, Alva proclaimed an amnesty, resigned the command of the troops to Luis de Requesens, and left the provinces. His parting advice was that every city in the Netherlands should be burned to the ground except a few to be permanently garrisoned, and he boasted that during his six years' rule he had executed 18,000 men. But to this number must be added those who perished by siege, battle, and merciless slaughter, and the number cannot be computed. He had kindled a war which burned sixty-eight years, cost Spain $800,000,000, her finest troops, and seven of her richest provinces in the Netherlands. His cruelties were inhuman. Every conceivable mode of death and torture was wreaked upon the victims of his royal master's vengeance. At the sack of Haarlem three hundred citizens, tied two and two and back to back, were thrown into the lake, and at Zutphen five hundred more were drowned in the same manner in the river Yssel. Thousands of women were publicly violated, and unborn infants ripped from the wombs of their mothers. Yet Alva complained of the ingratitude of the Netherlands in return for his clemency! He was well received at Madrid, but did not long enjoy his former credit. One of his sons had seduced one of the queen's maids of honor under a promise of marriage, and was for that reason arrested. His father assisted him to escape, and married him to one of his relatives contrary to the will of the king. In consequence, Alva was banished from the court to his castle at Uzeda. Here he lived two years, when the troubles stirred up by Dom Antonio, prior of Crato, who had been crowned king of Portugal, made it necessary for Philip to call out Alva to subdue the enemy. Accordingly, in 1581, he led an army to Portugal, drove out Dom Antonio, and reduced the entire country to submission. He made himself master of the treasures of the capital, and permitted his soldiers to plunder the suburbs and surrounding country with their usual rapacity and cruelty. Philip was displeased with this, and disposed to institute an investigation; but knowing the character of the duke, and fearing a rebellion, he desisted. Alva died Jan. 21, 1582. He was of a proud mien and noble aspect; he was tall, thin, and strong of frame; he slept little, wrote and labored much. It is said of him that in sixty years of warfare against different enemies he never lost a battle, and was never taken by surprise. But pride, severity, and cruelty tarnished his fame, and have condemned him to lasting infamy. See Motley, Rise of the Dutch Republic; also the arts. HOLLAND and WILLIAM I OF ORANGE.

Alvarez, Baltasar, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Cervera in 1533, and died in 1580. He left, among other works, Tractatus de Modo et Ratione Loquendi de Rebus Spiritualibus, against the Illuminati who had sprung up in Spain. See Antonio, Bibl. Script. Hisp.

Alvarez, Baltazar, a Portuguese Jesuit, was professor of theology at Evora. He died at Coimbra, Feb. 12, 1630. He wrote Index Expurgatorius Librorum ab Exorto Luthero. See Antonio, Bibl. Script. Hisp.

Alvarez, Bernadino de, a Spanish philanthropist, founder of the order of St. Hippolytus, was born at Seville in 1514. At the age of fourteen years he went to the New World to seek his fortune, and enrolled himself in the Mexican army; but, for bad conduct, was sent to the Philippine Islands, from which he escaped and took refuge in Peru. Having amassed wealth, he founded hospitals severally at Mexico in 1567, at Oaxtepe, at Vera Cruz, at Acapulco, and in other cities of New Spain. These hospitals were occupied by a charitable association of St. Hippolytus, the statutes of which were approved by pope Innocent XII, and printed in Mexico in 1621 and 1718. Alvarez died in 1584, and was eventually canonized. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alvarez, Diego, a Spanish Dominican friar, was born at Rio Seco, in Old Castile, near the middle of the 16th century. He taught theology for thirty years in Spain and at Rome, to which latter place he was sent in 1596 in order to sustain the doctrine of St. Thomas against the disciples of Molina in the assemblies of De Auxiliis; but he left to his companion Lemos the brilliant part of this celebrated dispute. He died at Naples in 1635. He published, in defence of the opinions of his order, De Auxiliis Divinae Gratiae (Lyons, 1611):—Concordia Liberi Arbitrii cum Prædestinatione (ibid. 1622). These works gained for him the archbishopric of Trani, in the kingdom of Naples. He was considered the chief theologian of his school, and was the author of certain commentaries upon Isaiah and upon the Summa of St. Thomas; he is also the author of several learned works, as De Incarnatione Divini Verbi Disput. 80 (Lugduni, 1614):—De Origine Pelagianæ Hæresis, etc. (Trani, 1629). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alvarez, Fernando. See ALVA, DUKE OF.

Alvarez, Francisco, was mass priest and chaplain to Dom Manuel, king of Portugal, about the year 1515. He was a native of Coimbra, and at that time advanced in life; but of his early history nothing is known. He visited Abyssinia in company with the Portuguese ambassador, Duarte Galvam, reaching that country in 1516. He passed several years there, and returned to Portugal, landing at Lisbon, July 25, 1527. He had explored a considerable part of Abyssinia, and an interesting account of his travels was published in 1540, entitled a True Account of the Country of Prester John. He died about 1540.

Alvarez, Gonçalo, a Portuguese Jesuit, and missionary to the East, was born at Villaviciosa, in the first half of the 16th century, of a noble family. Having studied at Coimbra, he joined the Jesuit Order at that place, Jan. 1, 1549. Being a man of profound learning, he was chosen by St. Francis of Borja to fill the important office of visitor to the Indies. He started on this mission in 1568, and arrived there the following September, in the ship which conveyed Don Luis of Altagde. He accomplished his work, returned to China, and organized the first system of studies at Macao. On his way back to Japan, in order to continue his labors with Manoel Lopes, he was shipwrecked and drowned July 2, 1573. He wrote Carta a São Francisco de Borja, General de Companhia. This letter was useful to many historians, as well as another, entitled Oriente Conquistado, written at Souza. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Alvarez, Lorenzo, a Spanish painter, studied at Valladolid and Madrid under B. Carducci. In 1638 he went to Murcia, and executed some fine work for the convents of that city.

Alvarez, Luiz, a Portuguese Jesuit, was born at São Romão, in the bishopric of Coimbra, in 1618, and died at Lisbon in 1709. This ascetic writer is regarded as a classical composer, and is the author of a great number of works, among others, Amor Sagrado Offereceo P. Luiz Alvarez, da Companhia de Jesus (Evora, 1673):—Cêo de Graça Inferno Custoso (Coimbra, 1692):—Sermões de Quaresma Offerecidas ao Ilustrissimo Senhor D. João Mascarenhas, Bispo de Portalegre, etc. (Lisboa, 1688). The second and third parts were prepared in 1693 and 1699. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alvarez, Manoel, a Portuguese Jesuit, was born on the island of Madeira, June 4, 1526. He was well versed in the Greek and Hebrew languages, and, above all, in the Latin language and literature, which he taught at Lisbon and Coimbra thus gaining a high reputation. He filled various offices in his order, and died at Lisbon, Dec. 30, 1583. His Latin grammar, entitled De Institutione Grammatica, was published first at Lisbon in 1572, and was adopted in nearly all the schools of his order. Some of his companions, as Kess, Ricardi, Torsellino, prepared abridgments; others, criticisms. Alvarez is the author of a more celebrated work, entitled De Mensuris, Ponderibus, et Numeris. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alvarez, Paulus. See PAULUS ALVAREZ.

Alvarez, Thomas, a Portuguese canonist, born at Leyra, was first treasurer of the Chapel Royal. He devoted himself to the study of the rubrics of the missal and Roman breviary, and published the result in certain Observations (Lisbon, 1615, 1629).

Alvaro, Pelagio, a Spanish theologian, was born near the close of the 13th century. He studied canonical law at Bologna; was a pupil of Scotus and the companion of William Ockam and Raymond Lully. He became grand-penitentiary of pope John XXII of Avignon; bishop of Sylves, in Algarves; and apostolic nuncio to Portugal. He died at Seville in 1352. He wrote, De Planctu Ecclesiæ Libri Duo (Lyons, 1517; Venice, 1560). This work, commenced at Avignon in 1330 and completed in 1332, set forth ultramontanist more prominently. Trithemius attributes to him, *Speculum Regum Liber Unus:—Super Sententias Libri Quatuor:—Apologia:—*and other unpublished works. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alvelda (or Albelda), JUAN GONZALES DE, a Spanish Dominican, was born at Navarrete, diocese of Calahorra. In 1608 he was called to Rome, and appointed first regent of the college of St. Thomas della Minerva. After three years he returned to Spain, and filled the first chair in theology at Alcalá, from 1612 to 1622, when he died. He wrote a Commentary on the first part of the Summa of St. Thomas (Alcalá, 1621).

Alvintzi, Peter, a Hungarian Protestant ecclesiastic of the 17th century, was born in Transylvania. He completed his studies at the best universities of Switzerland and Germany, and became pastor in Hungary. His religious zeal led him into a warm controversy with the Jesuit Peter Pazmany, archbishop of Gran. He wrote in the Hungarian language a number of controversial works, among which we notice one published in 1616, entitled The Catholic Itinerary, in which the author compares the two religions, the Protestant and the Catholic. He also composed a Hungarian Grammar. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alviset, Benoît, a learned French Benedictine, was born at the commencement of the 17th century, at Besançon. During the wars which then desolated the Franche-Comté he returned to Italy and entered the brotherhood at Monte-Casino, under the name Virginus. He wrote a treatise upon the privileges of the monks, entitled Murenula Sacre Vestis Sponsæ Regis Eterni Vermiculatæ; Opus de Privilegiis Ordinum Regularium (Venetiis, 1661). This work was put in the Index by the court of Rome, and reprinted at Kempten in 1673. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Alvord, Caleb Mattoon, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Southampton, Mass., May 3, 1815. He received an academical education in his native town; experienced religion at Miccosukee, Fla., in 1839; was licensed to exhort at Marianna in 1841; and to preach at Wetumpka, Ala., in 1842. He followed the profession of teaching until 1858, when he united with the Providence Conference. In 1865 he was appointed a teacher in the Conference Seminary, where he continued until his death, Jan. 6, 1873. Mr. Alvord was characterized by a joyful Christian experience. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 39.

Alvord, John Watson, a Congregational minister, was born at East Hampton, Conn., April 18, 1807. Having spent some time, as a student, in Oneida Institute, he studied one year in Lane Seminary. In 1836 he graduated from the Oberlin Theological Seminary, and Sept. 16 of that year received his ordination. For one year he was acting-pastor in Maumee City, O.; and then, from 1838 to 1842, held the same position at Barkhamstead, Conn.; March 16, 1842, he was installed pastor in Stamford, of which Church he remained in charge until Oct. 14, 1846. In November of that year he was installed pastor of Phillips Church, South Boston, Mass., from which he was dismissed March 24, 1852; from 1858 to 1866 he was secretary of the American Tract Society in Boston; from 1866 to 1870 was superintendent of schools in connection with the Freedmen's Bureau at Washington, D. C.; the next four years was treasurer of the Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company. He died at Denver, Col., Jan. 14, 1880. See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 16.

Alvord, Samuel, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Massachusetts in 1784. For several years he was a member of a Presbyterian church, and subsequently joined a Calvinist Baptist church. His doctrinal views inclining him more to the Free-will Baptists, he joined that denomination, and was a preacher among them for many years. He died at Hamilton, Ill., Aug. 13, 1871. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1871, p. 82. (J. C. S.)

Alwig (Aluic, Alwih, Alowiochus, Alwine, or Alhunig), the fifth bishop of the Lindisfari (or people of Lindsey), was consecrated by Tatwine, archbishop of Canterbury, in A.D. 733. He subscribed several chapters from 736 to 747, and in the latter year attended the Council of Clovesho. He died, according to Simeon of Durham, in 750.

Alwia, in Norse mythology, was a dwarf who skillfully and secretly won the attention of the daughter of Thor and married her. Thor, the omnipotent hero, being very angry, delayed the marriage until the sun arose, when the dwarf, not able to endure the light of day, was changed into a stone.

Alwitra, in Norse mythology, was a heroine and a companion of the Walkyries.

Alymnus, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Mercury, after the city of Alymne, where he was worshipped.

Alypius. See ALPHEIUS.

Alypius, a learned architect, was commanded by the emperor Julian to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem, with the avowed object of falsifying the prophecies of our Saviour with regard to that structure. It is said that while the workmen were excavating for the foundation, balls of fire issued from the earth and destroyed them. Alypius died about A.D. 363.

Alypius, bishop of CÆSARÆA, in Cappadocia, was one of the metropolitans to whom the emperor Leo wrote respecting the Council of Chalcedon and the death of Proterius. He is also mentioned as assenting to the deposition of Lampetius, a Messalian, whom he had ordained, and who was convicted of immorality. See Labbé, Concil. iv, 1904 sq.; Photius, Bibl. 52.

Alypius, a priest of the Church of CONSTANTINOPLE, who lived in A.D. 430. He wrote an Epistle to St. Cyril, exhorting him to contend against the heresy of Nestorius.

Alzog, JOMANN, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Ohlau, Silesia, in 1808. He studied at Breslau and Bonn; received holy orders at Cologne in 1834; was made doctor of theology at Münster in 1835; the same year he was appointed professor at the Clerical Seminary in Posen; in 1845 he was called to Hildersheim; and he died at Freiburg, March 1, 1878, where he had been laboring since 1853. He wrote, Universalgeschichte der christl. Kirche (Mentz, 1841; 9th ed. 1859 and often; Engl. transl. by Pabisch and Bryne):—Manual of Universal Church History (Cincinnati, 1874), vol. i and ii:—Grundriss der Patrologie (Freiburg, 1866). Am ("I am"). See JEHOVAH.

Am (or Amam) (devourer), a dæmon of the Egyptian Iiades who is mentioned in the Ritual of the Dead.

Ama, in Indian mythology, was a popular name of the goddess Bhuvani, or Parvati.

Ama (or Amūla), the vessel in which wine for the celebration of the eucharist was offered by the worshippers. The word is used by Columella and other classical authors, but the earliest instance of its use as a liturgical vessel which has been noticed is in the Charta Cornutianna of A.D. 471. Silver "amæ" are mentioned (Ordo Romanus, i, 5) among the vessels which were to be brought from the Church of the Saviour, now known as St. John Lateran, for the pontifical mass on Easter-day; and in the directions for the pontifical mass itself (ibid.), we find that after the pope had entered the senatorium, or presbytery, the archdeacon following him received the amulæ, and poured the wine into the larger chalice, which was held by the subdeacon; and again, after the altar was decked, the archdeacon took the pope's amula from the oblationary subdeacon, and poured the wine through the strainer into the chalice (q. v.); then those of the deacons, of the primicerius, and the others. The amulæ, which may not have been identical with the amæ, seem to have been church-vessels provided for the purpose of the offertory. Among the presents which pope Adrian (772-795) made to the Church of St. Adrian at Rome were an "ama" and also an "amula" of silver, which weighed sixty-seven pounds (Liber Pontificalis, p. 346). They were, however, often of much smaller size, and the small silver vessels preserved in the Museo Cristiano in the Vatican are deemed to be amulæ. They measure only about seven inches in height, and may probably date from the 5th or 6th century. On a similar vessel of larger size, probably of the 4th century, the miracle of Cana is represented in a tolerably good style. The material of these vessels was usually of silver, but sometimes gold, and they were often adorned with gems. Gregory the Great mentions (Epist. I, lxii, 539) "amulæ," probably of onyx, or glass imitating onyx.

Amabylis, St., was born in the 5th century at Riom, in Auvergne, about two leagues from Clermont. Having received the order of priesthood, he was appointed to the cure of his native place, where he labored indefatigably, and built the churches of St. John Baptist and St. Benignus. He died at Clermont, Nov. 1, 464, and was buried in the Church of St. Hilary; but his body was afterwards translated to Riom, and interred in the Church of St. Benig-nus, which is now called by his name. His festival is celebrated June 11, the day of his translation, or, according to Ruinart, Oct. 19. See Gregory of Tours, De Gloria Confess. xxxiii, 921 and note by Ruinart.

Amacius, a bishop whose deposition is set down in the martyrology of Bede on July 14.

Amad. Tristram thinks this is the "little mound with traces of ruins, called Un el-Amad, five miles west of Wady el-Malek" (Bible Places, p. 215); meaning the Um el-Amad of Robinson (Later Researches, p. 113, note), who, however, observes that "the people of Bethlehem [Beit-lahm of Zebulun adjoining] said there were no columns there," as the name ("mother of columns") would imply. The place is laid down on the Ordnance Map as Umm el-Amed, a village without any signs of ruins, one mile south of west from Beit-lahm, in the hills north of the plain of Esdraelon; but the situation is rather far east to have been included in the territory of Asher.

Amadeo (or Amadei), GIOVANNI ANTONIO, an Italian sculptor, was born at Pavia in 1400. His principal works are the monuments of the Venetian general, Bartolomeo Colleoni, in a church at Basella, near Bergamo.

Amadesi, GIUSEPPE LUIGI, an Italian canonist, was born at Leghorn, Aug. 28, 1701. He was keeper of the celebrated records of the archbishopric of Ravenna. These he compiled, and he arranged and indexed a large number of writings which he employed in getting up his learned works. He became one of the important citizens of Ravenna, and was one of the founders of the literary unions which were organized in the palace of the marquis Cesare Rasponi. He was four times sent to Rome by the archbishops, where he transacted well much important business. He died at Rome, Feb. 8, 1775. He published, De Jurisdictione Ravennatum Archiepiscoporum in Civitate et Diocesi Ferrariensi (Ravenna, 1747);—De Jure Ravennatum Archiepiscoporum Deputandi Notarios, etc. (Rome, 1752);—De Comitatu Argentano, etc. (ibid. 1763);—and many other works, of which a complete list may be found in vol. i of a work upon the writers of Bologna by Fantuzzi. He assisted in the composition of the burlesque poem entitled Bertholdo con Bertholdino e Cacusenno. The seventeenth canto, with notes, is by him. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amadeus, bishop of LAUSANNE, was born at Côte-Saint-André, a little village in Dauphiné. His father, Amadeus, was a relative of the emperor Henry V, and became a Cistercian monk in 1119; his son entered the same order at Clairvaux, where he studied under St. Bernard. In 1139 he was appointed abbot of the Cistercian monastery at Hautecombe (Altacumba), near Genoa. Under his guidance the monastery profited greatly and was in a very flourishing condition. After the deposition of bishop Guido I of Lausanne, Amadeus was elected in 1141 to the see as the twenty-third bishop of Lausanne, and was consecrated Jan. 21, 1145. The rights and privileges of his bishopric and Church he defended against all opponents, especially against the count of Geneva, the protector of Lausanne, who was finally deposed. The emperor, Conrad III, confirmed all the rights and privileges of the Church of Lausanne, and the emperor Frederick I esteemed Amadeus highly. He ruled his Church until his death in 1158. He is the author of some homilies, written in honor of the Virgin Mary, which were edited by Sopherus (Basle, 1517), and are contained in Bibl. Patrum (printed by P. Gibbon, Antwerp, 1603). Amadeus is among the saints of the Order of Cîteaux. See Gallia Christiana, xv, 346-348; Manriquez, Annales Cisterc. ad Annum 1158, c. 5; Schmid, in Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Amadeus (or Amedius) OF PORTUGAL was a

Franciscan, whose real name was João de Mendez, son of Rodrigo Gomez de Sylva and Isabella, his wife, both of high birth. He was born about 1420, and married at eighteen, but left his bride the instant he was married, and went into Spain, where he fought against the Moors under John II. Determined after this to embrace the monastic state, he became a hermit of St. Jerome. In 1452 he joined the order of the Franciscans and went to Italy. In Perugia and Assisi he was at first refused, till in 1455 the new general of the order received him as a lay-brother. He soon attracted attention on account of his austere penance and wonderful power of prayer. He then connected himself with some others for the purpose of observing most rigidly the rules of St. Francis. Having received holy orders in 1459, he was permitted to build convents of the regular observance at Cremona, Brescia, and Milan. In the latter place he succeeded, by the help of the duke as well as with that of the archbishop, in founding the monastery of Maria della Pace in 1469. When the general, Francis of Rovere, was elected to the see of St. Peter's, under the name of Sixtus IV (q. v.), the society was presented with the monastery and Church of St. Peter's at Rome, while Amadeus was elected confessor to the pope. Here he spent ten years, highly honored by the pope, princes, and ecclesiastical dignitaries. In 1482 he betook himself to visit the convents in Lombardy, when he was taken sick, and died, Aug. 10, in the Monastery of Maria della Pace. His successors worked in the same spirit, and soon convents of the Amedians were founded all over Italy and Spain. Under pope Pius V the Amedians, by means of an apostolic constitution, dated Jan. 23, 1568, were united with other orders. A Book of Prophecies filled with the most idle reveries, many of them opposed to sound doctrine, has been attributed to Amadeus. See Wadding, Annal. Minor.; Helyot (ed. Migne), vii; Tossin, Hist. Seraph. fol. 156; Grammer, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Amadeus VIII, count, afterwards duke, of SAVOY, is known in history for allowing himself to be elected at the Council of Basle, under the name of Felix V, antipope to Eugenius IV. He was born Dec. 4, 1383. In 1416 Savoy was made a dukedom by the emperor Sigismund, who also invested Amadeus, in 1422, with the county of Geneva. In 1430 Amadeus founded the hermitage at Ripaille, where he retired with five other knights, after having left the affairs of his estates in the hands of his son Louis. Amadeus was appointed dean of this hermitage, and spent five years there, until the year 1439, when the schismatic party of the Council of Basle elected him antipope. Although warmly attached to Eugenius IV, his vanity led him to accept the offer, and the more so as he was told that he was "obliged to help the Church." He now gave up entirely all his estates, and was consecrated at Basle July 24, 1440, as pope Felix V. For nine years he occupied his pontificate, which he voluntarily resigned in 1449 in favor of Nicholas V, the successor of Eugenius, whom he regarded as the right pope. He died at Ripaille, Jan. 7, 1451. See Müller, Schweizerische Geschichte, iii, 2, 9; Hefele, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Amador, REBELLO, a Portuguese Jesuit, was born at Mező Frio, in the bishopric of Oporto, in 1539, and died at Lisbon in 1622. He wrote, Alguns Capítulos Tirados das Cartas que Vieram este Anno de 1588 dos Padres da Companhia de Jesu que andam nas Partes da Índia, China, Japão, e Reino de Angola, Impressos para se poderem com mais Facilidade Comunicar a muitas Pessoas que as pedem. Collegidos por o Padre Amador Rebello, da Mesma Companhia, Procurador das Províncias da Índia e Brasil (Lisbon, 1688). This book is very rare, and difficult to be obtained even in France. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amæa, in Greek mythology, was the surname of Ceres in Troezen.

Amalaureus, FORTUNATUS, a friar of Madeloc, was archbishop of Treves in 810. The following year he established again the Christian religion in that part of Saxony which is situated beyond the Elbe. He dedicated the first Church in Hamburg, and went in 813 as an ambassador to Constantinople in order to ratify the peace treaty which Charlemagne had concluded with the emperor Michael Curopalate. He died the following year in his diocese. He wrote a treatise on baptism, which was printed with others under the name of Alcuin. This was in response to a letter in which Charlemagne consulted the metropolitans of his states upon the sacrament. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amalberga (St. and widow) was born about the beginning of the 7th century, of noble parents, in Anstrasia. Her uncle, Pepin, married her against her will to a great lord, named Thierry, by whom she had a daughter, afterwards St. Pharaïlda. Upon the death of her first husband, Pepin forced her to marry a second time, count Witger, a nobleman of Brabant. Of this marriage were born Sts. Gudula, Reinelda, and Emebertus (or Ablebertus). She took the veil at Maubeuge, where she died about A.D. 670, July 10, on which day her festival is celebrated in the Low Countries.

Amalger (Lat. Amalgerus), a friar of the 10th century of the Abbey of St. Gall, in Switzerland. He is mentioned by one of his contemporaries as being very skilful in the fine arts, especially in architecture. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amalric. See AMAURY.

Amalric (or Arnald), an influential chief in the crusade against the Albigenses (q. v.), was born about the middle of the 12th century. He was first abbot of Poblet, in Catalonia, then of Grandelve, and lastly of Cîteaux. He was in the enjoyment of this last dignity when, in 1204, Innocent III associated him with the legates Raoul and Pierre de Castelnau in the mission to extirpate throughout France the heresy of the Albigenses. He preached a crusade against them; many of his contemporaries, several of whom were princes and lords, took part in it, and he was nominated generalissimo of the crusaders. In 1209, after taking several castles and many times routing the enemy's forces, he besieged and took Béziers; sixty thousand inhabitants were massacred, and the town plundered. He then besieged Carcassonne and banished its inhabitants. He was presented to the archbishopric of Narbonne in 1212; thence he went into Spain with the troops, and contributed to the defeat of a Moorish king. On his return to France, he was embroiled in a quarrel with Simon de Montfort about the title of duke of Narbonne, which he had assumed. He died Sept. 29, 1225.

Amalricians. See ALMERICIANS.

Amalricus AUGERII, of Béziers, in Languedoc, took the vows in the Order of St. Augustine, and about 1362 was made abbot of the monastery of St. Mary de Aspirano, in the diocese of Ulm, Germany. He compiled a Chronicon Pontificale, taken from upwards of two hundred other chronicles, and arranged in alphabetical order. The last pope of whom he makes mention is John XXII, whom it may be therefore supposed he did not long survive. Baluze has given a portion of the work in his Vitæ Pap. Avenion. vol. i. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, app. p. 68.

Amalteo, Girolamo, an Italian painter of the 16th century, brother and scholar of Pomponio, was highly gifted by nature, as appears from his designs in small pictures executed in fresco. He executed some altar-pieces for the Church of San Vito. Ridolfi praises him greatly for his spirited manner.

Amalteo, Pomponio, an Italian painter of the Venetian school, was born at San Vito, in Friuli, in 1505. He was a pupil of Pordenone, whose style he closely imitated. His works consist chiefly of frescos and altar-pieces, and many of them have suffered greatly from the ravages of time. He died in the year 1584.

Amalthæa (Ἀμάλθεια), in Greek mythology. As to this name, the poets differ in their interpretations, some holding it to be the name of a goat that nursed Jupiter, others affirming it to be a nymph who weaned the child Jupiter with the milk of a goat. The nymph was a daughter either of Oceanus or of the god of the sun, of Melissus or Hæmonius, or of Olenus, a son of Vulcan. The goat whose milk she used in weaning Jupiter broke off one of its horns on a tree. The nymph filled this with green herbs and fruits, and brought it to Jupiter, who placed it among the stars. Mercury gave this horn to Hercules when he went out to capture the cattle of Geryon. It is also in the possession of the god of the river Achelous. Another story runs as follows: The Libyan king Ammon married an exceedingly beautiful maiden, Amalthea, and gave her a tract of land which had the appearance of a horn. This tract of land was subsequently called the Horn of Amalthea. This horn is made use of in Grecian works of art, and is found especially in the representations of the goddess of fortune, as a symbol of her abundance.

Amancius, Sr., was a priest of Tiferum, or Citta di Castello, in Umbria. He lived in the 6th century, in the time of St. Gregory the Great. The fame of his miracles induced Floridus, bishop of Tiferum, to make him known to St. Gregory, who brought him to Rome and lodged him in the hospital for the sick, where he is said to have performed many wonderful cures. His festival is marked on Sept. 26, and his history is contained in ch. xxxv of the 3d book of the Dialogues of St. Gregory.

Amandus, Sr., was born in Bordeaux, and was ordained priest by St. Delphinus, bishop of that city, and was godfather to St. Paulinus. In 404 he succeeded Delphinus in the see; and it is said that when St. Severinus (q. v.) retired to Bordeaux, Amandus, through extreme humility, compelled him to take charge of the government of that Church. He governed the Church with so much zeal that he was regarded as one of the most saintly prelates of his time. The substance of one of his letters is found in the Epistles of St. Jerome, to whom it was addressed. He is commemorated in the martyrologies on June 18, his birth on Feb. 6, and his translation on Oct. 26.

Amandus (called Fayeta) was abbot of St. BAVON, at Ghent, in the 14th century, and was very zealous against the Flagellants (q. v.); and it was at his instance that pope Clement VII entirely put an end to them. He resigned his abbacy before his death, which happened in 1394. He composed a treatise, De Esu Carnium, and other works.

Amandus, Hermann, was a Franciscan, professor of theology, and provincial of the province of St. Wenceslaus, in Bohemia. His works are, Philosophia ad Mentem Augustini Bernardi et Scoti (1676, 4 vols. fol.):—Tractatus Theologicus in lib. 1 Sententiarum, etc. (Cologne, 1690, fol.):—Commentaria in lib. 4 Sententiarum, etc. (ibid. eod. fol.):—Ethica Sacra Speculativo-practica, seu Disputationes Morales de Virtutibus Theologicis et Moralibus (Würzburg, 1698, 2 vols. fol.):—Capistranus Triumphans, seu Historia Fundamentalis de S. Joanne Capistrano (Cologne, 1700, fol.).

Amandus, Johann, doctor of theology and superintendent at Goslar, where he died, in 1580, was formerly a Romish priest, but soon embraced the doctrine of the Lutheran Reformation. He was called as first Lutheran pastor to Königsberg, where he preached his first sermon, Nov. 29, 1523. He soon came in conflict with his colleague Brissmann, whom Luther had sent there, and the result was that he had to leave the city. His unruly temperament did not suffer him long in one place, and thus he had to go from city to city. His mutinous sermons caused riots everywhere, and he was finally put in prison by the duke of Pomerania. He appeared again at Goslar, was appointed superintendent, and built a new school; but here also he caused difficulties between the citizens and the magistrates which resulted in disturbances, changed the liturgy, and was suspected of being a secret adherent of Zwingli's doctrine of the Lord's supper. He wrote, Vom geistlichen Streit der Christen (1524). See Corvinus, Wahrh. Bericht, dass das Wort Gottes ohn Tumult ohn Schwermerey zu Goslar und Braunschweig gepredigt wird. (W. Henb. 1529); Arnoldt, Historie d. Königsb. Universität, ii, 475. (B. P.)

Amandus Zierixensis, so called from his native place, Zierikzee, in the isle of Schouwen, in Zealand, was born in the 15th century, and died at Louvain in 1534. Being a good Hebrew and Greek scholar, he was regarded as an ornament of the Franciscan Order, in which he labored as priest, preacher, and later as lector of theology in his monastery at Louvain. He wrote commentaries on Genesis, Job, Ecclesiastes, etc., which he left in manuscript. Of his published works we mention Chronica ab Eordio Mundi ad Annum 1534 (Antwerp, apud Sim. Cocum, 1534).—Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Amani is a holy book of the Moslems, which contains precepts for a well-ordered, rational mode of living.

Amano Watta, in Japanese mythology, is a cave in Japan in a mountain of the province Isje, near the ocean, in which the highest of their gods, Ten-Sio-Dai-Dun, hid himself in order to prove that he was the supreme god from whom all light comes; for when he had hidden himself, the light of the stars went out, and only returned when he again appeared. In the cave is found an idol, sitting upon a cow, which is called Dai-Nitz-no-Rai. Pilgrimages are often made to this cave.

Amantius is the name of two saints commemorated in old Roman martyrologies—one a martyr at Rome, Feb. 10; the other of Noyon, June 6.

Amanus, or Hamanus (the Sun), an ancient deity of the Persians, mentioned by Strabo, the same as the Phœnician Baal.

Amara, in Hindû legend, was a highly respected philosopher at the court of king Vikramāditya. He was the king's favorite, and had several surnames, as "the divine," "the lion." For twelve years he lived a secluded life in a woods, because there he believed Buddha to live. In a certain place called Buddhagaya he built a temple, and decorated it with numerous images of deities. He wrote books, some of which have been translated into Latin and English, and are of much value in the study of the Sanscrit language.

Amaral, Prudentius de, a Portuguese, was born in Brazil, 1675, and entered the Company of Jesuits, July 30, 1690. He died of dropsy, in the college at Rio Janeiro, March 27, 1715, leaving two works: Os Feitos dos Bispos e Arcebispos da Bahia, which contains a history of the bishops and archbishops of the diocese of San Salvador (Lisbon, 1710):—a Book of Elegies in Praise of the Blessed Virgin, in MS.

Amarandus (or Amaranthus), St. and martyr, was put to death at Albi, in the 3d century, under the emperor Decius, or under Chrocius, king of the Allemanni, who ravaged Gaul in the time of Valerian and Gallienus, and made many martyrs. His tomb is shown at the village of Vians, near Albi. His festival is kept on Nov. 7. See Greg. Turonensis, c. lviii, lviii.

Amarapura, a Buddhist sect in Ceylon, which arose about the commencement of the present century. It seems to have originated from Burmah, and is now considerably extended in its influence, including priests of all castes. The object of this sect is to bring back the doctrines of Buddhism to their pristine purity, by disentangling them from caste, polytheism, and other corruptions. The following are the peculiarities of this sect in its present form in Ceylon, as given by R. Spence Hardy: "(1.) They publicly preach against the doctrines of Hindûism, and do not invoke the Hindû gods at the recitation of pîrit (a mode of exorcism). (2.) They give ordination to all castes, associating with them indiscriminately, and preach against the secular occupations of the Siamese priests. (3.) They do not acknowledge the authority of the royal edicts, that they have anything to do with their religion; neither do they acknowledge the Buddhist hierarchy. (4.) They do not follow the observances of the Pasé-Buddhas, unless sanctioned by Gotama. (5.) They do not use two seats nor employ two priests when Bana (the sacred writings) is read, nor quaver the voice, as not being authorized by Buddha. (6.) They expound and preach the Winaya (a portion of the sacred writings) to the laity, while the Siamese read it only to the priests, and then only a few passages, with closed doors. (7.) They perform a ceremony equivalent to confirmation a number of years after ordination, while the Siamese perform it immediately after. (8.) They lay great stress on the merits of the pân-pinkama (or feast of lamps), which they perform during the whole night, without any kind of preaching or reading; whereas the Siamese kindle only a few lamps in the evening and repeat Bana until the morning. (9.) The Amarapuras differ from the Siamese by having both the shoulders covered with a peculiar roll of robe under the armpit, and by leaving the eyebrows unshorn."

Amaravati, in Hindû mythology, is the residence of the god of the sun, Indra.

Amardvalli, in Hindû mythology, was the daughter of Vishnu and Sakshnia; she was the wife of Subramanya, a son of Siva.

Amarud (the circle of the day), an Accadian name of the deity Marduk, the son of Hea.

Amarynthia, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Diana, from the city Amarynthus, in Eubœa, where magnificent feasts were celebrated, which were called by the same name.

Amat, FELIX, a Spanish ecclesiastical historian, was born at Sabadell, in the diocese of Barcelona, Aug. 10, 1750. He entered the Church in 1767, and, after taking his doctor's degree at Granada in 1770, was made professor of philosophy and librarian in the episcopal seminary at Barcelona. He afterwards became director of the seminary, and in 1803 was made archbishop of Palmyra by the pope, and in the same year abbot of St. Ildefonso by king Charles IV. Being suspected of favoring the French cause against the Spanish, he was compelled to leave Madrid in 1812, and in 1814 was banished to Catalonia. He died in a Franciscan convent near Sallent, Sept. 28, 1824. His chief work is his Tractado de la Iglesia de Jesu Cristo, or ecclesiastical history from the birth of Christ to the close of the 18th century (Madrid, 1793-1803). Besides, he wrote Observaciones sobre la Potestad Ecclesiastica (Barcelona, 1817-1823); published under the pseudonym of Don Macario Padua Melato:—Seis Cartas á Irenico (ibid. 1817):—Deberes del Cristiano en Tiempo de Revolucion (Madrid, 1818). These last two works were published by the nephew of the author.

Ama-Teru-Oon-Gami, in Japanese mythology, is the son of Isanagi and Isunagi, the progenitors of the human race. He belongs to the seventh generation of the heavenly deities; but of the five generations of earthly deities he is the first. He was the oldest and the only fruitful son of his parents. His children are the Japanese, born in a time when they themselves were half-deities, and lived very much longer than the present human beings. In a direct line of succession, the emperors follow him; therefore his name, which signifies "the great god of the imperial generation." He himself reigned a quarter of a million of years. During this time he performed the most stupendous miracles, and proved himself the only and true god. The province of Isje is his residence, and there stands the most renowned of his triumphs. The great feast which is celebrated in his honor is called Matsuri. His successor in the kingdom was his son Osi-Mo-Nino-Mikol.

Amato (or Amatus), a friar of Monte-Casino, and afterwards bishop, lived in the 11th century. He composed several Latin poems, and among others four books, which he dedicated to pope Gregory VII, entitled De Gestis Apostolorum Petri et Pauli. These works have been lost; and this is a great misfortune, if we may credit the opinion of Peter Diacre, who called Amatus an admirable versifier. The canon Mari says that one MS. has been preserved in the Library of Monte-Casino, which contains a history of the Normans, in eight volumes, compiled by Amatus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amato, Francesco, an Italian painter and engraver, executed a few paintings. The following are the principal ones: St. Joseph Seated, Reading a Book, with the Infant Jesus near him:—St. Jerome:—and the Prodigal Son. These are upright prints, inscribed "Francescus Amatus inv."

Amato, Giovanni Antonio d', the older (also called Il Vecchio), a Neapolitan oil and fresco painter, was born in 1475. He studied the works of Perugino, and imitated his style. There are several of his works in the churches of Naples. His favorite study was theology, and he was noted for his exposition of many obscure parts of the Bible. He died in 1555.

Amato, Giovanni Antonio d', the younger, a Neapolitan painter, was born in 1535. Some of his works are said to have been equal to those of Titian. His best work is the large altar-piece of the Infant Christ in the Church of the Banco de' Poveri at Naples. He died in 1598.

Amato, Giuseppe d', an Italian missionary, was born at Naples about 1757. He was sent to Asia in 1783 by the Society for the Propagation of the Truth, and he became rector of five Catholic villages in the district of Dibayen, about ten leagues to the north-west of the city of Ava. These villages were inhabited by people of French descent, whom Alompra had made prisoners of war in 1757. Amato knew the people, and was acquainted with the natural history of the country. He had specimens of more than two hundred plants, and a collection of animals, which were lost in the war of the Birmans in 1834. He died at Moulha in 1832. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Amato, Michele d', an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Naples, Oct. 3, 1682. Having made himself acquainted with the Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Syriac, Slavonian, French, Spanish, and other languages, he took orders, and became a member of the Congregation of Apostolic Missions, formed in the Church of Naples. He held many public offices, and in 1719 was charged with the care of visiting all the churches and chapels royal. He died Nov. 15, 1729. Among the works which he composed, and which have been printed, are, De Balsami Specie ad S. Chrisma Consciendum Requisita (Naples, 1722, 8vo):—De Piacum atq. Avium Esus Consuetudine apud quosdam Christi Fideles in Antepaschali Jejuniis (ibid. 1723, 8vo):—Dissertationes IV Historicæ-dogmaticæ (ibid. 1728, 8vo). He also left many MSS. concerning the worship of saints and their images, of the state of infants dying without baptism, of the precautions to be used in reading the fathers (Italian), on the Magi, and several others. See Bibl. Ital. vii, 265; Mag. Bibl. Eccles. p. 371.

Amātor, ST., was born of a noble family in Auxerre, in the time of the emperor Constantius. His parents affianced him, without his consent, to Martha, a rich young lady; but when he and his bride went to church to receive the nuptial benediction from the bishop, St. Valerian, he, by mistake, or, as some think, by a special interposition of Providence, pronounced over them the office of consecration to the service of God, instead of the marriage prayer. Upon this they both embraced the monastic state, and Amator succeeded St. Helladius in the bishopric of Auxerre, about A.D. 388. In spite of his holy and self-denying life, he was persecuted by slanders and calumny; but his innocence was fully proved, and he died in 418, having appointed St. Germanus his successor, although he had at one time had some difference with him. He is said to have been distinguished by the gift of miracles, both before and after his death. The ancient breviaries of Auxerre commemorate him on May 1, and the Latin martyrologies on Nov. 26.

Amatrice, COLA FILOTESIO DELL', an Italian painter, flourished in 1533. He lived in Ascoli di Picino, and had a good reputation. He has a fine picture in the Oratory of the Corpus Domini, at Ascoli, which represents The Saviour in the Act of Dispensing the Eucharist to his Apostles.

Amātus, ST., OF REMIREMONT. See AMET.

Amātus (or Aimé), ST., bishop of Sens, and patron of Douay, in Flanders, was born in the 7th century of pious parents. In 669 he was compelled to take the charge of the Church of Sens, which he governed with admirable vigilance and mildness. After a time king Thierry III banished him to the Monastery of St. Fursy at Peronne. Subsequently he was put in trust of the Monastery of Bruel (or Brueil), built on the river Lys, in Flanders, in the diocese of Terouane, where he died and was buried in 690. His body was translated to Douay in 870, where it now remains. The Roman martyrology commemorates him on Sept. 13.

Amatus (or Amati), VINCENTIO, an Italian priest and musician, was born at Ciminna, in Sicily, Jan. 6, 1629. After finishing his studies in the Seminary at Palermo, he became master of the chapel of the cathedral of that place in 1665. He died July 29, 1670. He wrote, Sacri Concerti a Due, Tre, Quattro (Palermo, 1656):—Messa e Salmi di Vespro, e Compilata a Quattro e Cinque Voci (ibid. eod.):—Isaura, an opera (Aquila, 1664). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Génér. s. v.

Amaury OF CHARTRES. See AMALRIC OF BENA.

Amaury (Amalric, or Aimeric), patriarch of JERUSALEM, occupied the patriarchal see from 1159, and assisted in the election of Amaury I as king of Jerusalem in 1165. A bond of friendship existed between him and the celebrated historian William of Tyre. He died in 1180. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Génér. s. v.

Amawatura is a book of legends in Singhalese, recording chiefly the wondrous deeds of Gotama Buddha.

Ambarach, PETER, a Jesuit and Orientalist, was born in 1663 at Gusta, in Phœnicia. He was educated from 1672 to 1685 at the Maronite College of the Jesuits at Rome, and returned in 1685 to Syria. He received holy orders from the Maronite patriarch Stephen of Ado, and was intrusted with the revision of Arabic liturgical works, and with their translation into Latin. The Maronites sent him to Rome in behalf of their Church; and while on his way home the grand-duke Cosmo III retained him at Florence for the sake of arranging a printing-office and the Oriental types bought by his father, Ferdinand. Afterwards he was appointed professor at Pisa. In 1707 Ambarach joined the Jesuits at Rome, and Clement XI added him to the commission appointed for the criticism of the Greek text of the Bible. In 1730 cardinal Quirini intrusted to him the Latin translation of the Syriac work of Ephrem. The first two volumes appeared in 1737 and 1740; with the third volume he had advanced as far as the middle of the work when he died. The volume was completed by Stephen Evidius Assemani, and was published in 1743. The second volume contains also two treatises by Ambarach on the eucharist. See Biographie Universelle, iv, 198; Bauer, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Ambarvalia (Lat. ambiendi arvis, "going around the fields"), a ceremony performed among the ancient Romans with a view of procuring from the gods a plentiful harvest. A sacrifice was offered to Ceres, but before doing so the victims, consisting of a sow, a sheep, and a bull, were led amid a vast concourse of peasants around the cornfields in procession. The ceremony was sometimes private and managed by the master of a family, and sometimes public and performed by priests, who were called fratres arvales, or field brothers. This festival was held twice in the year—the first time either in January or April, the second time in July. See SOVÆTAURILIA.

Amberger, CHRISTOPH, a German painter, was born at Nuremberg in 1490, and studied under Hans Holbein the elder. He executed a set of twelve pictures, representing the history of Joseph and his Brethren, which gained him great celebrity, though he succeeded better in portraits than in history. He painted the emperor Charles V, who honored him with a gold medal and chain. He is supposed by some to have died in 1563, by others in 1550.

Ambest is the name given by the Hindûs to the tree of immortality. It grows on the mountain of Meru, in Amaravati, the metropolis of Indra.

Ambitus (compass in music). In the earliest Church melodies, the compass did not in some instances reach, and in few did it exceed, a fifth. In Gregorian music the octave was the limit, but in later times this compass was much extended. A melody occupying or employing its whole compass was called cantus perfectus; falling short of this, cantus imperfectus; exceeding it, cantus plusquamperfectus. Subsequently other interpretations have been given to the word ambitus.

Ambitus Altaris, an expression sometimes used for the enclosure which surrounded the altar. It was probably distinct from the presbyterium, or chorus cantorum (i. e. an enclosed space in front of the altar reserved for the use of the inferior clergy), and there was usually between the presbyterium and the altar a raised space called solea. Probably no early example of an ambitus altaris now exists. In St. John Lateran many fragments of marble slabs, with the plaited and knotted ornament characteristic of this period, are preserved in the cloister, and may probably be fragments of the ambitus mentioned above. The expression ambitus altaris may perhaps sometimes stand for the apse, as surrounding the altar.

Ambler, JAMES B., a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) and Presbyterian churches, was born in England in 1797. He was licensed to preach in his native country; and served in the same as pastor at Bradford from 1816 to 1818, when he came to America. His ministry was extended through the northern and central portions of New York State, in the Presbyterian Church, from 1818 to 1833; at which time he joined the Reformed Church, and therein remained till 1848, when he died. He was a man of sincere piety and untiring zeal, and his ministrations were effective and successful. See Corwin, Manual of Ref. Church of America (3d ed.), p. 165.

Ambo. Something in the nature of an ambo or desk, no doubt, was in use from a very early period.

Ambo of St. Apollinare Nuovo at Ravenna.

Bunsen (Basiliken des christlichen Roms, p. 48) expresses his opinion that the ambo was originally movable. In the earlier centuries much of the Church furniture was of wood, and the ambones were probably of the same material. Wherever a presbyterium, or chorus cantorum, existed, an ambo was probably connected with it, being placed usually on one side of the enclosure. Where no chorus existed, the ambo was probably placed in the centre.

Amboise, Françoise d', daughter of Louis Amboise, viscount of Thouars, was born in 1427. She was married to Peter II, duke of Brittany, who died in 1457. When in 1452 the general of the Carmelites, Johann So-reth, founded the Order of the Carmelites with the sanction of pope Nicholas V, Françoise founded the first monastery in Brittany, and entered the same in 1467, where she died in 1485. See Leroy, Vita Franciscæ ab Ambrosia, Ducissæ Armoricæ (Paris, 1604); Saint-Jean-Macé, Vie de la très Illustr. et Vert. F. d'Amboise, judis Duchesse de Bretagne, Fondatrice des Anciennes Carmélites de Bretagne (ibid. 1634, 1669); Bavin, Vie de St. Françoise, Duchesse de Bretagne (Rennes, 1704); Bauer, in Weitzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Amboise, Georges d' (1), a French cardinal and diplomatist, was born at Chaumont-sur-Loire in 1460. From his birth he was designed for the Church, as the younger son of the family. He studied canon law, and at the age of fourteen received the title of bishop of Montauban, and then became almoner of the king, although so young. He gained the friendship of the duke of Orleans, son-in-law of the king, who was similar to him in tastes, and was also of the same age. After the death of Louis XI, the duke of Orleans and Anna of Beaujeu each claimed the regency; but the latter was successful, and the duke was obliged to take refuge with Francis II, duke of Brittany (May, 1484). D'Amboise, attempting to persuade the king in his behalf, was betrayed by a messenger, arrested, and imprisoned for more than two years. After the battle of Saint-Aubin du Cormier (July 28, 1488), Francis II was obliged to capitulate. D'Amboise, exiled in the diocese of Montauban, sought to obtain liberty for himself and the duke of Orleans, whose interests were very dear to him. The attempt of the duke to assist in bringing about the marriage of the king with princess Anne of Brittany gained for him great favor, which favor reverted to D'Amboise. He was made archbishop of Narbonne and Rouen, and obtained in 1493, through the duke of Orleans, the appointment of governor of Normandy, which he succeeded in reducing to order. At the time of the expedition of Charles VIII into Italy, D'Amboise was accused of serving the interests of the duke of Orleans instead of attending to the affairs of his diocese. In November, 1494, he joined the duke at Asti, and withdrew from the service of the king. Eventually, however, Louis XII, having revived his project for regaining possession of Milan, D'Amboise rejoined him. Setting out for Italy with that king, the cardinal received from Alexander VI the title of legate a latere, with the prerogatives belonging to it. The conquest of Milan, Genoa, and a part of Piedmont was accomplished. At the advice of D'Amboise, the king founded at Milan a chair of theology, of law, and of medicine, and appointed to these positions celebrated professors. D'Amboise established a senate of select persons, who administered justice without favor or delay; and he persuaded the king to give the government of Milan and all the duchy to marshal Trivulce, and to associate with him the brave Stuart D'Aubigny. D'Amboise rendered great service to the people of Milan, who were loud in their expressions of praise and delight at what he had done for them. After the death of the archduke Philip, son of the emperor Maximilian and son-in-law of Ferdinand, king of Arragon, these two sovereigns sought the regency of Castile; and D'Amboise, being chosen for judge between them, decided in favor of the king of Arragon. After the death of pope Alexander VI, D'Amboise endeavored to raise himself to the papal throne; but, having failed in this, became the dangerous enemy of Pius III and Julius II. To secure his own election, he encouraged a schism between the French Church and the see of Rome, and convened a separate council, held first at Pisa, afterwards at Milan and Lyons; but his plans were frustrated by the failures of the French army in Italy. D'Amboise died at Lyons, May 25, 1510, and was interred with imposing ceremonies in the cathedral at Rouen, where his nephew, the archbishop, erected in 1522 a magnificent marble monument. He was a dexterous and experienced statesman; but was accused of avarice, vanity, and ambition. His biography was written by Montague (1681) and Legendre (1724). He left Lettres au Roi Louis XII (Brussels, 1712). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amboise, Georges d' (2), nephew of the foregoing, was born in 1487. In 1510 he was elected archbishop of Rouen, and consecrated Dec. 13, 1513. In 1545 he was made cardinal; and died Aug. 25, 1550.

Amboise, Louis d', also a nephew of Georges (1), was born in 1479. In 1501 he was appointed bishop of Autun, and in 1503 archbishop of Albi. In 1510 he was elected cardinal. He died in 1517 at Ancona.

Ambrogio (or Ambrosio), CORIOLANO, an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Rome, and lived about 1475. He was vicar-general of the Augustine Hermits; and left, among other works, a Commentary on the Rule of St. Augustine (Rome, 1481, fol.).

Ambroise DE LOMBEZ, a learned French Capuchin, was born at Lomez, March 20, 1708, and died Oct. 25, 1778, at Saint-Sauveur, near Barèges. He wrote, Traité de la Paix Intérieure (republished many times);—Lettres Spirituelles sur la Paix Intérieure et autres Sujets de Piété (1766). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ambrose OF ALEXANDRIA, a disciple of Didymus, who died some time after the year 392, wrote a Treatise against Apollinarius, and a Commentary on the Book of Job.

Ambrose (or Ambrois), St., was bishop of CAHORS in 725; but, finding that the people paid no heed to his doctrine or example, left his see and hid himself in a cave near the city, where he remained three years in prayer and fasting. Being discovered, he went to Rome, and thence to a hermitage on the Arnon, in Berry, where he died, in 770. His festival is observed Oct. 16, the day of his death.

Ambrose of Lisieux, a monk of the third Order of St. Francis, and professor of theology, died in 1630, leaving a work, entitled Lampas Accensa, on the gospels, epistles of Paul, and the seven canonical epistles.

Ambrose of Naples was an Augustine monk, and afterwards bishop (or rather administrator) of the Church of Mantua. He was one of the best preachers and most skilful doctors of his time. He lived about 1524, and wrote, De Gentura Mundi:—De Fato:—Quadragesimale (Venice, 1523, 4to):—Conciones super Salutationem Angel.:—De Tribus Magdalenis et Unica Magdalena:—De Vera et Catholica Fide, against Luther:—Sermons, etc. See Mag. Bibl. Eccles. p. 386.

Ambrose of Sienna, a Dominican, was born at Sienna, April 16, 1220, and assumed his habit when seventeen. After studying at Paris he went to Cologne, and preached with great success throughout Germany. Through his influence the city of Sienna made peace with Clement IV, who had placed it under interdict for favoring the party of Frederick II. Ambrose did the same thing during the pontificate of Gregory X. He frequently refused the episcopate; and spent the rest of his life in legations and apostolic missions. He died at Sienna, March 20, 1286, on which day the Roman martyrology commemorates him. See Bollandus, Life of Ambrose.

Ambrose of Soncino was so called because he relinquished the marquisate of Soncino in order to become a Capuchin. After the death of his wife, which happened when he was forty-seven, he obtained from Clement VIII a mission to the captive Christians in Algiers, where he died, in 1601. He left a treatise, On the Sacrament of Penance, and On Holy Living and Dying. See Boverius, in ann. 1601.

Ambrose, abbot of ST. VINCENT. See AMBROSE, AUTPERT.

Ambrose, Samuel (1), a Baptist minister, was born at Exeter, N. H., in 1754. He lost his father when he was but six years of age, and the care of his education devolved on his pious mother. It was not until the twenty-sixth year of his age that he became a hopeful Christian, and not long after felt it to be his duty to preach the Gospel. In 1782 he removed to Sutton, N. H. In April of this year a Church was constituted, of which he was ordained the pastor in October. He continued in this office eighteen years, preaching, however, in neighboring towns a part of the Sabbaths of the year. Soon after his settlement he was blessed with an extensive revival, which was quite general in Sutton, and reached to the neighboring towns. In 1800 Mr. Ambrose discontinued his ministerial services in Sutton, and removed his Church relations to New London, N. H. From 1800 to 1820 he was busily occupied in his Master's cause, chiefly as stated supply in a number of towns in New Hampshire, and as a missionary sent out under the direction of the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society in the destitute and sparsely settled portions of New Hampshire, Vermont, Maine, and Canada. "His journals, though imperfect, present him to us, amid hardships, toils, and labors, instructing the ignorant, comforting the feeble-minded, encouraging the weak, and preaching the Gospel to the poor." From 1820 to 1828 he made a few missionary tours; generally, however, during this period he was at his home during the week, preaching as occasion presented on the Sabbath. His interest in the kingdom of Christ remained unabated until the close of life. He died May 30, 1830. See Amer. Baptist Magazine, xi, 97-104. (J. C. S.)

Ambrose, Samuel (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Maine, Aug. 6, 1815. He experienced religion at the age of fifteen, graduated at the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, and in 1840 entered the Maine Conference. In 1852 he located, moved to Illinois, and in 1856 united with the Rock River Conference. In 1870 he supernumerated and retired to Kane County, Ill., where he died July 25, 1874. Mr. Ambrose was a man of much devotedness. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 137.

Ambrose, Thomas L., a Congregational missionary and army chaplain, was born in New England. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1856, spent one year in the Theological Seminary in New York, and in 1857 entered the Andover Theological Seminary. His health not allowing him to continue his studies, he was ordained in July of the following year, and in August sailed for Persia, where he labored three years as a missionary among the Nestorians. Returning to recruit his health in 1861, Mr. Ambrose received the appointment of chaplain to the 12th New Hampshire Regiment. He was taken prisoner at Chancellorsville, remaining in the hands of the enemy for two weeks. While passing from the intrenchments to the Chesapeake General Hospital, Fortress Monroe, in the rear, he was wounded, and, after three weeks of suffering, died, Aug. 19, 1864. Mr. Ambrose was "a noble Christian man, of fine talents, sympathizing, and of indomitable courage, and was much respected by his regiment." See Cong. Quarterly, 1865, p. 421.

Ambrose, William, a Welsh Congregational minister, was born at Bangor in 1813. He received a liberal education partly in his own city and partly at Holyhead. His only charge was at Portmadock, where he was ordained in 1837, and where he continued to labor till his death, Oct. 31, 1873. Mr. Ambrose was tall, gentlemanly, and commanding in appearance. As a preacher, he was polished, simple, persuasive, and very practical; as a poet, he took a high rank; as a speaker, he was chaste and masterly in diction, pointed in argument, abounding in scathing sarcasm, and very convincing in effect. He was a Christian of untarnished reputation and character. He was probably the most accomplished, heart-searching, and effective preacher that Wales ever produced. Mr. Ambrose was associate editor of the Dygyddyd, the leading Congregational periodical of North Wales. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 308.

Ambrosia, in pagan mythology, was (1) the name of the food of the deities, which gave eternal youth and immortality. This was conceived of as something material; and ambrosia is not only the food of the gods, but also the drink of the gods, as later writers have it. Homer also represents the gods as giving it to some of their favorites, as to Achilles; animals were also refreshed by it. Ambrosia is also a salve of the deities, which possesses the power of cleansing in a high degree; likewise an ointment for the hair. (2) One of the Pleiades, the daughter of Atlas and Pleione. (3) Festivals held in honor of Bacchus in some cities of Greece, the same as the Bromalia of the Romans.

Ambrosian Hymns. Under the name of Ambrose, bishop of Milan (q. v.), there exist a number of Latin hymns which are generally ascribed to him; yet they are not all his, the name having been freely given to many formed after the modal and pattern of those which he composed, and to some in every way unworthy of him. The hymns really belonging to him, and for which we have the authority of Augustine (Confess. ix, 12; Retractat. i, 21; De Natura et Gratia, c. 63), are, Deus creator omnium:—Eternæ rerum Conditor:—Jam surgit hora tertia:—Veni redemptor gentium (q. v.). Besides these hymns, we find a number of others, as, Rector potens, verax Deus:—Rerum Deus tenax vigor:—Eterna Christi munera:—Jesu corona virginum:—Splendor paternæ gloriæ:—Jam lucis orto sidere:—Te lucis ante terminum:—Christe, qui lux es et dies:—O lux beata Trinitas:—Aurora lucis rutilat:—Nunc Sancte nobis Spiritus:—Conditor alme siderum:—Jam Christus astra ascenderit:—Deus, tuorum milium:—Eternæ Rex altissime, which are all called Ambrosian.

The Benedictine authors attribute only twelve hymns to Ambrose, but even their decision has not remained unchallenged. Cardinal Thomasius, in a preliminary discourse to his Hymnarium (in his Works [Rome, 1747], ii, 351-434), has gathered the evidence in favor of Ambrose being the author of those twelve hymns; and Daniel speaks of Thomasius's works, "Ex illo libro tanquam fonte primario hauriendum est." More recently the question as to the genuineness of Ambrose's hymns has been treated by Biraghi, Inni Sinceri e Carini di S. Ambrogio (Milan, 1862), according to whom eighteen hymns may be ascribed to Ambrose as his own. Archbishop Trench remarked concerning the hymns of Ambrose that, although his almost austere simplicity seems cold and displeasing after the rich sentiment of some later writers, yet we cannot but observe "how truly these poems belong to their time and to the circumstances under which they were produced; how suitably the faith which was in actual conflict with, and was just triumphing over, the powers of this world found its utterance in hymns such as these, wherein is no softness, perhaps little tenderness, but a rock-like firmness—the old Roman stoicism transmuted and glorified into that nobler Christian courage which encountered and at length overcame the world." Most of the hymns which we have mentioned have been translated into English by Neale, Chandler, Mercer, and others. (B.P.)

Ambrosian Liturgy, that form for celebrating mass said to have been drawn up by St. Ambrose, used to the present day in the diocese of Milan. It is also called the Ambrosian Office (q. v.). While substantially identical with the Roman rite, it has many peculiarities of its own, indicating at once its veritable antiquity and the Eastern origin of certain of its distinctive features. See LITURGY.

Ambrosian Music, the earliest music used in the Christian Church of which we have any account, and so named after Ambrose, bishop of Milan (374-398), who introduced it to his diocese about the year 386, during the reign of Constantine. The notions prevailing among musical and other writers respecting the peculiarities of Ambrosian music are based rather on conjecture than knowledge. It may be considered certain that it was more simple and less varied than the Gregorian music, which, about two centuries later, almost everywhere superseded it. Indeed, it has been doubted whether actual melody at all entered into it, and conjectured that it was only a kind of musical speech—monotone with melodic closes, or accentus ecclesiasticus (q. v.); a kind of music, or mode of musical utterance, which Gregory retained for collects and responses, but which he rejected as too simple for psalms and hymns. On the other hand, it has been argued more plausibly that, to whatever extent the accentus or modus choraliter legendi may have been used in Ambrosian music, an element more distinctly musical entered largely into it; that a decided cantus, as in Gregorian music, was used for the psalms; and that something which might even now be called melody was employed for (especially metrical) hymns. That this melody was narrow in compass, and little varied in its intervals, is probable or certain. That neither Augustine nor any contemporary writer has described particularly, or given us any technical account of, the music practiced by the Milanese congregations of the end of the 4th century, however much we may regret it, need hardly cause us any surprise. That Ambrosian music, however, was rhythmical is irrefragably attested by the variety of metres employed by Ambrose in his own hymns.

The oldest scales consisted, at the most, of four sounds, which were therefore called tetrachords. This system continued long, and is the basis of modern tonality. Eventually scales extended in practice to pentachords, hexachords, heptachords, and ultimately to octachords, as with us. The theory and practice of the octachord were familiar to the Greeks, from whose system it is believed Ambrose took the first four octachords or modes, viz. the Dorian, Phrygian, Hypolydian, and Hypophrygian, called by the first Christian writers on music Protus, Deuterus, Tritus, and Tetrardus. Subsequently the Greek provincial names got to be misapplied, and the Ambrosian system appeared as follows:

PROTUS, OR DORIAN.

DEUTERUS, OR PHRYGIAN.

TRITUS, OR ÆOLIAN.

TETRARDUS, OR MYXOLYDIAN.

These scales differ essentially from our scales, major or minor. The 1st, 2d, 3d, and 4th Ambrosian scales or tones are not what we now call "keys," but "modes," differing from one another as the modern major and minor modes differ, in the places of their semitones. Melodies, therefore, in this or that Ambrosian "tone" have a variety of character analogous to that which distinguished our major and minor modes so very widely. Thus, one Ambrosian tone was supposed to be characterized by dignity, another by languor, and so on. The rhythmus of Ambrosian music is thought by some to have consisted only in the adaptation to long and short syllables of long and short notes. "Of what we call time," says Forkel (Gesch. der Musik, ii, 168)—the proportion between the different divisions of the same melody—"the ancients had no conception." He does not tell us how they contrived to march or to dance to timeless melodies—melodies with two beats in one foot and three in another, or three feet in one phrase and four in another; nor how vast congregations were enabled to sing them; and if anything is certain about Ambrosian song, it is that it was, above all things, congregational.

Whether Ambrose was acquainted with the use of musical characters is uncertain. Probably he was. The system he adopted was Greek, and he could hardly make himself acquainted with Greek music without having acquired some knowledge of Greek notation, which, though intricate in its detail, was simple in its principles. But even the invention, were it needed, of characters capable of representing the comparatively few sounds of Ambrosian melody could have been a matter of no difficulty. Such characters needed only to represent the pitch of these sounds; their duration was dependent on, and sufficiently indicated by, the metre. Copies of Ambrosian music-books are preserved in some libraries, which present indications of what may be, probably are, musical characters. Possibly, however, these are additions by later hands. It is certain that, in the time of Charlemagne, Ambrosian song was finally superseded, except in the Milanese, by Gregorian. The knowledge of the Ambrosian musical alphabet, if it ever existed, may, in such circumstances, and in such an age, have easily been lost, though the melodies themselves were long preserved traditionally.

Ambrosian Office (Ambrosianus ritus, or Mediolanensis Ecclesiæ ritus), the office used in the Church of Milan (called the Ambrosian Church). Before the time of Charlemagne every Church had its own particular office, and there is good reason to believe that this office was in use in the Church of Milan before the time of St. Ambrose; but that when the popes compelled all the Churches of the West to adopt the Roman office, the Milanese gave the name of St. Ambrose to theirs, in order to protect it, although he was not really the author of it. It may be, however, that St. Ambrose made alterations in the original office, which he found established in his Church; and the name of the office of St. Ambrose has been retained, to distinguish it from the Roman office in use in other churches. See Le Brun, Exp. de la Messe, ii, 176. See AMBROSIAN LITURGY.

Ambrosianum, a word in old liturgical writings denoting a hymn, from St. Ambrose having been the first to introduce metrical hymns into the service of the Church. Originally the word may have indicated that the particular hymn was the composition of St. Ambrose, and hence it came to mean any hymn.

Ambrosius, THESEUS (Ital. Teseo Ambrogio), an Italian Orientalist, was born in 1469. He is said to have understood eighteen languages, especially the Syriac. At the order of pope Leo X, he opened a school for the Chaldee and Syriac languages at Bologna. He died in the Monastery of St. Peter at Pavia in 1540. He wrote, Introductio in Chaldaicam Linguam, Syriacam atque Armenicam et decem alias Linguas (Pavia, 1539). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon and Suppl. s. v.; Götze, Merkwürdigkeiten der Dresd. Bibl. i, 141; Colomesius, Gallia Orientalis; Steinschneider, Bibl. Handbuch, s. v. (B. P.)

Ambulia, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Minerva, by which the inhabitants of Sparta worshipped her. The Dioscuri were also called Ambulii, and Jupiter Ambulius. The signification of the name is unknown.

Amé, St. See AMATUS.

Ame, rabbi, a Jewish teacher, lived at Tiberias in the 4th century. Together with his colleague rabbi Assé (q. v.), he performed judicial functions among his coreligionists. Both were highly honored, and were styled "judges of Palestine," "the noble pair of priests of Palestine." Both regarded the Samaritans as heathen, because they sold Gentile wine to the Jews (Cholin, fol. 6 b). Ame would also not allow that a Samaritan should be instructed in the law. Against the verbal interpretation of the Scriptures he propounded the thesis, "The law, the prophets, and the word of the wise contain hyperbolic expressions: the law, 'the cities are great and walled up to heaven' (Deut. i, 28); the prophets, 'so that the earth rent with the sound of them' (1 Kings i, 40); the word of the wise, 'the daily morning and evening sacrifice was watered with a golden cup' (Tamid, fol. 29 a)." Another maxim of his was, "No death without sin, no pains without trespasses" (Sabbath, fol. 55 a). See Hamburger, Real-Encyclop. ii, 56 sq.; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, iv, 298, 301, 304, 307; Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. u. s. Sekten, ii, 160, 162, 165, 195. (B. P.)

Amedon, MOSES, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Reedsborough, Vt., Oct. 10, 1794, of pious parents, who gave him a careful religious training. He experienced conversion about 1811, and in 1814 entered the New York Conference, in which he labored diligently until arrested by disease in 1829, when he retired to his residence at Watervliet Circuit, where he died, March 21, 1830. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1830, p. 78.

Amelgard, a Belgian priest, lived at Liege near the close of the 15th century. He was charged, it is said, by Charles VII with the revision of the trial of Joan of Arc. He wrote, De Rebus Gestis Caroli VII Historiarum Libri V.—De Rebus Gestis Ludovici XI, Francorum Regis, Historiarum Libri I. The unpublished MS. is preserved in the National Library at Paris. A number of extracts from the history of Louis XI are found in Martène and Durand, Veterum Scriptorum Amplissima Collectio. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amelincourt, Mons. J., a priest, author of a dogmatic treatise on the Number of the Elect (Rouen, 1702, 2 vols. 12mo). See Journal des Savans, 1702.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Ameline, CLAUDE, a French theologian, was born in Paris in 1635, being a son of the attorney at Chatelet. He for a time gave his attention to law, until, disgusted with the world, he entered the Brotherhood of the Oratory, April 29, 1660. In 1663 he received priest's orders, and was made chief chanter of the Church of Paris. He died in 1708. He published a work entitled Traité de la Volonté (Paris, 1684, 12mo). He also wrote a book against Quietism, entitled Traité de l'Amour du Souverain Bien, etc. (ibid. 1699, 12mo). Some have attributed to him L'Art de Vivre Heureux (ibid. 1690), which others have believed to belong to Louis Pascal. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Amelius, a Platonic philosopher of the 8d century, was born in Etruria. In the year 246 he went to Rome, where he attended for twenty-four years the lectures of the Neo-Platonist Plotinus, whose most famous pupil he became, as well as his apologist. Like all Neo-Platonists, Amelius tried to save heathenism, which was already on the wane. He was not only a pious heathen, but also attacked Christianity, especially Gnosticism, on the one hand, while, on the other, he perused the beginning of the Gospel of St. John, especially the Johannean doctrine of the Logos, in defence of Platonic philosophy. His writings, with the exception of the fragment, in which he makes reference to the beginning of the Gospel of St. John, are all lost. He died at Apamea, in Syria. See Eusebius, Præparatio Evangel. ii, 19; Theodoret, Græc. Affect. lib. ii; Cyrillus Alexandrinus, In Julianum, lib. viii; Hefele, in Wetzer und Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Class. Biog. s. v. (B. P.)

Amelius, PETER, an Augustine monk of the 14th century, afterwards bishop of Sinigaglia. He was born at Aleth (Alecta), in Languedoc, and not at St. Malo, as some assert. He accompanied Gregory XI to Rome when that pope transported the papal throne thither from Avignon in 1376; and he wrote an account of the journey, which Papyrus Masson mentions. Amelius also wrote a Treatise of the Ceremonies of the Roman Church, published by Mabillon in vol. ii of the Musæum Italicum. See Moréri, ed. of 1759.

Amelotte, DENIS, a French ecclesiastic and author, was born at Saintes, in Saintonge, in 1606. Soon after receiving priest's orders he became a member of the Congregation of the Oratory of St. Philip Neri. In 1643 he published a Life of Charles de Goudren, second superior of the Congregation, which, by some of its remarks on the abbot of St. Cyran, gave great offence to the Port-Royalists. Another work, containing a vehement attack on the doctrines of the Jansenists, still further embittered the feelings of the party towards him, and elicited from Nicole a satirical reply entitled Idée Générale de l'Esprit et du Livre du P. Amelotte. Amelotte, in revenge, availed himself of his influence with the chancellor to prevent the publication of the newly completed Port-Royalist translation of the New Test., which had therefore to be issued at Mons, in Flanders. He thus secured a free field for a translation of his own, with annotations, which appeared in 4 vols. 8vo (1666-68). He died Oct. 7, 1678. See Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Amemu, an inferior Egyptian deity who was represented as a man with the head of a sparrow-hawk.

Amenamen is a mystical title of the deity Amen-Ra in ch. clxvi of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Amende Honorable, in an ecclesiastical sense, is a sort of penance inflicted on offenders in some cases. It consists in walking barefooted and in a shirt only, with a lighted torch in the hand and a cord round the neck, and before the church, or some other auditory, demanding pardon of God, the king, and justice for the offence committed. The ecclesiastical courts of Great Britain have the power to impose a somewhat similar penance on offenders by directing them to stand in the sight of the congregation and confess their evil deeds.

Am Ende, Christian Carl, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born Oct. 3, 1730, at Lössnitz, in Saxony. He studied at Kulmbach and Erlangen; was appointed in 1755 adjunctus and rector at Kaufbeuern; in 1783 he was made deacon and hospital preacher. He died Nov. 15, 1799. He contributed largely to different periodicals and reviews. His own publications were few and of little value at present, with the exception of his edition of Sleidan's work De Statu Religionis et Reipublicæ Carolo V Cæsare Commentarii . . . multisque Annotationibus Illustrata (Francf.-ad-Moen. 1785-86). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theol. Deutschlands, i, 7 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 737; Zapf, Nachrichten vom Leben, Verdiensten u. Schriften Ch. C. Am Ende (1804). (B. P.)

Am Ende, Johann Joachim Gottlob, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born in 1704 at Gräfenhainichen, in Saxony. He studied at Wittenberg, and succeeded his father in the pastorate at his native place. In 1743 he was called to Schulpforte, and in 1748 he was appointed superintendent at Freiburg, in Thuringia. The year following he was called to Dresden, having been honored by the Leipsic University with the doctorate of divinity. He died May 2, 1777. He wrote, Commentatio Epistolica de quibusdam N. T. Locis, Act. xiv, 27; 1 Cor. xvi, 9; Col. iv, 4 (Wittenberg, 1744):—Christeis, i. e. Acta Apostolorum e Lingua Originali in Latinam Translata et Carmine Heroico Expressa, Notisq. Subjunctis Illustrata (ibid. 1759). Besides, he published a number of Sermons, which are enumerated in the Suppl. to Jöcher's Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Amendola, Ferrante, a Neapolitan historical painter, was born in 1664, and studied under the celebrated Solimena. He painted many works at Naples, the best of which are two altar-pieces in the Church of the Madonna di Monte Vergine. His chief merit consisted in a practical facility of coloring.

Amendola, Tommaso, a Dominican who lived in the 18th century, is the author of Collectanea in Septem Ecclesie Sacramenta (Naples, 1699, 1719, 1729, 3 vols.):—Collectanea in Ecclesiasticos Censuras et Penas (ibid. 1702, 1717, 2 vols.):—Resolutiones Morales et Practicæ (ibid. 1706):—Collectanea de Justitia et Jure in Duos Tomos Divisa (ibid. 1727). See Mazzuchelli, Scrittori d'Italia (Brescia, 1758); Echard, Script. Ord. Prædicant.; Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Amennaanka (Amennatakamti, or Amennapariusaka) is a mystical title of the deity Amen-Ra in ch. clxvi of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead, entitled the "Chapter of the Boat."

Amen-Ra (Amen, the Sun; or the Self-sufficient, the Hidden) was the Supreme Being of the Egyptians considered as an abstract entity; all the other deities, even Ra himself, being but emanations from him. He was chiefly adored at Thebes, in Upper Egypt, and his worship was repeatedly overthrown and restored in Egypt during the principal dynasties.

Amenruta was a mystical title of the deity Amen-Ra, in ch. clxvi of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Amensius, a deacon, is commemorated in Bede's martyrology as a saint on Nov. 10.

Ament, was a Theban goddess. She was a form of the goddess Mant, the wife of Amen-Ra, and was represented as wearing the sacred red crown.

Amenthes, the Græcized form of Rhotamenti, the mythological title of Osiris, as judge of the dead in Hades, among the ancient Egyptians.

Amenti (the Hidden), in Egyptian mythology, was the general name of the underworld, or Hades, including the lower heaven, or Aahlu, "fields of peace," with its twenty-one gates; Kernerer, "good place;" Rusta, or purgatory; and Hell. It was under the special governance of the setting sun as Osiris Rhotamenti, the judge of the souls of the dead; of Horus and the funeral deities. The great Hall of the Two Truths was there, and in it the examination of the soul of the deceased took place. There were also the fifteen gates of the House of Osiris, and the fourteen Abodes of Hell. Amenti had its rivers both of separation and punishment, in that respect resembling the Hades of Greek mythology, which was doubtless copied from it. It is fully described in the great collection of funeral rituals called the Ritual of the Dead, and it was often spoken of as the country of the words of truth and the happy land of Osiris. Owing to the graves of the Egyptians being mostly excavated in the mountains on the western bank of the Nile, the terms "land of the west" and "the hidden land" became synonymous; and the present name of the village of Erment is derived from that of one of the chief cities near the ancient Necropolis. For further details see AAhLU; ATUM; HORUS; KERNETER; RHOTAMENTI; RUSTA.

Amerbach, Vitus, a professed follower of Luther, and afterwards a Roman Catholic, was born at Wedinguen, in Bavaria, and studied law, philosophy, and divinity at Wittenberg. He was professor of philosophy at Ingolstadt. He translated into Latin the orations of Isocrates and Demosthenes, the treatise of St. Chrysostom on Providence, and that of Epiphanius on the Catholic faith. He published also commentaries on Cicero's Offices, on the poems of Pythagoras and Phocylides, on the Tristia of Ovid, and on Horace's De Arte Poetica. He died in 1557.

Ameretat (Immortality), in Zendic mythology, was the name of the sixth of the heavenly Amshaspandas.

Ames, Bernice Darwin, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Shoreham, Vt., Dec. 26, 1827. He experienced religion in early youth; graduated at Middlebury College when twenty-six years of age; and during the next year was professor of Latin and Greek in the seminaries at Fort Plain and Fort Edward, N. Y. He united with the Troy Conference in 1857, and, after serving the Church in the capacity of travelling preacher a few years, he became affected with a bronchial difficulty, and, resuming his work as teacher, assumed the principalship of the Providence Conference Seminary. During the last year of the war he was secretary of the Christian Commission at Philadelphia. In 1868 he became principal of Mechanicsville Academy, and sustained that office until his death, Jan. 5, 1876. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 82; Simpson, Cyclopædia of Methodism, s. v.

Ames, Edward Raymond, D.D., LL.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born near Amesville, Adams Co., O., May 20, 1806. He experienced religion in 1827, while a student in the State university at Athens, O. The following year he left college before graduating, and became the first principal of the Lebanon Seminary, which has since become McKendree College, Lebanon, Ill. In 1830 he entered the Illinois Conference, and was appointed junior preacher on School Creek Circuit. On the division of the Illinois Conference in 1832 he became a member of the Indiana Conference, and was appointed junior preacher on the New Albany and Jeffersonville Circuit. The remainder of his active pastoral life was spent in the Indiana Conference, except one year in St. Louis.

After filling several important appointments and acting as presiding elder, he was, in 1840, elected missionary secretary, which office he held four years, travelling over the West extensively, visiting the Indian missions along the northern lakes and western frontier, and establishing schools among the tribes in Arkansas. Between 1844 and 1852 Mr. Ames was presiding elder in Indiana. He then was elected to the office of bishop, and in the performance of the active duties of that office spent the remainder of his life. He died in the city of Baltimore, April 25, 1879. Bishop Ames possessed a powerful physical frame and commanding presence. In his earlier ministry he had a strong voice, and spoke with great oratorical power and pathos. Great revivals everywhere attended his preaching. His strong characteristics were quickness, clearness, and comprehensiveness of perception, an unbending will, and an intuitive perception of human character. In generalship he had few equals and no superiors in the Church he served. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 84; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Ames, Moses, a Free-will Baptist minister, was born in Sullivan, Hancock Co., Me., Dec. 8, 1812. He was converted in the spring of 1834, commenced preaching the following July as an itinerant, and was ordained by a council from the Sebec Quarterly Meeting, Sept. 22, 1839. He extended his labors to the Wellington and Springfield Quarterly meetings, his preaching being followed with blessed results. His last ministerial services were performed with the Dover and Foxcroft Church, seventy persons being added to the Church as the fruits of a revival conducted by him. He died in South Dover, Me., Sept. 30, 1860. See Free-will Baptist Register, 1862, p. 9. (J. C. S.)

Ames, William, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born near Wellington, Shropshire. He was sent as a missionary to the West Indies in 1818; labored with acceptance at St. Vincent; and was removed in 1821 to Demerara, where he soon fell a victim to putrid fever, dying, after seven days' illness, Oct. 1821. He was faithful to the duties of his calling. See Minutes of British Conferences, 1822.

Amesaspentao, the Zendic name of the heavenly beings who were called Amshaspands by the Persians.

Amess. See ALMUTUM.

Amet. See AMATUS.

Ametritæ is the name given by Prædestinatus to a sect who, according to Philastrius (Hæc, 115), followed various philosophers in asserting that "there are infinite and innumerable worlds," appealing to apocryphal books of (heathen?) prophets.

Amh, in Egyptian mythology, was the name of the exit gate of the funereal region of Amenti, or Hades.

Amharic Version. The earliest attempt to translate portions of Scripture into Amharic were made by Romish missionaries; but the date cannot be ascertained, since the MSS. have never been seen in Europe. An Amharic version of the entire Scriptures, which has superseded all others, was commenced about 1810 by M. Asselin de Cherville, French consul at Cairo. Providence directed him to an old man named Abu Rumi, a person well qualified for the work. After ten years' labor this work was completed, and sold to the British and Foreign Bible Society for £1250. The MS. was brought to England by the Rev. Mr. Jowett. In 1824 the gospels were carried through the press by Dr. Lee, Mr. Jowett, and Mr. J. P. Platt, and in 1829 the entire New Testament was completed. In 1840 the Old Testament was published, and in 1842 an edition of the whole Scriptures. In superintending the printing of these editions, Mr. Platt carefully compared Abu Rumi's edition with the original Greek and Hebrew, and inserted such corrections as seemed indispensably requisite, leaving a more complete revision for a future opportunity. Since

1875 there exists a revised edition of the Amharic Bible; the version having been made by the Rev. Dr. Krapf, aided by some young natives, for the British and Foreign Bible Society. For linguistic purposes, comp. Massaja, Lectioes Grammaticales pro Missionariis qui Addiscere volunt Linguam Amaram, etc. (Parisiis, 1867). See AMHARIC LANGUAGE. (B. P.)

Amica (friend) was an epithet of Venus among the Athenians, because of her joining lovers.

Amice (amictus, an outer garment), a square-shaped linen cloth worn by ecclesiastics when they put on the alb (q. v.). Walafrid Strabo, a pupil of Pabanus, enumerates the eight vestments of the Church, without including in them the amice. But in all the later liturgical writers the vestment is referred to by some one or other of its various designations (De Rebus Eccles. c. 24). There is no evidence of its use in England till nearly the close of the Saxon period. It is not mentioned in the Pontifical of Egbert (see Rock, Church of Our Fathers, i, 465).

1. Shape of the Amice, its Material and Ornamentation.—The amice was originally a square or oblong piece of linen, and was probably worn (Fig. 1) so as to cover the neck and shoulders. Early in the 10th century (A.D. 925) we hear for the first time of ornaments of gold on the amice (Migne, Patrol. cxxxii, 468). From the 11th century onwards the richer amices were adorned with embroidery, and at times even with precious stones. These ornaments were attached to a portion only of the amice, a comparatively small patch, known as a plaga, or parura (Fig. 4), being fastened on so as to appear as a kind of collar above the alb (Fig. 3). An example is given of late date to show the shape of the parura, as, from the nature of the material, very early amices are not extant.

2. How Worn.—All the earlier notices of the amice are such as to imply that it was worn on the neck and shoulders only. Honorius of Autun (writing cir. A.D. 1125) is the first who speaks of it as being placed on the head (Fig. 2) till the other vestments were arranged, after which it was turned down so that the parura might appear in its proper place. To this position on the head is to be referred its later symbolism as a helmet of salvation.

Amico, Antonino de', of Messina, canon of the Cathedral of Palermo, and historiographer to Philip IV, king of Spain, acquired much reputation for his knowledge in history and the antiquities of Sicily. Of his numerous works on this subject some have been printed and the others are in manuscript. Among those printed are, Trium Orientalium Latinorum Ordinum, post Captam a duce Gothofredo Hierusalem, etc., Notitiæ et Tabularia (Palermo, 1636, fol.):—Dissertatio Historica et Chronologica de Antiquo urbis Syracusa- rum Archiepiscopatu (Naples, 1640, 4to). He died Oct. 22, 1641.

Amico, Bartolommeo, a Jesuit, was born at Anzo, in Naples, in 1562. In 1581 he joined the Society of the Jesuits, lectured on theology and philosophy at Naples, and died Sept. 7, 1649. He wrote, In Universam Aristotelis Philosophiam Notæ et Disputationes, quibus Illustrium Scholarum Averrots, D. Thomæ, Scoti et Nominalium Sententiæ Expenduntur (Naples, 1623-48, 8 vols. fol.):—De Aliquibus Principiis Communibus Philosophis et Theologis (1638-44):—Regole della Coscienza Scrupolosa (1648). Amico, Bernardino, a Franciscan monk of Gallipoli, in the kingdom of Naples, was prior of his order at Jerusalem in 1596. During a sojourn of five years in Palestine, he sketched and accurately described the sacred spots; and on his return to Italy he published in Italian this interesting work, entitled Trattato delle Piantate e Imagini de' Sacri Edifizj di Terra-Santa, Disegnate in Gerusalemme, etc. (first printed at Rome, and then at Florence in 1620). The engravings of this work, which gave the designs of the sacred buildings in the Holy Land, were executed by Callot. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amico, Francesco, a Roman Catholic theologian, was born at Cosenza, in Italy. He was a member of the Order of Jesuits, and for some time taught at Aquila and Naples. After he had been sent to Germany, he was appointed professor of theology at Vienna, where he remained nine years, and acted as chancellor of the University of Graz for five years. He died at Graz, Jan. 31, 1651. He wrote Cursus Theologiæ Scholasticæ (Antwerp, 1650, 9 vols. fol.). The fifth volume, treating de jure et justitia, was placed on the Index with the remark "donec corrigatur," but was allowed, after due correction, by a decree dated July 6, 1655. See Sotwell, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jesu; Backer, Bibl. des Écriv. de la Comp. de Jésus; Hurter, Nomenclator Litterar. (1873), i, 59, 709. (B. P.)

Amico, Stefano di, a monk of the brotherhood of Monte-Casino, was born at Palermo in 1562. He was prior, priest, and vicar-general of his order. Being prior of the Abbey of St. Martin, he considerably increased the library at his own expense, and also constructed superb buildings for the monastery. He died in 1662. Mongitore, who bestowed upon him very high eulogies, informs us, in his Bibliotheca Sicula, that he published, under the name of "Fanesto Musica," a collection of Latin poems, entitled, Suava Lyra, Variorum Auctorum Cantionibus Contexta, in Latina Epigrammata Conversis (Palermo, 1650). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amicus, a Christian confessor at Lyons, is commemorated in some old Roman martyrologies on July 14.

Amid Aba, in the mythology of the Kalmucks, is the goddess of flowers. By a simple act of the will she transforms flowers into men. She is represented very much like Herli Kan and Jamandaga, in the centre of a number of goddesses, not seated, however, on a crushed man, but on a most beautiful flower.

Amida, in Japanese mythology, is the supreme god, sole sovereign in the regions of bliss, the father and protector of all spirits, without beginning and without end. He created the universe, rules the world, was in bodily form on the earth for more than a thousand years, performed the most stupendous miracles, and taught and converted men. There is a contradiction, however, in this, that he thereupon died voluntarily, and thus was raised to the godhead, since which time he stands as a mediator between God and men. Through him alone, and by his mediation only, can men be saved. At death they are placed for a time in hell, from which place they can be liberated by the priests upon making presents to the temple; after which liberation they again return to this earth. Amida has seven heads, which are meant to point to his seven thousand years' rule of the world. He sits riding on a seven-headed horse.

Amidano, POMPONEO, an Italian painter, was born at Parina, and flourished, according to Lanzi, about 1595. He probably studied under Parmigiano, and imitated his style almost perfectly. He executed a painting in the Church of Madonna del Quattiere for the work of Parmigiano. It is supposed that many pictures ascribed to Parmigiano are by this artist.

Amimitl, in Mexican mythology, is a god of fisheries, whom all the nations of the Isthmus, but more especially the inhabitants of the island Knilahuar, worshipped.

Amin (Arab. faithful), a name given by the Mohammedans to the angel Gabriel, as faithfully doing God's will. They hold that he was employed by God to carry the Koran down from heaven, verse by verse, to Mohammed.

Amin Deva (or Jamindiv) is one of the four supreme gods of the Mongolians.

Amiot. See AMYOT.

Amkhu, an Egyptian religious title applied to a young man when entering upon maturity, generally in connection with the worship of some deity.

Amling, Carl Gustav, a German designer and engraver, was born at Nuremberg in 1651, and studied under F. de Poilly. He executed a large number of plates of historical subjects and portraits, the latter of which were most successful. He died in 1701. The following are the principal sacred and historical subjects: Virgin and Child:—Image of the Virgin of Consolation:—Image of St. Nicholas of Tolentino (1691).

Amling, Wolfgang, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1542 at Münnerstadt, in Franconia. He studied at Tübingen, Wittenberg, and Jena. In 1566 he was called as rector to Zerbst, but in 1569 he gave up this position. After having travelled for some time, he was, in 1573, appointed pastor at Koswig, in Anhalt. In the same year, however, he went as pastor of St. Nicolaus's and superintendent to Zerbst, where he died, May 18, 1606. Amling was a very gifted and learned man, but takes no prominent place in the history of theological science. He is only known by his opposition to the Formula of Concord, and by his bringing over a large proportion of Anhalt to the Reformed Church. He is also the author of the so-called Confessio Anhaltina (published in 1578), although it is unjustly called so, because it was only a private document. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Baumann, Historie des Fürstenthums Anhalt, vi, 100-142; Schubring, Die Einführung der reform. Confession in Anhalt, in the Zeitschrift für die Gesch. d. luth. Theologie u. Kirche, 1848; Plitt, in Herzog's Real-Encyclop. s. v. (B. P.)

Ammah, in Egyptian mythology, was the name of the Gate of the Dead, or of Hades, from whence, according to the Ritual of the Dead, the souls of the deceased went out on their way to heaven.

Amman, JOHANN, a German engraver, lived at Hanau about the year 1640. He engraved a set of small wooden cuts representing the Passion of our Saviour, published at Amsterdam in the year 1623, with Latin verses. They possess considerable merit.

Ammanas, an unidentified Himyaritic divinity. He was probably a patron of agriculture, as a portion of the produce of the fields and herds was offered to him.

Ammanati, Bartolommeo, an illustrious Florentine sculptor and architect, was born in 1511. He first studied under the distinguished Baccio Bandinelli, and afterwards at Venice under Jacopo Tatti, better known as Sansovino. He executed a colossal statue of Hercules at Padua by order of Marco di Mantova, a rich physician and a great patron of the arts. At Urbino he was employed to make the monument of duke Francesco Maria, in the Church of Santa Chiara. He made a handsome monument, which still exists in the Church of San Pietro at Montorio. As an architect, he designed and erected the new bridge of the Trinity over the Arno, at Florence, which still remains, and is considered one of the most elegantly designed and ingeniously constructed specimens of which the art can boast. He died in 1589.

Ammanati, Giacomo, also called Piccolomini, an Italian cardinal and historian, was born in 1422 at Villa Basilica, near Pescia, in Tuscany, of a noble family. He acted as papal clerk under Calixtus III. Pius II (Piccolomini) intrusted him with an important mission to Sigismund Malatesta, who finally made peace with the papal see. On account of his talents, learning, and energy, Pius II took a great liking to him, and received him into his family by adoption. In 1460 the same pope made him bishop of Pavia, and in 1461 cardinal (hence cardinalis Papiensis). Under Sixtus IV Ammanati received the archbishopric of Lucca and the cardinal-bishopric of Frascati. He died Sept. 10, 1479, at St. Lorenzo, near Bolsena. He wrote Commentarii Rerum suo Tempore Gestarum Libri VII, comprising the period from 1464 to 1469, and thus forming a continuation of the commentaries of pope Pius II. They were published, together with his Epistles, at Milan in 1506, and at Frankfurt in 1614. See Paoli, Disquisizione Storica della Patria e Compendio della Vita del Card. G. Ammanati Piccolomini detto il Papiense (Lucca, 1712); Voigt, Enea Silvio III (Berlin, 1863), p. 538 sq.; Stahl, in Wetzlar u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon, s. v. (B. P.)

Ammankashibar, an Elamitic deity, of whom nothing is known.

Ammas, in Greek mythology, was (1) a surname of Cybele as well as of Ceres. (2.) The nurse of Diana.

Ammerman, OLIVER VALENTINE, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Brooklyn, N. Y., Jan. 10, 1804. He was left fatherless at the age of four; received a faithful training by his pious mother, who belonged to the Reformed Dutch Church; experienced religion at the age of sixteen on the death of his mother; was licensed to preach in 1824; and in 1826 was admitted into the New York Conference, and appointed to Suffolk Circuit. He afterwards labored at Suffolk and Sag Harbor, Stamford, Redding, Sag Harbor, Sag Harbor and Bridgehampton, Stamford, Fairhaven, Salisbury, Hillsdale, New Haven, Woodbury, Saugerties, Salisbury, Red Hook, Bedford Street and Duane Street (N. Y. city), Goshen, Rhinebeck, Red Hook, Sheffield, Shrub Oaks, Dobb's Ferry, Kensico and Northeast, Hillsdale, and Fishkill Landing, thus closing forty-two years of effective service. The remainder of his life was spent as a superannuate. He died at Peekskill, N. Y., April 23, 1879. Mr. Ammerman was sympathetic, enthusiastic, had a rich experience, and was able and successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 41.

Ammon (Amon, or Amun), Sr., the founder of the celebrated settlement of conobites and hermits on or near Mount Nitria, was born about A.D. 285 in Lower Egypt. At the age of twenty-two he was married against his own consent, and after passing eighteen years with his wife in a state of virginity, he left her, with her consent, and retired to Mount Nitria, where he founded the monastery of that name, and collected a large number of hermits, who took him for their chief and guide. He was on terms of close friendship with St. Anthony, and was credited with the gift of miracles. He died about 348. The Roman martyrology makes no mention of him; the Greeks commemorate him October 4.

AMMON is likewise the name of another Egyptian of the same century, a bishop, to whom St. Athanasius addressed his Letter on Chastity.

AMMON is the name of several other saints: (1) commemorated in the Hieronymian martyrology on Feb. 7; (2) commemorated in Jerome's and Bede's martyrology on Feb. 9; (3) the deacon, with the forty women, his disciples, martyrs, is commemorated in the Byzantine calendar on Sept. 1; (4) commemorated in Jerome's and Bede's martyrology on Sept. 10; (5) martyr at Alexandria, according to the old Roman and Bede's martyrology, on Dec. 20.

Ammonaria, a virgin and martyr of Alexandria, commemorated in the old Roman martyrology on Dec. 12.

Ammonia, in Greek mythology, was a surname of Juno at Elis, whither her worship had been brought from Egypt.

Ammonius (1), a disciple of Pambo, and one of the most celebrated of the monks of Nitria. He was distinguished by the epithet πατρις, in consequence of having cut off one of his ears to escape being made a bishop. In his youth he accompanied Athanasius to Rome; was a learned man, and is said to have been able to repeat the Old and New Testa. In the persecution under Valens he was banished to Diocæsarea. After being in high favor for some time with Theophilus of Alexandria, he and his brothers were accused by him of Origenism; they first took refuge in Palestine (Niceph. viii, 18), and afterwards at Constantinople, where they were well received by Chrysostom. They were also protected by the favor of the empress Eudoxia (Sozom. viii, 18), and even satisfied Epiphanius of Salamis, who came to Constantinople at the instigation of Theophilus to convict them of heresy. Ammonius died soon after. He is perhaps the author of the Institutiones Asceticae, of which twenty-two chapters are extant. See Lambecius, Biblioth. Vindob. iv, 155.

(2.) An Egyptian bishop in the 4th century. At the age of seventeen he was induced, by hearing a sermon by Athanasius, to become a monk, not having as yet even been baptized, and retired to Taberna. After passing two years there, under Theodorus, and fourteen at Nitria, he was, as several other monks, apparently made bishop by Athanasius, and banished by George of Cappadocia. At the request of Theophilus, he wrote an account of St. Theodorus.

(3.) Bishop of Paciemunis and, in part, of Elearchia in the 4th century. Having been a monk, he was made bishop by Alexander. He was sent with Serapion and other bishops on an embassy from Athanasius to Constantius; was banished shortly afterwards by the Arians; and returned in A.D. 362, in which year he was present at the councils of Alexandria and Sardica.

(4.) A solitary, near Canopus, in the 4th century. In the persecution by Valens he fled to Palestine, and thence to Sinai. There he was an eye-witness of the devastation of the monasteries and hermitages by the Saracens. Combes supposes him, on returning to Egypt, to have been ordained presbyter by Peter, and thus identifies him with the Ammonius martyred with that bishop. He thence escaped to Memphis, where he made himself a cell. His narrative, in which he mentions also a similar devastation at the same time at Raithi, is edited in Greek, with Latin translation by Combes.

AMMONIUS is the name of several other saints: (1) a martyr commemorated in Jerome's and Bede's martyrologies on Jan. 31; (2) an infant of Alexandria, commemorated in the old Roman martyrology on Feb. 12; (3) commemorated in Jerome's martyrology on Oct. 6.

Amner, RICHARD, an English Dissenting minister, was born in 1736, and had charge of a congregation at Cosely, in Staffordshire. He died in 1803. He published an Essay on the Prophecies of Daniel, which for its crudities brought him into lasting disgrace. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Amnon, a rabbi of Mayence, lived about 1240. He wrote, Machzor, a book of prayers, printed at Dyhernfurt in 1703. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amœnus PRUDENTIUS, the supposed author of an Enchiridion, or manual of the Old and New Tests, called also Dittochaon, or Diptychon, in 196 Latin hexameters. These are divided into forty-nine tetrastichs, descriptive of the principal events and characters of Scripture. Nothing is known of Amœnus except his name. The Enchiridion was first printed as his work in the Fabrician collection (Basle, 1562). Two other short compositions are ascribed to this author: Egyptius Deum Martini Invocans Tempestatis Periculum Effugit, a short hexameter fragment:—and In Leontium Episcopum Burdigalensi Ecclesie Redditum, an acrostic ode.

Amolo, archbishop of Lyons. See AMULO.

Amora (אַמּוּרָא, interpreter, or expositor). In the narrower sense, this word designated those men who assisted the teachers of the law, in the schools and colleges of Palestine and Babylon, during the 3d, 4th, and 5th centuries, in interpreting the law to the people. In a wider sense, it designates all teachers of the law who, after the death of Judah the Holy until the close of the Talmud (A.D. 219–500), occupied themselves with the elucidation and development of those laws which were laid down in the Mishna. These teachers were called “amoraim.” But as the force of these teachers, especially in large assemblies, was not sufficient, they were assisted in their lectures by a class of men who were styled “amoraim of the second order,” to distinguish them from those of the “first order.” The men of the second order became more and more indispensable to both teachers and hearers, and were well paid. But they soon abused their position either by abbreviating or expanding the lecture, and only cared to be heard. In consequence of this, R. Abbaku passed a law that no amora under fifty years of age should be engaged.

The time of the amoraim of the first order may be divided into six epochs—the first from 219 to 280, the second from 280 to 320, the third from 320 to 375, the fourth from 375 to 427, the fifth from 427 to 468, and the sixth from 468 to 500. We cannot enter here minutely upon the lives and merits of the amoraim, some of whom have already been treated in former volumes, or will be treated in their proper place in this Supplement. The lives of some of these teachers have been written by Bacher, in Die Agada der babylonischen Amoräer (Strasbourg, 1878). (B. P.)

Amos, the Hebrew prophet, is commemorated as a Christian saint in the Byzantine calendar on June 15.

Amos, bishop of JERUSALEM (called by Nicephorus NEAMUS), succeeded John III as the fifty-seventh bishop, A.D. 594. According to Baronius, he had previously been abbot of a Syrian monastery. A letter from Gregory the Great to Amos is extant charging him to withhold communion with, and, if possible, to apprehend and send back to Rome, a runaway acolyte named Peter. He was succeeded by Isaac in 601.

Amos, A. G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Troop County, Ga. He was converted in young manhood in 1869, was licensed to preach in 1871, and in 1872 entered the Savannah Conference. He died Aug. 19, 1879. As a pastor, Mr. Amos was devoted and energetic; as a preacher, earnest, diligent, and successful; as a Christian, irreproachable in character. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 92.

Amos, James R., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Chester County, Pa., July 31, 1822. He was educated at the Presbyterian High-school of Philadelphia. He studied theology in the Ashmore Institute, Oxford, Pa. He was ordained by the New Castle Presbytery in 1859, and sailed for Africa as a missionary in 1860. His health failed, and he returned to America in 1863. He died at Reading, Pa., Nov. 17, 1864. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 90.

Amoureux, ABRAHAM CÉSAR L', a French sculptor, was born at Lyons in 1644, and studied under Coustou the elder. He did some very fine work in the different churches of Lyons. He was invited to Copenhagen in 1682, where he executed the gilded leaden statue of Christian V, king of Denmark, which was placed before the Royal Palace in 1688.

Ampēlus of Messana is commemorated as a Christian saint in the old Roman martyrology on Nov. 20.

Amphian (Aphian, or Appianus), Sr., martyred at Cæsarea, in Palestine; was born in Lycia, in Asia Minor. His parents, who were idolaters, sent him to Berytus, in Phœnicia, to be educated; and upon his return home, in 304, he tried in vain to convert them; whereupon he forsook his home and, leaving himself to the guidance of God, came eventually to Cæsarea, in Palestine. Here, although not yet twenty years of age, he had the boldness to seize the hand of the governor Urban, as he was about to offer sacrifice to an idol, and expostulated with him. Upon this he was thrown into prison, cruelly tormented, burned, and thrown into the sea. This happened in 306, on April 2, according to Eusebius, on which day the Greeks commemorate him (Eusebius, De Mart. Palest. c. 4).

Amphibālus, an early British martyr, who converted St. Alban, and suffered with him in 286.

Amphibalus, a Scottish bishop, was the first bishop of the Isles, and flourished about 360. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 295.

Amphidromia, in Greek paganism, was a festival, among the Athenians, held a few days after the birth of a child. At this festival the child was carried about the house and thus shown to the family and the householders; at the same time a name was given to it; the entire house was profusely decorated, and a supper ended the whole.

Amphīētes (the yearly), in Greek mythology, was a surname of Bacchus, from his yearly festivals in Athens and his biennial festivals in Thebes.

Amphimēdon, one of the Centaurs.

Amphion, Sr., bishop of Epiphania, in Cilicia, who confessed the faith during the persecution of Maximin Daza. He was afterwards present at the councils of Ancyra, A.D. 314, and Neocæsarea, held about the same time; and for a time occupied the see of Nicomedia, in the place of the Arian Eusebius; but he afterwards returned to Epiphania, where he died. He is mentioned in the Roman martyrology on June 12. See Baillet, June 12.

Amphirrḥōē, one of the nymphs of the ocean.

Amphitheatre, a round or oval theatre, with tiers of seats, used chiefly by the Romans to exhibit the combats of gladiators or wild beasts. It was at least partially covered with awning. The general taste of that people for these amusements is proverbial, and they appear to have constructed amphitheatres at all their principal settlements. There are still considerable remains of them: in England the earthworks only exist at Cirencester, Silchester, and Dorchester; in France, much of the masonry exists at Arles, and at Nîmes, in Languedoc; in Istria, at Pola; and in Italy, the well-known Colosseum at Rome. At Verona, Capua, Pompeii, and many other places the buildings exist with their masonry very perfect. See THEATRE.

Amphithūra (Gr. folding-doors), a name given by Chrysostom and Evagrius to the veils or hangings which in the ancient Christian churches divided the chancel from the rest of the church. They received this name from their opening in the middle like folding-doors. They were used partly to hide the altar part of the church from the catechumens and unbelievers, and partly to cover the eucharist in the time of consecration.

Amphitrite, in Greek mythology, was one of the Nereids or Oceanides, the wife of Neptune. She fled to Western Africa and hid herself near Atlas, in order to avoid marriage with Neptune. Neptune sent his messengers in every direction to find her. Delphinus was successful in persuading her to follow him as queen of the sea. Neptune placed Delphinus among the stars. Amphitrite became mother by Neptune of Triton, who, with his parents, lives on the bottom of the sea in a golden palace. Later, Neptune loved Scylla, whereupon Amphitrite changed the latter into a monster of six heads and twelve feet. With the poets Amphitrite is the personification of the Mediterranean Sea.

Ampidius is commemorated as a Christian saint at Rome in Jerome's martyrlogy on Oct. 14.

Ampodius is commemorated as a Christian saint in Jerome's martyrlogy on Oct. 11.

Ampulla (prob. for amb-olla, from its swelling out in every direction) was a flask for holding water and wine for the eucharist, and also a vessel (Ἀμφοδος) for the oil used in chrism (Opt. Milevitanus, Contra Donat. ii, 19, p. 42). One of the most celebrated of these utensils was the one said to have been brought from heaven by a dove at the baptism of Clovis, and afterwards used at the coronation of the Frankish kings (Hincmar, Hist. Eccles. Remensis, i, 13).

Ampullianus was, according to Prædestinatus (i, 63), a "Bithynian heresiarch" who taught that all the wicked, with the devil and evil spirits, are purified by fire and restored to their primitive innocence; and, when his doctrine was impugned by the Church, alleged the authority of Origen, De Principiis.

Ampulling Cloth, a cloth used to wipe away the oil used in extreme unction; so called because originally kept in an ampulla.

Amra, in Hindû mythology, is one of the most beautiful trees of India, and plays a great part in Indian mythology. Figuratively it is called the bridegroom. Its flowers are consecrated to Kamadeva, the god of love, who uses the buds for points on his arrows.

Amrita, in Hindû mythology, is the nectar of immortality which the gods on Mount Meru drink to lengthen their lives, for they are not immortal. The gods and giants are said to have carried the Mandar mountain into a sea of milk, wound the huge snake Ananden around it, and turned the mountain so long that the milk became butter, out of which arose the moon, happiness, abundance, and all arts and sciences. Then came a genius carrying a vessel, full of this holy nectar. This caused a fierce combat between the gods and the giants, which Vishnu decided in favor of the former. The giants were thrown down the fearful precipice, and the gods enjoyed rest on the Meru mountain. Symbolism sees in this myth the turning of the earth on its axis, and interprets the snake as the equator belting the earth. The combat is interpreted as a revolution of the earth, upon which the repose of the human race follows.

Amsdorfians, the followers of Nicholas Amsdorf (q. v.).

Amset, in Egyptian mythology, is (1) the mystical name of one of the planks of the Boat of Souls in ch. xcix of the Ritual of the Dead. (2.) The Carpenter, a son of Osiris, and also one of the four genii of the dead who were offered by the deceased to make an atonement for his sins, and to whose care the different viscera of the embalmed body were committed. He is generally represented in the form of an ovoid vase with a human head as a cover; and on the vase is often a prayer to the goddess Isis on behalf of the deceased. (3.) One of the seven great spirits in the Ritual of the Dead.

Amshaspands, in Zendic mythology, are the names of the six "immortal saints," a series of genii created by Aburamazdu to assist him in the government of the world. Their names were Vohumano, Asovahisto, Khsathsovaairy, Spentaarmaiti, Haurvatat, and Ameretat. See PARSEISM.

Amsler, SAMUEL, a distinguished modern engraver, was born at Schinznach, in the canton of Aargau, Switzerland, in 1791. He studied under Lips and Hess, and practiced chiefly in Rome from 1816 until 1829, when he succeeded his former master, Hess, as professor of copper-engraving in the Munich Academy. He possessed wonderful skill in retaining the expression of the original from which he worked. He was a passionate admirer of Raphael, and had great success in reproducing his works. Amsler's principal engravings are, The Triumphal March of Alexander the Great and a full-length Christ, after the sculptures of Thorwaldsen and Dannecker; the Burial of Christ and two Madonnas, after Raphael; and the Triumph of Religion in the Arts, after Overbeck, his last, on which he spent six years. He died May 18, 1849. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.

Amswartznir, in Norse mythology, was an island in the Lyngian Sea, the scene of the victory of the Asas over the Fenris wolf, who was chained there. One of the Asas lost his hand in this conflict.

Amt, one of the mystical dæmons, called "the Devourer of the Dead," in the Egyptian purgatory. He had the head of a crocodile, the forefoot of a lioness, and the hind-quarters of a hippopotamus.

Amtatusemis, in the mythology of the Mongolians, is a root, on which the human beings and spirits living beyond the Sömmér Ola mountain are said to subsist.

Amula (medieval Latin) is the vessel in which the wine is contained which is offered at the mass. In French it is called urette. See AMA.

Amulio (or Da Mula), MARCO ANTONIO, an Italian cardinal, was born at Venice, Feb. 12, 1505. He studied jurisprudence at Padua, and was at first employed by the Venetian government in several important missions to Charles V. His virtue, his learning, his ability in these affairs, gained for him the esteem of pope Pius IV, who appointed him bishop of Rieti and cardinal and librarian of the Vatican. He died at Rome, March 13, 1570. He wrote, in Farrius, Orationes . . . ex Actis Concilii Tridentini (Venice, 1567):—in Labbe, Concilia (ibid. 1733):—and in Pino, Nuova Scelta di Lettere di Diversi Nobilissimi Uomini (ibid. 1582). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Amulo (or Amolo), archbishop of Lyons, was illustrious both for his knowledge and piety. He wrote against Gothescalcus, and died about the year 854. His works are printed with those of Argobardus.

Amun, another form of the Egyptian divine name Amen when it was used as a prefix.

Amurdvali, in Hindû mythology, was the daughter of Vishnu, sprung from unlawful love for the beautiful Lakshmi. The latter being married to Subramanja, a son of Siva, Vishnu arranged it so that Siva had no knowledge of this amour.

Amynus, in Phœnician mythology, was a son of the deity Agrotus. He is said to have taught men to construct villages and to rear cattle.

Amyot, JACQUES, bishop of Auxerre and grand-almoner of France, was born at Melun, Oct. 20, 1514, and studied philosophy at Paris in the college of the cardinal Le Moine. Here he took the degree of A.M. at nineteen, and afterwards continued his studies under the professors appointed by Francis I. He went to Bourges at the age of twenty-three, and was made professor of Greek and Latin in the university there. It was during this time that he translated into French the Amours of Theagenes and Chariclea, with which Francis I was so well pleased that he conferred upon him the abbey of Bellozanne. He went to Rome and translated Plutarch's Lives and Morals. Henry III conferred upon him the Order of the Holy Ghost, and at the same time decreed that all the grand-almoners of France should be commanders of that order. He did not neglect his studies in the midst of his honors, but revised all his translations with great care, compared them with the Greek text, and altered many passages. He died Feb. 6, 1593. Some of his other works are, his translation of Heliodorus (1547, fol.; 1549, 8vo) and of Diodorus Siculus (Paris, 1554, fol.; 1587):—Daphnis and Chloe (1559, 8vo).

Ana, in Brazilian mythology, is the name of a demon who lived in caves in dark woods, and whom the wild tribes of Brazil fear.

Anabaptists. Of these people there were a large number of sects who had nothing in common except the one doctrine of the necessity of rebaptism. Such were—

1. The Adamites, who numbered no more than three hundred, and who ran about naked on the tops of mountains expecting to be caught up into heaven.
2. The Apostolici, who, acting upon the letter of our Saviour's words, mounted on the house-tops and preached to the people. They are said to have derived their name from their leader, Samuel Apostool, who separated from the Waterlandians in 1664.
3. The Tacturni, or Silentes, who observed an inviolable silence as to their religious opinions.
4. The Perfecti, who separated themselves from the world in order to obey the precept not to conform themselves to this world. They held that a smile or the smallest appearance of happiness in the countenance was sufficient to draw down the curse threatened by our Lord in these words, "Woe unto you that laugh now, for ye shall mourn and weep" (Luke vi, 25).
5. The Impeccables, who held that after baptism it was impossible to commit sin, and consequently omitted the words "forgive us our trespasses," etc., from the Lord's Prayer.
6. The Free Brothers, or Libertini, who declared all servitude to be contrary to the spirit of Christianity.
7. The Sabbatarians, who held that Saturday, and not Sunday, should be kept holy.
8. The Clanularii, who held that in public it was a duty to speak of matters of religion as the generality of persons did, but in private to confess one's real opinion.

9. The Manifestarians, who held exactly the contrary doctrine.

10. The Weepers, who endeavored to attain to the power of weeping constantly, believing it to be acceptable to God.

11. The Rejoicers, who held that feastings, revellings, God-merriment formed the most acceptable tribute to God.

12. The Indifferents, who took no particular part in religious matters and held all forms equally good.

13. The Sanguinari, who sought to shed the blood of Catholics and Protestants.

14. The Anti-Marians, who refused all veneration whatever to the Blessed Virgin.

Anabāta, a term for a hooded cope usually worn in out-door processions, frequently larger and longer than the closed cope. Anciently the hood was one that could actually be drawn over the head for use, and not the mere flat, ornamental appendage found in the ordinary cope. It is no longer in use in the English Church.

Anacalypteria, in Grecian custom, were festivals which were celebrated on the day in which the bride appeared for the first time without a veil; at which festival she usually received presents from the bridegroom, from parents and friends. The presents themselves were so named likewise.

Anacampteria (from ἀνακμπρω, to unbend), small buildings which were erected adjacent to ancient Christian churches, designed to serve as little hospitals or inns, where poor persons and travellers might relax themselves on their journey. They are supposed, also, to have served as lodgings for such as fled to take sanctuary in the church.

Anacea, a festival of antiquity held at Athens in honor of the Dioscuri, or Castor and Pollux, who were called Anaces.

Anāces. Castor and Pollux were so called, either from the cessation of the war, ἀνοχή, which they had undertaken to rescue their sister Helen, whom Theseus had carried off; or from their singular care to preserve the city Aphidnæ, which they had reduced to submission, from the ravages of the soldiers. The Greek word ἀνακες literally means kings.

Anachis, one of the four Lares revered by the Egyptians.

Anaclethra, a stone held in great veneration by the women of Megara, because on it Ceres was said by the Greeks to have reposed after her fatigue in the search of Proserpine. It was kept at Athens near the Prytanæum.

Anacletus the pope is commemorated as a martyr in the old Roman martyrology on April 26.

Anactōron (ἀνάκτορον, from ἀνάκτωρ, a sovereign), the dwelling of a king or ruler. In classical authors, it is generally a house of a god, especially a temple of the Eleusinian Demeter or of the Dioscuri; also, the innermost recess of a temple, in which oracles were given (Lobeck, Aglaoph. i, 59, 62). Eusebius (Panegy. c. 9) applies the word to the church built by Constantine at Antioch; but whether as equivalent to basilica, or with reference to the unusual size and splendor of the church, or with a reminiscence of the classical use of the word, it is difficult to say (Bingham, Christ. Ant. bk. viii, ch. i, § 5).

Anactotelestæ, in ancient Greek ceremonies, was a title of the managers in the Corybantian mysteries.

Anadēma (ἀνάδημα, a garland), an ornament of the head with which victors were adorned in the sacred games of the ancients.

Anadyomēnē, an epithet of Venus, meaning emerging out of the waters. Under this title those worshipped her who had escaped drowning. The most celebrated picture of antiquity was that of this goddess by Apelles, for which his favorite mistress, Campaspe, was given him so generously by Alexander.

Anágami (from an, not, and agami, came), one of the four paths by which, according to Buddhism, an individual may obtain an entrance into Nirwāna, or a cessation of existence. The being that has entered this path does not again return to the world of men, and hence the name.

Anagnidagdas, in Hindû mythology, are progenitors of the Brahmins, who cannot be consumed by fire.

Anagogia, a feast held by the people of Eryx, in Sicily, to commemorate, as they alleged, the departure of Venus from them to Libya. They said that the pigeons, which abounded in that country, disappeared at that time, and accompanied the goddess in her journey. After nine days they returned, when the people celebrated another feast, which they termed Catagogia, in honor of the return of the goddess.

Anaharath. Tristram suggests (Bible Places, p. 238) that this place is represented by the modern En-Naurah, situated on the southern slope of the range of Jebel ed-Duby, or "Little Hermon" (Robinson, Later Researches, p. 339); a suggestion already made by Lieut. Conder (Tent Work, ii, 334). But it is difficult to run the boundary of Issachar so as to include this spot, and yet exclude the site of En-dor (if the latter be required by Josh. xvii, 11).

Anahid, in Persian mythology, was the name of the female genius Ized, the morning and evening star. The name is derived from the Indian Anahut, which signifies the pulse-beats of the blood in the ears, which the Indian dervise interprets as the pulse-beats of the spheres. Anahid was originally not a goddess, but a mortal. Two fallen angels, Harut and Marut, sought to mislead her; but the maiden withstood every temptation, and therefore she was counted worthy of the honor of becoming a goddess. She was placed among the stars, where her rich locks of hair are scented with amber and musk; and her dress, covering her pearl legs and feet, glimmers in the dazzling brightness of the morning star.

Anaideia, or Impudence, was a divinity among the Athenians.

Anaitis is the name of several Oriental female divinities, which are not easily distinguished.

1. In Persian mythology. The Cappadocians, Armenians, Persians, and Medes worshipped a goddess of love under this name, which the Romans and Greeks compared to Venus. She had two temples at Sacasene, in Armenia, which she divided among two Persian demons (Omanus and Anandatus), the temples being probably erected for the accommodation of the Persian armies or for trading caravans. In the neighborhood of Bactriana there was a rock supported by walls, erected as a retreat for the armies; and soon there was built a temple with a female priesthood, so that the city of Zela, in Pontus, near-by, was entirely inhabited by these priestesses, which goes to show that every girl living there consecrated herself to the service of the goddess. Strabo relates: "When the maidens had for a time consecrated themselves to the service of the goddess, they were married, and no one considered it a shame to marry them." The true signification of Anaitis is difficult to determine, as there are only Roman and Grecian accounts of her. However, when we remember the character of the Asiatic natural religion, in which a male and female are always classed together (Vishnu and Bhavani, Baal and Astarte, Isis and Osiris, Venus and Adonis, Attes and Cybele), and when we consider that this temple had two male demons, we can only find in this worship another form of Asiatic natural religion.

2. A Shemitic goddess of a warlike character, somewhat approaching the Bellona of classic mythology. She was represented as a nude woman standing on a lion, and sometimes on a crocodile, holding a spear or bow, and wearing a peculiar crown formed of tall feathers. Her worship was introduced into Egypt probably about the time of Rameses II, after his Syrian victories. See HERA.

3. Anaitis is also a feminine form of the great deity Mithra, as introduced into the Median religion when corrupted from Zoroastrianism. In some respects she was analogous to the Babylonian Mylitta (q. v.).

Anaka is an evil spirit worshipped by several Brazilian nations.

Anakri, in the mythology of the Caribbeans, were sacrifices which those nations made, of fruits and of drink, upon recovery from sickness.

Analābus (ἀνάλαβος), a Greek term for the monastic girdle or scapular. See SCAPULARY.

Analepsis (ἀνάληψις), the Greek term for the ascension of Christ.

Analogion (ἀναλόγιον, or ἀναλογεῖον), a Greek term for a reading-desk, lectern, elevated stall, or pulpit.

Anan (Ananias, or Ananus), BEN-DAVID, the celebrated founder of Karaism. The exact date of his birth cannot now be ascertained. All that we know about him is that his uncle Solomon, who was prince or patriarch of the exiled Jews, died childless in A.D. 761 or 762; that Anan was the legitimate successor to the patriarchate; and that he was then old enough to become the prince of the Captivity, so that he was most probably about thirty years of age. He was, however, prevented from obtaining the patriarchate by the brothers R. Jehudai the Blind and R. Dudai, who were at that time the gaonim, or presidents, of the academies (the former at Sora, from 759 to 762; and the latter at Pumbeditha, from 761 to 764), because he rejected the traditions of the fathers and made the Bible the only rule of his faith; and his younger brother, Chananja, or Achunai, was elected in his stead. Anan, however, was not disposed to submit meekly to such a slight, and his partisans encouraged him to appeal to the caliph Abugafar Almanzor, against the decision of the colleges. At first the caliph was disposed to favor his claim, but finally the Rabbinical party succeeded, and Anan was obliged to leave the country. He retired to Jerusalem, where he built a synagogue, the walls of which were still standing in the time of the First Crusade. With the establishment of the community the schism became formal. The Rabbinical Jews excommunicated Anan with his party; and Anan, on the other hand, declared he wished that all the Rabbinical Jews were in his body; he would then destroy himself, so that they might die with him. The writings of Anan are unfortunately lost, and we are mainly indebted to the statements and allusions in the works of the Arabic historians Makrizi, Masudi, Sharastani, and Abulfeda for our knowledge of his doctrinal system. The ground principles are the unity of God and his justice. Anan absolutely rejected the Talmud, and advised his followers to "search the Scriptures diligently." He also rejected the calendar introduced by Hillel II, and reinstituted the scriptural beginning of the month, which is when the new moon appears. The Sabbath was to be kept according to the Scripture, and he was in this respect stricter in his theory than the rabbins. He abrogated the use of phylacteries by explaining Exod. xiii. 9 figuratively, as in Prov. iii, 3; vi, 21. In matters of inheritance he put sons and daughters upon an equality, and declared that a husband has no right to inherit his departed wife's property. Of Christ, as the founder of Christianity, Anan spoke in terms of the highest respect. "The lovers of the truth should know," thus runs a Hebrew passage in Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iv, 1086, "that Jesus the Nazarene was a great teacher, a just and good man; one who feared God, and who taught nothing as a statute or judgment except the written law of God (תורת האלהים), setting aside all that shall be proved diverse or contrary to whatsoever Moses (upon whom be peace) wrote in the law." Anan's followers looked upon him with such adoration and from that of St. James; the three Nestorian from that of the apostles. See CANON; COMMUNION.

2. The word is sometimes used in liturgical writings as equivalent to the chalice-veil, and has found its way in this sense, corrupted in form (nuphir), into the Syrian liturgies (Renaudot, Lit. Orient. ii, 61).

Anar (or Onar), in Norse mythology, was the second of the three husbands of the giant daughter Not (night), by whom she gave birth to the goddess Jörd (earth). The word signifies work, in which, probably, a faint idea of creation work may be found.

Anargyres, FESTIVAL OF THE (from ἀ, not, and ἀργυρος, money), celebrated by the Greek Church Nov. 1 in honor of two saints named Cosmus and Damianus, who were brothers, and both physicians. The Greeks called them Anargyres because they practiced medicine out of pure charity, without claiming any reward for their services. A legend mentions a miraculous fountain at Athens, near a chapel consecrated to these two saints. The fountain never flows but on their festival, as soon as the priest has begun to say mass, and in the evening it is dried up again.

Anastase, OLIVIER DE SAINT, a friar of the Order of Carmelites, was born at the commencement of the 17th century, and died at Brussels in 1674. His family name was De Crock. He wrote, Le Jardin Spirituel des Carmes, etc. (Antwerp, 1659-61):—Le Combat Spirituel d'Amour entre la Mère de Dieu et les Serviteurs de l'Ordre du Mont-Carmel, avec Égal Avantage des deux Côtés (ibid. 1661):—Apologues Moraux, traduits de Saint Cyrille, et Enrichis de Petites Pièces de Poésies et de Conclusions (ibid. 1669):—Pleias Mystica, Calculata ad Meridianum Desolati (Belgii, eod.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anastasi, GIOVANNI, an Italian historical painter, was born at Sinigaglia in 1654. In the Church of Santa Lucia in Montalbodo there are three of his works. Lanzi says there are many of his works in the Church della Croce at Sinigaglia. His manner was easy, though not refined.

Anastasia is the name of several Christian saints: (1) a martyr of the time of Nero, said to have been a pupil of St. Peter and St. Paul, commemorated April 15; (2) the martyr under Diocletian whose nativity is celebrated in Roman lists on Dec. 25, and in the Byzantine calendar (as φωκαλοεργία, or dis-solver of spells) on Dec. 22 (Neale, Eastern Church, introd. p. 786); (3) a special martyr (ἁγιομάρτυς) of Rome commemorated in the Byzantine calendar on Oct. 29; (4) the daughter of an eminent Greek family of Constantinople. Her beauty attracted the attention of the emperor Justinian, but she resisted his dishonorable proposals, and retired to Alexandria, where she lived as a monk for twenty-eight years, her sex remaining unknown until her death, in A.D. 597. She is commemorated March 10.

Anastasius is the name of several saints in various calendars, of some of whom we have given details elsewhere: (1) the monk, a martyr in Persia, commemorated in all the old martyrologies on Jan. 23; (2) saint, April 1 (Bede); (3) the pope, April 27 (old Roman and Bede), or Oct. 28 (Armenian); (4) saint, May 2 (Bede); (5) the Cornicularius, martyr, Aug. 21 (old Roman); (6) Aug. 26 (Jerome); (7) bishop, Oct. 13 (Bede and Jerome).

Anastasius is further the name of several other early Christian celebrities: (1) saint and martyr, who succeeded St. Anastasius in the patriarchate of Antioch, and was cruelly tortured and burned to death by the Jews, whom he had labored to convert (see Baillet, April 31); (2) a Spanish priest and monk, martyred by the Saracens at Cordova in 853 for having publicly refuted the errors of the Koran (see Baillet, June 14, vol. ii).

Anastasius, bishop of ANCYRA, was one of the metropolitans to whom the emperor Leo writes concerning the death of Proterius (A.D. 458). His answer is extant (Labbe, Concil. [ed. Coleti], iv, 1291 sq.). He was also present at the Council of Constantinople in 459.

Anastasius, a presbyter of ANTIOCH, was celebrated in ecclesiastical history as the confidential friend and counsellor of Nestorius, whom he accompanied on his elevation to the archiepiscopal seat of Constantinople. Here, in a sermon preached by him, Anastasius uttered the words that destroyed the peace of the Church for so many years—"Let no one call Mary Θεοτόκος. She is but a human being. It is impossible for God to be born of a human being." Nestorius, by supporting and defending Anastasius, adopted the language as his own. In A.D. 430 Anastasius endeavored to bring about an accommodation between Cyril and Nestorius. After the deposition of Nestorius he still maintained his cause, and animated his party at Constantinople. Tillemont identifies him with the Anastasius who, in 434, wrote to Helladius, bishop of Tarsus, when he and the Oriental bishops were refusing to recognise Proclus as bishop of Constantinople, bearing witness to his orthodoxy, and urging them to receive him into communion.

Anastasius APOCRISIARIUS, of Rome, suffered much for the faith from the Monothelites in the 7th century under Constans II. He wrote an epistle to Theodosius, a priest of Gangra, on the death of St. Maximus, in which he cites fragments from the writings of Hippolytus, bishop of Porto. It is contained in the collections of Anastasius and the works of St. Maximus.

Anastasius THE BOHEMIAN, a Capuchin friar of the 17th century, lived at Prague. In 1669 he published an interesting book, entitled Radius Paupertatis, with several plates engraved by the author. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anastasius CASSINENSIS, a friar of Monte-Casino, lived in the last half of the 8th century. He was librarian of pope Stephen III. He is often confounded with Anastasius the librarian, who lived near the close of the 9th century. He is supposed to be the author of Historia de Translatione Puris Reliquiarum Sancti Benedicti et Sororis ejus Scholasticae, the MS. of which is in the library of Monte-Casino. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anastasius OF CLUNY, a monk and hermit, was born of a noble family at Venice. Being anxious to devote himself entirely to the service of God, he left his country and retired to Mont-Saint-Michel, where he embraced the monastic life; this was somewhat before the middle of the 11th century. Finding, however, that the abbot of his monastery was guilty of simony, he left it, and betook himself to an island in the sea, where he led a hermit's life. His fame reached the ears of Hugo, abbot of Cluny, who visited him in his solitude and induced him to return with him to Cluny, where he remained seven years, an example of all good to the brethren, diligently perusing the Greek and Latin fathers, and laying the foundation of his future admirable exhortations. Gregory VII directed the abbot of Cluny to send him into Spain to preach to the infidels, a work to which he applied himself with alacrity and zeal, but with little fruit, and he soon returned to Cluny. Afterwards he began to sigh for his hermit life, and obtained permission to retire into the Pyrenees, where he abode in solitude three years instructing the people. He died, on his return to Cluny, October 16, about the year 1086, at a place now called Doydes, in the diocese of Rieux. A small work of Anastasius containing his faith on the subject of the eucharist is extant; it was written to William, abbot of Corneilles, who demanded his opinion of the subject on the occasion of the speculations of Berenger.

Anastasius, patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE, was promoted by the influence of the emperor Leo Isaurus after the abdication or deposition of Germanus. According to one account, force was employed by the emperor to intimidate those who opposed the election; and when the populace, headed by some nuns, rioted against the new patriarch for removing an image of Christ from the palace, the ringleaders were executed. Anastasius favored the iconoclasts, which led to his excommunication by Gregory III. He was very complaisant to Artabasdas when he seized the throne; for which he was most ignominiously punished on the return to power of Constantius. He was, however, allowed, in mockery, to retain his see, and died in 753. By some chronologies he was made patriarch in 728.

Anastasius, MARTIN, a learned Benedictine of Monte-Casino who took the habit of his order July 22, 1595. He wrote, among other works, the following, De Monogamia B. Annæ Parentis Deipurae (Cenipont, 1659): — Vita di Santa Rosalia V. Palermiana: — Concordia IV Evangelistarum: — De Censuris Ecclesiasticis (all still in MS.). — Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Anastasius, bishop of NICEÆA (1), was present at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. Not having arrived, he was represented in the earlier sessions by two presbyters, but later he appeared and subscribed in person. At the thirteenth session he was charged by Eunomius of Nicomedia with invading his metropolitan rights over the churches of Bithynia; and the decision was given against him. The bishop of Nicea was henceforth to retain the title without exercising the jurisdiction of a metropolitan.

Anastasius, bishop of NICEÆA (2), was present at the Synod of Constantinople, A.D. 518, and signed the letter to the patriarch John concerning Severus. His name also appears attached to the letter of the synod of 520 to Hormisdas, on the appointment of Epiphanius. He took part, also, in the proceedings of the Council of Constantinople, A.D. 536. To this Anastasius is probably to be ascribed the Commentary on the Psalms (in MSS. Bibl. Coisl. p. 389).

Anastasius of PALESTINE, lived during the last half of the 11th century. He was the author of Tractatus de Jejunio Gloriosissimæ Deiparae quodque Servandum sit ut Legitimum, a work originally written in Greek, but translated by Cotelerius into Latin, in Vetere Monumenta Ecclesiæ Græcæ, iii, 432. He also wrote Περὶ τῶν ἐπὶ τὰ ἑβδόμηδων ἡστέων, which remains in MS. at the Imperial Library of Vienna. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anastasius THE SINAITE, the younger (saint and martyr), succeeded Anastasius the elder in the see of Antioch in 599. He labored with great zeal for the conversion of the Jews, who revolted and killed him, Dec. 21, 608. He is supposed to be the author of a Greek translation of the work of Gregory the Great De Cura Pastoralis, as well as of a treatise in Greek upon faith. A Latin translation of this last is found in the Bibliotheca Patrum. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anastasius THE SINAITE, the third of the name, patriarch of Antioch, was appointed to this see in 629 by the emperor Heraclius. He declared himself opposed to the Council of Chalcedon, and showed himself a partisan of the heretical doctrines of the Jacobites. He died in 649. He is probably the author of a Greek work on Heresies, which is found in MS. in the Imperial Library of Vienna. See Hofer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anastasius, abbot of the monastery of St. EUTHYMICUS, in Palestine, about 740. In the year 749 St. John Damascenus wrote against his error on the subject of the Trisagion, which he referred to the Son alone. The treatise against the Jews given by Canisius in his Antiquitates (III, i, 123, and contained in vol. xiii of the Bibl. Patrum) is attributed to this writer, but erroneously, since the writer speaks of a space of eight hundred years having elapsed since the destruction of Jerusalem. Ceillier, however, who attributes the work to this Anastasius, makes him to have lived in the 9th century. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 628.

Anastātus, in Grecian ceremonies, was a sort of cake baked at Athens on the occasion of the Arrhephorias.

Anat (or Anatu), the feminine Sacti of the Assyrian deity Oannes. She was the wife of Anu, and the impersonation of passive reproductive matter. Her chief title was "the Lady of Death and Life." Under the name of Anatīs she was worshipped by the Egyptians, in which case she was regarded as a feminine form or wife of the god Reseph.

Anathemāta (from ἀνὰθημι, to lay up), the general name applied in the ancient Christian Church to all kinds of ornaments in churches, whether in the structure itself or in the vessels and utensils belonging to it. The name was so applied because these things were set apart from a common use to the service of God. In this sense anathemata is used in Luke xxi, 5 for the gifts and ornaments of the temple. Accordingly, in early times, all ornaments belonging to the church, as well as whatever contributed to the beauty and splendor of the fabric itself, were reckoned among the anathemata of the Church. But the word is sometimes used in a more restricted sense to denote those gifts particularly which were hung upon pillars in the church as memorials of some great mercy which men had received from God. Hence Jerome speaks of men's gifts hanging in the church upon golden cords, or being set in golden sockets or sconces. From this custom of presenting gifts to churches, there appears to have arisen, about the middle of the 5th century, a peculiar practice noticed by Theodoret, that when any one obtained the benefit of a signal cure from God in any member of his body, as his eyes, hands, feet, or other part, he brought what was called his ectypoma, or figure, of the part in silver or gold, to be hung up in the church to God as a memorial of his favor. In a restricted sense, the term anathemata is used to designate the covering of the altar.

Anatocism (from ἀνά, upon, and τόκος, usury), a term applied to usurious contracts of such a nature that they bound the borrowers to pay interest upon the interest, or compound interest. Such contracts were condemned both by the canon and the civil law.

Anatolia, St., was a Roman virgin, espoused to a young Roman named Aurelian; but when her sister Victoria had taken the resolution to forsake her suitor and embrace the virgin state, Anatolia determined to do so likewise. The emperor Decius permitted their lovers to use any means to force their consent to their marriage, but in vain, and they were in the end put to death. The festival of Anatolia is marked in the Roman Church on July 9. See Baillet, July 9.

Anatolius of CONSTANTINOPLE, who died in A.D. 458, marks an era in Greek ecclesiastical poetry. He left those who were satisfied to imitate the classical writers, and struck out the new path of harmonious prose. His life-history began in a time of conflict. He had been apocrisiarius, or legate, from the archheretic Dioscorus to the emperor's court. At the death of Flavian, in consequence of the violence received in the "Robbers' Council" at Ephesus (449), he was, by the influence of his pontiff, raised to the vacant throne of Constantinople. To Anatolius also was due the decree passed at the Council of Chalcedon (451) that Constantinople should hold the second place among patriarchal sees. He governed his Church eight years in peace. His compositions are few and short, but they are usually very spirited. Of his hymns we mention, Ζοφεῖς αἱ ροκμῖαις, "Fierce was the wild billow:"—Τὴν ἡμέραν διελθόν, "The day is past and over," an evening hymn, greatly liked in the Greek isles:—Τῷ βασιλεῖ καὶ δεσπότῃ, "The Lord and King of all things," for St. Stephen's Day:—Μείγα καὶ παράδοξον θαῦμα, "A great and mighty wonder," a Christmas hymn. See Neale, Hymns of the Eastern Church, p. 55 sq.; Miller, Singers and Songs of the Church, p. 9; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B.P.)

Anaxagōras, an eminent Greek philosopher, was born at Clazomene, in Ionia, about B.C. 500. Inheriting wealth, he was able to give his time wholly to study. When twenty years old he went to Athens, where among his pupils were Pericles, Euripides, and Socrates. Accounts differ somewhat as to the nature of the persecution which drove him from Athens. It seems, however, to have been superstitious. He was condemned to death, but by the eloquence of Pericles the sentence was commuted into banishment for life. He retired to Lampsacus, on the Hellespont, where he died at the age of seventy-two. It is not easy to ascertain what were the opinions of Anaxagoras in philosophy. Fragments merely of his works have been preserved, and even these are contradictory. But we are certain that he had a deeper knowledge of physical laws than any of his predecessors or contemporaries. His great contribution to ancient philosophy, however, was his doctrine as to the origin of all things. He held that all matter existed originally in the condition of atoms; that these atoms, infinitely numerous and infinitely divisible, had existed from all eternity; and that order was first produced out of this infinite chaos of minutiae through the influence and operation of an eternal intelligence (νοῦς). He also maintained that all bodies were simply aggregations of these atoms, and that a bar of gold or iron or copper was composed of inconceivably minute particles of the same material; but he did not hold that objects had taken their shape through accident or blind fate, but through the agency of the eternal mind, which he described as infinite, self-potent, and unmixed with anything else. He declares that it "is the most pure and subtle of all things, and has all knowledge about all things and infinite power." His theory is thus only one step from pure theism. He makes the work of the Eternal commence with Providence, not with creation. The fragments of Anaxagoras have been collected by Schaubach (Leips. 1827) and by Schorn (Bonn, 1829). See also Mullach, Fragmenta Philos. Græc. i, 243-252.

Anaya y Maldonado, don DIEGO, a Spanish prelate, was born at Salamanca about 1360. He was bishop of Salamanca when he was sent as ambassador to the Council of Constance with Martin Fernandez of Cordova. Appointed bishop of Salamanca in 1401, Anaya founded there a college designed to afford gratuitous instruction, and to this he consecrated all his fortune. This college, the first of the kind in Europe, was known by the name of San Bartolomé el Viejo. This generous act was imitated by other prelates. Anaya died in 1440. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anazarba, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Anazarbicum).

I. Held in A.D. 431, to confirm the deposition of St. Cyril and those who believed with him.

II. Held in 433 or 435. In this council many bishops, following the example of Theodoret, put themselves in communion with John of Antioch.

Anbeheh, in Hindû mythology, is the boundless ocean, which arose of itself.

Anbert, in Hindû mythology, is the fruit of eternal life from the tree of Parajeti, which grows on the Meru Mountain.

Ancestor-worship, a form of idolatry very common among the Chinese, and frequently practiced by others. Many of the South-Sea Islanders worship their deceased ancestors, but it is difficult to ascertain how much of divinity they ascribed to them. The Sintoists of Japan, the Armenians, and many of the ancient heathens observed this form of worship. Both Cicero and Pliny say that this was the ancient mode of rewarding those who had done good while on earth. The whole system of Greek and Roman mythology is tinged with the deification of men of renown. Even the veneration which the early Christians entertained for the martyrs degenerated at length into a superstitious idolatry, which not only bought their intercessory prayers, but venerated their relics. "In the Armenian cemetery, which occupies several hundred acres on a hill that overlooks the Bosphorus, whole Armenian families, of two or three generations together, are often to be seen sitting round the tombs and holding visionary communications with their deceased friends. According to their belief, the souls of the dead pass into a place called Gayank, which is not a purgatory, for they suffer neither pain nor pleasure, but retain a perfect consciousness of the past. From this state they may be delivered by the alms and prayers of the living, which the pious Armenians give liberally for their friends" (Conder, View of all Religions). For the modes of ancestor-worship among the Chinese, see CHINA.

Anchieta, MIGUEL, a Spanish sculptor, was born at Pampeluna in the early part of the 16th century. He studied at Florence, and acquired, according to Bermudez, the reputation of one of the best sculptors of his time. He made the beautiful stalls of the choir of the Cathedral at Pampeluna, which are considered the finest in Spain. There are one hundred of them. He also executed other beautiful pieces of work for the altars of Santa Maria at Tafalla, and the great altar of the Cathedral at Burgos.

Anchor (as a symbol). By the early Christians we find the anchor used sometimes with reference to the stormy ocean of human life, but more often to the tempests and the fierce blasts of persecution which threatened to engulf the ship of the Church. Thus the anchor is one of the most ancient of emblems; and we find it engraved on rings, and depicted on monuments and on the walls of cemeteries in the Catacombs, as a type of the hope by which the Church stood firm in the midst of the storms which surrounded it. In this, as in other cases, Christianity adopted a symbol from paganism, with merely the change of application.

The symbols on sepulchral tablets often contain allusions to the name of the deceased. An anchor upon tituli bearing names derived from Spes, or El-nig, has been found a number of times (De' Rossi, De Monum. etc. p. 18; Mai, Collect. Vatican. p. 449). In some cases, above the transverse bar of the anchor stands the letter E, probably the abbreviation of the word Elpis. Further, we find the anchor associated with the fish, the symbol of the Saviour. It is clear that the union of the two symbols expresses "hope in Jesus Christ"—a formula common on Christian tablets.

The transverse bar below the ring gives the upper part of the anchor the appearance of a crux ansata [see Cross]; and perhaps this form may have had as much influence in determining the choice of this symbol by the Christians as the words of Paul. The anchor appears, as is natural, very frequently upon the tombs of martyrs (see Lupi, Severæ Epitaph. p. 136 sq.; Boldetti, Osservaz. p. 366, 370).

Anchoress, a female anchorite.

Ancilæ, in Roman mythology, was the name of a small oval shield, which was cut on the side, and was said to have fallen from heaven under Numa's reign. The nymph Egeria and the Muses had made the welfare of the city of Rome dependent upon the preservation of this shield; therefore it was placed for safety in a temple on the Palatine or Capitoline Mountain. Mamurius Veturius was ordered to make eleven other shields similar to the first one, in order that the true shield might not be discerned. These twelve shields were carried once a year through the city by priests called Salii at Rome in the month of March, in honor of the descent of the original from heaven. The ceremonies consisted of sacrifices to the gods, singing, and dancing, participated in by a chorus of girls, dressed like the Salii, and called Saliae. Though the feast and procession were held properly in March, yet the ancilia were moved whenever a just war was declared by order of the Senate against any state or people.

Representation of the Sacred Ancle as borne in Procession. (From the tomb of a Pontifex Maximus. The staff on which the shields were borne is shown separately above.)

Ancillæ Dei (Lat. handmaidens of God), a name sometimes given to deaconesses (q. v.) in the early Church, and also to nuns (q. v.) at a later period.

Ancina, GIOVANNI (GIUVENALE), a learned Italian prelate, was born at Fossano in 1545. He studied the sciences first at Montpellier, then at the University of Mondovi, newly founded by Emmanuel Philibert, duke of Savoy. He devoted himself to poetry with success, studied medicine at Padua, then became priest, and afterwards bishop of Saluzzo. He died Aug. 31, 1604. At the age of twenty he published a work in heroic verse, entitled De Academia Subalpina Libri Duo (Montreale, Leon. Torrentinus, 1565). He also wrote, Odæ Quatuor Seren. Sabaudie Principibus, et Carolo Emmanueli eorum Patri Odæ Tres (ibid. eod.):—Tenpio Armonico (Rome, 1599):—a collection of spiritual poems, Decades Divinarum Contemplationum (ed. by P. Lombardo):—a Canticò, in one hundred stanzas, addressed to pope Pius V. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ancker, HANS, a copper-plate engraver, probably resided at Zwolle, Holland, and flourished during the early part of the 15th century. The largest two of his plates are Christ on the Mount of Olives and a Gothic Altar. The rest are all from the New Test. or from subjects connected with the Romish Church.

Ancona, ANDREA LILIO D', an Italian painter, was born at Nella Marca, and flourished about 1595. In a chapel of the Chiesa Nuova, at Rome, he represented Michael Driving the Evil Spirits from Heaven. He also executed a fine fresco painting in the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore, representing Our Saviour Washing the Feet of the Disciples. He was employed in the Roman churches and convents by Clement VIII.

Ancūli and Ancūlæ, in Roman mythology, were the protecting deities of the slaves at Rome.

Ancyra, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Ancyranum). Ancyra was an episcopal see in the diocese of Asia and province of Phrygia Pacatiana, first under the metropolitan of Laodicea, and afterwards under Hierapolis. Pliny speaks of this city as one of the first of Phrygia. Several Church councils were held there.

I. Held about Easter, 314. Eighteen bishops only were present, among whom were Vitalis of Antioch and Marcellus of Ancyra (well known in the history of St. Athanasius), Lupus of Tarsus and Amphion of Epiphania. Twenty-four (some say twenty-five) canons were drawn up, chiefly relating to the case of those who had relapsed during the persecution of Maximin.

1. Orders that priests who, after their fall, have sincerely repented shall be permitted to retain their rank, but excluded from all exercise of their office.

2. Orders the same concerning deacons.

3. Orders that those who have been forcibly made to sacrifice shall be admitted to communion; and that laymen should not by such violence be incapacitated from receiving holy orders.

4. Orders that those who have been induced to sacrifice by threats, etc., shall, upon repentance, be received as hearers from the time of holding this synod to the great day (Easter); after this, as prostrators for three years, and for two years more as communicants without offering. In case of sickness and danger they might be received under limitation.

5. Orders that those who have sacrificed two or three times, even under violence, shall fulfil a penance of six years.

6. Enjoins a penance of ten years upon those who have led away their brethren.

7. Allows those persons who, at the time of their being made deacons, declared their intention to marry, to do so, and to remain in the ministry; those who did not so declare their purpose, but were ordained professing continence, to be deposed if they afterwards married.

8. Allows the ordination of those who sacrificed before baptism.

9. Forbids the chorepiscopi to ordain priests or deacons without the permission of the bishop in writing.

10. Deprives those of the clergy who obstinately, through superstition, refuse to touch meat, and vegetables cooked with meat.

11. Enacts that Church property unlawfully sold by priests during a vacancy in the bishopric shall be reclaimed.

12. Excommunicates those who, having been appointed bishops, and refused by the persons in the parish to which they have been appointed, wish to invade other parishes.

13. Enjoins seven years' penance for adultery.

14. Enjoins five years of penance to those who use soothsaying and follow the customs of the Gentiles.

See Labbe, Concil. i, 1456, 1480.

II. Held in 358, by certain Semi-Arian bishops, headed by Basil of Ancyra and George of Laodicea. They condemned the grosser blasphemies of the Arians. The pure Arians taught that the Son of God is but a mere creature, but the semi-Arians believed him to be more than a created being, and even like to the Father, but not of the same substance with him, nor equal to him. The Eusebians favored this latter notion, and drew up a long exposition of the faith, which they presented to the bishops; in which, by establishing that the Son is of like substance with the father, they cunningly implied that he is not of the same substance with him, and anathematized the term consubstantial. The Semi-Arians sent a deputation to Constantius, and obtained the suppression of the second confession or formulæ of Sirmium, made in 357. See Labbé, Concil. ii, 789; Sozomen, iv, 13; Epiphanius, Hær. lxxii.

III. Another synod of Semi-Arians was held at Ancyra in 375, at which Hypsius, bishop of Parnassus, was deposed.

ANCYRA, THE SEVEN VIRGINS OF, are commemorated by the Armenian Church on June 20 as fellow-martyrs with Theodotion, or Theodoros, of Salatia, the first bishop of Ancyra of whom we have any account (Neale, Eastern Church, introd. p. 800).

Andala, RUARD, a Dutch theologian, was born near Boalsward in Frisia, in 1665. He studied at Franeker, where he died as professor of theology, Sept. 12, 1727. He was a great adherent of the Cartesian system of philosophy. He wrote, Epist. Apolog. adversus Ulr. Huberum et H. Witzium in qua præter alia De- monstratur Necessitas Rationis, seu Manifestationis Dei Naturalis (Franecker, 1681):—Existentia Dei non modo a Posteriori, sed et a Priori Demonstrata (ibid. 1705):—Exercit. Acad. in Philosophiam Primam et Naturalem in quibus Philosophia Cartesii Explicatur, Confirmatur, et Vindicatur (ibid. 1709):—Synagma Theologico-physics-methaphysicum (ibid. 1711):—Vindiciæ Veritatis quam Ecclesiæ Reformatæ Profitentur de Dependentiæ Actionum a Deo (ibid. 1713):—Summa Theologiæ Supernaturalis (ibid. 1716):—Exegesis Illustrum Locorum S. S. acced. Clavis Apocalyptica (ibid. 1720):—Disserit. in Præcipua Zachariæ Dicta (ibid. eod.):—Verklaaring van de Openbaringe van Joannes (Leeuwarden, 1726). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Vrienoet, Series Professorum Franequeranorum; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Andate (or Andraste), in British mythology, was a goddess of victory whom the ancient Britons are said to have worshipped. In the country of the Trinobantes (County of Essex) a large temple was built of unhewn trees for her worship, surrounded by spacious woods. The prisoners of war were taken there and slain.

Andelot, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Andelaense), near Langres, was summoned by Guntram, king of Orleans (at a meeting to ratify a compact, also made at Andelot, between himself and Childebert, November 28 or 29, 567), for March 1, 568, but nothing further is recorded of it, and possibly it was never held at all (Greg. Turon. Hist. Fr. ix, 20; Mansi, ix, 967-970).

Andéol de Lodève (ANDEOLUS LICTAVIENSIS), a Capuchin monk of Lyons (where he died in 1653), was a missionary apostolic, and signalized himself by his zeal against the Calvinists, Anabaptists, and other heretics. He is the author of, Summa Doctrina Christianæ quam Docet Ecclesia Catholico-Romana, cum Brevariario Errorum et Hæresium quas Docet Ecclesia Præterita Reformatæ Calvinistarum (Lyons, 1638):—Collatio Amica inter duos Gallos, quorum unus est Catholicus, alter Calvinista, circa Fidei Materias Controversas (ibid. 1637):—Interrogationes Justæ ac Rationalibiles, quas Catholici Faciunt Calvini Sectariis, ad eos ab Erroribus Liberandos, et a Morte Æterna Revocandos (Tournon, 1638):—Adoratio Veri Dei, in qua Ostenditur quod Calvinistæ Gravissime Errant, dum Christum Dicunt non esse Adorandum in Sacramento Altaris, neque Colendas esse Imagines (ibid. 1639):—Monita Amica Sectariis Calvinisticæ Religionis (Lyons, 1640). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, supplement vol., s. v.; Bernhard, a Bononia, Bibl. Capuccinorum; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v. (B. P.)

Andeölus (or Andiolus), saint and martyr (vulgarly called St. Anduch or Andeux), preached the Gospel at Carpentras and other places in Viennese Gaul. The emperor Severus, on his journey to England in 208, condemned him to death, and caused him to have his head split open by a wooden sword at Bergoiate, near the Rhone. See Baillet, May 1.

Ander, in Zendic mythology, was the second of the wicked Darvands. He was considered by them to be the same deity as the Indra of the Vedas, but of an opposite or evil character.

Anderiot (or Handeriot), FRANÇOIS, a Parisian engraver, was born in 1665, and practiced both in France and Italy, especially in Rome. The most important of his works are, a Magdalene, a Madonna, and a Bambino, after Guido:—the Holy Family, with a Rose, after Raphael:—two Annunciations, after Albano:—the Good Samaritan, after Poussin:—the Crowning with Thorns, after Domenichino:—and the same after A. Caracci.

Anderloni, Faustino, an Italian engraver, was born at Brescia. In 1786 and 1794 he executed portraits of the distinguished Herder, Carlo Porta, and Schiller; afterwards he executed a beautiful plate of the Dying Magdalene, by Correggio:—the Repose in Egypt, by N. Poussin:—and Mater Amabilis, by Sassoterrato.

Anderloni, Pietro, a distinguished Italian engraver, brother of the preceding, was born in 1784. He studied under his brother and also F. Palazzi. He was in the school of Longhi nine years. He assisted that master in the production of many of his admirable works, among which was Ezekiel's Vision, after Raphael. He visited Rome in 1824, for the second time, to make drawings of the Heliodorus and Attila of Raphael. His principal works are, Moses Defending the Daughters of Midian, after N. Poussin:—The Adoration of the Shepherds, after Titian:—a Holy Family:—Heliodorus:—Flight of Attila:—St. John.

Anderson, Abraham, D.D., an Associate minister, was born near Newville, Cumberland Co., Pa., Dec. 7, 1789. He served as a soldier in the war of 1812-13, and on his return in the latter year he entered Jefferson College, where he studied four years, and graduated in 1817. He then began the study of theology, first under the direction of Dr. John Anderson for five months, then under the general direction of the presbytery for three years, at the same time pursuing a medical course under Dr. Letherman. In 1818 he was chosen professor of languages in Jefferson College, and retained the position until 1821. In October of that year he was licensed, and, after itinerating about two months in Pennsylvania and Ohio, he was sent by the synod into the Southern States, where he was soon settled as pastor at Steele Creek and Bethany, N. C. In 1831 he came North on account of his health, and preached at Hebron, N. Y., for some time; but returning to Carolina in 1832, he found himself in an embarrassing position on account of the slavery agitation then going on, and was accordingly settled as pastor at Hebron in the summer of 1833. In 1847 he was elected professor in the theological seminary of the Associate Church at Canonsburg, Pa., and professor extraordinary of Hebrew in Jefferson College, which positions, in connection with the collegiate charge of the congregation at Miller's Run, he held until the close of life. He died May 9, 1855. He published a few pamphlets. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 107.

Anderson, Alexander, A.M., a minister of the Free Church of Scotland, was converted in 1850. He lived five years after; and they were five years of such holy zeal, such heavenly piety, such earnest love for Christ, that, young as he was when taken from the world, he has left a trail of light in the Church militant through which he passed to heaven. See Christian Observer, March, 1859.

Anderson, George M., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Chesterfield County, Va., Aug. 20, 1799, of pious parents, who early instructed him in religion. He experienced conversion when about fourteen, and in 1818 united with the Virginia Conference, wherein he served the Church faithfully until 1825, when he superannuated, which relation he held until his decease, Dec. 7, 1833. Mr. Anderson was zealous, acceptable, and successful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1834, p. 278.

Anderson, Henry, an English Methodist preacher, father of the Rev. John Anderson, was born at East Sutton, Yorkshire, in 1766. He early participated in the frivolity and dissipation characteristic of the neighborhood, and it was not until his twentieth year that he was converted under Methodist preaching. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1791, and labored incessantly until 1832, when the Conference granted him a super-numerary relation. He resided for some years in Gainsborough. In 1840 he removed to Hull, where he died, Jan. 31, 1843. Mr. Anderson was a studious, pious, and affectionate man. See Wesleyan Meth. Mag. 1847, p. 521; Minutes of British Conference, 1843.

Anderson, Isaac, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Rockbridge County, Va., March 26, 1780. At the age of twenty he united with the Presbyterian Church; and in 1802 was licensed to preach by the Union Presbytery, and was ordained and installed pastor of Washington Church, Knox Co., Tenn., where he labored successfully for nine years. In 1811 he accepted a call to the New Providence Church, Maryville, Tenn., where he performed the principal part of the labors of his life. He died Jan. 28, 1857. He was a man of commanding power, of glowing zeal, and untiring and successful industry. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 55.

Anderson, James (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Scotland, Nov. 17, 1678, and was ordained by the Irvine Presbytery Nov. 17, 1708, with a view to his settlement in Virginia, America. He sailed March 6, 1709, and arrived in the Rappahannock April 22; but the state of things not warranting his stay, he came northward, and was received by the Presbytery on Sept. 20, and settled at Newcastle. In 1714 he was directed to supply the people of Kent County monthly on a Sabbath, and also to spend a Sabbath at Cedar Creek, in Sussex. In 1717 he was called to labor in New York city. Public worship was held in the City Hall. Troubles arose, and the Synod in 1726 pronounced his conduct unjustifiable, and wrote to the ministers in Boston not to countenance him. He was called, Sept. 24, 1726, to Donegal, on the Susquehanna, and accepted. In September, 1729, he gave every fifth Sabbath to the people on the Swatara, and joined the congregation of Derry. The Presbytery of Donegal held its first meeting on Oct. 11, 1732, and Anderson was one of the four members. In 1738 the Presbytery sent Anderson to wait on the Virginia government and solicit its favor in behalf of their interest there. He performed his mission satisfactorily. Mr. Anderson died July 16, 1740. He was a man high in esteem for circumspection, diligence, and faithfulness as a Christian minister. See Webster, Hist. of the Presb. Church in Amer. (1857); Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 19.

Anderson, James (2), an English Wesleyan minister, was born in 1767. He entered the itinerancy in 1789; labored in Scotland, the Isle of Man, as well as on several circuits in England; became a supernumerary in Liverpool in 1828; and died April 13, 1840. See Minutes of British Conference, 1840.

Anderson, James (3), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Washington County, Pa., in 1802. His academical training was received in Warren County, O., and he graduated at the Washington College, Pa., in 1826. His first year in theological study was under the Rev. John Anderson, D.D., and his second year was spent in the Western Theological Seminary. He was licensed to preach in 1828, and travelled and labored as a financial agent for the seminary, and also for a time as a missionary for the American Tract Society in Ohio, Virginia, and Kentucky. In 1831 he settled as pastor of the churches of Rushville and New Baltimore, Fairfield Co., O. In the fall of 1850 the Presbytery of Zanesville elected Mr. Anderson as principal of the Miller Academy at Washington, Guernsey Co. In 1852 he resigned this position, and removed to Utica, where he became the stated supply of the churches of Mount Pleasant and Bladensburg. In 1854 Mr. Anderson removed to Lexington, O., serving the Church there. Next he went to the Belleville, Bloomfield, and Ontario churches, serving them for a brief time. In 1864 Mr. Anderson closed his labors in Ohio, and removed to Iowa, made himself a home, organized the West Union and Bethel churches, and resuscitated the South Wales Church. He died Jan. 21, 1871, at Stelapolis, Ia. See Presbyterian, Feb. 11 and June 3, 1871.

Anderson, John (1), D.D., an Associate minister, was born in England, near the Scotch border, about 1748. After completing the usual course of studies, he was licensed by the Associate or Secession Church of Scotland, but on account of a weak voice and hesitating manner his pulpit services were not acceptable. He came to America in 1783, arriving in Philadelphia some time in August. He spent several years in preaching in various sections of this country, and in 1788 he crossed the Alleghany Mountains and preached to congregations in Beaver County, Pa. He was ordained in Philadelphia Oct. 31, 1788, preached awhile in Eastern Pennsylvania, and in 1789 returned to the scene of his former labors. He was settled as pastor over the congregations of Mill Creek and Harman's Creek, Beaver Co., in 1792. He was chosen professor of theology for the Associate Church during the same year. "A small two-story log building was erected on the farm on which he lived for the accommodation of his theological students. A library was also collected, consisting of about a thousand volumes of rare and valuable works, most of which were donations from the brethren of the Associate Church in Scotland. In his office of professor he continued until the spring of 1819, when, owing to the infirmities of age, he resigned." He still attended to the duties of the pastoral office until his death, which occurred April 6, 1830. The number of students under his care was usually five or six, and perhaps never exceeded ten. His chief employment as a professor was in reading Marck's Medulla Theologicæ. These he enlarged on each repetition of them until they became so voluminous that, although he read each day of the week except Monday and Saturday from the middle of the day till from three to five o'clock during the four months of the session, he was not able, with his last class, to finish the whole system during the four years of their attendance. Among his publications are, Essays on Various Subjects relative to the Present State of Religion (Glasgow, 1782);—A Discourse on the Divine Ordinance of Singing Praise (Phila. 1793);—The Scripture Doctrine of the Appropriation, etc. (eod.);—Vindiciæ Cantus Dominici (1800);—Precious Truth (1806);—and a Series of Dialogues on Church Communion (Pittsburgh, 1820). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 17.

Anderson, John (2), an eloquent Wesleyan minister of England, was born at Gibraltar, Spain, where his father was garrisoned, Jan. 28, 1791. He entered the Methodist Society in 1808, the ministry in 1812; travelled many of the prominent circuits, such as Reading (1819), Manchester (1821), London, West (1824), City Road (1827), Leeds (1830), Manchester (1833), Leeds, West (1835), and Liverpool, North; and died in Liverpool, after severe suffering, April 11, 1840. Anderson was one of the eminent men of the Methodism of his time, to the principles of which he was most firmly attached. He preferred the charges against Dr. S. Warren in 1834, and his name was prominent in that celebrated case. He was tender and ardent in his friendships, fervent in his piety, and zealously devoted to the duties of his calling. Few men of his time exceeded him in the eloquence and power of his pulpit and platform efforts. A speech he delivered at Leeds in 1830 on the abolition of slavery was pronounced by Lord (then Mr.) Brougham as the most eloquent and masterly he had ever heard on that subject. He is the subject of the third sketch in Everett's 2d vol. of Wesleyan Takings. He published a Sermon, on the death of Adam Clarke (Leeds, 1832). See Minutes of British Conference, 1840; Wesleyan Meth. Mag. 1846, p. 417, 521; West, Sketches of Wesleyan Preachers, p. 322-335.

Anderson, John (3), an English Congregational minister, was born at Burnham Market, Norfolk, Feb. 22, 1797, and was trained "in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." He was admitted into fellowship with the Church in 1816, and became much engaged in preaching in the neighboring villages. Mr. Anderson entered Hoxton College in 1817. In 1821 he commenced preaching at Market Rasen, Lincolnshire, and in 1824 was ordained first pastor of the Church in that place. In 1826 he accepted a call from the Church at Dorchester. In 1840 he removed to Caistor, Lincolnshire, and in 1852 to Wymondham, in his native county, where he labored until his death, Sept. 5, 1866. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1867, p. 268.

Anderson, John (4), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Frederick County, Md., Dec. 24, 1803. He removed early in life to Pennsylvania, was converted in 1829, and in 1834 entered the Baltimore Conference. In 1839 he was transferred to the Missouri Conference. Upon the adhesion of the Missouri Conference to the Church South, he declined to accompany it, but labored, under the direction of the bishops, in Illinois until the Conference was reorganized. In 1854 he was retransferred to the Baltimore Conference, and upon its division in 1857 he became a member of the East Baltimore Conference, and continued such until his decease, Sept. 10, 1867. As a preacher, Mr. Anderson was clear, earnest, and successful; as a man, cheerful, and a favorite among the masses. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 28.

Anderson, John A., an English Congregational minister, was born in the parish of Clatt, Aberdeenshire, May 20, 1833. He was brought to a decision for Christ in his nineteenth year. He attended for one session at King's College, Aberdeen, and then entered the Theological Hall. Here he continued four years, attending also the classes at Edinburgh University. In 1858 Mr. Anderson was ordained over the Church in Kilsyth, where he labored for a year or more with great earnestness and success, and then, becoming suddenly ill, was called, Oct. 9, 1859, to his reward. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1860, p. 175.

Anderson, John Henry, son of the Rev. John Anderson, now of the British Conference, and grandson of the Rev. Henry Anderson (died 1843), was born at Oakham, Rutland, England, July 4, 1841. He spent six years at Kingswood School. He was accepted for the ministry in 1861. In consequence of failing health, he undertook a voyage to the Mauritius. He became worse in the southern seas, died Jan. 2, 1880, and his body was committed to the deep. His imagination was vigorous, and his discourses were marked by freshness of thought and originality of style, while they were richly evangelical. In the pastorate he was faithful and sympathetic. He labored on some of the most important circuits of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection. See Minutes of British Conference, 1880.

Anderson, Joseph R., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the Diocese of Michigan, was assistant minister in 1864 of St. John's Church, Detroit, Mich.; in 1865 was rector of St. Luke's Church, Kalamazoo, Mich.; in 1870 was rector of Zion Church, Pontiac, in which pastorate he remained until his death. He died May 26, 1874, aged thirty-six years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 145.

Anderson, J. Rush, M.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Montgomery County, Pa., in 1824. He was led to Christ at the age of thirteen; was remarkable from early childhood for his piety; graduated at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia; and in 1844 entered the Philadelphia Conference, in which he labored with diligence and success until his death, Nov. 8, 1863. Dr. Anderson was genial in spirit, honest, frank, decided, faithful, able, and more zealous than physically strong. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1864, p. 26.

Anderson, Patrick, an English Congregational minister, was born at Peterhead, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, in April, 1806. He was blessed with a loving, cheerful, and pious home. He received the elements of a good education in his native town, and in 1820 removed to Aberdeen, and received an academical training at Marischal College. On leaving in 1824, having taken his degree of A.M., he resolved to devote himself to the ministry, and proceeded, after spending a session at the University of Edinburgh, to London, where in 1825 he became a student at Homerton College. After completing his curriculum, he spent a few years at Rudgeley, Staffordshire, supplying the vacant pulpit of the Congregational Church. Mr. Anderson was ordained in April, 1838, to the pastorate of the Congregational Church of New Lanark, on the banks of the Clyde. Here he lived and labored till his death, July 11, 1868. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1869, p. 237.

Anderson, Robert, a Congregational minister, was born in 1817, in England probably. "In the year 1849 he and other fellow-laborers accompanied Dr. Lang in the 'Clifton' to Australia." On arriving at Melbourne, Mr. Anderson was informed of the call for help in a ministerial line at Van Diemen's Land, whither he at once proceeded. For a time he was engaged in supplying the pulpit at Collins Street Chapel, Hobart Town; and afterwards engaged as a colonial missionary in the Richmond district. In June, 1852, he removed to Victoria, and became pastor of Kyneton, where he remained till his death, June 18, 1855. Many are the trophies which he won for Christ. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1856, p. 208.

Anderson, Rufus, Sr., a Congregational minister, was born at Londonderry, N. H., March 5, 1765. His preparation for college was made under Rev. Dr. Morrison, and in 1791 he graduated at Dartmouth College. His theological studies were prosecuted under Rev. Joseph M'Keen, his brother-in-law, the first president of Bowdoin College. After candidating for some time, he was ordained pastor of the Second Church in North Yarmouth, Me., Oct. 22, 1794. For nearly ten years he remained in this charge, when his inadequate support and impaired health compelled him to ask for a dismission. His next pastorate began in Wenham, Mass., June 10, 1805, and he continued to preach until the latter part of 1813. He died at Wenham Feb. 11, 1814. Although he had collected materials for a History of Missions, he did not complete his work. He was considered a very able minister. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 361.

Anderson, Rufus, Jr., D.D., LL.D., a Congregational minister, son of the preceding, was born at North Yarmouth, Me., Aug. 17, 1796. He graduated at Bowdoin College in 1818, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1822. During the next two years he was an assistant of the secretary of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions; and from 1824 to 1832 held the office of assistant secretary. From 1832 to 1866 he was foreign secretary of the same organization. During this period of service he twice visited the Levant—in 1828–29 and in 1845; in 1854–55 he visited India, Syria, and Turkey, and in 1863 the Hawaiian Islands. He was a fellow of the American Oriental Society. He died at Roxbury, Mass., May 30, 1880. Besides the many sermons, tracts, and papers which he published, as secretary of the American Board, he issued other works of value, among which may be mentioned the first Christian Almanac (1818):—Peloponnesus and the Greek Islands (1828):—Irish Missions in the Early Ages (1839):—The Work of Missions Progressive (1840):—Bartimeus, the Blind Preacher of Manai (1851):—Missions in the Levant (1860):—The Hawaiian Islands (1864):—Synopsis of Lectures on Missions (1869), delivered at Andover Theological Seminary:—Foreign Missions; their Relations and Claims (1869):—History of the Sandwich Islands Mission (1870):—History of the Missions of the Amer. Board of Com. for For. Missions to the Oriental Churches (1872, 2 vols.):—History of the India Mission (1874). See Cong. Year-book, 1881, p. 16.

Anderson, Samuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Norway, May 3, 1824. He emigrated to Chicago, Ill., in 1849; soon after was powerfully converted, and in 1853 began his itinerant career in connection with the Wisconsin Conference. His physical constitution was never strong, and undue exertion in protracted meetings in his last mission, Primrose, caused his death, March 16, 1860. Mr. Anderson was a scholar, speaking four languages readily. As a preacher, he was logical, eloquent, pathetic. He possessed a vast amount of theological lore, and a burning zeal for the salvation of his countrymen. He did gigantic work in Wisconsin and Minnesota for the Church. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 266; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Anderson, Samuel James Pierce, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Virginia, and spent the early part of his ministerial life as pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Norfolk, Va. After resigning this charge, he went to St. Louis, Mo., where he was successful in building up a strong Church, which remains as a memorial of his labors. He died near St. Louis in 1873. See Presbyterian, Sept. 29, 1873. (W. P. S.)

Anderson, Thomas (1), a Presbyterian minister, was born in Cumberland County, Pa., Jan. 1, 1791. At the age of eighteen he became a member of the Presbyterian Church, Neshannock, Mercer Co., Pa. His early life was one of great trial. He studied Latin and Greek partly at home, partly at Greensburg Academy, sometimes teaching, sometimes laboring with his hands, until he was fitted for college. He graduated at Washington College, Pa., 1820. After graduating, he removed to the town of Mercer, and took charge of the academy in that place. He taught for five years, paid off his college debts, and pursued his theological studies under the directions of Mr. Tait. He was licensed to preach by the Presbytery of Erie, Dec. 28, 1825; began his ministerial labors regularly at Concord, Venango Co., Pa., May 7, 1826; was ordained by the Presbytery of Erie Sept. 19 of the same year, and installed as pastor. At the division of the Presbytery in 1838, Mr. Anderson adhered to the New School. In 1843 he removed to Huntington, Ind., where he organized a Church in November of that year. He was released from this charge Jan. 9, 1848, and died Dec. 22, 1853. See Hist. of Presbyterianism in Erie.

Anderson, Thomas (2), an English Congregational minister, was born in London, May 10, 1799. At the age of eleven he was left an orphan, and went to live with an uncle at Bath. He was converted at the age of fifteen. In 1816 Mr. Anderson entered Cheshunt College, and in 1819 he was engaged in supplying Zion Chapel, Dover, and other places in the connection. He was ordained in 1821 at Ebley, and his first charge was at Kidderminster, from which place he removed to Zion Chapel. At the close of fifteen years' labor in this place, feeble health compelled his resignation. His death occurred Nov. 30, 1875. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 341.

Anderson, Walter, D.D., a Scotch clergyman, was for fifty years minister of Chirnside, and died June 2, 1800. He published, The History of France (1769-83, 5 vols. 4to):—and The Philosophy of Ancient Greece Investigated (Edinb. 1791). See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.; Fasts Scotc. i, 426.

Anderson, William (1), was an English Congregational missionary to South Africa for more than half a century. He arrived at the Cape of Good Hope in September, 1800, with the late Rev. James Read of the Kat River Settlement. Mr. Anderson commenced the Griqua Mission in 1801, and formed the station in Griqua Town in 1804. He remained in this position for sixteen years, and then (1820) removed to the Caledon Institution. Subsequently he was removed to Pacaltsdorp, where he continued to labor honorably and successfully for thirty years. His exact age at death is not known, but he must have verged on eighty years. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1854, p. 217.

Anderson, William (2), a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Madison County, Va., Jan. 4, 1803. He grew up in ignorance and sin; experienced conversion in his sixteenth year; received license to preach in 1823; was for several years a member of the Virginia Conference, and became a member of the Georgia Conference on its organization. Subsequently he superannuated, and, after suffering for years with paralysis, died in 1859. Mr. Anderson was richly endowed with native intellect, and employed it vigorously in expounding the doctrines of the Cross. His pure and upright example was a vast power for good. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1859, p. 146.

Anderson, William (3), a minister in the Free Methodist Church, was born at Enniskillen, Ireland, March 30, 1825. He was brought to Canada East when three years of age; was converted at the age of thirteen; went to Illinois in August, 1865, and united soon after with the Free Methodist Church in St. Charles, and the following year was received into the Illinois Annual Conference. He died at Belvidere, Boone Co., Ill., Aug. 4, 1868. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the F. M. Church, 1868, p. 54.

Anderson, William B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Livingston, Ill., Sept. 5, 1837. He experienced conversion in his ninth year; was appointed class-leader when but sixteen; received license to exhort two years later, to preach in his twentieth year, and in 1858 entered the Illinois Conference. He fell at his post in Havana, Ill., March 23, 1868. Mr. Anderson was a successful preacher. About five hundred conversions witness the genuineness of his call to preach. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 211.

Anderson, William C., D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was a member of the Presbytery of New Albany. For some years he was president of Miami University, O., and was afterwards pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, San Francisco, Cal. His health being frail, he lived in retirement in Germantown, near Philadelphia. He died at Junction City, Kan., Aug. 28, 1870. See Presbyterian, Sept. 3, 1870.

Anderson, William R., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ross County, O., June 21, 1810. He was converted in his fourteenth year; received license to preach in 1836, and entered the travelling connection of the Ohio Conference, in which he labored faithfully until his death, Feb. 25, 1846. Mr. Anderson was deeply and fervently pious. His abilities were above the average. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1846, p. 75.

Andeshan, in Chaldæo-Persian religious worship, was the name of the first sacrificial high-priest, whom Nimrod appointed to the service of his fire-worship. It is said to have been he who, upon Nimrod's command, threw Abraham into the fiery oven when the latter sought to convert the king from his idolatry to the true worship. But the fire did not consume the holy man, and this miracle converted even the heart of the hardened priest.

Andeux (or Andiolus), St. See ANDEOLUS.

Andhatasmira, in Hindû mythology, is one of the twenty-one subdivisions of the Nark, or hell of the Hindûs, of which the dark god Jema is manager, who sees all the deeds of men through a glass.

Andhrimmer, in Norse mythology, is the cook who prepares the boar in Walhalla for Einheriar. His cooking-vessel is called Eldhrimmer, and is so large that all the gods can be plentifully supplied by it in one meal. The boar possesses the characteristic that every evening, after he has been devoured, he comes to life again from the remaining bones, so that on the following day he may be killed and eaten again.

Andlangur (the far-reaching), in Norse mythology, is the name of a heaven which is higher than the heaven of the Asas, and lies south of it. Into this heaven the deities will go at the end of the world.

Andochius (or Andocius), saint and martyr, was a priest and disciple of St. Polycarp of Smyrna, and was sent by him to preach the Gospel to the Gauls. When in the country about Autun, he was denounced to the governor of the province as having been taken in the performance of his priestly functions at Sedeloc, or Sanlieu. By order of the governor he was flogged, beaten to death with clubs, and thrown into the fire. This happened under Marcus Aurelius. His festival is kept on Sept. 24. See Baillet, Sept. 24.

Andrada, Alfonso de, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Toledo in 1590. He was a member of the college of St. Bernard at Toledo, and taught philosophy at the Athenaeum of that place. He was sent on a mission to the Indies, and found time to write more than thirty volumes, of which Nicholas Antonio gave the titles, and of which the greater part have been published. He died at Madrid in 1658. We notice some of his works, as follows: El Buen Soldado Católico, y sus Obligaciones (Madrid, 1642):—El Estudiante Perfecto, y sus Obligaciones (ibid. 1643):—Itinerario Historial que debe guardar al Hombre para Caminar al Cielo (ibid. 1648, 1667):—Idea del Perfecto Prelado, y Vida del Cardenal Arzobispo de Toledo, Don Baltazar de Moscoso y Sandoval (ibid. 1658):—Varones Ilustres de Cumpañia de Jesus (ibid. 1672). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andrada, Diego Lopez de, a celebrated Portuguese preacher, was born in June, 1565, at Azambria, in the district of Santerem. He entered the Augustine order, and distinguished himself as a preacher in the principal cities of Spain and Portugal. Philip IV appointed him archbishop of Otranto, in the vice-realm of Naples. He died in June, 1635. The works of Andrada, consisting of sermons, homilies, discourses, and theological treatises, were published in three volumes by Gregorio Rodriguez (Madrid, 1656). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andrada, Francisco Rades, a Spanish priest of the Order of Calatrava, lived at the end of the 16th century, and wrote a Chronicle of the Orders of St. Jago, Calatrava, and Alcantara (Toledo, 1572).

André de SAINT-NICOLAS, a French Carmelite friar, was born at Remiremont, in Lorraine, about 1650, and died at Besançon in 1713. He wrote, De Lapide Sepulchrali, Antiqua Burgundo-Sequanorum Comitibus, Vesuntione, in Sancti Joannis Evangelistae Basilica recens Posito (Besançon, 1693):—Lettres en Forme de Dissertation sur la Prétendue Découverte de la Ville d'Antre en Franche-Comté (Dijon, Micard, 1698). The author here combats the opinion of Dunod upon the situation of the ancient city of Avenches, near Lake Antre and Moirons. Several other MSS. of this friar are preserved in the Library of Besançon. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andre, John George, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Michlen, duchy of Nassau, Germany, Aug. 22, 1828. He emigrated to New Orleans in 1846, and in the following spring settled in Louisville, Ky. In 1848 he was converted; in 1850 received license to preach; and six years later entered the travelling connection of the South-west German Conference, and in it continued faithful until 1863, when hemorrhage of the lungs compelled him to retire. He died Aug. 19, 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 81.

André, Yves Marie, a French Jesuit, was born May 22, 1675, at Châteaulin, in Lower Brittany, and settled at Caen, where he was professor regius of mathematics from 1726 to 1759. He died Feb. 26, 1764. He is chiefly known by Essai sur la Beau, of which a new edition was given in the collection of his works in 1766

(5 vols. 12mo). His Traité sur l'Homme is highly esteemed.

Andrea of ANELLINO, St., an Italian ecclesiastic, was born at Castro Nuovo, in the kingdom of Naples, in 1521. He practiced the profession of advocate in the ecclesiastical court of Naples, which he left in order to consecrate himself entirely to the Brotherhood of the Theatines. The reforms which he introduced into this order raised a strong opposition against him, in the midst of which he died, exhausted by fatigue and old-age, in 1608. He was canonized in 1712 by Clement XI. Naples and Sicily chose him as one of their patrons. His religious works were printed in five vols. (Naples, 1733-34), and his Letters in two vols. (ibid. 1732). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andrea, priest and canon of BERGAMO, lived near the close of the 9th century. He wrote a History from the time of the entry of the Lombards into Italy down to the death of the emperor Louis II, about A.D. 874. This History was published by Muratori in vol. i of his Antiquitates Italicae. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andrea, monk of VALLOMBROSA, and priest of San Fedele di Strami, in the diocese of Arezzo, was at Parma in 1061; then at Cadolo, and simoniacal bishop of this see; and was elected pope in opposition to Alexander II. Andrea was strongly opposed in this election, and was banished by the clergy. He died in 1106. He wrote, Sancti Arialdi Vita (inserted in Puricelli's De Sanctis Martyribus, etc. [Milan, 1657]):—Epistolæ ad Lyrum, Presbyterum Mediolanensem:—Vita Sancti Johannis Gualberti (in vol. iii of the Acta Sanct.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andrea, Antonio, an Arragonese, a Franciscan friar, and a disciple of Scotus, flourished about the beginning of the 14th century. He wrote, among other works, a treatise on the Principles of Gilbert de la Porée (Venice, 1512, 1517).

Andrea, Giovanni Antonio, bishop of Aleria, in Corsica, was born at Vigevano in 1417, and was the friend of the celebrated cardinal Nicolas Cusa, who advanced him to the post of secretary to the apostolic library, or librarian at the Vatican. He was particularly instrumental in introducing the art of printing into Italy and fixing it at Rome. He died in 1475, or, according to Trithemius, in 1493. He is known to the literary world not so much for his original compositions as by the care he bestowed in superintending many valuable works when the invention of printing was introduced at Rome by those celebrated printers Conrad Sweynheym and Arnold Pannartz. The works he superintended were, in 1468-9, Epistolæ Ciceronis ad Familiæres, Hieronymi Epistolæ, and editions of Julius Cæsar, Livy, Virgil, Lucan, Aulus Gellius, Apuleius:—and in 1470-1, Lactantius, Cicero's Orations, Cyprian, Ovid's Metam., Pliny, Quintilian, etc.

Andrea, Giovanni d', a famous Italian canonist of the 14th century, was born at Mugello, near Florence, and went to Bologna and studied under Guy de Baif. In the year 1330 he was professor at Padua, but was soon recalled to Bologna, where he acquired the highest reputation. He died of the plague at Bologna in the year 1348. Among his best works were his Gloss upon the Sixth Book of the Decretals (Rome, 1476, and five editions afterwards at Pavia, Basle, and Venice) and Glosses upon the Clementines (Strasburg, 1471). He enlarged the Speculum of Durant in 1347.

Andrea Pisano, a distinguished Italian sculptor and architect, was born at Pisa in 1270, and studied under Nicola and Giovanni Pisano. Andrea was employed at the Duomo of Pisa as one of the assistants, under Giovanni, and after this he was employed to execute some small figures in marble for the Church of Santa Maria al Ponte at Pisa. His success in these works led to his being invited to Florence to assist in completing the façade of the Cathedral of Santa Maria del Fiore. He executed two marble statues of St. Peter and St. Paul, which were placed in the façade. As an architect, he designed the Castle of Scarperia, the Arsenal at Venice, and the Church of San Giovanni. He died in 1345.

Andréa, Samuel, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born in 1640 at Dantzic. He studied at Heidelberg and Groningen, and in 1665 was appointed professor of Greek and philosophy at Herborn. In 1674 he was called to Marburg, where he died, Jan. 6, 1699. His numerous writings are given by Jöcher and Adelung, as well as in Niedner's Hessische Gelehrten-geschichte, i, 44 sq. See also Tholuck, Akademisches Leben des 17ten Jahrhunderts, ii, 293; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Andreani, ANDREA, a Mantuan painter and engraver, was born, according to Brulliot, in 1560; by others he is supposed to have been born in 1540. He is little known as a painter. The following are a few of his principal works: Pharaoh's Host Destroyed in the Red Sea and the Adoration of the Magi, after Parmigiano (1585):—the Virgin and Child, with St. John presenting a bird and a female saint holding a lily, after Giacomo Ligozzi:—Christ Curing the Leper and Christ Curing the Paralytic, after Franco de Nauto da Sabaudia:—and The Triumph of the Church.

Andreas BARBATUS (so called from his long beard), a celebrated civil and canon lawyer of the 15th century, was born in Sicily, from which place he went to study at Bologna, where he attracted the admiration of every one. His memory is said to have been so retentive that he could remember everything that he read, and could repeat off-hand two hundred arguments proposed to him, with his answers. In law he had so vast a reputation that he was called "the Monarch of the Laws." He was present at the Council of Basle, and died about 1476, leaving many works on the civil and canon law. See Mongitore, Bibl. Sic. vol. i.

Andreas, bishop of CÆSAREA, in Cappadocia, flourished about A.D. 500. He wrote a Commentary on the Apocalypse, which is extant in Greek and Latin among the works of Chrysostom. He also wrote Therapeutica Spiritualis, of which only some fragments remain. See Mosheim, Hist. of the Church, bk. ii, cent. v, pt. ii, ch. ii.

Andreas, a celebrated archbishop of LUND, in Sweden, while young travelled through Germany, Italy, France, and England, and on his return was appointed chancellor of Canute VI, who sent him to Rome to plead the cause of his sister, who, without sufficient motive, had been divorced by Philip II, king of France. Andreas pleaded the cause of the queen so well that the pope, Celestine III, obliged king Philip to receive her back again. Returning to Rome, Andreas was seized by the French in Burgundy and detained for some time. After his release, he was elected archbishop of Lund and primate of Denmark, and confirmed in this by pope Innocent III in 1201. After the death of Canute, in 1203, Andreas crowned his brother, Waldemar II, his successor. He accompanied him in his crusade against the Livonians. On account of his age and infirmities, he retired to an island (Insula Ivenis of Moller), where he died, June 24, 1228. He made a Latin translation of the Laws of Skåne (published by Huitfeld, Copenhagen, 1590):—wrote The Laws of Zealand (published in Danish by Huitfeld, ibid.):—Iezameron, a Latin poem on the six days of the creation:—On the Seven Sacraments, a poem. These two poems have been preserved in manuscript in the archives of the Cathedral of Lund. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andreas von STAFFELSTEIN, a German Benedictine of the Monastery of St. Michael at Bamberg, died in 1502. He wrote, Chronicon Monasterii Sancti Michaelis prope Bambergam (in MS. at the Library of Munich):—Opus Ingens de Sanctis et Viris Illustribus Ordinis Sancti Benedicti (in MS. at Munich; an extract of it is found in Pez, Theaurus; an Italian translation has been found in Maffei, Vite di XVII Confessori di Cristo). Ziegelbauer mentions a number of other works in MS. at Bamberg and other libraries. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andreoli, GIORGIO, an Italian sculptor and delft-painter, settled in Gubbio in 1498. He painted many beautiful designs upon table-service, and executed in this material two beautiful bass-reliefs for altar-pieces—one for the Church of San Domenico, and the other for the house-chapel of the Bentivogli family. He was living in 1552.

Andres, Antonio, a Franciscan monk of Spain, native of Tauste, in Arragon, lived near the close of the 13th century or at the commencement of the 14th. He was a zealous partisan, and one of the best commentators of his master, John Duns Scotus. The insinuating manner in which he taught the doctrines of his master gained for him the surname of "Doctor Dulciffusus." He wrote, Commentarius in Artem Veterem Aristotelis, scilicet in Isagogen Porphyris, Prædicamenta et post Prædicamenta Aristotelis (Venice, 1477):—Questiones super XII Libros Metaphysicæ (ibid. 1491):—In Quatuor Libros Sententiarum (ibid. 1572, 1578). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andres, Johann Baptist, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Königshofen, in Würzburg, Aug. 11, 1768. He studied at Würzburg, where he was made doctor of philosophy. In 1798 he was appointed licentiate of theology, and, in order to enlarge his knowledge, travelled extensively, visiting the different universities on his journey. In 1803 he was appointed professor at Würzburg; and he accepted in the following year a call to Salzburg, where he remained till 1813. In this year he was called to Landshut, where he died, Sept. 26, 1823. He wrote, Præmissæ Origines Impedimentorum Matrimonii inter Christianos Dirimentium. Quas pro Consequenda Doctoratus Theologici Licentia Præsidæ, etc. (Würzburg, 1798). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 10 sq. (B. P.)

Andres, Johann Bonaventura, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, May 29, 1743. At a very early age he joined the Order of the Jesuits, and after it was abolished in 1773 he entered the clerical seminary at Würzburg, where, on presenting a dissertation, he was made licentiate of theology. In 1774 he received holy orders; was appointed in 1775 professor of rhetoric at the gymnasium in Würzburg, and in 1783 professor of philosophy at the university there, where he also lectured on homiletics and pedagogics. He died as doctor of theology and director of the gymnasium of Würzburg and Münsterstadt, May 16, 1822. He published, Principia Fidei (Würzburg, 1774):—Magazin für Prediger (ibid. 1789-93, 4 vols.):—Archiv für Kirchen- und Schulwesen (ibid. 1804 sq. 2 vols.). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 12 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. ii, 42. (B. P.)

Andreucci, ANDREA GERONIMO, an Italian Jesuit, born at Viterbo in 1684, was much in the employment of the bishop of Pavia, and wrote many works, among them De Sacrosanctæ Usm Eucharistiæ crebrius aut rarius Laicis Concedendo (Rome, 1720):—The Life of St. Emidius, Bishop of Ascoli, in Italian (ibid. 1728):—De Episcopo Titulari Tractatus Canonico-theologicus (ibid. 1732):—Opuscula Moralia de Eucharistia (ibid. 1733), in four parts:—De Dignitate, Officio, ac Privilegiis Cardinalium (ibid. 1734):—De Patriarchatu Antiocheno (ibid. 1735):—De Ritu Ambrosiano (ibid. 1738):—De Observandis ab Episcopo in Authentican- dis Reliquiis (ibid. 1739):—A Treatise upon Dreams, to prove that they mean nothing, and that it is superstitious, criminal, and dangerous to trace consequences to them (ibid. 1740, under the name of F. A. Gaffori).

Andrew, St. (the Apostle). A letter entitled The Priests and Deacons of Achaia, who are said to have been present at the martyrdom of St. Andrew the apostle, A.D. 59, and to have written an encyclical letter concerning his passion, is still extant in Latin, in Lipomannus and Surius, dated Nov. 30, and is defended by Bellarmine, Possevinus, and Labbe as genuine. Alexander Natalis (Hist. Eccles. I, x, 8) also boldly affirms its genuineness, but fails in his proof, for his argument rests upon the testimony of the fathers, whereas he cites none earlier than Etherius, bishop of Osma, Spain, in 789, while it is notorious that it was ranked among the apocryphal books by St. Philastrius of Bresse and popes Innocent I and Gelasius. An argument for its genuineness used by Baronius—viz., that parts of it are read by the Roman Church in the Office of St. Andrew—can hardly be entitled to any weight, since it cannot be denied that apocryphal and spurious writings have found their way into the breviary. Cave (Hist. Lit. vol. i) attributes the work to a monk of the Middle Ages. M. Wog, professor of ecclesiastical antiquities in the University of Leipsic, published (in 1749) a dissertation in defence of the authenticity of these acts, which he supposes to have been written in A.D. 67. See Baronius, A.D. 69, No. 34; Dupin, Hist. Eccles. i, 42.

ANDREW, St., FESTIVAL OF. This was anciently placed on the same level as the feast of St. Peter himself (Krazer, De Liturgiis, p. 529). His natal day is Nov. 30. The hymn Nunc Andree solennius for his festival is attributed to the Venerable Bede. Jerome's martyrology places his translation on Sept. 3, but others on May 9 or Feb. 5.

Andrew, saint and martyr, a tribune, who, together with many soldiers whom he had converted, suffered martyrdom about A.D. 297, under Galerius Maximianus, in Cilicia or Armenia. They are commemorated by the Greek and Roman churches Aug. 19. Their acts given by Surius and Metaphrastes are spurious. See Baillet, Aug. 19.

Andrew, a Scottish bishop, was promoted to the see of ARGYLE in 1304. He was living in 1327. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 286.

Andrew, a Scottish prelate, was elected bishop of CATHNESS in 1150, and was the first bishop of that see. He was bishop there in the reign of king David I, and was witness to a donation by this prince to the Monastery of Dunfermline, and was also witness to the same king's donation of Lochleven, etc., in the time of Robert bishop of St. Andrews. He was bishop there in the time of king William, and of Matthew, and the two Simons, bishops of Aberdeen, Moray, and Dunblane. He was also witness to the erection of the Monastery of Abroath. He was present at the Council of Northampton in 1176. He probably died Dec. 30, 1184. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 205.

Andrew, St., OF CRETE (or OF CHRYSUS), who lived sixty years later than Andreas Cretensis (q. v.), was also born in the island of Crete. When the emperor Constantine Copronymus published a decree against images, Andrew went to Constantinople, and boldly reproached him with his conduct, which so enraged the monarch that he ordered him to be hanged; but as Andrew was conveyed to the place of execution, a man wounded him so miserably in the foot that he died of this and other ill-usage. This happened in A.D. 761. The Greeks and Latins commemorate him on Oct. 17. See Baillet, Oct. 17.

Andrew, a Jew OF CYRENE, surnamed Lucas by Eusebius, and "the man of light" by Abulfaraj, a fanat-ic, lived at the commencement of the 2d century. Under the reign of Trajan he distinguished himself as the leader of his compatriots, whom he promised a triumphant return to Jerusalem. The enthusiasm thus inspired gained for him many advantages over Lupus, præfect of Egypt, whom he obliged to shut himself up in Alexandria, where he took revenge by causing the massacre of all the Jews in that city. Andrew, accustomed to retaliation, ravaged the flat countries, and desolated all Libya, by which more than 200,000 people became the victims of his rage. These horrible disorders extended even to the Isle of Cyprus, where the Jews, under the leadership of Artemion, perished with an equal number of Greeks and Romans. It was not until after many very bloody encounters that they were brought to submission. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andrew, a Scottish bishop, was promoted bishop of GALLOWAY in 1368 or 1369. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 274.

Andrew, saint and martyr OF LAMPSACUS, was a companion of Sts. Peter, Paul, and Dionysia, martyred by the proconsul Optimus, A.D. 200. They are commemorated May 15. See Ruinart, p. 158; Baillet, May 15.

Andrew, OF THE MOTHER OF GOD, a Barefooted Carmelite, was born at Palencia, in Old Castile, and died in the year 1674. He was one of the most learned of the theological professors of Salamanca, and wrote, Cursus Theologiae Moralis (Salamanca):—De Sacram. Ordinis et Matrimonii, ac de Censuris (ibid. 1668, 3 vols. fol.):—De Statu Religioso, etc. (Lyons, 4 vols. fol.; Madrid, 1709). See Biblioth. Carmelit. i, 91.

Andrew, OF NEUFCHÂTEL, was a theologian who lived in the 14th century, and whom Cave, Dupin, and others believed to be an Englishman and a Dominican; but it is more probable that he was a Franciscan and a native of Neufchâtel, near Toul. He wrote, A Commentary on the Sentences of Aquinas (Paris, 1514).

Andrew, a Scottish prelate, became bishop of ORKNEY in 1478, and was witness to a charter of Roslin's in 1491. He obtained from king Henry VII of England letters of safe-conduct for himself and twelve persons in his retinue in 1494, and was still bishop in 1501. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 222.

Andrew, titular archbishop OF RHODES, was by birth a Greek, and of the Orthodox Greek Church; but subsequently he unhappily forsook his mother Church to join the schismatical Roman communion in the East, and became a Dominican, and was nominated to the titular archbishopric of Rhodes in 1415. As such he attended the twentieth session of the Council of Constantine, and was present at the coronation of Martin V, whom he accompanied to Rome, and who sent him to Constantinople to further the union of the two churches, which the emperor Manuel and his son desired. After the death of Martin, pope Eugenius IV sent him to the Council of Basle as his nuncio to look after his interests, and to endeavor to bring round the council to his views. He met, however, with no success, and retired to Ferrara, whither the Greek emperor and several bishops of that Church shortly came, and where Andrew, in the council, held long disputations with Mark, archbishop of Ephesus, and Bessarion of Nicæa, on the points at issue between the two churches. When the main business of the Council of Florence was completed, Andrew remained there to bring back the Armenians and others to the Roman Church. Lastly, the pope sent him into Cyprus upon the same errand, but what became of him afterwards is unknown. He is sometimes called archbishop of Rhodes, and at others archbishop of Colossus.

Andrew, abbot OF SAINT-MICHAEL-OF-BAMBERG, was a Benedictine, who lived in the beginning of the 16th century, and left a work concerning the popes, archbishops, bishops, abbots, and abbesses of his order who have been canonized; also a Life of St. Odo, the apostle of Pomerania.

Andrew, bishop of SAMOSATA, and the friend of Theodoret, flourished about A.D. 431, and wrote, at the command of John of Antioch, two pieces in refutation of the celebrated anathemas of St. Cyril, and eight Letters, given by Lupus. See Cave, Historia Literaria, i, 419.

Andrew, Asbury, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Caroline County, Md., in 1825. He removed to the vicinity of Port Wayne, Ind., in 1833; experienced conversion in 1840; and in 1845 entered the Indiana Conference, in which he filled acceptably the appointments assigned him until his superannuation, which took place six years previous to his death. He died July 19, 1870. Mr. Andrew was a man of deep piety and respectable preaching ability. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1871, p. 114.

Andrew, James Osgood, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Wilkes County, Ga., May 3, 1794. His father, the Rev. John Andrew, was one of the early itinerant Methodist preachers. His mother's maiden name was Crosby. She was possessed of a strong intellect, fine taste, and deep piety—elements that strongly marked the bishop's character. He was an extensive reader from his childhood, joined the Church at the age of thirteen, soon became class-leader, and when eighteen was licensed to preach. His first pulpit efforts were among the negroes, and were crowned with success. His first attempt before his friends was considered a failure, and he concluded to never attempt again to preach; but his presiding elder secured his entrance into the South Carolina Conference in 1812, and he began his regular ministry as assistant on the Saltketcher Circuit. In three years he began to fill the best appointments in the Conference, and thus continued, with growing popularity, until 1832, when he was elected bishop. He entered upon his work as bishop with great reluctance, fear, and trembling, saying, "The Conference has laid upon me a work for which I am not prepared, and have had no experience whatever." In 1866 he superannuated, but continued to preach as health would permit until his death, March 2, 1871.

Bishop Andrew through his third wife became an owner of slaves, although he had no pecuniary interest in them. His ownership was so arranged that he could not liberate them had he wished. However, because of such ownership, the Northern majority of the General Conference suspended him from his office. This action caused a division in the Methodist Episcopal Church. He would gladly have resigned to preserve the union, had it not been sanctioning, as he considered, a false, fanatical, and unconstitutional principle, and had it not been for the earnest protests of the Southern delegates. The plan of separation was therefore agreed upon, and the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was organized, with bishop Andrew at its head. In the meridian of life bishop Andrew was a noble-looking man, somewhat under six feet in height, well proportioned, and sallow of countenance—the prevailing type of his region. His features were chiselled with marked outlines of strong expression. His voice was strong and melodious. He was warm and devoted in his friendships, liberal in his benefactions, sympathizing in spirit, and a special friend of the colored people. He wrote much for the Church papers, and published a valuable work on Family Government, and a volume of Miscellanies. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1871, p. 643; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Andrew, Samuel, a Congregational minister, was born at Cambridge, Mass., Jan. 29, 1656. He graduated at Harvard College in 1675; for a few years was tutor there, and while thus engaged, preached in Milford, being ordained pastor there Nov. 18, 1685. Mr. Andrew was one of the original projectors, founders, and trustees of Yale College; and when Rev. Mr. Pierson, the first rector, died, he became rector pro tem. He held his trusteeship from the establishment of the college in 1700 until his death. In the convention from which emanated the Saybrook Platform, assembled at Saybrook, Conn., in 1708, he was a prominent member. He died Jan. 24, 1738. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 269.

Andrewes, GERARD, D.D., an English divine, was born at Leicester, April 3, 1750. He was educated at Westminster School and Trinity College, Cambridge. In 1772 he returned to Westminster as an assistant master, where he remained till 1784. One of his first clerical duties was that of an occasional assistant preacher at St. Bride's, Fleet Street; afterwards he was engaged at St. James's Chapel, in the Hampstead Road. In 1780 he served as chaplain to the high sheriff of Leicestershire; in 1788 was presented to the rectory of Zeal-Monachorum, Devonshire; in 1791 was chosen alternate evening preacher at the Magdalen, and in 1799 at the Foundling Hospital. In 1800 he was presented to the rectory of Mickleham, Surrey; and collated to St. James's Aug. 10, 1802. His rectory of Mickleham having become vacant on his preferment, he was again presented to it, and instituted Sept. 7, 1802. In 1809 he was elected dean of Canterbury, and he thereupon finally left Mickleham. In 1812, on the translation of bishop Sparke, he was offered the bishopric of Chester, but declined it on the plea of his advancing years. He died June 2, 1825. Dean Andrewes in the pulpit was argumentative, but not impassioned; conclusive, but not eloquent; a good rather than a great preacher. He published several special sermons. See (Lond.) Annual Register, 1825, p. 254.

Andrews, Abraham, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in England about 1744, and emigrated to the United States in 1796. He had been a reputable member of the Methodist Society about forty years, and in the land of his adoption maintained great strictness of life as a Christian and minister until his death in August, 1800. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1801, p. 97.

Andrews, Benjamin, LL.D., an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London, Nov. 1, 1785. His ancestors were among the Huguenot refugees in England, and some of them were received by Wesley into his first class in the Foundry. Andrews united with the Church in early life, made high attainments as a scholar, and received his degree from the University of Aberdeen. He entered the ministry in 1814, became a supernumerary in 1855, and died at Richmond, Surrey, May 3, 1868. His entire course was marked by sterling integrity of character and unswerving devotedness to Methodism. His ministry was an awakening and earnest one. See Minutes of British Conference, 1868, p. 29.

Andrews, Charles W., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Virginia, was rector of Trinity Church, Shepherdstown, Va. (afterwards West Virginia), during the greater part of his ministerial life. He died May 24, 1875, aged sixty-seven years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Andrews, David O., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born June 4, 1819. He experienced religion in 1839, and in 1844 received license to preach and was admitted into the Memphis Conference, in which for nine years he continued a model of diligence, fidelity, and zeal. He died in 1853. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1853, p. 462.

Andrews, Ebenezer B., LL.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Pennsylvania. He was of a ministerial family, the sacred calling being the profession of his father and five sons, of whom he was the youngest and the first to depart this life. He received his education at Williams and Marietta colleges, and pursued his theological studies at Princeton Seminary. He was ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Housatonic, Mass., and subsequently became pastor of the New Britain Church, Conn., where he remained until he was elected professor of geology at Marietta College in 1851. He filled this appointment with great ability and success until 1861, when he was appointed on the Geological Survey of the State of Ohio. He was earnest and consistent, and ready to make any sacrifice for the public good. He felt it his duty during the war of the Rebellion to accept the office of major in the Thirty-sixth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, which had been tendered him unsolicited by the governor of Ohio, and served two years as major and colonel. He was recently appointed one of the members of the Board of Inspection of the United States Mint, Philadelphia. He published several valuable papers, and a work on geology for the use of colleges and schools. He died at Lancaster, O., Aug. 14, 1880. See N. Y. Evangelist, Aug. 26, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Andrews, Edward, D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, became rector of Christ Church, Binghamton, N. Y., in August, 1836, which position he held for seven years, when he resigned. After an interval of eighteen months, he became rector of the same Church, and retained the office for a second period of seven years. He died at Binghamton, March 5, 1867, of which place he had been a resident for thirty years. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. July, 1867, p. 335.

Andrews, Elisha, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Queensbury, N. Y., in 1802. He was converted when about eighteen, and in 1824 entered the New York Conference. When, in 1832, the Troy Conference was set off, he was included within it; in 1837 was transferred to the New York Conference, and in it labored zealously and successfully until his death by drowning, Sept. 3, 1844. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1845, p. 601.

Andrews, Elisha Deming, a Congregational minister, was born at Southington, Conn., in 1783. He graduated at Yale College in 1803; was ordained pastor of the Church in Putney, Vt., June 25, 1807; was dismissed May 27, 1829; and died in Michigan in 1852. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 538.

Andrews, George B., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of New York, was rector for many years of Zion Church, Wappinger's Falls, N. Y., his rectorship covering a period of more than a quarter of a century. He died Aug. 22, 1875, aged ninety years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1876, p. 149.

Andrews, George Clinton, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Salem, Pa., Sept. 30, 1840. He was converted in early life; was licensed to preach in 1863; studied at Wyoming Seminary from 1864 to 1866; served as supply, Herrick Centre charge in 1867, Oregon charge in 1869, Lackawaxen charge from 1870 to 1872, and in 1873 was admitted into the Wyoming Conference and appointed to Pleasant Valley charge. His subsequent appointments were: 1875, Osborn Hollow; 1876-77, Triangle; 1878, Union Centre; and in 1879 he superannuated. He died at Franklin Forks, July 12, 1879. Mr. Andrews was self-denying, laborious, and faithful. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1880, p. 86.

Andrews, George W., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Gloucester County, Va., Oct. 27, 1808. He experienced religion in 1826, and in 1841 entered the Virginia Conference. In it he labored as diligently as his health would permit until 1851, when he superannuated and settled on a farm in Mecklenburg County, where he spent the remainder of his life in farming, teaching school, and frequent preaching. He died June 11, 1854. Mr. Andrews was a modest, unassuming minister, and possessed good natural and acquired pulpit gifts. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1854, p. 335.

Andrews, Henry, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted early. He left England in December, 1852, and died of yellow fever in Trinidad, W. I., Oct. 30, 1853, in the twenty-fifth year of his age. His zeal was fervent, his dedication unreserved, and his charge was rising under his care. See Minutes of British Conference, 1854.

Andrews, John (1), a clergyman of the Church of England, came from that country with the Rev. Richard Clarke in 1753. He had been educated at St. Mary's Hall, Oxford; had been ordained deacon by the bishop of Gloucester, Dec. 3, 1750, and priest by the bishop of Oxford, Dec. 24, 1752. In 1753 he was assistant minister of St. Philip's Church, Charleston, S. C., which he resigned Nov. 9, 1756, to return to England. After this he was appointed minister at Stinchcombe, in Gloucester, and afterwards was vicar of Marden, in Kent. In 1763 he published the Scripture Doctrine of Grace, an answer to a treatise on the same subject by the bishop of Gloucester. A volume of his Sermons was published after his death. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 140.

Andrews, John (2), D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in Cecil County, Md., about six miles from the head of Elk River, April 4, 1746. His preparatory studies were acquired at the Elk School, and he graduated from the College of Philadelphia in 1765. Before completing his course, he had become a tutor in the grammar-school, where he taught one year, and then assumed charge of a classical school at Lancaster. While there he studied theology under the Rev. Thomas Barton. He was ordained deacon Feb. 2, 1767, in London, England, and on Feb. 15 was admitted to priest's orders. Before leaving England he was appointed missionary to Lewes, Del., by the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts. For three years he discharged the duties of his position, when he became missionary to York and Carlisle, Pa., fixing his residence at York. Soon after the governor of Maryland appointed him rector of St. John's Parish, Queen Anne's Co. His want of sympathy with the war of the Revolution rendered his situation uncomfortable, and led to his return to York, where he opened a classical school. After some years, he returned to Maryland, and on April 13, 1782, became rector of St. Thomas's Parish, in Baltimore Co., devoting half of his time to this parish and the other half to St. James's, adjoining it. He still continued to teach school. In 1784 he was influential with others in organizing the Protestant Episcopal Church of Maryland, independent of all foreign jurisdiction. In 1785 he was placed at the head of the newly established Academy of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Philadelphia. From November, 1786, to the following April he supplied the pulpits of the united churches of Christ Church and St. Peter's in Philadelphia during the absence, in England, of the Rev. Dr. White. In 1789 Dr. Andrews was made professor in the College and Academy of Philadelphia; and in 1791, when that institution and the University of the State of Pennsylvania were united under the corporate title of the University of Pennsylvania, he was elected its vice-provost. After filling this position for more than twenty years, he was elected, in December, 1810, to the office of provost, which he resigned, Feb. 2, 1813, on account of failing health. He died in Philadelphia, March 29, 1813. He published, Elements of Logic (1800); Elements of Rhetoric and Belles-lettres (1813); and several Sermons. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 246.

Andrews, John (3), D.D., a Unitarian minister, was born at Hingham, Mass., March 3, 1764. He graduated from Harvard University in 1786, and afterwards studied theology at Cambridge. He then accepted a call to settle as assistant pastor over the First Church at Newburyport, and was ordained Dec. 10, 1788. In 1808, when the senior pastor died, Mr. Andrews took sole charge of the parish, and labored therein until May 1, 1830, when he resigned his office. After his resignation he preached occasionally to one or two societies in the vicinity of Newburyport. He died Aug. 17, 1845. Dr. Andrews, while not a great man, was emphatically a good man. His life was a beautiful exhibition of the Christian graces. As a preacher he was eloquent and practical. He was called upon to deliver the Dudleian Lecture and to preach several occasional discourses, which were published. For fifty years he was a trustee, and for half that time the treasurer, of Dummer Academy. He was also one of the delegates from Newburyport in the convention for revising the constitution of his state. See (Boston) Christian Examiner, 1846, p. 24.

Andrews, Joseph D., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Giles County, Tenn., in 1822. He professed religion in his youth; in 1839 received license to preach, and was recommended to the Tennessee Conference to be transferred to the Arkansas Conference. He died in 1860. Mr. Andrews was remarkable for his cheerful Christian character. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1860, p. 282.

Andrews, Josiah, an English Congregational minister, was born at Lichfield, Dec. 27, 1821, of earnest Christian parents. At a very early age he gave his heart to God, and became an active Christian. He preached his first sermon in a barn when he was about fifteen years old. At the age of seventeen he went to Georgetown, Demerara; and after laboring some time he returned to England, and became pastor of the Church at Long Stratton, Norfolk. Soon after he sailed for Jamaica, under the auspices of the London Missionary Society, and, at the close of seven years, returned to England, and became the pastor successively of several churches, the last of which was that of Shanklin, where he labored four years. He died April 8, 1878. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 296.

Andrews, Lemuel, a Methodist Episcopal minister, concerning whose life no further information is accessible than that he labored four years in the ministry, maintaining an upright, zealous, Christian character, and by his devotedness to his calling endearing himself to his parishioners. He died in 1791. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1791, p. 41.

Andrews, Lewis, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London in 1780. He became a member of the Methodist Society at the age of nine; entered the ministry in 1803; and travelled, among others, the Loughborough, Ashby, Birmingham, and Mansfield circuits. He died on the latter circuit, Dec. 2, 1818. He was a man of piety and talent. See Wesleyan Meth. Mag. 1820, p. 321; Minutes of British Conference, 1819.

Andrews, Lewis Feuilleatean Wilson, a Universalist minister, son of the Rev. John Andrews, a Presbyterian minister, was born in North Carolina, Sept. 7, 1802. He removed, when quite young, with his parents to Chillicothe, O.; was given a classical education; graduated as M.D. at the Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky.; and for several years practiced as a physician in Cleveland, O., and about Pittsburgh, Pa. In 1830 he embraced Universalism; in 1831 was ordained a preacher of that faith; became pastor of the Second Universalist Church in 1832; labored in 1834 in Montgomery, Ala., as preacher, and editor of the Gospel Evangelist; in 1835 as pastor in Charleston, S. C.; in 1836-37 as senior editor of the Southern Pioneer and Gospel Visitor, Baltimore, Md.; and subsequently removed South and published the Evangelical Universalist. He died at Americus, Ga., March 16, 1875. Dr. Andrews was abundant in labors, in long and frequent missionary journeys; generous and free-hearted, naturally energetic, profound, and able. See Universalist Register, 1876, p. 116.

Andrews, Robert L., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was reared in Williamson County, Tenn. He experienced conversion in early life, and in 1829 was admitted into the Tennessee Conference. He soon rose to distinction in the Church, and filled many important and responsible stations. In 1864 he located in Mississippi, and there died in 1865. Mr. Andrews was agreeable in person, gentle in manner, amiable in disposition, and deep and uniform in piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1866, p. 57; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Andrews, Silas Millon, D.D., a minister of the Presbyterian Church, was born in Brown County, N. C., March 11, 1805. His parents were Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, and emigrated to this country at an early day. After a preparatory training, Mr. Andrews entered the University of North Carolina, and graduated therefrom in 1825. Though he had the ministry in view, he devoted three years to teaching in a classical academy. He then entered the Princeton (N. J.) Theological Seminary, where he graduated in 1831. His first charge after his ordination, and his last, was at Doylestown, Pa. In October, 1849, he was elected clerk of the Synod of Philadelphia, and continued in the faithful discharge of the duties of that office until the reunion of the Church in 1870. For nearly half a century he broke the bread of life to his beloved people. He died at Doylestown, March 7, 1881. See N. Y. Observer, March 17, 1881. (W. P. S.)

Andrews, Thomas, a Presbyterian minister, was born in Ashland County, O., April 10, 1835. He graduated at Jefferson College in the class of 1856, and entered the United Presbyterian Seminary in Allegheny at the opening of its next session. He was licensed as a minister in 1859, and received a call from the united congregations of Calcutta and East Liverpool, O., and was installed as pastor in April, 1861. He died of consumption, Oct. 6, 1862. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1863, p. 356.

Andrews, Thomas J., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Berwick, Me., Feb. 12, 1826. He experienced a change of heart at the age of fourteen; received license to exhort in 1848; studied at Concord Biblical Institute; and in 1852 joined the New Hampshire Conference. He labored with zeal and fidelity until accidentally killed, Aug. 21, 1854. Mr. Andrews was a warm friend, an affectionate husband, a sincere Christian, and a faithful minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1855, p. 527.

Andrews, Wells, A.M., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Hartland, Conn., Nov. 21, 1787. In 1807 he was converted, and decided to study for the ministry. He entered Jefferson College, Pa., where he graduated with the honors of his class in 1812. In 1814 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, N. J.; in 1816 was ordained by the New Brunswick Presbytery, and went to Wilmington, N. C., and after laboring there a short time was called to the pastorate of a Church in Alexandria, Va. In 1837 he was elected to the chair of languages in the Ohio University. He died Feb. 14, 1867. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1868, p. 192.

Andrews, William (1), a missionary of the Church of England, came to preach to the Mohawk Indians in New York as a successor to the Rev. Thoroughgood Moore. At a meeting of the Commissioners of Indian Affairs held in Albany, he was greeted by the sachems with great respect; but his mission proving unsuccessful, he abandoned it in 1719. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 91.

Andrews, William (2), a missionary of the Church of England and a native of Ireland, after having been for some time in America, went to England in 1770; was ordained by the bishop of London, and appointed to Schenectady, N. Y., by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. In 1771 he opened a grammar-school, but ill-health led him in 1773 to migrate to Virginia, and he resided for some time in Williamsburg. The mission of Johnstown having become vacant, he applied for it. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 91.

Andrews, William (3), a Congregational minister, was born at Ellington, Conn., Sept. 28, 1782. He graduated at Middlebury College in 1806; studied theology with Dr. Burton, and was ordained pastor at Windham, Conn., in 1808. In 1813 he was installed at Danbury, and in the year following at South Cornwall, where he remained until his death, Jan. 1, 1838. "He was a man of grave deportment, good learning, and sincere piety." Of his six sons, five have been preachers, one being president and another professor at Marietta College, O. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 264; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, ii, 237.

Andrews, William (4), a Canadian Methodist minister, was born at Leeds, Yorkshire, England, in October, 1817. He united with the Wesleyan Methodist Church in 1832; emigrated to Canada in 1842; was received into the ministry in 1843; labored faithfully for thirty-six years, and died April 14, 1879. He was a good man and true. His son, Wilbur W. Andrews, is a missionary in the Winnipeg District. See Minutes of the Toronto Conference of the Meth. Church of Canada, 1879, p. 18.

Andrews, William Williams, an English Methodist preacher, was converted when young under a sermon by W. Hopper. He joined the Bible Christians, and became a local preacher; went to America to avoid entering the ministry, but the call to do so pursued him. He returned to England, went to the Shebbear Institution, was accepted for the ministry in 1863, and labored in six home circuits with great acceptance. He died March 5, 1878, at Weare, Somerset, aged forty-two years. See Minutes of Conferences of Bible Christians, 1878.

Andrews, Wyatt, a Methodist Episcopal minister, of whose life or sphere of labor no record is accessible further than that he was full of faith and Christian zeal. He died in 1791. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1791, p. 40.

Andrezel, Barthélemy Philibert Picon d', a French priest, was born at Salins in 1757. He participated in the highest assemblies of the clergy held in 1782 and 1786, and was titular of the wealthy abbey of St. Jacut in Brittany. He emigrated to England, but returned to France under the Consulate, and assisted in editing certain papers, among others the Journal des Curés, and afterwards became inspector-general of the university. He died at Versailles, Dec. 12, 1825. He translated into French Fox's work, History of the Reign of James II (published in 1809). D'Andrezel was the editor of the Excerpta e Scriptis Græcis of M. Mollevaut, professor, brother of the poet of that name (Paris, 1815). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andries, Johann Baptist, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 8, 1836, at Rosskirch. In 1865 he received holy orders, and died Nov. 2, 1872, at Kettenberg, in Hanover. He published, Alphonsi Salmeronis Doctrina de Jurisdictionis Episcopalis origine ac Ratione. Ex variis ejusdem commentariis conscriptam . . . apto ordine disposuit notisque illustravit (Mayence, 1871) :—Cathedra Romana, oder der apostolische Lehrprimat (vol. i, ibid. 1872). See Litewrischer Handweiser für das katholische Deutschland, 1872, p. 551 sq. (B. F.)

Androgeos, in Greek mythology, was the son of Minos and of Pasiphae, whose death was the cause of the tribute of the seven maidens and young men which the Athenians were obliged to render to the Minotaur (q. v.). Androgeos was so proficient in all gymnastic exercises that he won all the prizes at the festival of the Panathenæa at Athens. This gained for him the friendship of the Pallantides (sons of Pallas), but caused also the hatred and envy of Ægeus (q. v.), who thought such a friendship dangerous to himself, as it was possible Minos might help the Pallantides and drive him from the throne. He therefore sent spies to Enoe, in Attica, secretly to lay in wait for Androgeos and murder him. When Minos became acquainted with what had happened, he came to Athens and sought redress for the dreadful crime, begged Jupiter for revenge, and made war upon Athens. As an answer to his prayers, great want and pestilence came upon Attica, which would only cease when its inhabitants would pay the tribute for the murder of Androgeos. This tribute consisted in the yearly sacrifice of seven young men and seven maidens as food for the Minotaur.

Androgynēs, in Greek mythology, were men-women with four arms, four feet, two heads, and a union of male and female functions. They were very courageous, and even attempted to besiege Jupiter on Olympus. Their fleetness caused him not a little trouble. Jupiter, not desirous of crushing them, as the Giants, separated the male from the female, and authorized Apollo to heal the parts so separated. Of the manner in which this was done, man still carries the mark in the navel; Apollo tied the skin into a knot at the exposed point. In this separation their original strength departed; however, love, the highest virtue, and desire, the strongest passion, are indebted to this separation for their existence.

Andromēda, in Greek mythology. Cepheus, the son of the Æthiopian king Belus, was married to Cassiopeia, who was so proud of her beauty that she maintained her pre-eminence over the Nereids. The latter complained of their case to Neptune. The angry god showed himself above the waves of the sea, overflooded Ethiopia, and sent a frightful monster through the land, who devastated the entire country. The oracle of Jupiter Ammon said that Andromeda, the daughter of Cepheus and of Cassiopeia, who had been tied to a rock as a punishment for the boasting of her mother, must be sacrificed to the frightful monster. Perseus met the maiden and asked her the reason of her imprisonment. In order that Perseus might not think the gods punished her for her own crimes, Andromeda related to him why she was condemned to this torture. Hardly had she finished, when, in the distance, the sea began to foam and the frightful monster came rushing on. The disheartened parents saw the death of their daughter drawing near. Then Perseus asked them if he might have her hand in case he liberated her. This was readily granted, and half the kingdom. The monster drew nearer and nearer. Perseus got up with the winged shoes loaned to him by Mercury, and with the petrifying head which he had taken from the Gorgon Medusa, and, holding this before the monster, changed him into stone. The marriage took place; but the brother of Cepheus, Phineus, to whom Andromeda had been promised, began a bloody siege. Perseus was compelled to sum up all his courage to guard himself against his enemy. At last he brought forth his Medusa head, at the appearance of which Phineus was changed into stone. Perseus thereupon took Andromeda to his own country, and she bore him many sons and daughters. The gods placed the entire family—Cepheus, Perseus, Andromeda, and Cassiopeia—among the stars.

Andrōna (from άνήρ, a man), a term used to denote that part of the ancient Christian churches allotted to the male portion of the audience. The men occupied the left of the altar, on the south side of the church, and the women the right, on the north side. They were separated from each other by a veil or lattice. In the Eastern churches, the women and catechumens occupied the galleries above, while the men sat below. In some churches a separate apartment was allotted to widows and virgins.

Andronicus, the name of several saints commemorated in various early calendars: (1) saint, April 5 (Bede); (2) May 13 (Jerome); (3) "apostle," with Junia (Rom. xvi, 2), May 17 (Byzant.); finding of relics, Feb. 22 (ibid.); (4) Sept. 27 (Jerome); (5) "holy father," Oct. 9 (Byzant.); (6) martyr, Oct. 10 (Jerome), Oct. 11 (old Rom.), Oct. 12 (Byzant.).

Andronicus, St., the companion of Sts. Probus and Taracus.

Andronicus, CAMATERUS, a relative of the emperor Manuel Comnenus, and governor of Constantinople, who, about 1150, wrote a book against the Latins, in the form of dialogue between the emperor Manuel and a Roman cardinal, concerning the procession of the Holy Spirit. Beccus, or Veccus, the Romanizing patriarch of Constantinople, replied to this work. Andronicus also wrote a work in the form of a conference between the emperor and Peter, the patriarch of the Armenians, and a Treatise on the Two Natures of Jesus Christ.

Andronicus, the elder, emperor of Constantinople, was the son of the emperor Michael, and began to reign in 1283. He disapproved of all that his father had done in the case of the union, and recalled the orthodox clergy who had been ejected on account of their opposition to that act. On account of their proceedings, Clement V excommunicated him; and in 1325 his grandson, Andronicus, revolted against him, and obliged him to yield up the throne to him. Upon this Andronicus the elder retired into a cloister, where he died in 1332. He is supposed to have written a long dialogue between a Jew and a Christian in the Bibl. Patrum, which was printed at Ingolstadt in 1616. The three works mentioned in the preceding article as the composition of Andronicus Camaterus have been also attributed to this emperor.

Andros, Thomas, a Congregational minister, was born at Norwich, Conn., May 1, 1759. He saw service and endured great hardships in the Revolutionary war, especially in connection with his imprisonment in the famous old "Jersey" ship at New York, in which it is said eleven thousand persons perished. He was ordained at Berkley, Conn., March 19, 1788, where he remained for forty-six years (1788-1834). He died Dec. 30, 1845. He published several Sermons, and a Narrative of his Imprisonment and Escape from the Jersey Prison-ship. See Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Androtius, FULVIUS (Ital. Fulvio Androzzi), an Italian Jesuit, was born in 1523 at Monticelo, in Ancona. At the age of thirty-two he joined the Order of the Jesuits, and died as the head of the college at Ferrara, Aug. 27, 1575. He wrote, Della Frequenza della Comunione (Brescia, 1618):—Dello Stato delle Vedove (ibid. 1614). His general writings were published by F. Adorno under the title Opere Spirituali (Milan, 1579). They were also published separately as Meditazione della Vita e della Morte di Jes. Christ. (Brescia, 1618). They were translated into Latin, French, German, and Dutch. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten- Lexikon, and Suppl. s. v.; Mazzuchelli, Scrittori d'Italia; Ale-gambe, Biblioth. Script. Soc. Jesu. (B. P.)

Andrus, Jared, a Congregational minister, was born at Bolton, Conn., in May, 1784. He was converted at the age of thirty. He hesitated to enter the ministry until, appealing to the lot, a favorable indication was given. He was ordained pastor of the Church at Chaplin, Conn., in 1820, where he labored for ten years, when he removed to Bozrah; from thence, in 1832, to North Madison. On the first Sabbath of 1832 he preached with great earnestness from the text "This year thou shalt die," and on Nov. 11 of the same year the text proved a prophecy of his own decease. See Cong. Quart. 1860, p. 178.

Andrus, Joseph Raphael, an Episcopal clergyman, was born at Cornwall, Vt., in 1791. He was a graduate of Middlebury College in the class of 1812; studied at Yale College as a resident graduate in 1812-13; and for one year (1816) he was a student at the Andover Theological Seminary. He took orders in the Protestant Episcopal Church and was ordained priest April 22, 1817. During the years 1816-17 he was a preacher at Marblehead, Mass., and in Northern Vermont. Subsequently he went to Virginia, where he was a preacher for not far from four years (1817-21). In 1821 he received an appointment as an agent of the American Colonization Society, and went to Africa in the interests of the society in 1821. He died soon after his arrival at Sierra Leone, July 28, 1821. See Andover General Catalogue, p. 81; Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 565. (J. C. S.)

Andrus, Loyal B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Cornwall, Vt., Jan. 13, 1809. He experienced conversion when about twenty-one years of age, and in 1843 joined the New York Conference. In 1871 he superannuated, and sustained that relation until his death, near Yonkers, March 27, 1873. Mr. Andrus was peculiarly gifted in prayer, and was highly esteemed for his piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1873, p. 47.

Andruzzì, LUIGI, an Italian theologian, count of Sant' Andrea, was born about 1688 or 1689 on the Isle of Cyprus. He probably belonged to a Venetian family. From 1709 to 1732 he was professor of Greek in the University of Bologna. He wrote several controversial works against Dositheus, patriarch of Jerusalem, for the defence of the Roman Catholic Church, as his opponent had attacked the infallibility of the pope, and revived the famous dispute upon the Filioque. He died near the middle of the 18th century. Among his principal works we notice, Vetus Græcia de Sancta Romana Sede Præclare Sentiens, sive Responsio ad Dositheim Patriarcham Hierosolymitanum (Venice, 1713):—Consensus tum Græcorum tum Latinorum Patrum de Proces- sione Spiritus Sancti e Filio, contra Dositheim, Patriarcham Hierosolymitanum (Rome, 1716), dedicated to pope Clement XI:—Perpetua Ecclesie Doctrina de Infalibilitate Papæ in Decidendis ex Cathedra Fidei Quæstionibus extra Concilium Œcumenicum et ante Fideiſum Acceptionem (Bologna, 1720):—Vindicia Sermonis Sancti Ildefonsi, Archiepiscopi Toletani, de Perpetua Virginitate ac Parturitione Dei Genitricis Mariæ (Rome, 1742). He also translated into Greek several homilies of Clement XI, and a speech of Benedict XIV. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Andry, CLAUDE, of Lyons, who died in 1718, wrote L'Hérésie des Protestans et la Vérité de l'Eglise Cathol. Découverte (Lyons, 1714):—also a Letter to a Protestant of Lyons, written in 1717, Sur le Nom d'Eglise Romaine donné à l'Eglise Catholique.

Anduch, St. See ANDOLUS.

Andwari, in Norse mythology, was a dwarf, whom Loki captured in order that by the gold which he possessed a murder might be atoned, for which the Asas had fallen into the hands of Hreidmar, the father of the murdered. Andwari gave all that he had, with the exception of a small golden ring, which had the function to produce by witchcraft all the money the possessor desired. The ring got into the hands of Hreidmar, and his own sons slew him for his gold; then envy and hatred arose among them, and finally they all murdered each other.

Andwari fors, in Norse mythology, was the waterfall where the dwarf Andwari lived, and where Loki captured him in the form of a fish.

Andwaris naut, in Norse mythology, was the ring of the dwarf Andwari (q. v.), on which he laid the curse ever to kill its possessor.

Aneitumese VERSION of the Holy Scriptures. Aneiteum is one of the languages belonging to the Farther Polynesian group, and is a branch of the Papuan tongue. The island of Aneiteum, in which it is vernacular, is the most southward of the New Hebrides, and is thirty miles in circuit. The efforts made to diffuse a knowledge of the revealed Word of God among the people of Aneiteum are of recent date; and the following data furnished by the Rev. John Inglis, the editor and translator of the Aneitumese Bible, which we subjoin from the fifty-ninth annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society (1863), will be of interest:

"In 1841 the first attempt was made to introduce Christianity into Aneiteum by locating native teachers from Samoa. In 1848 the Rev. J. Geddie, of the Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia, commenced missionary operations in Aneiteum. During the first year, Mr. Geddie was assisted by the Rev. T. Powell, of the London Missionary Society, from Samoa. In 1852 I left New Zealand, where I had labored for the seven and a half previous years, and joined Mr. Geddie in Aneiteum. By that time Mr. Geddie had acquired a considerable knowledge of the language. He had printed several small books, such as a primer and a catechism, Scripture extracts, etc.; he had also a translation of Matthew in manuscript. Assisted by Mr. Geddie's vocabulary and translations, and occasionally by his personal instructions, I lost no time in endeavoring to acquire a knowledge of the language. In 1848 the island was wholly heathen. In 1858 the whole population, with a few straggling exceptions, was professedly Christian.

"In the end of 1859, when the 'John Williams' left the New Hebrides commencing her homeward voyage, the whole of the New Test. was translated, but it was not corrected; it was only in a rough form, requiring still to be carefully corrected and copied out for the press. Mr. Geddie and I proposed to devote a whole year, at least, conjointly to this work; but as the mission vessel was about to return to England, it was unanimously agreed by the missionaries that I should return home, accompanied by my wife and a native of Aneiteum, for the purpose of getting the translation printed. We reached London on June 30, 1860. In August, 1861, I had the whole corrected and copied out, so as to be able to present it to your Editorial Committee through the Rev. T. W. Meller. They accepted the translation. Subsequently, Mr. Meller went carefully over the whole and made many important suggestions. The printing was commenced in last January, and is now finished.

"For eleven and a half years Mr. Geddie devoted all his spare time to the preparation of this translation. For the last seven and a half of these years I was associated with him in this work. Since I left the Islands, fully three years ago, including the seven months of the homeward voyage of the 'John Williams,' I have been chiefly occupied in this work.

"Although fifteen years ago there was not a sentence of the Aneiteum language reduced to writing, I am happy to think that this is both a faithful and idiomatic translation."

The Old Test., having been published in parts from time to time, was finally carried through the press in 1878 at London by the Rev. J. Inglis. The announcement is thus made in the Bible Society Monthly Reporter, January, 1880:

"Another translation of the entire Bible is now ready. For the past two and a half years the Rev. J. Inglis, of the Free Church of Scotland Mission to the New Hebrides, has been in this country carrying the Old Test. through the press, the New Test. having been printed previously. Mr. Inglis brought over with him contributions raised by the natives of the small island, sufficient to pay the whole bill for printing. He expresses a just pride in the reflection that the people of Aneiteum should have paid in full for every copy of the Scriptures they have received; and he expresses his thankfulness that, with the counsel and assistance of the society's officers, the cost of the printing of the Old Test. is much less than he and his colleagues had anticipated."

According to the seventy-seventh annual report of the British and Foreign Bible Society, 20,630 copies of parts of the Scriptures had been disposed of up to March 31, 1881. See Bible of Every Land, p. 392 sq. (B. P.)

Anemher, an Egyptian deity who was worshipped in the city of Arma.

Aner. Tristram suggests (Bible Places, p. 205) that "this may, perhaps, be recognised in the modern village of Anim, near Taanuk, where are the remains of an ancient site;" meaning, doubtless, the Anin marked on the Ordnance Map as three and a half miles south-west of Taanuk. Lieut. Conder, on the other hand, regards this place as the representation of Anem, and suggests the modern Ellâr as the site of Aner (Tent Work, ii, 334). Neither suggestion seems to be called for.

Anergisus. See ANERGIS.

Anesius, of Africa, is commemorated as a Christian saint March 31 (Jerome).

Anfal (Arab. the spoils) is the title of a chapter in the Koran which lays down the rules in regard to the distribution of spoils taken from the enemy. The arrangement of Mohammed on this subject was that the fifth part was to belong to God, to the prophet, to his relations, to orphans, to the poor, and to pilgrims. One interpretation of this rule practically excludes God from the parties entitled to the spoil. Others suppose that the rule is to be literally followed by subdividing a fifth part of the booty into six portions, and that the portions belonging to God and the prophet are to be used in repairing and adorning the temple of Mecca.

Anfosius, DOMINIC (Ital. Domenico Anfossi), was a native of Taggia, in the state of Genoa, who lived in the beginning of the 17th century. He embraced the ecclesiastic state, taught in the University of Pavia, and in his old-age, when blind, retired among the Fathers of the Oratory of that place. He wrote, De Sacrarum Reliquiarum Cultu, Veneratione, Translatione atque Identitate (Brescia, 1610):—published an edition of the Acts of the Council of Albenga, held by Vincent Landinelli, the bishop of that see:—and some other works.

Anga is the collective name of a series of treatises derived from the Hindû Vedas. They are called respectively the Siksha, the Kalpa, the Vyakarana, the Chandas, the Jyotisha, and the Nirukta.

Angadrema (or Angadrisma), saint and virgin, patroness of Beauvais, was daughter of Robert, who was the son of Clovis II and St. Bathilda. Having received the veil at the hands of St. Ouen, bishop of Rouen, she retired to Beauvais, where she assembled a community of widows and virgins who had consecrated themselves to God, and died October 14, about the end of the 7th century. Her body is said to be still in the Church of St. Michael at Beauvais, and her festival is kept there October 14. See Baillet, October 14.

Angarassen. According to the Hindû doctrine of deities, Menu Sayamo Huwa, a grandchild of Bramah, desirous of making men, created ten Rishis, of whom Angarassen was one. The wife of the latter gave birth to four daughters and one son, who is the ancestor of the caste of warriors, the Kshatrias.

Angariense Concilium. See SANGARIENSE CONCILIIUM.

Angas, in Hindû mythology, were holy books belonging to the Shastras. They are six in number—one pertaining to the articulation of words, another to religious usages, a third about grammar, a fourth concerning witchcraft, a fifth about astronomy, and a sixth is an explanation of hard words in the Vedas.

Angas, WILLIAM HENRY, an English Baptist minister, was born in the year 1781. For many years he devoted his time, his talents, and his fortune to the interests of benevolence and religion. He took special interest in cultivating fraternal associations with the Mennonites, most of whose churches he visited, making them acquainted with the principles and objects of the Baptist missions to the East and West Indies, and enlisting their sympathies and co-operation in the work of carrying the Gospel to the heathen. He also took a deep interest in the Moravians; and we are told that there was not a settlement belonging to that interesting people in Continental Europe which did not gladly open its doors to receive him as a friend and a brother. The English Baptist Missionary Society sent him in 1830 to visit their stations in the West India islands, and his labors were productive of great good. Later in life he directed his special attention to the promotion of the religious welfare of sailors, and at the time of his death was gratuitously supplying the Baptist Church at South Shields, England, with a view to benefiting that interesting class of men. His death, which was sudden, occurred at South Shields in September, 1832. See New Baptist Miscellany, 1832, p. 452. (J. C. S.)

Angat is the devil of the inhabitants of Madagascar. When they bring a sacrifice to God, a part is retained for this evil spirit.

ANGE DE SAINTE-JOSEPH, a Barefooted Carmelite of Toulouse, whose real name was La Brosse, lived in Persia, and was an apostolic missionary; he was also provincial of his order in Languedoc. He died at Perpignan in 1697. The following are some of his works: Gazophylactum Linguae Persarum (Amst. 1684, fol.) :—Castigatio in Angelum a S. Joseph, alias dictum de la Brosse. His reputation as a Persian scholar was great in his own country.

ANGE DE SAINTE-ROSALIE, a Barefooted Augustine and a learned genealogist, was born at Blois in 1655. He was preparing a new edition of the Histoire Généalogique et Chronologique de la Maison de France et des Grand-officiers de la Couronne, begun by père Anselme, the first edition of which appeared in 1672 (2 vols. 4to), and the second in 1712; but his death, which occurred at Paris in 1726, prevented its completion.

Angekoks are the physicians, witches, and conjurers among the Greenlanders and Esquimaux. They can hardly be called priests, for there is no specific form of worship among these tribes. The Angekoks pretend to live in communication with the spirits, and understand the art of substantiating this assertion by various ceremonies and tricks, so that they are held in great respect and fear, and are consulted in all difficult cases, and never without receiving presents. In order to become an Angekok much work is necessary. He who desires to become an Angekok must pray the Great Spirit to send him a Torngak, i. e. a genius (spiritus familiaris); and for the reception of this spirit he must prepare himself by dwelling often for successive weeks in a quiet secluded place, separate from all human dwellings, without sleep or food, and await the coming of the Torngak. One of the spirits Angekok selects for his guide, and now, he is equipped with all wisdom and knowledge. It is in his power to heal the sick, foretell death, give success in fishing, make good weather, ascend into heaven, or descend into the infernal regions. In such opportunities he shows all his arts. In the middle of the night in mid-winter, when, according to the belief of the natives, the spirits have all retired to their habitations, and the rainbow, which constitutes the lowest heaven, is quite near the earth, the relatives gather about him for whom a conjuration is to be made. All the lamps save one are extinguished. After much drumming, yelling, and singing, the Angekok permits his scholar to tie his head between his knees and his hands behind his back. Then the last light is extinguished, and in the same moment the Angekok liberates himself from his bonds, and begins to drum and sing, in which all join. Hereupon he falls to the ground, apparently dead, for his soul has departed, and only the lifeless body remains. When he returns, it is always in company with this Torngak; whereupon he speaks in undistinguishable sounds and oracles, which those present are at liberty to interpret as they like. When that which they prophesy does not come to pass, the fault lies not with the Torngak, but with those who interpret. When a conjurer calls ten times without result to his Torngak, he is obliged to give up his office; on the other hand, if his call be always answered, he may become an Angekok Poglît (q. v.)

Angekoks Poglît is a great wise physician and conjurer of a higher grade among the Greenlanders. In order to become one of these, the Angekok withdraws from men into a secluded hut, where he makes his desire known to Torngarsuk, the Great Spirit of the Greenlanders. The latter then appears to him as a white bear, drags the Angekok to the sea, and plunges with him into it. After both have been devoured by a walrus, the body of the Angekok is thrown piece by piece on the shore; whereupon the soul takes possession of the body again, and now he can draw himself into heaven by a long rope, and let himself down into the infernal regions. The latter is not so easily accomplished. The object is to liberate the sea lions held by the queen of the infernal regions, and this can only be done in company with the Torngak.

Angel (or Angell), JOHN, an English Nonconformist divine, was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and became an earnest and faithful preacher. He died in 1655. His publications include The Right Government of the Thoughts and four Sermons. See Allibone, Dictionary of British and American Authors, s. v.

Angelerius, GREGORY (Ital. Gregorio Angelieri), was a zealous preacher of the Capuchins, of Lower Calabria, who died at Naples in 1622. He left many works in Latin and Italian, among them De Præparatione Evangelica :—Narrationes Atheistarum, Gentilium, Hebræorum, Turcarum, Hæreticorum, et Schismaticorum; quod Ecclesia Romana est Vera Ecclesia, et sola Schola Dei in Terris (Naples, 1653).

Angeletti, ANDREA, a Carmelite of Rome, who lived in the 17th century, wrote the Life of St. Canute, the martyr, king of Denmark (printed in Italian and Latin at Rome in 1667).

Angeli, Agostino DEGLI. See ANGELIS.

Angeli, Filippo, a priest, was born in the territory of Perugia, and died at Padua in 1677. He wrote Missæ Privata Præxis (Padua, 1677). This work is divided into three parts. The first contains a resolution of all the doubts which may arise concerning private mass; the second relates to the rubrics concerning the private mass; the third contains a methodical praxis according to the canons and rubrics.

Angeli, Francesco Antonio DEGLI, an Italian Jesuit, was born at Sorrento, about 1567. He was employed in the foreign missions in India, and afterwards in Ethiopia, where he went in 1605. His piety caused him to be held in high esteem at the court of the prince Zagachristi, whom he induced to abjure the Eutychnian errors. He died in 1623, after having translated into the Ethiopic language the Commentary of Maldonatus on the Gospels of Matthew and John.

Angeli, Paoli DEGLI (or Paul de Angelis), an Italian antiquary, was born in Syracuse, and died at Rome in 1647 as canon of the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore. He wrote several artistic works, for which see Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Angelic Brothers, an obscure Christian sect, the followers of Johann Georg Gichtel (q. v.), and from him also called Gichtelites.

Angelica (Angelica vestis) is the dress of certain Greek monks of St. Basil. These monks are divided into two classes. Those who have made profession are called monks of the great and angelic habit, and novices are called monks of the lesser habit.

The monkish dress was also so called, which the laity in England were formerly in the habit of putting on shortly before their death, in order to take part in the prayers of the monks. The person thus dressed in the monastic habit in the hour of death is called in old books monachus ad succurrendum. The custom is said to exist still in Spain and Italy.

Angelical Doctor. See AQUINAS.

Angelico, GIOVANNI, da Fiesola, a Dominican friar of Italy, was born in 1387, and was a disciple of Giotto. He was employed by Nicholas V to paint historical subjects in his chapel. He was called by some the Angelic Painter, because he never took up his pencil without a prayer. He always painted religious subjects. He was offered the archbishopric of Florence as a reward for his talents by Nicholas V, but refused the honor. He died in 1448.

Angelicus Codex, of the Greek New Test., belonging to the Angelica Library of the Augustinian monks at Rome (A 2, 15), designated formerly Pasionei (so called after its possessor, the cardinal Pasioni), and designated by the letter G, but now L 2, contains Acts from viii, 10, μὴ τοῦ Θεοῦ, and the Catholic and Pauline epistles down to Heb. xiii, 10, ὅτι ἔχουσιν. It belongs to the 9th century, and was collated by Scholz, Fleck, Tischendorf (1843), and Tregelles (1845). (B. P.)

Angelieri, BONAVENTURA, an Italian monk of the Order of the Minorites of St. Francis, was born at Marsala, in Sicily, near the middle of the 17th century. He is known by the singularity of the titles of two books which he published, followed by twenty-four others on the same subjects. The first is entitled Lux Magica, etc., Cælestium, Terrestrialium, et Inferorum Origo, Ordo, et Subordinatio Cunctorum, quoad Esse, Fieri, et Operari, Vaginti Quatuor Voluminibus Divisa; Pars Prima, etc. (Venice, 1686). This was published under the pseudonym Livio Betani. The second volume was entitled Lux Magica Academica; Pars Secunda, Primordia Rerum Naturalium, Sanabilium, Infirmarum, et Incurabilium Continens, etc. (ibid. 1687). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Angelis, AGOSTINO D', a Roman Catholic divine of Italy, was born in 1606 at Anagni, in Naples. He joined the Order of the Somaschians, and lectured on philosophy and theology at Rome. In 1667 he was made bishop of Umbriatico, and died in 1681. He wrote, Lectiones Theologicae de Deo Clare Viso, Omnia Sciente, nos Prædestinante, ac Omnia Creante in Summam Contractæ (Rome, 1664):—De Deo ut Trino et ut Incarnato (ibid. 1666):—Homologia, seu Consensus Historiarum Ecclesiasticarum cum Sacris Canonibus, Conciliis, etc. (ibid. eod.):—De Recto Usu Opinionis Probabilis (ibid. eod.). See Mazzuchelli, Scrittori d'Italia; Toppi, Biblioth. Napoletana; Ughelli, Italia Sacra. (B. P.)

Angelus appears to have been the immediate successor of Acesius (q. v.) as Novatian bishop at Constantinople, A.D. 345, and to have held his see till his death, in 384. Suffering by the fierce persecution of the Homoousians, he fled from Constantinople (Socrates, Hist. Eccles. ii, 38). As a Homoousian he was persecuted and banished by Valens. He was consulted by Nectarius when Theodosius opened his plan for restoring peace to the divided Church in 383. Doubting his ability in disputation, Angelus deputed his lector, Sisinnius, to represent him. He also named him as his successor, but the people preferring Marcian, he yielded to them on the condition that if Sisinnius outlived Marcian he should be the next bishop.

Angell, George, a Baptist minister, was born at Smithfield, R. I., March 14, 1786. In early life he neglected religious instruction, associated with the profane, and at the age of twenty-one had become a confirmed infidel. Severe illness brought him near death's door, and then he vowed to serve God. He was licensed to preach March 7, 1812; began preaching at Woodstock, Conn., and also preached at Southbridge, Mass. The years 1821–22, and especially 1824, of his ministry were distinguished by rich displays of divine grace. He died Feb. 18, 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, vi, 599.

Angell, John. See ANGEL, JOHN.

Angelo, saint and martyr, a Carmelite, and by family a Jew, was born at Jerusalem in 1185. After having passed many years in a hermitage in the desert of Mount Carmel, he sailed to Sicily, believing that God had called him thither to convert the inhabitants. By his holy example and earnest labors he effected much good, but was assassinated by Belingar (or Berenger), May 5, 1220. His festival is kept on May 5. See Baillet, May.

Angelo and Agostino, Italian architects, were brothers, born at Sienna, and the most illustrious disciples of the school of Giovanni di Pisa. They erected the northern façade of the cathedral, made two new gates to the city, began the church and convent of San Francesco and the Church of Santa Maria, and finished the tower of the Public Palace.

Angelo, Michael (Amerighi Michelangelo da Caravaggio), an Italian painter, was born at Caravaggio, a village in the Milanese, in 1569. While a lad, he was employed to prepare plaster for the fresco-painters of Milan. From seeing them work he became inspired with the ambition to become an artist; and soon, without instruction from any master, became an excellent imitator of nature, and adopted a singular style, characterized by daring lights and shadows, which became highly popular. While young, he lived at Venice, and there studied the works of Giorgione. He afterwards went to Rome, and executed his first production in that city in concert with Cavaliere Giuseppe Cesari. His chief works at Rome are the Crucifixion of St. Peter, in the Church of Santa Maria del Popolo, and the Entombing of Our Saviour, in the Chiesa Nuova. There is a picture by him at Naples of the Scourging of Christ, and in San Martino is another, representing Peter Denying Christ, one of his most famous works. His paintings are characterized by wonderful vigor and admirable distribution of light and shade. He died at Rome in 1609.

Angelocrator (or Engelhardt), DANIEL, a German theologian, was born at Corbach in 1569, and died in 1634, as superintendent and pastor of Roethen. Among other theological works, he wrote, Chronologia Antoptica (Cassel, 1601):—Doctrina de Ponderibus, Mensuris, et Monetis (Marburg, 1617). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Angelology of the Jews. See DÆMONOLOGY.

Angelome was a religious writer of the Benedictine order. The time of his birth is unknown. While young, he entered the Monastery of Luxeuil, and from thence passed to the school of Palais. He then went to the court, where he received much favor from Lothaire. He afterwards retired to Luxeuil, and gave himself up entirely to the work upon the Scriptures. His style was clear and precise. He died in 854. He wrote in Latin commentaries On Genesis:—On the Books of Kings (Rome, 1565):—On the Canticles (Cologne, 1531, by John Praël):—On the Four Gospels. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Angels and Archangels, in Christian art. The early artistic representations of these reproduce the ideas concerning them which have prevailed in the Church, and these come before us in a series of monuments from the 4th to the close of the 14th century.

I. First Centuries.—These monuments are, for the first five hundred years or more, almost exclusively from the West, and probably not earlier than A.D. 400. D'Agincourt (Histoire de l'Art, v, 5) thinks that the earliest of these is a representation of Tobias and the angel in the Cemetery of St. Priscilla, and of the 2d century. The angel has a human figure and the dress commonly assigned to apostles and other Scripture personages, but is without wings.

II. Fourth and Fifth Centuries.—The first representation of angels in mosaic is supposed to be that of the Church of St. Agatha at Ravenna, and believed by Ciampinus to belong to the beginning of the 5th century. The first to which a date can be positively assigned are those in the Church of Santa Maria Maggiore at Rome, put up by Xystus III A.D. 432-440. On the "Arcus Triumphalis" of this church is a series of mosaics of great interest, among them being the Worship of the Magi, in which four archangels appear as ministering to a king, and thus teaching the divinity of Christ. To this period is to be assigned the diptych of Milan, containing angels as created beings doing service unto Christ.

III. Sixth Century.—In this century we notice the following examples: the triumphal arch of the Church of Sts. Cosmas and Damianus at Rome, about 530; and the mosaics of St. Michael the Archangel at Ravenna, about 545.

IV. From A.D. 600 to 800.—Art monuments of this period are few in number, and contain nothing to call for special remark save that, in the 8th century particularly, the wings of angels became more and more curtailed in proportion to the body. One such example in sculpture is Michael and the Dragon. See MICHAEL.

V. Eastern and Greek.—Early monuments of Christian art in the East are very rare, many having been destroyed by the iconoclasts, the Saracens and Turks. The earliest Greek example is a representation of an angel in a MS. of Genesis, Imperial Library at Vienna, believed to be of the 4th or 5th century. It is a human figure, winged, and without nimbus or other special attributes. The fiery sword, etc., spoken of in Gen. iii is there represented not as a sword in the hand of the angel, but as a great wheel of fire beside him. Next in date is the Ascension, in a Syriac MS. of the gospels, A.D. 586, written and illuminated at Zagba, in Mesopotamia, in which is a representation of the order of angels designated as "thrones" and cherubim, known as a Tetramorphon (q. v.). Four other angels in human form and winged are represented as ministering to their Lord; two as bearing him up in their hands, two offering him crowns of victory, while two others minister to men, asking of the apostles, "Why stand ye gazing up into heaven?" According to Dionysius (Celestial Hierarchy), celestial beings are divided into three orders. In the first are the "thrones," the seraphim, and cherubim; in the second are dominions, authorities, and powers; and in the third, principalities, archangels, and angels.

VI. In Later Greek Art.—The language of the Painter's Guide of Panselinos, a monk of Mount Athos in the 11th century, may be regarded as embodying the unchanging rules of Greek religious art from the 8th century to the present time. The writer says, as to the first order, that "the thrones are represented as wheels of fire compassed about with wings; their wings are full of eyes, and the whole is so arranged, as to produce the semblance of a royal throne. The cherubim are represented by a head and two wings. The seraphim have six wings, whereof two rise upward to the head, and two droop to the feet, and two are outspread as if for flight." Of those in the second order he says, "These are clothed in white tunics reaching to the feet, with golden girdles and green outer robes. They hold in the right hand staves of gold, and in the left a seal formed thus ☒." Of the third order he writes, "These are represented vested as warriors, and with golden girdles, and hold in their hands javelins and axes."

VII. Attributes of Angels.—The two sources of information respecting the attributes regarded as proper to angels in these early times are Dionysius and actual monuments. Dionysius says that angels are represented as of human form in regard to the intellectual qualities of man, and of his heavenward gaze, and the lordship and dominion which are naturally his; that bright vesture, and that which is of the color of fire, are symbolical of light and of the divine likeness; while sacerdotal vesture serves to denote their office in leading to divine and mystical contemplations, and the consecration of their whole life unto God. He mentions, also, girdles, staves or rods (significant of royal or princely power), spears and axes, instruments for measurement or of constructive art, among the insignia occasionally attributed to angels. Turning to monuments, we find to be noted,

1. The Human Form.—In the earlier monuments angels were represented as men, and either with or without wings. The prevailing opinion, however, of early Christian writers was that this manifestation was not actual flesh, but only a semblance.

2. Wings.—Heavenly messengers have been represented in all ages of the Church as furnished with wings. As to the number of these wings, two only appear in the earlier representations. No examples of four or of six wings are known earlier than the 9th century.

3. Vesture.—The vesture assigned to angels, in various ages of the Church, has ever been such as was associated in men's minds with the ideas of religious solemnity, and, in the later centuries, of sacerdotal ministry. In the mosaics of the 5th and 6th centuries, at Rome and Ravenna, we find white vestments generally assigned them, resembling those of apostles. In mosaics believed to be of the 7th century (St. Sophia, Thessalonica), angels have colored outer robes over a long white tunic, and their wings colored too, red and blue prevailing—red as the color of flame, and symbolical of holy love; blue as significant of heaven, and of heavenly contemplation or divine knowledge.

4. The Nimbus.—Before the middle of the 5th century angels were sometimes represented without the nimbus, but after that era this ornament is almost invariably assigned to them.

5. The Wand of Power.—Only in exceptional instances, during the first eight centuries, are angels represented as bearing anything in the hand. Three examples may be cited, in mosaics, of the 6th century, at Ravenna, in which angels attendant on our Lord hold wands in their hands, which may either represent the rod of divine power, or, as some have thought, the "golden reed"—the "measuring reed," assigned to the angel in Rev. xxi, 15, as in Ezek. xl, 3. The representations of archangels, particularly of Michael, as warriors with sword, or spear, and girdle, are of later date.

6. Instruments of Music.—In the Ravenna mosaic already referred to, the "Seven Angels" are represented holding trumpets in their hands. In the later traditions of Christian art, representations of angels as the "choristers of heaven" have been far more common, various instruments of music being assigned to them.—Smith, Dict. of Christ. Antiq. s. v.

ANGELS OF CHURCHES (Bishops). It does not appear that the bishops of the primitive Church were commonly spoken of under this title; nor, indeed, did it become the ordinary designation of the episcopal office. Instances, however, of this application of it occur in the early Church historians, as, e. g. in Socrates (lib. iv, c. 28), who so styles Serapion, bishop of Thomaia.

By Presbyterian writers the angel of the vision has been variously interpreted: 1. Of the collective presbytery; 2. Of the presiding presbyter, which office, however, it is contended, was soon to be discontinued in the Church, because of its foreseen corruption; 3. Of the messengers sent from the several churches to St. John.

On the other hand, as St. John is believed on other grounds to have been pre-eminently the organizer of episcopacy throughout the Church, so here in this wonderful vision the holy apostle comes before us very remarkably in this special character; and in the message which he delivers, under divine direction, to each of the seven churches through its angel, many recognise a most important confirmation of the evidence on which they claim for episcopal government the precedent, sanction, and authority of the apostolic age.

Angélus Pacis (the angel of peace). In the ancient Greek Church the catechumens were taught to offer in their prayers a special petition "for the angel of peace." St. Chrysostom often mentions this petition in his Homilies; as in his third, upon the Colossians, where he says, "Every man has angels attending him, and also the devil very busy about him. Therefore we pray and make our supplications for the angel of peace." In a sermon, he tells his auditory, "They might know there were angels of peace by hearing the deacons always in their prayers bidding men pray for the angel of peace." This undoubtedly refers to the forementioned form of prayers, wherein the catechumens are directed to ask of God the protection of "the angel of peace." See Bingham, Christian Antiquities, bk. xiv, ch. v, sec. 4.

Angennes, Charles d', cardinal of Rambouillet, called St. Euphemius, was first bishop of Mons, and during his episcopate the Huguenots seized Mons and devastated Saint-Julien. He was present at the Council of Trent, and went as ambassador of France to Gregory XIII; and died in 1517. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Angennes, Claude d', a French prelate, was born at Rambouillet in 1534. He was bishop of Noyon and peer of France, then bishop of Mons. He studied philosophy at Paris, and law at Bourges and Padua. In 1568 he was sent with an embassy to Cosmo de' Medici. In 1585 he assisted at the assembly of the clergy at Paris, where he eloquently defended the liberty of the Gallican Church. Henry III selected him to bear the news of the death of the duke of Guise and the cardinal of Lorraine to Sixtus V. He died March 15, 1601. He wrote, Remontrance du Clergé de France (1585):—Lettre de l'Évêque du Mons, avec la Réponse faite par un Docteur en Théologie, en laquelle est répondu à ces deux Doutes: Si on peut suivre en sûreté de conscience le parti du Roi de Navarre et le reconnaître pour roi, et si l'acte de Frère Jacques Clément doit être approuvé en conscience, et s'il est louable ou non (Paris, 1589). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anger, RUDOLPH, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in the year 1806 at Dresden, and died, as doctor and professor of theology of the Leipzig University, Oct. 10, 1866, at the Elster watering-place. He published, De Temporum in Actis Apostolorum Ratione (Lips. 1830–33):—Beiträge zur historisch-kritischen Einleitung in das Alte u. Neue Testament (ibid. 1843):—De Onkelo, Chaldaico, quem ferunt Pentateuchi Paraphraste, etc. (ibid. 1846, ii particulæ):—Der Stern der Weisen und das Geburtsjahr Christi (ibid. 1847):—Zur Chronologie des Lehramtes Christi (ibid. 1848):—Synopsis Evangeliorum Matthæi, Marci, Lucæ, cum Locis quæ supersunt Parallela, etc. (ibid. 1852):—Ratio, qua Locis Veteris Testamenti in Evangelio Matthæi Laudantur (ibid. 1861–62, iii particulæ). In connection with W. Dindorf, he edited and annotated the Pastor Hermæ. See Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 30. (B. P.)

Angerbode, in Norse mythology, was a powerful giantess, a Jetten or Jote woman, wife of the evil demon Loki, and by him mother of three frightful monsters—of the abominable goddess of death, Hel (Hela); of Fenris, a wolf, whose open mouth reaches heaven and earth; and of the huge snake Jörmungand.

Angerōna (or Angeronia), in Roman mythology, was a goddess, about whom conflicting stories are found. For the most part, mythologists are agreed that she was the goddess of fear and apprehension. She was represented with a sealed mouth, in explanation of which it was said that secrecy and silence were the best remedy for fear and apprehension. Her statue stood in Rome on the altar of Volupia, goddess of pleasure, by whom she was ruled. Others say her sealed mouth denoted that the name of Rome was to be kept secret.

Angeronalia was a festival in honor of the goddess Angerona, which was celebrated yearly on Dec. 12, when sacrifices were offered to her in the Temple of Volupia at Rome.

Angers, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Andegavense). Angers is an episcopal city of France, sixty-seven leagues from Paris. Several synods were held there.

I. Held in 453, in order to consecrate a bishop to the see of Angers; Leo, archbishop of Bourges, presided. The council, before separating, made twelve canons for the better maintenance of discipline. The first is to the effect that since the emperor had granted to the bishops the power of trying civil causes, the clergy should, in every case of difference among themselves, apply to them instead of the lay authorities. The clergy were forbidden to engage in any secular business. Wandering monks were to be excommunicated; assaults and mutilation were forbidden. The fourth canon deprives those of the clergy who would not abstain from intercourse with all "strange" women, i. e. all who were not near relations.

II. This council was held about 1056, against Berenger (q. v.), who maintained that the body and blood of our Lord are not really present in the eucharist, etc. He was condemned in twelve councils, of which this is one.

III. Held Oct. 22, 1279, by John de Menseoreau, archbishop of Tours. Five canons were made, one of which punished excommunicated clergy with the loss of the profits of their benefices as long as the period of excommunication lasted. The second canon forbids the bishop's officials to require any fee for sealing letters of orders, under pain of suspension or excommunication.

IV. This council was held March 12, 1365, by Simon Renoul, archbishop of Tours, and seven of his suffragans. Thirty-four articles were drawn up, the first relating to proceedings at law, others to the immunities of the Church, and a few tend directly to the correction of morals.

V. A provincial council of Touraine was held at Angers in July, 1448, by John, archbishop of Tours, with his suffragans. Seventeen regulations were made for the reformation of abuses. The third orders all priests to say the Office for the Dead, with three lessons at least, every day that was not a holyday. The fourth forbids giving the daily distribution to those of the clergy who were not present at the holy office. The fifth forbids all talking in the choir. The council also orders, in canon seven, that the Word of God should be preached only in churches, and with becoming dignity; and forbids the preacher to make use of loud cries or extravagant gestures: it also forbids clandestine marriages, and the silly tumult and noise made in derision when any one marries a second or third time, commonly called charivari.

VI. Held in 1583, being a continuation of one held at Tours in the same year, which, on account of the plague, which had broken out in that city, was transferred to Angers. Several regulations were made: First, upon the subject of holy baptism, directions were given as to the choice of god-parents; it was also forbidden to rebaptize, even conditionally, in cases where that sacrament had been administered by heretics, provided the matter and form of words and intention had been preserved. Secondly, confirmation, the holy eucharist, the sacrifice of the mass, marriage, orders, the celebration of the festivals, and the worship of relics were treated of. Thirdly, the subjects of reform, ecclesiastical discipline, the duty of bishops, canons, curates, etc., were discussed; among other regulations, the monks were ordered to preserve the tonsure large and distinct, and to shave their beards. Fourthly, a rigid abstinence from meat every Wednesday and during all Advent was enjoined them. With respect to nuns, it was forbidden to appoint any one to be abbess or prioress under forty years of age and eight of profession.

Matters concerning the burial of the dead, ecclesiastical jurisdiction, visitations, the preservation of ecclesiastical property, seminaries, schools, and universities were also discussed in this council, and the regulations agreed upon were confirmed by a bull of Gregory XIII of the same year, and published by order of king Henry III. See Labbé, Concil. xv, 1001.

Angeya, in Norse mythology, was one of the nine Jote, or giant, maidens, who bore the god Heimdall on the border of the earth. They were all mother to him, Odin being his father.

Angilbert, archbishop of Milan, lived in the first half of the 9th century. Being called to the archiepiscopacy in 828, he applied himself first to the re-establishing of discipline in his diocese, and summoned from France two monks, Leutgaire and Nildemar, who assisted him in this work of reform. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Angiolillo (called Roccadrame), a Neapolitan painter, lived about 1450, and studied under Antonio Solario. Dominici says he painted some works for the churches at Naples, one of the best being a picture in the Church of San Lorenzo, representing the Virgin and Infant, with saints. He died about 1458.

Angiolini, FRANCESCO, an Italian Jesuit, was born in 1738. He studied at Bologna, and was appointed professor of literature at the college of the Jesuits in Modena. He died in 1788. At the period of the suppression of this order in Italy, he retired to Verona, where he translated into Italian the history of the Jews, by Josephus—Giuseppe Flavio, Delle Antichità dei Giudei (Verona, 1779–80; Rome, 1792; Milan, 1821). He also translated into Italian several tragedies of Sophocles and Euripides—Elettra, Edipo, Antigone:—Tragedie di Sofocle, e il Ciclope di Euripide, Traduzione Illustrata con Note (Rome, 1782). The translator here united certain poems in Italian, Latin, Greek, and Hebrew. At the tidings that the empress Catherine of Russia accorded an asylum to the members of the Order of Jesuits, Angiolini went to Russia with his two brothers, and became professor in the newly founded universities of Polotsk, Witepsk, Mohilov, and Moscow. He left in manuscript a history of his order after its establishment in Russia, continued by Ignatius Peter Buoni down to 1830. It is uncertain whether or not this work was ever published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Angras, in Hindû mythology, are certain deities emanating from Brahma, to whom he committed the power of creation. Other similar deities are Atri, Bhri-gu, Daksha, Marilshi, Narada, Palaha, Pilastya, and Varishka.

Angitia (the strangler), in Roman mythology, was a goddess of the inhabitants round about the Fucian Sea, who, well versed in the knowledge of poisons and their antidotes, received her name from her skill in strangling snakes. Some have placed her in Grecian mythology, and have therefore called her a daughter of Aetes, and thus a sister of Medea.

Angles, JOSEPH, was a Franciscan of the province of Compostella, and native of Valencia, Spain, who rendered himself famous in the 16th century. He governed the Reformed nuns of Madrid in the quality of confessor, and finally was raised to the see of Bosa, in Sardinia. He wrote, Flores Theologicarum Questionum, in Primum Librum Sententiarum (Lyons, 1584):—Flores in Secundum Librum Sentent. (ibid. 1587, 1597):—Flores in Tertium Librum Sentent.:—Flores in Quartum Librum (Burgos, 1585).—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Anglican Councils, a designation given to the English general councils, of which the precise locality is unknown; e. g. A.D. 756, one of bishops, presbyters, and abbots, held by archbishop Cuthbert to appoint June 5 to be kept in memory of the martyrdom of St. Boniface and his companions; A.D. 797 or 798, held by Ethelheard preparatory to his journey to Rome, to oppose the archbishopric of Lichfield.

Anglo-Calvinists is a name given by some writers to the members of the Church of England, as agreeing with the other Calvinists in most points excepting Church government.

Anglo-Saxon Versions. The gospels, besides being published by Marshall and Thorpe, were also published in 1865 by Bosworth; and an admirable edition of the Anglo-Saxon gospels is now in course of publication at the Cambridge University Press, under the editorship of the Rev. W. W. Skeat. In this edition the readings of all the MSS., including the Lindisfarne and Rushworth glosses, are carefully given. Excellent descriptions of the MSS. and of the printed editions are furnished in the introductions to part ii (St. Mark) and part iii (St. Luke). (B. P.)

Ango, PIERRE, a French Jesuit, lived in the last half of the 17th century. He taught mathematics at Caen, and wrote several works on physics: L'Optique, divisée en trois livres, ou l'on démontre: 1°. La Propagation et les Propriétés de la Lumière; 2°. La Vision; 3°. La Figure et la Disposition des Verres qui servent à la perfectionner (Paris, 1682):—Pratique Générale des Fortifications, pour les tracer sur le papier et sur le terrain sans avoir égard à aucune méthode particulière (Moulins, 1679). He also wrote other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Angrādus. See ANGRADUS.

Angouleme, LOUIS EMMANUEL DE VALOIS, duc d', a French noble and prelate, was born in 1596. He was at first comte d'Alais, then bishop of Agde, and finally turned soldier. He became governor of Provence in 1637, succeeded to the dukedom in 1650, and died in 1658.

Angriani (Aygriani, or Aygnani), MICHAEL (more commonly known as Michael of Bologna, where he was born about the middle of the 14th century and entered the order of Carmelites), studied at Paris, and in 1354 was named regent of the Carmelite convent in that city; subsequently, about 1372, he was appointed definitor of the province of Bologna. The great schism which divided the Roman Church after the death of Gregory XI caused vast division also among the religious orders, and especially among the Carmelites. The convents of France, Spain, Scotland, and Naples attached themselves to the party of Clement VII, as did also Bernard, the seventeenth general of the order, who for that reason was deposed by pope Urban; and in a general chapter held at Bruges in 1379, and in another at Milan in 1381, Michael Angriani was elected in his place. However, in 1386, he was deposed by Urban himself without any cause being assigned, upon which he retired into the convent at Bologna, where he died, Nov. 16, 1400 (according to the most probable opinion; Trithemius says in 1416). His works are, Questiones Disputatæ in Libros IV Sentent. (Milan, 1510).—Commentaria in Psalmos, commonly called opus auctoris incogniti (Alcala, 1524).—a work on the Conception of the Blessed Virgin.—a book on St. Matthew's Gospel.—a book on St. Luke.—Postils on St. John.—Postils on the Apocalypse.—Sermons.—Dictionarium Divinum (unfinished).—and many others.

Anguaragen, in Hindû mythology, was the planet Ciowa, or Mongalen (our Mars); also the genius Div, over whom he rules, and whom he leads through his great path.

Anguier, MICHEL, a celebrated French sculptor, and brother of François, was born at Eu, Normandy, in 1612. He visited Rome in 1641, where he became the pupil of Algardi. He executed works for the sculptor of St. Peter's and for the palaces of several cardinals. In 1651 he returned to Paris and assisted his brother in his works for the mausoleum of the duke of Montmorency, his greatest work. Michel made for queen Anne of Austria the principal sculptures in the Church of Val de Grâce, of which the Nativity, in marble over the altar, is considered his masterpiece; also the sculptures of the great altar of St. Denis de la Chartre. This artist was professor of the Academy of Arts in Paris, and wrote fourteen discourses on sculpture. He died at Paris in 1686.

Anguli Mala, in Hindû mythology, are the books which the Hindûs generally call Karrick, after a pious philosopher, who had been taught by Buddha himself.

Angus, JOHN, a Dissenting minister, was born at Styford, Northumberland, England, in July, 1724. When sixteen years old, he entered the University of Edinburgh, where he remained two years; afterwards removed to London, and studied under the tuition of Mr. Eames and Dr. Marryat; was ordained to the pastorate of the Dissenting congregation in Bishop's Stortford, Herts, Oct. 26, 1748, which he held till the time of his death, Dec. 22, 1802. Mr. Angus belonged to the Calvinistic school of thought, yet was singularly free from any bitterness towards those who conscientiously differed with him. In all the duties of the pastoral office, he was diligent and faithful; in those of friendship and good neighborhood, almost unparalleled. See Theological Magazine, April, 1803, p. 138.

Angusius (1), a Scottish bishop, became bishop of the Isles in 1427, and was witness to a charter in the same year. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 304.

Angusius (2), a Scottish bishop, was made bishop of the Isles Nov. 25, 1476. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 305.

Anh-naru, the Egyptian abode or heaven of Osiris.

Anhur (that which brings to heaven) was an Egyptian deity who is always represented as in a marching attitude and robed in long clothing. He wears a head-dress of four plumes, with the usual Uraeus serpent of celestial deity. He holds a cord in his hands, which is supposed to symbolize one of the forces of the universe. He was a form also of the solar god, Shu, and in that character he had for his consort the goddess Tefnut (the heavenly bow). He was the Anuris, or Egyptian Mars, of the Greek writers. Anhur was chiefly worshipped in the city and nome of Abot, which was situated on the eastern bank of the Nile, in the Thebaid, and was afterwards called by the Greeks Thinitia.

Anianus, ST., the successor of St. Mark in the patriarchate of ALEXANDRIA, was a shoemaker whom Mark is said to have converted soon after his entrance into the city, and whom he is said to have established on the episcopal chair two years afterwards. St. Anianus governed the Church of Alexandria about twenty-two years—viz. four years under Mark, and eighteen years after his death. He is supposed to have died Nov. 26, A.D. 86; nevertheless, the Roman martyrology marks his festival April 25—viz. on the festival of his master, St. Mark. See Baillet, April 25.

Anianus (called also Adrianus by Sozomen), presbyter of ANTIOCH, was ordained bishop of that Church at the Council of Seleucia, A.D. 359, in the room of Eudoxius, who, together with Acacius and others, had been deposed. The Acacian party immediately arrested the newly made bishop, and delivered him into the hands of the civil authorities, by whom he was sent into exile. The subsequent fortunes of Anianus are unknown. Nicephorus gives four years to his episcopate, but his numbers are not to be trusted.

Anianus, an EGYPTIAN monk who lived about the year A.D. 401. He composed a Chronology, in part agreeing with, and partly differing from, Eusebius. It is mentioned by Georgius Syncellus.

Anianus, ST. (vulgarly called St. Agnan), bishop of ORLEANS, was born in the 4th century at Vienne, on the Rhone. In his early youth he left his home and retired to a cell which he had built for himself, where he spent his time in reading, prayer, and mortification. After a time he left his solitude to place himself among the disciples of St. Euvertus, bishop of Orleans, whose great fame had reached him. By this bishop he was made priest and abbot of St. Laurent-des-Orgeris, in the vicinity of the city, and ultimately became his successor in the see. By his worth and merits he delivered the city of Orleans from the army of Attila, and died, it is said, soon after (Nov. 17, A.D. 453), having occupied the see sixty-two years. His festival is kept Nov. 17. The history of his life, which was extant in the time of Gregory of Tours, is now lost. See Baillet, Nov. 17.

Anichini, PIETRO, an Italian engraver, lived in the 17th century. His principal works are, A Holy Family (1655).—The Good Samaritan.—and the Portrait of Cosmo of Tuscany.

Anignon, MICHAEL. See ANINYON.

Animals or living creatures are often represented in sacred buildings within mouldings and on tombs merely as ornaments from early days, such as dolphins, doves, griffins, monsters, birds, and the like. In the mediæval period, effigies rest their feet on a lion or dog, the types of constancy and strength; but in the catacomb and church, the lion, the horse, the lamb, the hart, the stag, the dove, peacocks, and fish are emblems. The lion represented vigilance; the lamb, innocence; the hart, flight from sin; the hare or the horse alluded to the Christian course (1 Cor. ix, 24; 2 Tim. iv, 7); the dolphin typified speed and diligence, and, from heathen fables of Ælian and Pliny, loving affection; while birds, among foliage and flowers, portrayed the deliverance of the souls of the blessed from their earthly habitations (Psa. cxxiv, 6). In the ceremony of canonization, the pope is offered, among other presents, caged birds, as emblematical of the virtues of saints. Doves and serpents refer to Matt. x, 16. See SYMBOLISM.

Animals, SACRED. The system of zoolatry, or animal-worship, was said to have been introduced into Egypt by king Kekau, of the 2d dynasty; and the chief sacred animals and reptiles which were adored either as incarnations or servants of the various deities were—

The bull Apis, sacred to Osiris; the bull Mnevis, sacred to Osiris; the bull Pacis, unknown; the cat, sacred to Bast; the cobra or Uraeus serpent, sacred to all the deities; the cow, sacred to Athor; the crocodile, sacred to Sebek; the cynocephalus baboon, sacred to Thoth; the eel, sacred to Atum; the fish Latns, sacred to Isis; the frog, sacred to Haket; the hippopotamus, sacred to Thôris; the ibis, sacred to Thoth; the juckal, sacred to Anubis; the lapwing, sacred to Osiris; the lion, sacred to Sekhet; the ram, sacred to Ptah and Khnum; the scarabæus beetle, sacred to Kheper Ra; the scorpion, sacred to Selk; the sparrow-hawk, sacred to Horus; the shrew-mouse, sacred to Buto; the vulture, sacred to Mant.

Animuccia, GIOVANNI, an eminent Italian composer of sacred music, was born at Florence in the last years of the 15th century. At the request of St. Philip Neri, he composed a number of Laudes, or hymns of praise, to be sung after sermon, out of which the oratorio was developed. In 1555 he was appointed maestro di cappella at St. Peter's, an office which he held until his death, in 1571. Many of his compositions are still preserved in MS. in the Vatican Library. His chief published works were Madrigali e Motetti a Quattro e Cinque Voci (Ven. 1548), and Il Primo Libro di Messa (Rom. 1567). See Encyclop. Brit. 9th ed. s. v.

Anin is one of the mystical deities of the Egyptian Ritual of the Dead.

Aninyon (or Anignon), MICHAEL, a Spanish ecclesiastic, was born of an honest but obscure family at Saragossa. He attached himself chiefly to the study of ecclesiastical history, and discharged for fifteen years the office of consulter to the Inquisition. In 1578 or 1588 he printed a work on the primacy of St. Peter and the unity of the Church, entitled Tractatus de Unitate Orbis et Pastoris, which he himself declares that he had read through a hundred times. It is in the Biblioth. Pontif. of Rocaberti, xvi, 333. He was nominated bishop of Algarve, and died Nov. 24, 1654.

Aniran, in Persian mythology, is an Ized, a genius of the pure light, and the spiritual essence of fire and water united, in which form he surrounds the canopy of heaven. This genius is present at weddings, and the 30th day of each month is consecrated to him, under his name, and is generally observed as a holiday.

Anit (the Lady of Horns) is another form of the goddess Hathor, or Athor.

Anite. On the Mariana Islands there is a belief that the spirits of departed men (Anites) are certain beings that plague those who are left; therefore flower-pots are placed beside the dead body, and the spirit is prayed to settle down on them. Others seek to keep the spirit away by fasting, because they know how to plague men in dreams.

Aniwa Version of the Scriptures. This dialect is spoken in the island of Aniwa, Australia. The Gospels of St. Matthew and St. Luke, translated by the Rev. J. G. Paton, of Aniwa, were printed in 1877 at Melbourne. (B. P.)

Anjecahbo, JOHN, an Ojibway Indian, was born in Upper Canada about 1807. He was a noted hunter and great medicine-man. Converted to Christianity when his first child was born, he began immediately to preach the Gospel. He was ordained in 1860, and labored at Sangeen in connection with the Congregational Indian Missionary Society. He died in July, 1874, strong in the faith. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1875, p. 310.

Anjos, LUIZ DOS, a Portuguese monk born at Oporto, lived in the beginning of the 17th century. He entered the Order of the Hermits of St. Augustine, and became confessor to Alexis de Menezes, archbishop of Prague. He conceived the design of writing the history of his order in the form of annals, and for that purpose traversed Spain, France, and Italy to collect materials; he, however, only published the Life of St. Augustine (Coimbra, 1612), and died in 1625. He also wrote the Garden of Portugal, an account of some of the saints and illustrious women of that country.

Anka, in Oriental mythology, was a monstrous bird that had the power of reason and speech. He still lives on the mountain of Kar, and was in the world before Adam. The Persians call him Simorg, the Talmud Jukneh.

Anka, a minor Egyptian goddess, was the wife of Khnum the creating spirit, and the Anucis of the Greek writers.

Anker-hold is the cell or place of abode of an anchorite or anchoress.

Anker-hut is a North-country term for the hut of an anchorite.

Ankh (life) is the name given by the ancient Egyptians to the emblem in the form of a handled cross, somewhat resembling the Tau of St. Anthony's cross. The cause of its significance is unknown, but as an emblem of life it is always borne in the hands of the gods, and symbolically laid on the lips of the mummy to revive it, or held over the king at his mystical baptism. As a hieroglyphic, it is simply the determinative of all things relating to the ear. It is the most common of all the Egyptian symbols.

Ankham, in Egyptian mythology, is a peculiar sacred flower. It was probably the lotus.

Anmantf, among the ancient Egyptians, was the name of a high sacerdotal dignity, the emblem and vestment of which was a panther's skin, and the long lock of hair peculiar to the infantile Horus. The title is said to mean literally "husband of his mother." It was specially connected with the worship of the Ithyphallic god Khem.

Anmeruther (salt lake of the sea), in Egyptian mythology, is a mystical lake near the heavenly Nile in Hades. It is figured in the vignette to ch. cx of the Ritual of the Dead.

Anmutf is a mystical epithet applied to the eye of Horus in ch. cxxxvii of the Ritual of the Dead.

Ann (or Annat), in Scotch law, signifies the half-year's stipend payable for the vacant half-year after the death of a clergyman, to which his family or nearest of kin have right, under an act of the Scottish Parliament passed in 1672. It is a right that does not belong to the clergyman himself, but to his next of kin absolutely, and therefore can neither be assigned nor disposed of by him, nor attached for his debts. See ANNATES.

Anna was the Accadian name of the god Anu.

Anna Comnena. See COMNENA, ANNA.

Anna, Matthew, was a Dominican of Cefalu, in Sicily, who rendered himself celebrated in the 17th century by his Italian poetry. He published at Palermo, in 1641, a poetical paraphrase of Psa. cxviii, and the tragedies of Thomas Aquinas and St. Margaret.

Anna Perenna, in Roman mythology, was a goddess or nymph whom the Romans honored in a joyous feast, which was annually held on March 15. She is often confounded with Anna, sister of Dido. The story runs as follows: After the death of Dido, Jarbas, king of the Gætuli, conquered Carthage, causing Anna to flee to Battus, king of Malta; and when her brother, Pygmalion, threatened her and Battus with war, she fled to Italy to Æneas; but here also danger threatened her from the jealousy of Lavinia. Warned by Dido in a dream, Anna threw herself into the river Numicius, and was afterwards honored as nymph of the river under the name of Anna Perenna. Some call Anna Perenna the goddess of the moon, others a nymph who brought up Jupiter. As Anna is the feminine of the Latin year, and Perenna signifies duration, she probably is an ancient Italian goddess of the ever-returning year. Her festival, occurring in the spring of the year, when the earth begins to yield fruits, possibly suggests the thought that the old saying of the distribution of bread by her to starving Roman soldiers belongs to the oldest representations of her being, and that the conception of her as a river nymph denotes the fertilizing virtue of water.

Annalist, an officer in a religious house who was authoritatively and solemnly commissioned by its ruler or chapter to write the annals of the institution, and to record such public events as bore upon religious or ecclesiastical questions. Many such annals and records have been preserved and printed.

Annals (or Annals), in Church phrase, is (1) a term used to describe anniversary masses for the faithful departed in general, which were commonly said on All-souls'-day, or for the souls of particular individuals upon the anniversary of their decease. These latter were sometimes solemnized half-yearly, or on the festival of the departed person's patron saint. Other terms for annals were Year-minds and Obits. (2.) The written records of religious houses. (3.) This term was also secondarily applied to masses said for deceased persons, either daily or weekly, throughout the year succeeding their decease, or annually, on the anniversary of their decease, for the space of three, seven, or twenty-one years.

Annan, John Ebenezer, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Baltimore, Md., about 1803. He prepared for college in the Classical School at Gettysburg, Pa., and graduated at Dickinson College in 1824. On his graduation, he was chosen professor of mathematics in Miami University, Oxford, O.; but remained there only a few years, when he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, and after attending one session, was licensed May 16, 1829. He labored for a few months as a missionary in Ohio, and was ordained as an evangelist at Baltimore in December of the same year. He was installed as pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Petersburg, Va., July 10, 1830; but was stricken down with a fever, and died Aug. 10 of the same year. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv, 14.

Annan, Robert, an Associate Reformed minister, was born in the town of Cupar, Fife, Scotland, in 1742. He was educated at the University of St. Andrews, and studied theology under the venerable Alexander Moncrieff, one of the original Seceders. He was licensed by the Associate Presbytery of Perth when only about nineteen years of age, and shortly after sent by the Synod as a missionary to the American colonies. He arrived in New York in the summer of 1761, and, after four years of labor as an itinerant, he was ordained and installed as pastor at Neelytown, N. Y., in 1765. During the struggle for independence, Mr. Annan was a warm advocate of the American cause, and labored both publicly and privately to that end. In 1783 he removed to Boston as pastor of the Federal Street Church. In 1786 he accepted a call from the Old Scots Church, Spruce Street, Philadelphia. He removed to Baltimore in 1801 or 1802, where he remained in charge of a new congregation formed in that city until 1812. He then retired to a home which he had purchased in York County, Pa., where he remained until his death, Dec. 5, 1819. He published, An Overture Illustrating and Defending the Doctrines of the Westminster Confession of Faith (1787):—A Concise and Faithful Narrative of the Steps that led to the Division in the Associate Body of the United States (1789):—Animadversions on the Doctrine of Universal Salvation (1790):—and The Connection between Civil Government and Religion (cod.). See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iv, 11.

Annap (God) is the Turanian word for the idea of deity in the abstract. It is derived from An, "a star."

Annat (or Anats), François, a French ecclesiastic, was born at Rodez, Feb. 5, 1590, and became a Jesuit in 1607. He was professor of philosophy at Toulouse six years, and of divinity seven years. He was invited to Rome to act as censor-general of the books published by the Jesuits and theologian to the general of the society. On his return to his own province, he was appointed rector of the colleges of Montpellier and Toulouse. In 1645 he assisted as deputy of his province at the eighth Congregation General of the Jesuits, held at Rome. He was appointed to discharge the office of provincial of France, and while engaged in this he was chosen confessor to the king (1654), which office he filled for sixteen years. He died at Paris June 14, 1670. He wrote several books, some in Latin, which were published in 3 vols. 4to (Paris, 1666).

Annat, Pierre, a French ecclesiastical writer, nephew of François, was born in 1638 at Villecontat, in Rouergue. He was for a time professor of philosophy at Toulouse, and entered the Congregation of the Christian Doctrine, of which he was elected general in 1694. He was an excessively modest man, of perfect simplicity and honesty. He died at Paris in 1715. He wrote Methodicus ad Positivam Theologiam Apparatus, in Gratiam Candidatorum (Paris, 1700; Venice, 1701). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anne, St. See ANNA, St.

Annedotus, a Chaldean fish-deity, a form of Hea, said to have had the body of a fish entire, but underneath his fish's head to have had a human head, while human feet appeared under his tail. This monster was said to spend the whole day among men without taking any food, teaching them letters, science, and the principles of every art, the rules for the foundation of towns, the building of temples, the measurement and boundaries of lands, seed-time and harvest—all that could advance civilization; and then at sunset he returned to the sea, and passed the night in the vast region of waves, for he was amphibious. See Lenormant, Chaldean Magic, p. 157.

Annemondus (otherwise spelled Aunemondus, Chanemundus, Enemundus, and commonly St. Chaimond), saint and martyr, was bishop of Lyons, and was also called Dalfnus. He succeeded Viventius in the see of Lyons about the middle of the 7th century. Mild, humble, prudent, just, and full of zeal and vigilance, he discharged all the duties of a faithful bishop. About 660, under the ministry of Bathilda, widow of Clovis II, he was accused of a state crime, and upon the strength of a royal order for him to attend court to justify himself, he was inveigled into a journey thither and murdered on the road, in the territory of Châlons-sur-Saône. His body was transported to Lyons, and his festival is kept Sept. 28.

Annenberg, in German antiquity, is a mountain near Schöningen, in Brunswick, on which was a heathen altar for sacrifices. The superstition of the people tells of nightly dances of the spirits of forefathers, and many fables of spirit appearances are recounted.

Annibal, cardinal-priest of St. Clement, and arch-priest of the basilica of the Vatican, was sent in 1710 into Austria as nuncio extraordinary. In 1727 he published at Urbino the following work, Menologium Græcorum, Jussu Basilii Imperatoris Græce olim Editum, Munificentia et Liberalitate S. P. Benedicti XIII in Tres Partes Divisum, etc., in Mag. Biblioth. Eccles. p. 473.

Annigoni, GIOVANNI, one of the first-fruits of the Methodist mission in Italy, was born at Parma in 1835. He labored for several years in his native place as a local preacher. Four years before his death he was called into the ministry, and in Padua, where he first labored in this capacity, his preaching was very popular, and he gave promise of usefulness. His last station was Pavia. He died Nov. 24, 1872. See Minutes of the British Wesleyan Conference, 1873, p. 46.

Anninga, in Greenland mythology, is the personified moon, the brother of Malina (sun). Like most of the deities of the Greenlanders, these gods were once men. Anninga loved his beautiful sister, and in order to draw near to her unknown, he extinguished all the lights at a festival and looked for Malina. The latter, in order to discover her unknown lover, made her hands black with soot, and rubbed it on the face of him clasping her in his arms. Thereupon she fled out of the hut and lighted some moss to see who her lover was. The latter, however, advanced towards her, and she was compelled to flee, as he did not desist from his pleasure. He lighted a fagot, which soon went out, and he was compelled to follow her in her own light; for which reason the moon gives a more dim light than the sun. He became the moon, and she was changed into the sun, always followed around by Anninga. Plagued by his passion, he does not eat, and gets thinner and thinner (last quarter), until he disappears entirely (new moon); then he goes hunting sea-lions, and returns stronger and better-looking (first quarter), until he appears in all his beauty and splendor (full moon). The spots on the moon are the marks of the soot which Malina rubbed on his face.

Annōna, in Roman mythology, is the blessed goddess of the yearly harvest. She was prayed to for rich gifts of the field and cheap prices of food, and was represented as a female, her right shoulder bare, otherwise dressed. In her right hand she carried an ear of corn, in the left a cornucopia.

Annoni, HIERONYMUS, a Reformed theologian of Switzerland, was born Sept. 12, 1697, at Basle, where he prepared himself for the ministry. In 1739 he was called as pastor to Wallenburg, where he died, Oct. 10, 1770. He was one of the prominent preachers of the Gospel in his day, and the author of many hymns, which were published in 1739 under the title Erbaulicher Christenschatz, and which formed the basis for the Basle hymn-book published in 1743. See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, vi, 95 sq.; Hagenbach, Kirchengeschichte des 18. und 19. Jahrhunderts (Basle), p. 182 sq. (B. P.)

Annotinum Pascha, a festival celebrated, according to some authorities, on the day following the octave of Easter. It is placed on the Thursday before Ascension-day in an ancient ritual of Vienne; but later authorities mention it as having been celebrated on various days, as on the Saturday after Easter-day.

As to the meaning of the expression there are various opinions. Several of the older authorities supposed it to be the anniversary of the Easter of the preceding year. If this anniversary was specially observed, when it fell in the Lent of the actual year it would naturally be omitted or transferred to a period when the fast was over. Probably, however, Annotinum Pascha is a term equivalent to anniversary Pascha; and it is so called because in olden times at Rome those who had been baptized at Easter celebrated the anniversary of their baptism in the next year by solemn services. To this calling to mind of baptismal vows the collects of the Gregorian sacramentary for the day refer. It had become obsolete before 1100.

Annals. See ANNALS.

Annuellars are chaplain priests who celebrated the commemoration masses for the departed on their annals. Their usual pay was three marks yearly. At Exeter there were twenty-four, who acted as subdeacons in choir; at Wells, fourteen: both corporations lived in a collegiate manner. The name was preserved at Llandaff so late as 1575.

Annulet (a little ring) is a small, flat fillet encircling a column, etc., used either by itself or in connection with other mouldings. It is used, several times repeated, under the ovolo or echinus of the Doric capital.

Annulets Repeated.

Anunnaci, in the magical texts, is the name of certain Assyrian deities, the offspring of the deity Anu, or the sky. They inhabited the lower world, and were called the deities of the earth.

Anos, in Græco-Babylonian mythology, was the son of Kissare and Assaros, and the first member of the Divine Triad. His analogue was the Anu of the Assyrians.

Anouke was an Egyptian warlike goddess, possibly of Syrian origin, represented as a woman with a spear in her hand, and with a peculiar crown formed of high feathers curving outwardly from a white bonnet upon her head. She was the third member of the great Nubian Triad, and her worship dates to the period of Osirtesen III, of the 12th dynasty. Her festival took place on the 28th of Paophi and the 30th of Athyr.

Anp, in ancient Egyptian mythology, was one of the sacred names of the ram deity Mendes.

Anqt was another form of the name of the Egyptian goddess Anouke.

Anquetil, LOUIS PIERRE, a French ecclesiastic and historian, was born in Paris, Jan. 21, 1723. He became director of the Academy at Rheims, and in 1757 published a history of that city. In 1759 he became prior of the Abbey de la Roë in Anjou, and soon after director of the College of Senlis. In 1766 he obtained the curacy or priory of Château-Renard, near Montargis, which he exchanged at the commencement of the Revolution for the curacy of La Villette, in the neighborhood of Paris. During the Reign of Terror, he was imprisoned at Saint-Lazare. He became a member of the second class of the National Institute, and was soon after employed in the office of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. He died Sept. 6, 1808. He left a number of historical works; but his style is not commendable, and he seems to lack the elements of a true historian. For a list of his works, see Biographie Universelle, s. v.

Anru, a name of the Egyptian Elysium, which occurs in the Ritual of the Dead.

Anrutf (the sterile) was the Egyptian name of one of the mystical regions of Hades. It is described in ch. xvii of the Ritual of the Dead. It was also the northern gate of the house of Osiris in the Egyptian Karneter.

Ansab (statues) was the name given by the Koranic writers to the sacred stones, or bostylia, which were worshipped and anointed with oil by the ancient Arabians.

Ansaldi, Carlo Agostino, brother to Casto I., was born Sept. 23, 1771, and assumed the habit of the Order of St. Dominic. He is well known by his beautiful poetical effusions, all of which are consecrated to divine subjects, but he was not less celebrated as a preacher.

Ansaldi, Casto Innocente, an Italian anti-quarian, was born May 7, 1710, at Piacenza. In 1726 he joined the Order of the Dominicans, and studied at

Bologna and Rome. In 1735 he went to Naples as professor of philosophy; in 1745 he was made professor of theology at Brescia; went to Ferrara in 1750; then to Turin, where he died, in 1774. He wrote, Patriarchæ Josephi Religio a Criminationibus Basnagii Vindicata (Naples, 1738, and often):—De Martyribus sine Sanguine altera adv. Dodwellum Diss. (Milan, 1744):—De Fœrensi Judæorum Buccina (Brescia, 1745):—Herodiani Infanticidii Vindicatio (ibid. 1746):—De Authenticis S. Scripturarum apud SS. Patres Lectionibus (Verona, 1747):—De Futuro Sæculo ab Hebræis ante Captivitatem Cognito (Milan, 1748):—De Baptismate in Spiritu S. et Igni (ibid. 1752), etc. See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, Suppl. s. v.; Mazzuchelli, Scrittori d' Italia, s. v. (B. P.)

Ansaldi, Giovanni Andrea, an Italian oil and fresco painter, was born, according to Soprani, at Voltri, a small town near Genoa, in 1584. His principal work was the cupola in the Church of the Santissima Annunziata at Genoa. There are many of his works in the churches and palaces of that city. He died in 1638.

Ansalmi, Giordano, an Italian missionary, was born at Sant' Angelo, in Sicily. He pursued his studies at Salamanca, and became a Dominican. In 1625 he was sent to the Philippine Islands, where he was appointed to serve the sick-hospital at Manilla. Here he learned the Chinese language, and in 1632 was chosen to go as a missionary to the Christians in Japan. He died a martyr, Nov. 18, 1634. He completed a Latin translation of the Lives of the saints of his order, from the Spanish of Ferdinand Castillo.

Ansalmi, Vincenzo, a Bolognese historical painter, lived, according to Lanzi, about 1615, and studied under Ludovico Caracci. He has some fine works in the chapel of the family of Fioraventi, in the Church of Santo Stefano at Bologna, representing the Martyrdom of St. Sebastian; and in the Church of the Celestine Monks there is a fine work representing the Virgin and Infant in the clouds, with Sts. Roch and Sebastian beneath. Zani says he died young.

Ansar was an early Chaldean deity, after whom the town of Assur was named.

Ansart, André Joseph, a French historian and ecclesiastical writer, was born in Artois in 1723, became a Benedictine, and attached himself to the Order of Malta. He was an advocate of Parliament and doctor of laws of the faculty of Paris. He was also made prior of Villeconin, and a member of the academies of Arras and the Arcadia of Rome. He died in 1790. The works of Ansart are, Exposition sur le Cantique des Cantiques de Salomon (1770, 12mo):—Histoire de St. Maur, Abbé de Glanfeuil (1772, 12mo):—Esprit de St. Vincent de Paul (1780, 12mo):—Histoire de St. Fiacre (1784).

Ansart, Louis Joseph Auguste, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born at Aubigny, in the diocese of Arras, in 1748, and died about 1790. He was prior-rector at Grand-Pré, Ardennes, and published, Bibliothèque Littéraire du Maine, ou Traité Historique et Critique des Auteurs de cette Province (Châlons-sur-Marne, 1784); this work of 8 vols. remains unfinished:—Vie de Grégoire Cortes, Bénédictin, Evêque d'Urbain et Cardinal (Paris, 1786). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ansata (or CRUX ANSATA), the handled Taucross, was the emblem of life which was always held in the hands of the Egyptian deities. The nature of the object and the reason of its symbolism are unknown. See ANKH.

Ansbert, St., was born in the early part of the 7th century at Chaussi, a village in Vexin, France. He was bishop of Rouen after the death of St. Ouen, in A.D.

683, and assisted the states of the kingdom assembled at Clichy by Thierry III. Pepin, mayor of the palace, deceived by the enemies of Ansbert, banished him to a monastery in Hainaut to end his days in the performance of religious duties. He died in 698. His body was conveyed to the Abbey of Fontenelle. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anschütz, Johann Christoph, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 11, 1745, at Wiedersbach, in Henneberg. He studied at Coburg and Leipzig, and became pastor at Bärenstein. In 1781 he was called to Liebenau; and finally, in 1795, to Stolpen, in Saxony, where he died, June 21, 1814. He is the author of twenty-six hymns, which were published under the title Geistliche Lieder nach bekannten Melodien (1788). (B. P.)

Anse, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Ansonum or Ansense). These councils were held in Anse, a small town of France, on the Saône, in the diocese of Lyons.

I. Held in A.D. 990, concerning the privileges of the Abbey of Cluny, which were confirmed. Several canons were published, of which nine only remain. See Martène, Thesaur. Anec. tom. iv.

II. Held in 994, on discipline. See Mansi, Concil. tom. i.

III. Held in 1025. At this council, Gaustin de Mâcon complained against Bouchard, archbishop of Vienne, for having ordained certain monks of Cluny, although that monastery was in the diocese of Mâcon. Odilon, the abbot, exhibited the pope's privilege exempting the monks of Cluny from the jurisdiction of their own bishop. The council, however, declared the privilege to be null and void, being contrary to the canons. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 859.

IV. Held in 1052, concerning the ordination of the monks of Cluny. The papal privilege, which permitted the monks of this monastery to be ordained by any bishop whom the abbot chose, was declared to be contrary to the canons, and null.

V. Held in 1070, concerning a donation made to the abbey of l'Isle-Barbe.

VI. Held in 1077, on discipline.

VII. Held in 1100, at which Anselm of Canterbury was present. Hugo, archbishop of Lyons, demanded a subsidy to repay the expenses of his voyage to Jerusalem.

VIII. Held in 1112, against investitures.

IX. Held in 1299, under Henry de Villars, archbishop of Lyons. See Gall. Christ. tom. iv.

Ansegis (or Ansusus, Anseisus, Anseisus, finally Anselgus), bishop of TROY, was raised to the episcopacy in A.D. 912, and became, according to Mabillon, chancellor to the king of France, Ralph or Rodulf. Prelate and warrior according to the spirit of the epoch, he was wounded in 925 in an engagement with the Normans, who at that time ravaged Burgundy. In 949 Hugh the Grand, duke of France, sent him against Louis IV of Outremer. In an encounter with Robert, count of Troy, he returned to the court of Otho, who gave him more troops with which to besiege the episcopal city; but these abandoned him after the defeat of their compatriots before the city of Sens, which they had attempted to pillage. The authors of Gallia Christiana place this event in 959, and suppose that the bishop was restored to his bishopric the year following; but the first date is more trustworthy. He died about 971. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anselm, canon and theologian of the Church of St. Lambert at LIEGE, and afterwards dean of Namur, lived about the year 1049. The bishop Vazon became interested in him on account of his eminent merit, and his successor went with Anselm on a pilgrimage to Rome. He died, it is supposed, about 1056. He prepared Histoire des Evêques de Liège, commenced by the canon Alexander, and continued by Anselm from about 1050 to 1056. The work is composed of two parts—the first containing a history of the first twenty-seven bishops of Liege, and the second the bishops down to Vazon inclusive. This second part is found in Martène, from an ancient MS., more than six centuries old, found in the Abbey of St. Hubert, which belonged to M. de Cras-sier. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anselm, ST., born at Mantua, of noble parents, was raised in 1061 to the bishopric of LUCCA, by pope Alexander II, having received investiture at the hand of the emperor Henry, by the ring and pastoral staff; he was afterwards seized with remorse, resigned his see, and retired to Cluny. In 1073 Gregory VII recalled him, and reinstated him in the bishopric. This pope employed him in various legations, and, among others, in 1084, charged him with the office of reconciling to the Church, as his legate in all Italy, those who deserted the emperor's cause. He died in 1086, having written two books against Guibert the antipope and his followers; and a work, composed of sentences from various authors, to show that the powers of the Church are not under the control of the king or Cæsar. See Canisius, Antiq. Lect. vi, 202, 235; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 150.

Anselm, NICHOLAS. See ASCELIN.

Anselm, a friar of the Abbey of St. REMI at Rheims, was a writer of the 11th century. Nothing is known of his life except that he wrote in 1056, at the wish of his priest, a history of the dedication of the Church of St. Remi, in 1049, by pope Leo IX. His book is entitled Histoire de l'Eglise de Saint-Remi de Reims, and contains different parts: first, description of the new church; second, of the voyage of pope Leo IX to Rheims, from which the book was called by Sigebert L'Itinéraire du Pape Léon IX, and dates the council held on this occasion Oct. 2 and 3, 1049; dedication, and removal of the body of St. Remi in October, 1049:—Recit de quelques Miracles, with a letter from the pope to Francis concerning a celebration of the anniversary of the removal of St. Remi. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anselme, ANTOINE, a celebrated French preacher, was born Jan. 13, 1652, at Isle-Jourdain, in the district of Armagnac. Son of a renowned surgeon, he studied at Toulouse, and devoted himself to preaching; he first appeared at Gimont with great success, where he received the surname Petit Prophète, which he always retained. He went to preach at Toulouse; the marquis of Montespan, charmed with his eloquence, intrusted to him the education of his son. Anselme went with his pupil to Paris, where he met with the same success. Madame de Sévigné praised him very highly. In 1681 the French Academy chose him to pronounce the panegyric of St. Louis, and he also preached at the court and in all the great parishes of the capital. In 1710 he became a member of the Academy of Inscriptions; and died August 8, 1737, in the Abbey of St. Sener, which Louis XIV had given to him in 1699. He wrote the odes printed in the Recueil de l'Académie des Jeux Floraux de Toulouse:—the panegyrics of the saints and the funeral orations at Paris in 1718, with his portrait:—Sermons pour l'Avent, le Carême, et sur divers Sujets (Paris, 1731):—several dissertations inserted in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions et Belles-Lettres (1724 and 1729). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anselmi, GIORGIO, a Veronese painter, was born in 1722; studied under Balestra; painted the cupola of Sant' Andrea at Mantua, and other reputable works in fresco. He died in 1797.

Anselmi, Michel Angelo, an Italian painter, was born at Sienna in 1491, and studied under Gio. Antonio Vercelli, called Sodoma. One of his first works was a large painting representing the crowning of the Virgin Mary. He also painted some pictures for the churches of Parma. Lanzi says he died at Parma in 1554.

Anseraus. See ANSEGIS.

Ansiaux, JEAN JOSEPH ÉLÉONORE ANTOINE, an eminent French historical and portrait painter, of the present century, was born at Liege in 1764, and studied under Vincent. There are three pictures by him in the Church of St. Paul at Liege. He ranks among the first artists of the modern French school. He died in 1840.

Ansley, SAMUEL, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Warren County, N. J., date unknown. He embraced religion in early life; entered the itinerancy when young, and continued in it about twenty years, during which time he travelled extensively from Virginia to Georgia, and from the sea-shore to the mountains. He died in April, 1837. Mr. Ansley was a consistent, devoted, energetic Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1838, p. 574.

Anso, monk and abbot of Laube or Lobbes, in Belgium, was the author of the lives of Sts. Ursmar and Erminius, his predecessors. He succeeded the abbot Theodulfus in 776, and died in 800. The Life of St. Ursmar is interesting as containing evidence on certain points of ecclesiastical discipline, such as the use of holy water. The Life of St. Erminius was written before 768, and is marked by the same conciseness of detail and style as the preceding. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 637; Acta SS. April 3, 375.

Anson, WILLIAM, a Methodist Episcopal minister. No data concerning his birth or conversion are accessible. He travelled as an itinerant in Ontario, Canada, two years; in 1802 went to the United States, and there preached for two years, and then returned to Ontario. In 1823 he took a supernumerary relation, and retired to his farm in Saratoga County, N. Y., where he continued until his death, July 17, 1848, in about his eightieth year. He was a man of undoubted piety, sterling integrity, and good preaching abilities. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1849, p. 340.

Anta, a warlike Egyptian goddess, who is generally represented as wearing a white mitre similar to that of Osiris, ornamented with two feathers, and brandishing a kind of battle-axe in her left hand, while she holds a spear with her right. She is very rarely represented on the Egyptian sculptures, and is not found before the time of Amenhotep I, of the 18th dynasty. She was properly a Syrian or Asiatic goddess.

Anta Kalpa, in Hindû mythology, is the twentieth part of the duration of the world, and the eightieth part of a Kalpa, the fourfold duration of the world.

Antæ (Lat.), a species of pilasters used in Greek and Roman architecture to terminate the pteromata, or side walls, of temples, when they are prolonged beyond the face of the end walls. The first order of temples, according to Vitruvius, is called "in antis," because the pronaos, or porch in front of the cell, is formed by the projection of the pteromata terminated by antæ, with columns between them.

Antamtappes (the dark well), the place of final punishment into which, according to the Indian Brahmins, the wicked are cast, and from which they never can return. There they are lacerated with thorns, pecked by mad crows with steel beaks, bitten by dogs, and stung by gnats.

Antæ.

Antara, in Hindû mythology. Three hundred and sixty of our years make one year of the gods, 12,000 years of the gods one generation of the gods, and 71 such generations one Antara—that is, 806,720,000 of our fiscal years. This, however, must not be confounded with the days of Brahma; for one day of Brahma is 4,320,000,000 years long; and day and night again as long—namely, 8,640,000,000 years. See NARAJANA.

Antechapel. (1.) A transeptal building at the west end of a collegiate or conventual chapel, by which access is mainly gained to the building itself. (2.) The outer portion of a chapel, which lies west of the rood-screen in the same.

Antechurch, a term used to designate an approach to a church, situated at the extreme west end of the building, of which it forms the main entrance.

Antecomunion, in a liturgical sense, is that part of the order for the holy communion which precedes the exhortations, prayers, etc., connected with the actual celebration of the eucharist. It has for many ages been customary to view the communion service as embracing three main divisions: 1. The antecomunion, or the preparatory portions; having a general reference to the sacrament, but yet not touching on its immediate celebration. 2. The communion proper, formerly styled the canon, including the consecration and distribution of the elements. And, 3. The postcommunion, or prayers, anthems, etc., which follow after the reception of the sacrament. The English and American prayer-books differ somewhat in assigning the limits of the antecomunion. In the first book of Edward VI it appears to have embraced the offertory; and in the English prayer-books now in use, the rubric extends it "until the end of the general prayer (for the whole state of Christ's Church militant here on earth)." In the American Prayer-book the rubric does not authorize the minister to proceed further than the end of the Gospel, unless "when there is a communion." In the primitive age the holy communion was administered on every Lord's day at the least, and the antecomunion formed an integral part of the regular liturgy or service. But it was also used in a detached form, as with us. It appears, also, that in the Middle Ages a practice prevailed, under the appellation of missa sicca or missa nautica. The earliest notice of this practice, according to Bona, is in the writings of Petrus Cantor, who flourished A.D. 1200; and it seems to have prevailed extensively in the West for some centuries afterwards. The missa sicca, or "dry service," as it was called, consisted of a repetition of all the preparatory and concluding parts of the liturgy, omitting the canon. No elements were laid on the table, and there was neither consecration nor communion. This certainly approaches very nearly to the office enjoined by the Church of England, when there is no communion. See Origines Liturgicæ, i, 164, 165.

Antefixæ (or Antefixes) are ornamented tiles on the top of the cornice or eaves at the end of each ridge of tiling, as on the choragic monument of Lysicrates at Athens; sometimes of marble, but generally of terra-cotta, and ornamented with a mask, honeysuckle, or other decoration moulded on them. Also lions' heads carved on the upper mouldings of the cornice, either for ornament or to serve as spouts to carry off the water, as on the Temple of the Winds at Athens.

Antelmi, Joseph, a French ecclesiastical historian, was born at Fréjus, July 25, 1648, and died June 21, 1697. He was canon of Fréjus, and first published a treatise entitled De Periculis Cœnæ. In 1680 he wrote a dissertation, De Initio Ecclesiæ Forojuliensis, which he designed to extend. In 1684, by the aid of père La Chaise, he obtained the position of grand-vicar and official with the bishop of Pamiers. In 1689 he published upon the works of St. Leo the Great and of St. Prosper certain sketches directed against Pasquier Queasel, who had attributed works belonging to St. Prosper to St. Leo. Antelmi also wrote, De Ætate Sancti Martini, Turonensis Episcopi, et quorundam ejus Gestorum Ordine, Anno Æmortalis; necnon Sancto Bricio Successore, Epistola ad R. P. Anton. Pagium (Parisii, 1693):—De Sanctæ Maximæ Virginis Callidiæ in Forojuliensi Diœcesi Cultu et Patria Epistola ad Virum Cl. Danielem Papbrochium (printed in the collection of Bollandus):—De Translatione Corporis Sancti Auxilii, Epistola ad Virum Cl. Ludovicum Thomassinum de Muzange; Assertio pro Unico Sancto Eucherio Lugdunensi Episcopo, Opus Posthumum; accessit Concilium Regiense sub Rostagno Metropolitano Aquisi Anni 1285; nunc primum prodit integrum, et notis illustratum, Opera Caroli Antelmi, designati Episcopi Grassensis, Præpositi Forojuliensis (ibid. 1726). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antelmi (or Anthelmi), Léonce, grand-vicar of Fréjus and provost of the cathedral of that place, lived near the close of the 17th and the commencement of the 18th century. Père Lelong attributed to him a work on the life of Francis Picquet, consul of France and Holland at Aleppo (Paris, 1732); but Quérard claimed that it belonged to Charles Antelmi, bishop of Grasse. The preface, however, indicated that it was commenced by Charles and continued by his brother Léonce. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antelmi, Nicolas, a French theologian, was born in the last half of the 16th century, and died March 2, 1646. He was canon and vicar-general of Fréjus. He was very intimate with the learned patron of literature Peiresc, and furnished the brothers Gaucher and Louis of St. Martha for their Gallia Christiana the catalogues of the bishops of Fréjus, which he had edited upon the more ancient documents of the bishopric. Nicolas Antelmi wrote Adversaria, which was quoted in the treatise of Joseph Antelmi, De Initio Ecclesiæ Forojuliensis (Aix, 1680), p. 170. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antelmi, Pierre, a French theologian, nephew of Nicolas, was born at Fréjus near the commencement of the 17th century, and died Nov. 27, 1668. He studied theology and jurisprudence at Paris. He wished to follow in the footsteps of his uncle, who, in his old-age, had raised a dissension concerning the celebrated Peiresc in establishing, like him, a rich cabinet of antiquities. He applied himself with ardor to the search for monuments of his native country, and formed a very beautiful collection. Afterwards he yielded up his cabinet in favor of Peiresc. He gave to him, among other things, the beautiful trivet of bronze, upon which Peiresc wrote a dissertation. Peiresc died in 1637, and Antelmi abandoned the study of antiquities in order to devote himself to theology. He restored the ancient rites and rejected all the fabulous traditions concerning St. Léonce, the patron of the Church of Fréjus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anteminsion. See ANTIMENSIMUM.

Antenatâle Domini, another name for Advent, the time immediately preceding Christmas-day. See Staunton, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antepagments, dressings or architrave of a doorway. This term does not include the frame of the door, which is of wood, but only the stone decorations, or stucco, when that material is used.

Antependium (Antepane, or Antependium), a veil or hanging in front of an altar. The use of such a piece of drapery no doubt began at a period when altars were first constructed with cancelled fronts. The veil hanging in front would protect the interior from dust and from profane or irreverent curiosity. In the 7th and 8th centuries veils of rich and costly stuffs are often mentioned as suspended "before the altar," as in the case where pope Leo III gave to the Church of St. Paul at Rome a red veil which hangs before the altar, having in the middle a cross of gold embroidery and a border of the same. It is possible, however, that in this and like cases the veil was not attached to the altar, but hung before it from the ciborium, or from arches or railings raised upon the altar enclosure.

Antes, Henry, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, came to America in 1726. His name is often referred to as "the pious and active German Reformed layman of Frederick township" (now Montgomery County, Pa.) from 1730 to 1748. He was a prominent mover in an organization to unite all religious souls in what was called "The Congregation of God in the Spirit." He himself issued a call to all Christians in 1741 to meet at Germantown, which was followed by six successive meetings in the first half of 1742 of like character, called synods. It was through these meetings that the aforesaid organization was perfected. It received all evangelical Christians without interfering with their creeds. In 1742 Mr. Antes was himself licensed by this Synod to go forth and preach, which seems to have been successful, as he is spoken of by all in the highest terms. This effort, while it may have shown the longings of the Christian world for closer union, was premature, and was exhausted by 1748. In 1747 a Lutheran, and in 1748 a Reformed, synod were organized. About the same time the Moravians organized, and each drew its own material to itself. Mr. Antes joined the Moravians, but on account of certain vestments which were introduced into their communion service, he left, or separated from, them in 1750. After his separation, he assisted them frequently, thereby showing that he was kindly disposed towards them. Upon his separation from the Moravians he became an Independent, and so remained until 1755, when he died, beloved and respected by all. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, 3d ed. p. 166.

Antes, John, a missionary of the Moravian Church, was born March 4, 1740. He was sent from this country to Hermhut, in Germany, in 1764. Five years after, he went as far as Cairo, in Egypt, with the purpose of engaging in missionary work in Abyssinia, but was induced, for what he deemed good reasons, to abandon his undertaking. Subsequently he returned to Germany, where he remained for some time, and then, in 1808, he went to England, where he died, in the city of Bristol, Dec. 17, 1811. He was the author of a work entitled Observations on the Manners of the Egyptians. He wrote also a Memoir of his own life. See Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Antevorta (also Antevorta), in Roman mythology, is a goddess representing the knowledge of the past, as her sister Postvorta represents the knowledge of the future. Both are called sisters of the prophesying and healing goddess Carmenta, and they are even represented as the same with her, or a personification of two characteristics of the same goddess. According to some, they are goddesses of births—Antevorta attending to the births with the head first, Postvorta to those with the feet first.

Anthatasmira, in Hindû mythology. Nark, or Hell, is divided into twenty-one parts, one of which is called Anthatasmira.

Anthelmus, Sr., bishop of Bellay, was the son of a gentleman of Savoy, named Hardouin. He was born in 1107, became a monk of the Carthusian Order, and in 1141 general, which office he filled for twelve years with great zeal and firmness. In the great schism caused by the antipope Octavianus, he managed so that the whole order of Chartreux adhered to Alexander III, the lawful pope. In 1163 he was created bishop of Bellay, and excommunicated Humbert, count of Savoy, who had unjustly imprisoned a clerk of the diocese of Bellay. The pope having absolved the count, Anthelmus retired in disgust to the Grande Chartreuse, whence he was forcibly brought back to Bellay, and died June 26, 1178.

Anthesphoria (from ἄνθος, a flower, and φέρω, to carry away), an ancient festival celebrated in Sicily in honor of the heathen goddess Proserpine (or Persephone), in commemoration of her return to her mother in the spring, after having been carried away by Pluto; accordingly, it is a flower festival. Festivals of the same kind were held in honor of other deities, on which occasions maidens walked in processions carrying baskets filled with flowers, while a tune called Hierakion was played on the flute.

Anthesteria, an Athenian festival held annually in the month of Anthesterion, corresponding nearly to our February, at which time the wine of the previous vintage was considered fit for use. The object of the festival was to celebrate the arrival of that season and the beginning of spring. It lasted three days, from the 11th to the 13th of the month. On the first day, called Pithoigia, or "jar-opening," libations were offered from the newly opened jars to the god of wine, all the household, including servants or slaves, joining in the festivities of the occasion. The second day, which was named Choes, or "the pouring," was a time of merry-making. The people dressed themselves gayly, some in the disguise of the mythical personages in the suite of Bacchus, and paid a round of visits to their acquaintances. Drinking-clubs met to drink off matches; while others did not forget deceased relations, but poured libations on their tombs. On the part of the State, this day was the occasion of a peculiarly solemn and secret ceremony in one of the temples of Bacchus, which for the rest of the year was closed. The Basilissa (or Basilinna), wife of the Archon Basileus for the time, went through a ceremony of marriage to the wine god, in which she was assisted by fourteen Athenian matrons called Geraræ, chosen by the Basileus, and sworn to secrecy. The third day was named Chutroï, or "jugs." Cooked fruit was offered to Mercury in his capacity of a god of the lower world; rejoicings and games were held; and though no tragedy was allowed to be performed in the theatre, yet there was a rehearsal, at which the players for the ensuing dramatic festival were selected. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.

Anthiasists, a sect of heretics who held all labor to be sinful, and therefore passed their time in sleep. St. Philastrius mentions them in his work on heresies, but does not specify the time when they appeared.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Anthîmus, bishop of Tyana, joined with Basil, A.D. 372, in subscribing a circular letter addressed by the Oriental bishops to those of Italy and Gaul; but immediately after discussions broke out between them. On two several occasions we find Anthîmus in a position of antagonism to Basil. (a.) When the province of Cappadocia was divided and Tyana became the capital of the second division, Anthîmus insisted that the ecclesiastical arrangements should follow the civil, and claimed metropolitan rights over several of Basil's suffragans. (b.) A certain Faustus had applied to Basil to consecrate him to an Armenian see; but, as he did not produce the proper authority, the consecration was deferred. He immediately applied to Anthîmus, who at once complied with his request, thus setting canonical rules at defiance. A reconciliation seems to have been effected, as we find Basil speaking of Anthîmus in friendly terms. Except in connection with Basil and Gregory, nothing is known of this prelate.

Anthon, HENRY, D.D., a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in New York city, in March, 1795. His father, Dr. G. C. Anthon, though a German by birth, was an officer in the British army, and settled in New York at the close of the 18th century. Henry Anthon, the son, was the brother of Charles, the classical scholar. He was ordained deacon in November, 1816, and took charge of the parish in Red Hook, N. Y.; removed to South Carolina in 1819; was called to Trinity Church, Utica, N. Y., in 1821, and remained until 1829, when he accepted the pastorate of St. Stephen's Church, New York city; and became pastor of Trinity Church in 1831, which position he held until 1836, when he was chosen rector of St. Mark's, in the Bowery, spending in this parish the last twenty-four years of his life. He died in New York city, Jan. 5, 1861. His protest to the Rev. Arthur Carey's ordination, July 2, 1843, and circumstances attending it, led to Dr. Anthon's separation from those with whom, ecclesiastically, he had formerly been associated. He was at one time editor of the Protestant Churchman, and was one of the founders of the Evangelical Knowledge Society, as well as the Church Missionary Society. He was thoroughly honest in his opinions, and was distinguished for his tenacity of purpose, intellectual strength, and purity of character. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1861, p. 187.

Anthonzee, JOHN, a native Wesleyan missionary, was born at Galle, Ceylon, Aug. 28, 1793. He was converted about the time of the commencement of the mission in Galle. His ministry was useful and zealous. He was a man of simplicity in his manners, yet powerful in his prayers and sermons. He died at Colombo, July 24, 1845, where he had labored for several years, and his death was deeply felt both by the Church of which he was pastor and by his European brethren. See Minutes of English Wesleyan Conference, 1846.

Anthony, a disciple and imitator of St. Simeon Stylites, flourished about A.D. 460, and wrote the Life of that saint. See Evagrius, Hist. Eccles. I, xiii, 270; Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 448.

Anthony OF BALOCHE (or OF VERCELLI, so called from the place of his birth), was a Franciscan of the Congregation of Regular Observantines. He was a very celebrated preacher, and flourished about 1480. His Quadragesimale de duodecim Excellentiss Christianæ Fidei was printed at Venice in 1492, and at Lyons in 1504. He also wrote a Treatise of the Virtues (Haguenau, 1512), and another Quadragesimale on the eternal fruits of the Holy Spirit, given by Wadding, De Scripturis Ord. Minor. p. 29. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 195.

Anthony THE BLESSED, a Dominican of the 15th century, was a native of Piedmont, who received the religious habit at the hands of St. Antoninus, archbishop of Florence. In passing from Sicily to Naples, he was seized by corsairs and carried to Tunis, where he abjured the Christian faith, and embraced Mohammedanism in 1459. He quickly, however, repented, resumed his religious dress, and in a numerous assembly of the infidels declared himself to be a Christian and ready to die for the faith. Upon this he was stoned to death. It is said that his body resisted the flames into which his persecutors had thrown it, and was subsequently buried at Carthage by the Christians in a Genoese church. His Life was written by Francis de Castiglioni.

Anthony, St., surnamed CAULEAS, the second patriarch of Constantinople of the name, was born about 828, near Constantinople. At twelve years of age he retired into a monastery, of which he afterwards became abbot, and where he did vast good by his wisdom, excellent government, and rare example. In 894 he was raised to the patriarchal throne, to succeed St. Stephen. When in this elevated position he relaxed nothing from his former perfect life: he spent his days in penitence and prayer, in visiting and comforting the poor and sick, and in other deeds befitting a Christian bishop. After governing his Church two years, he died, Feb. 12, 896, the day on which he is commemorated. See Oriens Christ. i, 250; Baillet, Feb. 12.

Anthony, St., OF LERINS (also called Antonius Cyrus), was the son of a man of rank in Pannonia, named Secundinus. After the death of his father, Anthony retired into different solitudes, where he lived a strictly ascetic life, until at last, to avoid the persons who flocked to him on account of his reputation for sanctity, he retired into the monastery of Lerins, where he died at the end of two years, about 526, aged about forty-eight years. His name occurs in the modern Roman martyrology, December 28. His Life, by St. Ennodius of Pavia, is in Surius. See Baillet, December 28.

Anthony, St., OF LITHUANIA, a martyr, met his death at Wilna in 1828, by Olgar, grand-duke of Lithuania. He had, with his brother, renounced Paganism, in order to embrace the Christian religion. The grand-duke of Lithuania, having tried in vain to cause them to renounce the new faith, put them to death. The anniversary of these saints and martyrs is celebrated April 14. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Anthony MELISSA (so called from the sweetness of his discourses) was a Greek monk, and is said to have lived about 1140. He wrote, Libri II Locorum Communium, or of sentences collected out of the fathers concerning the virtues and vices, published at Paris, in Latin, 1575, 1589, and contained in the Biblioth. Patrum, tom. v. It is also probable that he is the author of some sermons, attributed by Trithemius and others to St. Anthony the Great. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 219.

Anthony LE QUIEN, founder of the Congregation of the Holy Sacrament of the Order of St. Dominic, was born in Paris, Feb. 23, 1601, and assumed the habit of his order Aug. 16, 1622. He was a man of strictly religious and austere life, and was the means of withdrawing multitudes of persons from the paths of sin by his example and his preaching. He founded a Reformed congregation of his order, and styled it the Congregation of the Holy Sacrament. He died Oct. 7, 1676, leaving several works of piety; among them, one On the Devotion of the Inward Life of Jesus Christ:—another On the True Means of Arriving Soon at the Highest Christian and Religious Perfection:—a third On the Love of Jesus towards the Soul, etc.

Anthony DE RAMPIGOLLIS (Antonius Rumpelogus), an Italian monk of the Order of Augustine Hermits and a doctor in theology, flourished at the beginning of the 15th century, and especially distinguished himself at the Council of Constance in 1418 by his disputations against the Hussites. He wrote, for the use of the young persons of his order in the monastery at Naples, a work entitled Figuræ Bibliæ, which Possevinus strongly censures, and which was placed upon the Index Expurgatorius. It was printed several times in Paris and elsewhere. His Dictionarium Panperum et Speculum Salvationis Humanæ was published with the above, at Paris, in 1497, 8vo. He is also reputed to be the author of the Aureum Bibliorum Repertorium. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 121.

Anthony OF ST. MICHAEL was a native of Arles, in Provence, and recollet of the province of St. Denis. He was a man of piety, zeal, and knowledge, and founded the Confraternity of the Guardian Angel, for which he acquired a considerable extension by his discourses and writings. He died July 13, 1650, leaving, among other works, The Rules of the Confraternity of the Guardian Angel:—Two Books on Angels:—On the Ecstasies of the Ecstatic Life:—The History of the Passion of our Lord, in Latin and French.

Anthony OF VERCELLI. See ANTHONY OF BALOCHE.

Anthony, George, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, officiated in 1853 at Jamestown, R. I., serving St. Matthew's Church, and continued so to do until the close of his life. He died in 1866. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1867, p. 101.

Anthony, M. R., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Jackson County, O., Feb. 12, 1823. He joined the Church at the age of eighteen; emigrated to Missouri in 1846; and in 1851 united with the St. Louis Conference, which connection he held, with the exception of a short interval, until his death, June 18, 1868. He was most noted for his piety. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1868, p. 264.

Anthropiāni, a name which occurs in three short lists of representative heresies in Latin authors (Cyprian, Epis. 73; Lactantius, Inst. iv, 20, etc.). Grabe supposes the heretics intended to be the section of Valentiniāns briefly noticed by Irenæus, who called the first principle of the universe "Man." Schlie-mann (Die Clementinen, p. 475 sq.) with better reason understands the Symmachians, i. e. the Ebionites of North Africa, sometimes called Homuncionitæ. They are probably also, as he suggests, the Anthropolatæ (q. v.).

Anthropopathists (from ἄνθρωπος, a man, and πάθος, an affection), a class of believers differing somewhat from the Anthropomorphites (q. v.), by ascribing to the Divine Being, not the possession of a human body, but the same limitations and defects which are found cleaving to the human spirit. There is a true, in opposition to a false, anthropopathism—an ascription of human affections to God which is thoroughly scriptural, provided always that they be understood in accordance with the nature and majesty of God, and so as not to imply the slightest imperfection in the infinitely perfect Jehovah.

Antidiaphorists, a name given to the strict Lutherans who opposed the views of the Adiaphorists, or "Indifferents." They were also called Antidiaphorists.

Anti-Calvinists, a name given to Arminians (q. v.) as opposed to the Calvinists.

Antichio, PIETRO, a Venetian painter, lived in the 18th century. There are two of his works in the Church of San Salvatore, The Pool of Bethesda, and Christ Driving the Sellers and Money-changers from the Temple.

Antigonos of Socho, a Jewish teacher (about 200–170 B.C.), belonged to the earlier Tanaim, and was a disciple of Simon the Just. He was the first that bears a Greek name. He probably belonged to the Grecian party, which, by an imitation of Grecian practices, sought to bring about an intimate union with those foreign masters of Palestine who were objects of pious abhorrence to the Pharisees. It is to this tendency that the sect of the Sadducees, which traces its origin to the successors of Antigonos, owes its rise. Unlike the Pharisees, the Sadducees were primarily a political, and only secondarily a religious, party. Their theology, which is rather negative than positive, was modified in accordance with their political aspirations. The motto of Antigonos, which fully accords with this view, was, "Be not like servants who serve their master for the sake of a reward, but imitate servants who serve their master without looking for a reward, and let the fear of Heaven be upon you" (Pirke Aboth, i, 3)—a motto which Pressense, in his Jesus Christ: his Times, Life, and Work (Amer. ed. 1868, p. 68 sq.), calls a "noble and almost evangelical one, a most beautiful maxim, and one denoting a legitimate reaction from the legal formalism which was in process of development." See Ham-burger, Real-Encyklop. ii, 58 sq.; Pick, The Scribes Before and in the Time of Christ, in the Lutheran Quarterly, 1878, p. 253 sq. (B. P.)

Antiminsium (ἀντιμίσσιον, derived by the Greeks from ἀντι, over against, and μίσσιον, a canister) is a liturgical term in use in the Greek Church, signifying a linen cloth to cover the altar of an unconsecrated church. These Antiminsia were not laid upon all altars, but only upon those which were in churches of which there was any doubt about their consecration; and where that was the case the sanctifying power of this cloth was considered sufficient to remedy the defect. In the Oriental ritual there is an order for the consecration of these cloths, which, owing to the scarcity of consecrated buildings at the present time, are much used by the Greeks to supply the need of a consecrated altar. This consecration ought to take place only at the dedication of a new church. "Relics being pounded up with fragrant gum, oil is poured over them by the bishop, and, distilling upon the corporals, is supposed to convey to them the mysterious virtues of the relics themselves. The holy eucharist is celebrated on them for seven days." These Antiminsia must be sufficiently large to cover the spot occupied by the paten and chalice at the time of consecration. The Syrians, instead of these, consecrate slabs of wood, which appear to be used even on altars which are consecrated. In the absence of an Antiminsium of any kind, Syriac usage permitted the consecration of the eucharist on a leaf of the Gospels, or, in case of urgent necessity, on the hands of the deacons. See Goar, Euchologion, p. 648–654; Suicer, The-saur. p. 377; Martène, lib. i, cap. iii, art. 6, No. 7. See ANTIMENSIMUM.

Antiminsius (ἀντιμίσσιος), a Greek term for the church officer who arranges the faithful in proper order prior to their receiving holy communion.

Antioch in Pisidia. Among the present ruins of this once important city are a large building, probably a church, of prodigious stones, of which the ground-plan and the circular end for the bema still remain. There are also the ruins of a wall, of a temple of Dionysus, and of a small temple. Another construction, apparently of the principal temple, is cut in the rock in a semicircular form, in the centre of which a mass of rock has been left, which is hollowed out into a square chamber. Masses of highly finished marble cornices, with several broken fluted columns, are spread about the hollow. See Lewin, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i, 137 sq.

ANTIOCH IN SYRIA. The great interest attaching to this place as the seat of the mother Church of the Gentile world, justifies us in a few additional particulars respecting its modern condition. The city is now accessible only on horseback, by way of Aleppo. It is thought to contain about six thousand inhabitants, including a few Christians. Since the last earthquake (April, 1872), which overthrew one half of the houses, an almost entirely new town has sprung up, consisting, however, of unsubstantial buildings rudely constructed of irregular fragments of stone, held together with mud or inferior mortar. The interior of the town consists of dreary heaps of ruins and unsightly houses, interspersed with rubbish and garbage. The bazaar is insignificant. On the east side of the town is a large silk-factory. Near it are the houses of the vice-consuls, all of whom (except the French) are natives, and speak their own language only (generally the Turkish). On the river

Orontes are a number of large water-wheels for irrigating the gardens. See Bäderer, Palest. and Syria, p. 578.

Antiochus. By way of supplement, we notice—12. Antiochus (XIII), surnamed Asiaticus, son of Antiochus Eusebes, succeeded in ascending the throne of Syria in B.C. 69; and, after a reign of four years, was expelled by Pompey, and Syria became a province of the Roman empire. See Appian, Syr. p. 49, 70; Justin, xl, 2; Clinton, Fasti Hellenici: the Civil and Literary Chronology of Greece (Oxford, 1851), p. 344-348. (B. P.)

Antipānon (ἀντιπᾶνον), a Greek term for a border or edge-band, corresponding to the Latin "apparel."

Anti-pasch (or Antipascha) (Ἀντιπάσχα), Low-Sunday, the Sunday after Easter-day, Dominica in albis, the Sunday within the octave of Easter.

Antipatris. The identity of this place with the modern Kefr Saba seems to be conclusively proved by the general coincidence in location and distance from other known towns, and especially by its agreement with Caphar-saba, which Josephus repeatedly states was the old name of Antipatris. Nevertheless, both Lieut. Conder and Major Wilson contend (Quar. Statement of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," July, 1874, p. 184 sq., 192 sq.) for its situation at Ras el-Ain, six miles to the south, for the following reasons: (1.) The abundant water and fertility of the spot, in accordance with the representations of all ancient writers; whereas at Kefr Saba there are only two indifferent wells. (2.) The naturally favorable site of Ras el-Ain for a city, especially the strong military position; while the other is every way the reverse. (3.) The existence to-day of traces of the old Roman road in the former spot, and the absence of any such indications at Kefr Saba. (4.) The close proximity of Ras el-Ain to the mountains, as indicated by the ancient authorities. To this view, also, Dr. Tristram gives his adherence (Bible Places, p. 55), thus summing up the evidence: "The name of Caphar-saba seems to have become attached to the present Kefr Saba after the original site was abandoned. That site is plainly marked out at Ras el-Ain, where a large artificial mound is covered with old foundations, and on the summit is the ruined shell of the fine old (Crusaders') castle of Mirabel, while beneath it burst forth the springs of the Aujeh, the largest and most copious of all in Palestine. At the foot of the mountains this was exactly the point where it was convenient for the horsemen to accompany Paul to Cæsarea without the foot-soldiers. Two Roman roads may be traced from it—north to Cæsarea, and southwards to Lydda—on the former of which a Roman milestone still stands. To this day part of the pavement remains on which Paul rode to Cæsarea, and by which Pilate and Felix used to go up to Jerusalem." It should be noted, however, that most, if not all, of these arguments apply nearly as well to the site of Kefr Saba. In his Tent Work (i, 230) Lieut. Conder reiterates his view, giving a fuller description of Ras el-Ain, and adding that the Talmud seems to distinguish between Antipatris and Caphar-saba—a point, however, which he does not make clear. See the citations in Reland, Palestina (see Index).

Antependium. See ANTEPENDIUM.

Antiphon-lectern, a lectern which stands in the centre of the floor of a choir, chancel, or chapel, facing the altar, at which the antiphons are solemnly chanted. Here the cantors stand at certain periods of the service in order to command a full view of the choir, and so as to enable the choir to follow them both in time, tune, and due regularity. See LECTERN.

Antiphōnon (ἀντιφωνον) is, 1. The alternate chant of the two sides of a choir; 2. A verse or versicle used as a key-note to a psalm or canticle; 3. An anthem sung during the Liturgy in the Eastern Church.

Antipope, the chief of a party who causes a schism in order to dethrone a pope lawfully elected, and to assume his place. Twenty-seven such illegal competitors for the papacy are reckoned from the third century to the present time, viz.:

1. Novatian, who disputed the see with Cornelius, in 251.
 2. Ursinus, with pope Damasus, in 367.
 3. Eulalius, with pope Boniface I, in 418.
 4. Laurentius, with pope Symmachus, in 498.
 5. Dioscorus, the deacon, with pope Boniface II, in 530.
 6. Peter and Theodore, with pope Conon, in 656.
 7. Theodore and Pascal, with pope Sergius, in 687.
 8. Theophylact, with pope Paul I, in 757.
 9. Constantine, forcibly held the see thirteen months after the death of Paul.
 10. Philipp, a monk, declared pope by the faction of Wal-dipertus, in 768.
 11. Zosimus, disputed the see with pope Eugenius II, in 824.
 12. Anastasius, with pope Benedict III, in 855.
 13. Sergius, with pope Formosus, in 891.
 14. Boniface, after the death of Formosus, in 896, driven out by pope Stephen VII.
 15. Leo, disputed the see with popes John XII and Benedict V, in 955 and 964.
 16. Gregory, with pope Benedict VIII.
 17. Silvester III and John XXII contested the see with pope Benedict IX; all three resigned in favor of Gregory VI, in 1044.
 18. Mincius (styled Benedict), contested the see with pope Nicholas II, in 1059.
 19. Cadolaus (Honorius II), with Alexander II, 1061.
 20. Guibert of Ravenna (Clement III), with Gregory VII, in 1073.
 21. Theobald (Celestine II), with Honorius II, in 1124.
 22. Peter (Anacletus II), with Innocent II, in 1130.
 23. Octavianus (Victor IV), with Alexander III, in 1159.
 24. Peter (Nicholas V); while the see was in France pope John XXII arrested him.
 25. Robert (Clement VII), began the great schism in 1378, and held the see at Avignon, against popes Urban VI and Boniface IX.
 26. Peter of Luna (Benedict XI, XII, or XIII, according to different writers), held the see thirty years at Peñiscola, Spain, against Boniface IX and his successors.
 27. Giles de Muñoz, a Spaniard (Clement VIII), opposed pope Martin V five years, viz. from 1424 to 1429.
- Amadeus, or pope Felix V, is also reckoned among the antipopes by Roman writers; but, having been elected in the Council of Basle, lawfully assembled, in which Eugenius IV had been previously deposed, he cannot justly be regarded in that light. Felix renounced the pontificate in 1449.

Antiquarii, a name given to copiers of ancient books and documents in religious houses. They were generally regulars belonging to some order, and lived in monasteries.

Antiquario, JACOPO, an Italian prelate, and native of Perugia, was born near the middle of the 15th century. He was secretary to cardinal Savelli, legate of Bologna, then of the duke of Milan, John Galeazzo Sforza; and was employed in several important matters. He remained at Milan after it had been conquered by the French, and delivered a discourse, which he pronounced in the name of the people of Milan, on a solemn occasion, and which was published under the title Oratio Jacobi Antiquarii pro Populo Mediolanensi, in Die Triumphi Ludovici Galliarum Regis et Mediolani Ducis de Fractis Venetis (Milan, 1509). He obtained rich benefices of pope Alexander VI; and distinguished himself by his regularity of morals, his ability, and by the support which he lent on all occasions to people of learning. He died at Milan in 1512. A collection of his Latin letters were printed at Perugia in 1519; several are also found among those of Angelo Poliziano and in other collections. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antist, VINCENT JUSTINIAN, a Spanish Dominican, was born at Valencia. He was prior of his order, and died in the year 1599, leaving many works. Among them are, Notes on the Opuscula of St. Vincent Ferrer:—A Defence of the Images of St. Catherine of Sienna, etc., in Latin:—A Life of St. Vincent Ferrer, and lives of some other saints, in Spanish:—A Treatise on the Conception of the Blessed Virgin (Madrid, 1615).

Antistes. This title appears to have been common to bishops and presbyters in the early Church. As the name sacerdos is common to both estates in respect to the offices of divine service, which were performed by both, so in respect of the government of the Church in which they were associated, we find them designated alike—sometimes as “presbyters,” as marking their age and dignity; sometimes in respect of their “cure” or charge, as “antistites” præpositi. For example, in the first canon of the Council of Antioch, A.D. 341, the bishop and presbyter are both expressly classed together thus, and the corresponding title of “antistites” is evidently extended to the second order of the ministry by St. Augustine. This usage of the word agrees with that of archisynagogus in the Jewish synagogue, and may have been suggested by it.

Antisthènes, the founder of the Cynics, was the son of Antouthenes, an Athenian. He flourished B.C. 366. In his youth he fought at Tanagra (B.C. 426), and was a disciple first of Gorgias, and then of Socrates, whom he followed until his death. He is said to have been instrumental in securing the punishment of the persecutors of the latter philosopher. He taught in the Cynosarges, a gymnasium for the use of Athenians born of foreign mothers, near the Temple of Hercules. From this circumstance some derive the name Cynic, while others derive it from κύων, a dog, on account of the habits of the sect. He died at Athens at the age of seventy. His writings were very numerous, chiefly dialogues.

His philosophical system pertained chiefly to ethics. The wise man, he claimed, conforms his acts to perfect virtue; and pleasure is not only unnecessary to him, but a positive evil. He is said to have held that pain and infamy are blessings. He did not, however, condemn the pleasures which spring from the soul, and the enjoyments of a wisely chosen friendship. The aim of the true man must be to become, as far as possible, independent of everything outside, using it as needful, but not desiring it as a gratification. Such a mastery of self he called virtue, and it was enough for happiness. Once attained, it can never be lost. Antisthenes did not encourage the formality of a school, and even drove away the curious and enthusiastic with his staff except Diogenes, who would not go away; but he taught many by his example and by his sarcastic words. The Cynic adopted a peculiar garb; at first, perhaps, for reasons of economy, but subsequently as a symbol of his profession. “A rough cloak, which could be doubled to counterfeit an inner garment, and served the purpose of a night covering; a wallet, in which provisions could be carried; a staff to support his steps, and perhaps something from which to drink, constituted the property of the barefooted Cynic; and to these was afterwards added a long beard.” The followers of Antisthenes lived on the alms of the public, and wandered from place to place. Many of their habits were decidedly indecent. Whatever they had to do, they deemed it their duty to do in public; for the wise man is a citizen of the world, and not of a particular city. Some of the Cynics even maintained the advisability of a community of wives. Antisthenes was a voluminous writer; his works, according to Diogenes Laertius, filled ten volumes. Of these scarcely anything is left. The fragments which remain have been collected by Winckelmann (Antisthenes, Fragmenta [Turici, 1842]), and this small work, with the account of him given in Ritter, Gesch. der Philosophie (vii, 4), will supply all the information that can be desired. See Smith, Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biog. and Mythol. s. v.; Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.

Antisupernaturalists, those who endeavor to subtract from the character of Christ and Christianity all that is miraculous and supernatural, thus reducing everything within the limits of human reason, and what is accordant with the ordinary operations of nature. See RATIONALISM.

Anti-Talmudists, a name given to all those Jews who reject the Talmud, whether they adhere to the teachings of the Old Testament or not. By far the greater portion of the Anti-Talmudists have gone further than simply to reject the Rabbinical teachings. They have also rejected the Old Testament and sunk down to infidelity. With many their infidelity is a mere negation; they have renounced authority, and can receive nothing without evidence. Still, they are open to conviction. Another and increasing party place themselves in direct and active antagonism to all systems of belief, which they regard as fettering the understanding and unnecessarily restraining the inclination. In Germany and elsewhere on the Continent of Europe, the writings of Moses Mendelssohn (q. v.) have done much to alienate the Jews from all the old standards, and spread abroad a reckless spirit of speculation and infidelity. Rationalism has taken the place of Judaism. Since the death of Mendelssohn, in 1785, the Anti-Talmudists have been every year growing in numbers in Europe. See KARAITES.

Antithëos (ἀντίθεος, opposed to God), a Greek epithet for Satan.

Antoine, PAUL GABRIEL, a French Jesuit, was born Jan. 21, 1679, at Luneville, in Lorraine. He joined his order in 1711, lectured on theology and philosophy at Pont-à-Mousson, and died Jan. 22, 1743. He wrote, Theologia Moralis (Nancy, 1731, and often, 3 vols.):—Theologia Universa Dogmatica (ibid. 1735, 7 vols.):—Lectures Chrétiennes par Forme de Méditation sur les Grandes Vérités de la Foi (ibid. 1736):—Démonstration de la Vérité de la Religion Chrétienne et Catholique (ibid. 1739). See Calmet, Bibliothèque Lorraine (Nancy, 1750); Chevrier, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Hommes Illustres de Lorraine (Brussels, 1754). (B. P.)

Antoli, JACOB BAR-SAMSON, a Spanish rabbi, was born in the kingdom of Naples during the reign of the emperor Frederick, in the first half of the 13th century. He was son-in-law of Samuel ibn-Tibbon, the celebrated translator of the works of Maimonides. Antoli distinguished himself in the crowd of Rabbinical commentators, in that he strengthened himself by the study of philosophy; but this was considered a dangerous innovation, and called forth violent opposition, for the most part, from his collaborators. He died in 1232. He wrote, Malmad Mattulmidim, containing philosophical sketches of the Pentateuch, which have been partially preserved in MS. in the Vatican:—Matzreph Lakeseph, a Hebrew translation of the Prædicamenta of Aristotle:—Sepher Melitna; this is a translation of the Arabic commentary of Averroes upon Aristotle:—a Hebrew translation of the Arabic work of Alfragan, entitled Elements of Astronomy. He also prepared other translations. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Fürst, Biblioth. Jud. i, 46.

Antoliānus, Sr., a martyr of Auvergne, who suffered under Chroco, one of the German kings of Pomerania, about 266.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antolinez, Don José, a Spanish historical and portrait painter, was born at Seville in 1639, and studied under Don Francisco Rizi. There are two fine pictures by this master in the Church of La Magdalena at Madrid, representing the Miraculous Conception and the Good Shepherd. He died in Madrid in 1676.

Anton, Karl, a convert from Judaism, and lector of Jewish literature at the Helmstädt University, was born at Mitau, in Courland, Sept. 11, 1722. He descended from a very learned family, to which belonged Bartenora, the Cabalist Vital, and L. Heller. His teacher was the famous Eibeschütz, whose lectures he attended at Prague, and for whom he not only preserved a grateful heart, but wrote in his favor when accused of heresy. In the year 1748 he embraced Christianity, taking the name Karl Anton instead of his former Jewish name, Moses Gerson Kohen. The Jewish historian Dr. Grätz, in his partisan manner, especially when referring to Hebrew Christians, speaks of Anton as of having embraced Christianity out of worldly interests, without bringing any proof to make his assertion good. Anton—the date of whose death we cannot give—wrote, Nachrichten von dem falschen Messias Sabbathai Zewi (Wolfenbüttel, 1752):—Einleitung in die jüdischen Rechte (Brunswick, 1756):—Wahre Gründe welche einen Juden zu Jesum Christum führen können (Helmst. 1753):—Entwurf der Erklärung jüdischer Gebräuche (Brunswick, 17... 8, etc.). See Fürst, Biblioth. Jud. i, 46 sq.; A. Fürst, Karl Anton, in Saat auf Hoffnung (ed. Delitzsch, 1871), p. 214 sq. (B. P.)

Anton, Konrad Gottlob, professor of Oriental languages at Wittenberg, was born in 1745, and died July 4, 1814. He published, Rationem Prophetas Messianas Interpretandi Certissimam Nostræque Ætatis Accommodatissimam Exponit (Dessau, 1786):—Abhandlung von der alten hebräischen Tonkunst, a treatise published in Paulus's Neues Repertorium, iii, 36 sq., in which he regards the accents as musical notes, according to which the melody of Hebrew hymns is to be decided. This idea he further developed in his musical exposition of the Song of Songs, Salomonis Carmen Melicum (Viteb. and Lips. 1800). Besides, he wrote De Verisimillima Librum Jonæ Interpretandi Ratione (1794), and Nova Loci 1 Sam. vi, 19 Interpretandi Ratio (1780). See the biography in the Programm published by his son, Karl Gottlieb Anton (Görlitz, 1816); Rosenmüller, Handbuch für die Lit., bibl. Kritik u. Exegese, iv, 146; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 90, 215; Steinschneider, Bibl. Handbuch, No. 126, 127. (B. P.)

Anton, Paul, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born in 1661 at Hirschfeld, in Upper Lusatia. He studied at Leipsic; accompanied, in 1687, prince Friedrich August of Saxony on his tour through France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy; was appointed, in 1689, superintendent at Rochlitz, and in 1692 court-preacher at Eisenach; at the suggestion of Spener he was called, in 1695, to Halle as professor of theology and member of the Magdeburg Consistory; and died in 1730. He was one of the founders of the Pietistic School at Halle, where he had labored together with the famous Franke. Of his writings, the most important is his Collegium Antitheticum (edited by Schwentzel in 1732). See Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Anton, Ulrich, DUKE OF BRUNSWICK, was born Oct. 4, 1633, and studied at Helmstädt. He was a very learned man, pupil of two of the most distinguished scholars of the day, and a good and pious sovereign. The stain in his career is that in extreme old-age he embraced the Roman Catholic religion, avowedly from political motives, and then again reverted to Lutheranism on his death-bed. But except for this inconsistency, he deserved and enjoyed the esteem of his people. He died March 27, 1714. He wrote several hymns, which are extremely good, graceful in form, and deep in feeling, and have become very well known, viz., Wer Geduld und Demuth liebet (Engl. transl. in Winkworth's Christian Singers, p. 225, "Patience and humility"):—Nach dir, o Herr verlanget mich (Engl. transl. in Lyra Germ. i, 145, "O God, I long thy light to see"):—Nun treu' ich wieder aus der Ruh' (ibid. p. 220, "Once more from rest I rise again"):—Lass dich, Gott, du verlassener (ibid. p. 159, "Leave all to God"). See Koch, Gesch. des deutschen Kirchenliedes, iii, 537 sq. (B. P.)

Antonelli, Giacomo, an Italian cardinal and statesman, was born at Sonnino, on the Neapolitan frontier, April 2, 1806. Though of an ancient family, he was the son of a herdsman, and was educated at the Grand Seminary of Rome, where he attracted the attention of Gregory XVI, who raised him to the prelacy and appointed him to several important offices, and in 1845 to that of minister of finance. After the accession of Pius IX, he became cardinal, June 12, 1847, and in 1848 prime-minister, in which position he won at first the favor of the popular party. After the assassination of the pope's political adviser, Rossi, Antonelli urged Pius IX to leave Rome, and joined him at Gaeta in November, 1848, where he conducted the negotiations which resulted in the pope's return to his capital under the protection of the French army, April 12, 1850. He now became secretary of foreign affairs, and maintained a conservative policy, to the great exasperation of the Liberals. He, however, maintained his position against his opponents, and did all in his power to stem the tide of events in Italy. In 1867 he became curator ad interim of the University of Rome. After the death of cardinal Ugolino, he became dean of the Order of Cardinal Deacons in January, 1868. He remonstrated against the success of Victor Emmanuel, who entered Rome formally Nov. 21, 1871. After the Ecumenical Council of 1870, he came prominently forward in defence of papal interests. He died Nov. 6, 1876.

Antonelli, Giovanni Carlo, an Italian bishop, was born in 1690. He belonged to a noble family of Velletri. Having entered the priesthood, he gained the favor of Alexander Borgia, who made him apostolic protonotary about 1723. He afterwards became general auditor of the nunciature in Saxony. Returning to Rome in 1730, he aspired to the episcopacy; but the intrigues which he witnessed caused him to retire to Velletri, where he still found enemies. Finally he became bishop of that place in 1752. He died in 1769. He wrote Epistola ad Polyarchum, on the occasion of a celebration given on the election of Clement XII. His other writings are unpublished. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antonelli, Leonardo, cardinal-bishop of Velletri and Ostia, and dean of the Sacred College, was born at Sinigaglia, Nov. 6, 1730. His attachment to the Jesuits met with opposition from pope Clement XIV, who had abolished this order. It has been said of Antonelli that he came into the world a hundred years too late.

Acting as if Europe were still under the temporal and spiritual power of the pope, he fulfilled the functions of prefect of the Propaganda with all the bias of a Roman prelate of the 18th century. During the French Revolution he was one of the chiefs of the assembly of the State, and proposed, in concert with the fiscal Barbieri, more extreme measures. In the meantime, he supported the vote of Jan. 15, 1791, for the sanction of the civil constitution of the clergy, decreed by the National Assembly of France, July 12, 1790. In 1800 he concurred in the election of Pius VII, and accompanied that pontiff on his voyage to Paris in 1804. He was driven from Rome in 1808 by the French, but was conveyed to Spoleto, and died at Sinigaglia, Jan. 23, 1811. In his youth he had written the pope's brief of interdiction of the duke of Parma, which gave to Voltaire the idea of a piquant article entitled Le Royaume mis en Interdit. Nevertheless, his letter to the bishops of Ireland showed that he held the same opinions of intolerance that were ascribed to him earlier. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antonia, St., a virgin, who suffered martyrdom in Numidia with Sts. James, Marianus, and others in A.D. 259, under Valerian. See Ruinart, p. 224, 228.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antoniano, SILVIO, an Italian cardinal, was born at Rome, Dec. 31, 1540. Son of a cloth-dealer, he at first applied himself to the study of the fine arts, and obtained the name of Il Poetino. He gained by his talents the favor of Hercules II, duke of Ferrara, who appointed him, at the age of sixteen, professor of eloquence at Ferrara. At the death of his patron, he was called to Rome in 1559 by Pius IV, who made him secretary of cardinal Charles Borromeo. While acting in this capacity he wrote the Acts of the Council of Milan, and thereby gained a number of friends and patrons. Afterwards he was appointed professor of belles-lettres in the College of Sapienza at Rome. His lectures were brilliant, and it is said that on the day when he commenced the explanation of Cicero's oration Pro Marcello he had twenty-five cardinals in his audience. He was one of the most distinguished members of the Academy of the Vatican, established by cardinal Borromeo. He at length gave up belles-lettres in order to devote himself entirely to the study of philosophy and theology. He was ordained priest in 1567, and was appointed a little later secretary of the Sacred College. The popes Gregory XIII and Sixtus V confided to him several missions, which he performed successfully. Finally, Clement VIII made him canon of the basilica of the Vatican, and then cardinal, March 3, 1598. He died Aug. 15, 1603. He wrote, Dell' Educazione Cristiana de' Figliuoli Libri Tre (Verona, 1584; republished at Cremona, and then at Naples):—Orationes Tredecim (published after his death [Rome, 1610] by Joseph Castiglione). His Life is found in this last work. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antonianus, a bishop who wrote (A.D. 252) to Cyprian to assure him of his adherence to him and Cornelius against Novatian. He was afterwards much shaken by a letter from Novatian defending his doctrine and accusing pope Cornelius of laxity. Cyprian seems, however, to have convinced him of the excellence of Cornelius's life and policy as well as of the danger of Novatian's rigor.

Antonianus, JOHANNES, a Dutch Dominican of Nimeguen, was born in the first half of the 16th century, and died in 1588. He wrote several works highly esteemed by the fathers of the Church, of which the following are some of the principal ones: Liber Gregorii, Episc. Nysseni, de Creatione Hominis; Supplementum Hexameri Basilii Magni, Interprete Dionysio Romano eziquo, nunc primum typis excusum (Cologne, 1537):—Paulini Nolani quotquot Exstant Opera Omnia, H. Gravii studio restituta et illustrata (ibid. 1560):—Epistolarum D. Hieronymi Decas I, ab Henrico Gravio Priore quondam suo recensita et illustrata (Antwerp, 1568). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antonides, Theodorus, a Dutch theologian, who lived in the first half of the 18th century, wrote commentaries upon the Epistles of St. James, St. Peter, and St. Jude, and upon the book of Job. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Antonides, Vincentius, a minister of the Reformed (Dutch) Church, was born in Holland (?) in 1670. He was pastor of Bergen, in Friesland, Holland, from about 1695 to 1705, at which time he came to America. He served as pastor in the following places: Bushwick, Flatbush, Flatlands, Brooklyn, New Utrecht, Gravesend, and Jamaica, from 1705 to 1744. He died July 18, 1744. He was a gentleman of extensive learning, exemplary piety, kind, benevolent, and charitable to all; and resigned under all his afflictions, losses, calamities, and misfortunes, which befel him in his own person and family. See Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America (3d ed.), p. 167.

Antoninus, St., the patron of Sorrento, in Naples, was born in the 8th century, and entered a monastery, observing the rule of Monte-Casino. Upon the death of Bonifacius, he was made abbot of St. Agrippinus. He died Feb. 13, 830, but his festival is observed on the 14th.

Antonio OF BRONTO, in Naples, a Franciscan, was vicar of the province of St. Nicolas of that order, and died in 1459, leaving many works, among them, Sermones Quadragesimales per Totum Annum (Lyons, 1496):—De Causis quare Deus fecit Peccabile Genus Humanum (MS.):—Quasiones in Epistolas et Evangelia Quadragesimalia (Venice, 1538; Lyons, 1569, 4to).—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antonio DE FANTIS, a Franciscan of Treviso, was one of the most subtle defenders of the doctrine of Scotus in the 16th century. Besides a Commentary on the first and second of the Sentences, he wrote Tubula Generalis Scotici Subtilitatis Sectionibus Octo.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Antonio DI FEDRIGO, an Italian sculptor, lived, according to Vasari, about 1450. He executed three statues for the Cathedral of Siena, and made some of the works for the external embellishment of the cathedral. In the year 1457 he executed a statue of St. Peter.

Antonio OF SANTA MARIA, a Spanish Franciscan, was born at Placentia, in Estremadura, about 1521. Early distinguishing himself in letters, he took the doctor's degree at Salamanca, whence he went to Rome, and was employed in the apostolic chamber. Upon his return he assumed the habit of the Franciscan Discalceates. He died at Segovia, July 18, 1602, leaving many works. See Saint-Antoine, Bibl. Univ. Franc.

Antonio OF SIENNA, OR OF THE CONCEPTION, a Portuguese Dominican, who died in 1586, was the author of the Annals and the Library of Dominicans.

Antonio DE YEPEZ, a Benedictine, wrote a history of his order in seven decades, and died some time before 1621.

Antonio Fiorentino, an Italian architect, who lived about the year 1560, was born at Cava, near Naples. He studied at Rome, established himself at Naples, and built there the Church of Santa Catarina a Formello.

Antonio Margarita (Margarita, or Margalitha), a German rabbi, lived in the early half of the 16th century. His father presided over the synagogue of Ratisbon. He was converted to Christianity in 1522; became professor of Hebrew at Augsburg, Leipsic, Vienna, and finally at Meissen with Schlegel. His works point clearly to his conversion. He wrote, Der gans jüdisch Glaub, etc. (Augsburg, 1530, 1531; Frankfurt, 1544-61), in German; Luther cites this work with praise:—a work comparing the prophecies of the Old and the New Test. (Vienna, 1534):—Duo priora cap. evang. Matt. Hebraice, cum Dav. Psalmis, etc. (Leips. 1575). See Hoefler, Nov. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Fürst, Biblioth. Jud. ii, 330.

Antonio, Nicola, a Spanish bibliographer, was knight of the order of St. Iago, and canon of Seville, where he was born, in 1617. He studied at Salamanca, and afterwards travelled to Rome as envoy of the king of Spain. While there, pope Alexander VII made him canon of the Cathedral of Seville, the income arising from which appointment he spent entirely in amassing a splendid library of more than thirty thousand volumes, by the aid of which he compiled his well-known Bibliotheca, or library of Spanish writers, in Latin (vol. iii and iv, Rome, 1672; vol. i and ii, ibid. 1696). A few treatises by him were collected (Antwerp, 1659). He died in Spain in 1684.

Antonius, CYRUS. See ANTOINE OF LERINS.

Antonius RAMPALOGUS. See ANTHONY OF RAM-PIGOLLIS.

Antoslandrians, a term applied to Melancthon and other Lutherans who opposed the doctrines of Andreas Osiander (q. v.). See also OSIANDRIANS.

Antrim, PRESBYTERY OF, a section of the Irish Presbyterians [see PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH IN IRELAND] who separated from the main body in 1750 from a disinclination to subscribe to the Westminster Confession of Faith. They adopted the Arian, or New-Light, principles, and may be identified with the Scotch section known as the New-Light Burghers. See ANTI-BURGHES.

Antrimp was a god of the sea among the Wends and Prussians. He belonged to the twelve great gods who were held as the symbols of the months.

Antumalgumen was a goddess in Chili, and was worshipped as a wife of the god of the sun.

Anu, in Assyrian mythology, was the first great deity of the upper triad Anu, Elu or Bel, and Hea—or Heaven, Earth, and Hades. His residence was in the upper, or seventh, heaven, which was called the heaven of Anu, and was symbolized by an emblem resembling the Maltese cross, which was often worn round the necks of the Chaldean kings. He was called "The God of Heaven," "Anu the King," "The Great God," "The God of the World," "The Chief of the Gods," and "Father Anu." The Assyrians regarded him more in the light of the Zeus of the Greeks, as a divine and benevolent personality. The Accadians, on the other hand, looked upon him simply as the spirit or fetic of heaven, in which case he was called Anna, or, still more simply, Na. His wife Anatu, was simply a feminine form of himself. She was the goddess of life and death, and was the Anatis of the Egyptians.

Anub, St. See ANUPH.

Anunit was an Assyrian or Chaldean goddess worshipped by the early monarchs. She is supposed to have resembled the Venus of the Greeks. Anunit was also a star which was identified by the Assyrians with the goddess Ishtar, the daughter of the moon god, Sin.

Anunnage was the Accadian deity called the Archangel of the Abyss, a form of Hea.

Anuph (Anub, or Nob), St., was a monk of Scotis in the 4th century, and brother of St. Poemen. When the monasteries there were devastated by the Mazici, a Moorish tribe, he retired with his brother to Terenuthi. So strong were his ascetic principles that it is said he refused to see his own mother.

Anuvarta is the first rank of ascetics among the Jains (q. v.). This degree of asceticism can be attained only by him who forsakes his family, entirely cuts off his hair, holds always in his hand a bundle of peacock's feathers and an earthen pot, and wears only clothes of a tawny color.

Anvers, HENRY D'. See D'ANVERS.

Anwyl, EDWARD, a Welsh Wesleyan minister, a native of Llanegryn, Merionethshire, entered the ministry in 1808, had a long, useful, and influential course, and died in February, 1857, in the seventieth year of his age. For sixteen years he was chairman of the North Wales district. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1857.

Anxur (Anxurus, Anxytus, Axurus, or Axur), that is, without a beard, was a title under which Jupiter was worshipped as a child in Campania, and particularly in Anxur, a city of the Volsci.

Anyon, JOHN, an English Congregational minister, was born at Whittle, near Chorley, in the year 1796. He was ordained at Inglewhite, near Preston, and afterwards removed to Pendlebury, near Manchester. In 1845 Mr. Anyon accepted a call to Park, near Ramsbottom, where he labored with much success nearly twenty-two years. He died Nov. 7, 1867. See (Lond.) Congregational Year-book, 1869, p. 238.

Anyalus, St., succeeded St. Ascholiis in the see of Thessalonica, in Macedonia, in 383. He took part with Chrysostom in his sufferings, exchanging letters with him, and disapproving of the acts of his enemies. He is commemorated Dec. 30. See Baillet, Dec. 80.

Ao was an Assyrian deity called "The Intelligent Guide," "The Lord of the Visible World," "The Lord of Knowledge, Glory, and Life." His most usual symbol was a serpent. In concert with the other great divinities, the city of Dursharyakin (Khorsabad) was dedicated to Ao by Sargon II.

Ao was also, according to Wilkinson, the name of an uncertain Egyptian deity, sometimes called Moui. He was represented as a kingly figure, with an upright feather on his head.

Aos, in Græco-Babylonian mythology, was the son of Kissare and Assaros, another third member of the first divine triad. By his wife Danke he was the father of the demiurge Bel.

Aoura (or BALOR) was a beautiful valley in the Elysian Fields of the ancient Egyptians, which had to be passed through by the deceased before his trial by Osiris and the forty-two assessors.

Apa (Apy) was an Egyptian amulet, representing the flying scarabæus, an emblem of the sun and of Pthah-Sokari-Osiris, and indicating the idea of self-existence, or the changes or phases or transformations through which the soul passed in the future state.

Apan, in Hindû mythology. The breath of life which is in man is called, according to the Hindû doctrine, Pran. The different parts of this breath bear different names; that part which causes the separation of various useless parts from the body of man is called Apan.

Apap, in Egyptian mythology, was the simpler form of the name of the evil serpent Apophis.

Aparchæ were first-fruits which were usually sacrificed by the ancients.

Apason, in Græco-Babylonian mythology, was the son of Sige, the primitive father of the gods by his wife Ianthe. Apason was derived from the Accadian Apen, the deep.

Apate (disappointment), in Greek mythology, was the personified daughter of night, and sister of dreams.

Apaturia, in ancient Grecian usage, is a name for an Athenian-Ionian festival of the people. The origin of the name is unknown. The most probable explanation is that the name is somewhat related to the phratias, which were subdivisions of the Athenian nationality, and denotes a reunion festival of these phratias. That there was no want of feasting and good wine at this festival is self-evident from the character of Grecian festivals. The celebration occurred in the month Pyanepsion (which began in the latter part of October) and lasted three days. All Athenians and all Ionians resident in Athens, with the exception of the Ephesians and the Colophonians, were admitted to this festival. The meaning of Apatē (disappointment, deception) lies close to Apaturia, a surname often given to Venus and Minerva. It is said of Venus that she was waylaid by giants in the region of Phanagoria, in the Taurian Chersonese, and then called Hercules to help her, who hid her in a cave, and to whom she gave the giants one after another, in order that he might kill them by this means of deception. Of Minerva it is said she deceived Æthra, the daughter of king Pittæus of Troezen, in a dream, in which she asked her to come to her temple on the island of Sphæria, where Neptune then lived with her.

Apchon, CLAUDE MARC ANTOINE D', a French prelate, was born at Montbrison about 1723. In his youth he followed the profession of arms, which he gave up in order to embrace an ecclesiastical calling. Appointed bishop of Dijon, then archbishop of Auch, he devoted his life entirely to acts of beneficence and the practice of all other virtues. Several noble acts of self-sacrifice are related of him. He died at Paris in 1783. He wrote, Instructions Pastorales. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Apeliotes, in Greek mythology, is the east wind. He is represented, as seen in the Tower of Winds at Athens, flying in a horizontal direction, with a light mantle, in which he carries flowers and fruits, with flowing hair, and looking out upon the world with a friendly open face. The east wind brought light, fruitful rains from the sea, therefore he is represented thus.

Apelles, a monk and priest near Acoris, in the Heptanomis, in the 4th century. He had been a smith, and a legend is related of his chasing Satan with a red-hot iron. He was famous for working many reputed miracles. See Niceph. Hist. xi, 34; Sozomen, Hist. vi, 28.

Apellis Evangelium. This apocryphal Gospel is mentioned by Jerome in his Proem. ad Matth., and by Bede, init. Comment. in Luc. Perhaps it is only a mutilated Gospel like that of Marcion. See Origen, Epist. ad Caros suos in Alexandria (ed. Basil. 1557, i, 881, in Rufini Apologia pro Origine); Epiphan. xlv, 2. (B. P.)

Aper (or Evre), St., bishop of Toul, was by birth rich and noble. He married a lady named Amanda, by whom he had many children. At the bar he formed an acquaintance with St. Paulinus, who was then employed in the affairs of the emperor. The example and instructions of this holy man had the effect of disgusting him with the world; and, with his wife's consent, he vowed continence, quitted all his public employments, and retired to one of his estates in the country, where he gave himself up to prayer and mortification. He had not, however, long tasted the delights of his new mode of life before he was, almost forcibly, made priest, and elevated to the bishopric of Toul, in Lorraine. Such, at least, is the account given by those who make Aper the bishop of Toul to have been the same with Aper the friend of Paulinus, bishop of Nola. Others maintain that they were distinct individuals, and make Aper to have succeeded Ursus in the see of Toul. He seems to have been honored in the Church before the middle of the 7th century, when Salaberga, abbess of Laon, caused a church which she had built to be dedicated in his name. He is commemorated Sept. 15. See Baillet, Sept. 15.

Aperu was a hieratic order in the ancient Egyptian temples, analogous to that of the novices in Catholic convents.

Apet was an Egyptian goddess, represented under the form of an upright hippopotamus, with long pendent breasts, generally leaning upon a peculiar cross-like instrument, which has been regarded as a sign of protection. She appears to have been substituted for the goddess Mut in the lower times of the empire; and her titles were, "The Good Nurse," "The Great One who bears the Gods," "The Great Mother of him who is Married to his Mother," i. e. the Ithyphallic Horus. She was also, under the title of "The Great Ta Ouer," or Thoueris, represented as an avenging deity, having a lion's head and armed with a long straight knife, in which character she was called "The Nourisher of those who approach to the Flames (of hell)."

Apewesh, in Persian mythology, was one of the evil mighty genii which Ahriman created to fight against the genii of light, created by Ormuzd. This genius fights with Tashter in the great final battle. The latter is the water, and Apewesh is the drought (not fire, which is holy). Apewesh will finally be overcome.

Apex, a stitched cap, somewhat resembling a helmet, with the addition of a little stick fixed on the top, and wound about with white wool, properly belonging to the ancient Flamen (q. v.).

The word is also used by Jerome to express a small hair-stroke, with which the Jews embellish the top of some of the Hebrew characters, placing it over them in the shape of a crown. These are used especially in the books read in the synagogues, and in the Mezuzoth (q. v.).

Aperu (Guide of the Roads), in Egyptian mythology, was the name of the divine jackal Anubis.

Apbian, St. See AMPHIAN.

Aphraates, JACOB, surnamed the Persian Sage, a Syrian writer of the 4th century, is said to have been born of idolatrous parents. After his conversion he left his country, and went first to Edessa and afterwards to Antioch, where he did not cease from warning the faithful in every way against the Arian heresy. The Greeks commemorate him as a saint on Jan. 29; the Latins, April 7. See Theodoret, lib. iv; Baillet, April 7; Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v. He is the author of homilies, which were erroneously ascribed by N. Antonelli to Jacob of Nisibis (comp. S. Jacobi Nisibeni Opera Omnia ex Armeno in Lat. Sermonem Translata [Rome, 1756]), and likewise by Gennadius, who copied Antonelli. G. Wright published them in 1869, under the title The Homilies of Aphraates, the Persian Sage, edited from Syriac MSS. of the 5th and 6th Centuries (London). Eight of these homilies were translated into German by Bickell, in the Bibliothek der Kirchenväter, No. 102, 103 (Kempten, 1874). More recently this writer has been treated by Schönfelder, Aus und über Aphraates, in the Theologische Quartalschrift, 1878, p. 195-256; and by Sasse, in Prolegomena in Aphraatis Sapientis Persae Sermones Homileticos, Dissertatio Inauguralis (Lips.

1878). See Schitrer, Theologische Literaturzeitung, 1879, No. 13. (B. P.)

Aphrodisia is the name of several festivals in honor of Aphrodite, or Venus, which were celebrated at various places, but particularly at Cyprus. Mysterious rites were performed, to which only the initiated were admitted, who offered a piece of money to the goddess.

Api Doma (from dom, "the house," i. e. "the protector of the home") was, in ancient Slavonian mythology, a god whose protection the people invoked when they left their homes.

Apia (Earth) was, according to Herodotus, the name of a Scythian deity answering to the Tellus of the Greeks.

Apiarius was a priest of Sicca, in the province of Mauritania, who, having been guilty of immoral conduct, was deposed and excommunicated by his bishop, Urban. He appealed from his judgment to the pope, although that step was forbidden by several African councils; and, although the Council of Nicæa had determined that the affairs of the clergy should be settled in their own province, nevertheless, Zosimus, according to Baronius, received the appeal of Apiarius and readmitted him to communion. The African bishops refused to admit this pretension of the pope, with regard to the right of appeal to Rome. See AFRICA, COUNCILS OF.

Apitus (she who is on the hill) was an Egyptian goddess, worshipped in the city of Tuaa, in the Oxyrhynchite or eighteenth nome, on the western side of the Nile, in Middle Egypt.

Apmatenu was an Egyptian deity who was generally represented with a jackal's head and holding the Uas, or Cucufa staff, the emblem of a divine life. He was another form of the deity Aphuru.

Apocreos is a name for the Sunday in the Orthodox Greek calendar, which corresponds to Sexagesima Sunday, so called because from it the abstinence from flesh begins, though the more strict observance of the Lenten fast does not commence until the following Sunday. The whole of the preceding week is also named from this Sunday, and is a kind of carnival.

Apodēmus, Sr., was one of the eighteen martyrs of Saragossa.

Apodipnon (ἀποδείπνον) is one of the ecclesiastical hours in the Greek Church, corresponding with compline in the West.

Apodōsis (ἀπόδοσις, return). When the commemoration of a festival is prolonged over several days, the last day of this period is called in the Greek calendar the "apodosis" of the festival. For instance, on the Thursday before Pentecost is the apodosis of the Ascension. In this case, and in some others (for instance, the Exaltation of the Cross and the Transfiguration), the apodosis coincides with the octave; but this is not always the case. Sometimes the period is more than an octave. Easter-day, for instance, has its apodosis on the eve of the Ascension, but generally it is less; the Nativity of the Theotokos (Sept. 8), for instance, has its apodosis Sept. 12.

Apollinārēs Ludi were games celebrated annually by the ancient Romans in honor of Apollo, and instituted during the second Punic war, B.C. 212. The prætor presided, and ten men were appointed to see that the sacrifices were offered after the manner of the Greeks. At first the day was chosen by the prætor; but in the year U.C. 545 they were appointed to be held regularly about the nones of July.

Apollināria, Sr. (1), first bishop of Ravenna, in the 1st or 2d century; suffered much, and even unto blood, in his attempts to plant the faith. Some accounts say that he was martyred by the heathen, but Peter Chrysologus denies this; however this may be, the Church honors him as a martyr on July 23. See Baillet, July 23. (2.) The companion of St. Timotheus, both being martyred together at Rheims in the 3d or 4th century. Their festival is on Aug. 23. (3.) (St. Aiplomay.) Bishop of Valence, on the Rhone; was the son of St. Isicus, and elder brother of St. Avitus, both of whom were bishops of Vienne. Having been consecrated bishop, he continued to wage inexorable war against all vice and heresy, until Sigismund, king of Burgundy, banished him for attending a synod at Lyons, in which Stephen, the royal treasurer, was excommunicated for incest with his wife's sister. He afterwards returned to his see; and in 517 he attended the Council of Epaone. He died probably in 525, and is commemorated on Oct. 5. See Baillet, Oct. 5.

Apo'llonia, a festival sacred to Apollo at Ægiale, observed annually in honor of the return of that god with his sister Artemis, after having been driven to Crete on the conquest of Python.

Apollonio, JACOPO, an Italian painter, was born at Bassano in 1584. He was a pupil of Jacopo da Ponte. His best work is The Martyrdom of St. Sebastian, in the church dedicated to that saint. There is also a Magdalene in the dome of the cathedral at Bassano, and a picture of St. Francis at the Riformati. He died in 1654.

Apollonius, Sr., a solitary and deacon in the Thebaid; was taken prisoner at Antinoë, in Egypt, in 311. The judge who presided over his trial condemned him to be burned with Philemon, whom he had converted when in prison; but, "the fire being miraculously quenched," he was carried before the præfect of Alexandria, who caused them both to be cast into the sea with his first judge, who, together with many people, had been converted by the miracle which he had seen. The Latins commemorate them on March 7. See Ruinart, p. 487. See also APOLLLOS, Sr.

Apollonius (1), an imaginary bishop of Corinth, referred to by Prædestinatus (i, 23). (2.) An imaginary bishop of Ephesus (ibid. 26, 27). He is perhaps the same spoken of by St. Jerome as a person of great wisdom who lived about the end of the 2d century, under the emperors Commodus and Severus. He wrote in Greek against the heresiarch Montanus, and Priscilla and Maxilla, the two women whom he induced to forsake their husbands and to follow him as his prophetesses. He reproached them for their avarice, and ridiculed their doctrine and their prophecies. A fragment of this work will be found in Eusebius, lib. v, cap. 18. Tertullian, after his fall, wrote a book, now lost—the seventh book De Ecstasy—which was specially directed against this work of Apollonius. One writer makes Apollonius to have been bishop of Antioch; but nothing at all certain is known about his country. See Cave, Hist. Lit. I, i, 86.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v. (3.) A "companion" of one of the Antonines, who vainly tried to persuade Bardeisan to abjure Christianity (Epiphanius, Her. 477). (4.) A correspondent of Theodoret, probably not a Christian, to whom he wrote, commending the excellence of his natural endowments, and urging an acknowledgment of the Giver (Theodoret, Ep. 73). (5.) Count, præfect of the East in 442, and great chamberlain, to whom Theodoret wrote with reference to the calumnies spread against him at Constantinople (ibid. 103). He was in office at the Council of Chalcedon, 451 (Labbe, Council. iv, 851, etc.).

Apollonius (or Apollonii), WILLEM, a Reformed theologian, was born at Veer, in Zealand, at the commencement of the 17th century, and died in 1657. He published, Disputationes de Lege Dei (Middelburg, 1655). But he is especially known by his controversy with Nic. Vedel upon the limit of the power of a sovereign in ecclesiastical affairs. The work is entitled Jus Majestatis circa Sacra, seu de Jure Magistratus circa Res Ecclesiasticas, contra Nic. Vedelii Tractatum de Episcopatu Constantini Magni (Middelburg, 1642); a controversy of which Thomasius has given an account in his Historia Contentionis inter Imperium et Sacerdotium (Halle, 1722). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Apollon (or Apollonius), St., an abbot and confessor for the faith. At the age of fifteen years he retired into the Thebaid, where he lived a rigid and ascetic life, his only food being the wild herbs which the earth produced. After forty years of this solitary life he applied himself to the conversion of the heathen; and having brought over many to the faith, undergone many troubles, and, it is said, performed many miracles, he died about 895. The Greeks commemorate him on Jan. 25. See Baillet, Jan. 25.

Apolytikion (ἀπολυτικὸν). In the Greek Church the conclusion of the office or form of dismissal is called Apolysis (ἀπόλυσις). The Apolytikion is composed of troparia, or verses suited to the particular day or festival which are such after the dismissal. See Suicer, s. v.; Goar, Euchol. p. 32, 123.

Apomyos Deus, a name under which Jupiter was worshipped at Elia, and Hercules, as well as Jupiter, at the Olympic games. These divinities were supplicated under this name to destroy or drive away the flies which were so numerous and troublesome at the great sacrifices.

Aponimma, in Greek mythology, is the holy water whereby both the criminal is justified and the body of the dead is purified.

Aponte, PEDRO, a Spanish bishop of Majorca and theologian, lived in the early part of the 16th century. He was first apostolic inquisitor in the province of Arragon and at the Balearic Isles, when he aspired to episcopal honors. In 1519 he wrote, at the request of Leo X., a Breviarium Ordinis Redemptorum SS. Trinitatis. Aponte himself bore a part in this monastic order. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Apopāpas (ἀποπάπας), a Greek term for an ex-priest.

Apophis, in Egyptian mythology, was the name of the great serpent of evil inhabiting the lower world, whose office it was to seduce the souls of the deceased into error or forgetfulness as they crossed the waters of the infernal Nile on their way to the Kerneret, or Egyptian Paradise. To protect the souls of the justified from this terrible enemy, they were accompanied by the deity Horus, and strengthened by the goddess Nut with the water of life and heavenly food. The terrible ordeal once passed, and the soul of the deceased acquitted by Osiris and the forty-two assessors in the Hall of the Two Truths, they afterwards assisted the benevolent Horus to fight against and conquer the serpent enemy, who was then brought captive to the throne of Ra, the sun deity, tortured with knives, bound with ropes, and eventually slain.

Apopompæ, certain days on which the Greeks offered sacrifices to the gods called Pompaiot, or conductors by the way, referring probably to Mercury, whose employment it was to conduct the souls of deceased persons to the shades below.

Aporrhaterion was a water-vessel of the ancient Grecians which was used for consecration and purification previous to entering the temple.

Aporrhēta, in Greek mythology, were the holy things with which those desirous of being consecrated in the Eleusinian mysteries were made acquainted. They were partly symbols of the blessings of the Eleusinian deities, partly relics of art, which were shown to the candidates, touched and kissed by them.

Apostle Spoons, a series of twelve spoons, in precious metal, the handles of which are adorned with representations of the apostles. Anciently they were frequently given as baptismal presents by godparents of the upper classes to their godchildren. Several ancient examples of single spoons exist on which the Blessed Virgin or the patron saint of the child is also represented.

Apostles (Lat. Apostoli) is the title given, in prelatial churches, to certain letters dismissory in matters of appeal.

APOSTLES IN CHRISTIAN ART.—1. Eastern and Greek Churches.—Among these the only representations of the twelve apostles known are the following: In an early Syriac manuscript of the Gospels, written at Zaggaba, in Mesopotamia, in A.D. 585, now in the Library of the Medici at Florence, is a picture of the Ascension, in which twelve (not eleven only) apostles are represented, the Virgin Mary standing in the midst of them. Of about the same date are some mosaics in the Church of St. Sophia at Thessalonica. Separate representations of many of the apostles will be found among the illuminations of the Menol. Græc. of the emperor Basil.

2. Early Monuments in the West.—These are very numerous in Italy and in France, and of very various kinds—as, for example, in mosaics, frescos, marble sarcophagi, and even in vessels of glass or ornaments of bronze.

3. Costume and Insignia.—The dress is a long tunic reaching to the feet (with rare exceptions confined to some of the Roman catacombs), and with a pallium as an outer garment. The insignia by which they are designated are generally a roll of a book, commonly in the left hand, indicative of their office as preachers of the divine Word; or a chaplet, also held in the hand, significant either of the martyr's crown, or the crown of victory, which the Lord bestows upon those faithful unto the end. The scroll is sometimes replaced by a book of the more modern form (usually, however, the distinctive mark of a bishop). See TIARA.

4. Mode of Representation.—In Western monuments of the first eight centuries, the twelve are almost invariably represented as standing, or as seated, on either side of our Lord, who is either figured in his human person or (much more rarely) symbolically designated. In many early monuments there has been an evident attempt at portraiture in the case of the two "chiefest apostles." Of the rest, some are represented as of youthful appearance and beardless, others as bearded and of more advanced years.

5. Symbolical Designation.—The most common is that of twelve sheep, usually represented six on either side of our Lord, who is generally seen standing upon a rock, whence flow four streams. The two groups, each of six sheep, are in most cases exhibited as issuing from two towers representing Bethlehem and Jerusalem. Another symbol is that of twelve doves. Paulinus, bishop of Nola, speaks of a mosaic picture on the roof of the apse of his church, on which was delineated, inter alia, a cross surrounded with a "corona"—a circle of light, to use his own words—and round about this corona the figures of twelve doves, emblematic of the twelve apostles. Other symbols are palm-trees, vines, and other trees, to which a mystical reference was given.

6. Special Insignia.—Another mode of designating the apostles individually is found in a series of enamels in the Church of St. Peter at Chartres. The twelve are there represented with the following insignia: St. Peter with the keys; St. Paul with a sword; St. Andrew with a cross, saltier-wise; St. John with a chalice; St. James the Less with a book and a club; St. James the Elder with a pilgrim's staff, a broad hat with scallop-shells, and a book; St. Thomas with an architect's square; St. Philip with a small cross, the staff of which is knotted like a reed; St. Matthew with a pike (or spear); St. Matthias with an axe; St. Bartholomew with a book and a knife; St. Simon with a saw.

Apostles, EQUAL OF, is a term applied to (1) bishops supposed to be consecrated by apostles, as Abercius of Hierapolis (Oct. 22); (2) holy women who were companions of the apostles, as Mary Magdalene, Junia, and Thecla; (3) princes who have aided the spread of the faith, as Constantine and Helena in the Orthodox Greek Church, and Vladimir in the Russian Church; (4) the first preachers, or "apostles," of the faith in any country, as Nina, in the Georgian calendar.

Apostles' Coats is a term frequently found in parish and churchwardens' accounts, indicating the garments worn by performers in the mediæval miracle or mystery plays.

APOSTLES' FESTIVALS, FASTS, etc.—I. Festivals.—1. In the Apostolical Constitutions we find abstinence from labor enjoined on certain "days of the apostles;" but what these days were does not appear, though the injunction betokens a great festival.

2. The first Sunday after Easter appears to have been sometimes called "The Sunday of the Apostles." This Sunday was one of the highest festivals in the Ethiopian calendar.

3. In the West the commemoration of all the apostles was anciently joined with that of the two great apostles, Peter and Paul.

4. The Festival of the Twelve Apostles is celebrated in the Orthodox Greek Church on the morrow of that festival, June 30.

5. In the Armenian calendar, the Saturday of the sixth week after Pentecost is dedicated to the Twelve Holy Apostles; and the Tuesday in the fifth week after the Elevation of the Cross is dedicated to Ananias of Damascus, Matthias, Barnabas, Philip, Stephen, Silas, and Silvanus, and the Twelve Apostles.

6. On May 1 occurs the Festival of Sts. Philip and James and (some add) All Apostles.

7. July 15 is, in the Roman calendar, the Feast of the "Division of the Apostles."

II. Fasts.—1. As early as the Apostolical Constitutions, we find the week following the octave of Pentecost marked as a fast.

2. There is a collect for a fast in the mass in the Leonine sacramentary.

III. Dedications.—A church dedicated to the Twelve Apostles, second in splendor only to that of St. Sophia, was built at Constantinople by Constantine the Great, who intended it for the place of his own sepulture. He also dedicated at Capua, in honor of the apostles, a church to which he gave the name of Constantinian.

XI.—7

The ancient church at Rome dedicated to the apostles is said to have been begun by pope Pelagius I (555-560), and completed by his successor, John III (560-573).

Apostoli, PIETRO FRANCESCO DEGLI, an Italian theologian, was a native of Novara. He studied canonical law under Marco Antonio Ottelio of Padua. He afterwards distinguished himself as a preacher at Palermo, Genoa, Rome, Malta, and elsewhere. He became successively chaplain of cardinal Orsini, counselor of the Inquisition, and finally abbot of Grazie di Novara, where he collected a choice library. He died in 1650. He wrote, Delle Lodi di S. Carlo Borromeo Panegirico (Rome, 1617):—Plura ad quinque Libros Decretalium:—Ad Loca Selecta Sacra Scripturæ:—De Immunitate Ecclesiastica, in Rosini, Lycei Lateranensis Illustratum Elogia, and in Cotta, Museo Novarese. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Apostolical Briefs are letters despatched by the pope to princes and magistrates on public matters.

Apostolical Chamber is the council to which are intrusted all the pope's demesnes, from which the revenues of the Holy See are derived. It meets in the pope's palace twice a week, and consists, besides the cardinal's great chamberlain, of the governor of the Rota (who is the vice-chamberlain), of the treasurer-general, an auditor, a president (who is controller-general), an advocate-general, a solicitor-general, a commissary, and twelve clerks of the chamber. One of these clerks is præfect of the grain, a second præfect of provisions, a third præfect of prisons, a fourth præfect of streets, while the remaining eight are deputed to take cognizance of various causes, each privately in his chamber. The members of the chamber meet in the apostolical palace on the eve of St. Peter to receive the tribute of the several feudatories of the Church.

Apostolical See (1), an episcopal seat founded by an apostle; (2) a title given to the three sees of Antioch, Ephesus, and Rome.

Apostolical Visitation, CONGREGATION OF THE. See CONGREGATION.

Apostolicum. See APOSTOLUS.

Apostolicus is a title once common to all bishops (the earliest instance is from Venantius Fortunatus, in the 6th century, addressing Gregory of Tours; yet the word is not used here absolutely and by itself, but rather as an epithet), but from about the 9th century restricted to the pope, and used of him in the course of time as a technical name of office. It is so used, e.g. by Rupertus Tuitiensis, in the 12th century; but had been formally assigned to the pope still earlier, in the Council of Rheims, A.D. 1049—"because only the pontiff of the Roman see is primate of the universal Church and apostolicus;" and an archbishop of Compostella was excommunicated at the same council for assuming to himself the acme of the apostolic name (so that, in the Middle Ages, apostolicus, or, in Norman French, l'apostole or l'apostoile, which = apostolicus, not apostolus, became the current name for the pope of the time being). Claudius Taurinensis, in the 9th century, recognises the name as then appropriated to the pope by ridiculing his being called "not apostolus, but apostolicus," as if the latter term meant apostoli custos, for which Claudius's Irish opponent, Dungal, takes him to task.

Apostolia, PETRUS AB (or Pietro degli Apostoli), an Italian theologian, lived near the middle of the 16th century. He wrote, Vita d'Andrea Corsini, bishop of Fiesole (Florence, 1603):—Kalendarium Perpetuum Ordinis Carmelitarum (Venice, 1588):—Ceremoniale Ordinis Carmelitarum (Rome, 1616) without the name of the author. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Apostolium is a church dedicated in the name of one or more of the apostles. Thus Sozomen speaks of the basilica of St. Peter at Rome as the apostolium of Peter; and the same writer, speaking of the church which Rufinus built at the Oak (a suburb of Chalcedon) in honor of Sts. Peter and Paul, says that he called it apostolicum from them.

Apostōlus is (1) the formal missive of the judge of a lower court, whereby a cause was transferred to a higher court to which appeal had been made from him. See APPEAL. (2.) Apostolus (or Apostolicum) is one of the Church books in use among the Greeks, which contains the Epistles. Thus Gregory Thaumaturgus says (Serm. ii, "B. Annun. B. Virg.," p. 19), "When the gospel is read, or the apostolicum, do not attend to the book or to the reader, but to God speaking to thee from heaven."

Apostoolians, a Mennonite sect, followers of Samuel Apostool (q. v.).

Apotāphos (or Atāphos), among the Greeks, was that one who was buried outside of the family burial-place, or the unfortunate one whose bones were not buried.

Apotaxamēnos (ἀποταξάμενος), a Greek name for one who has renounced the world; a monk.

Apotelesmāta (ἀποτελέσματα) were little figures and images of wax made by magical art among the ancients to receive the influence of the stars, and used as helps in divination. Hence judicial astrology was sometimes called the apotelesmatical art. All divination of this kind was looked upon by the early Christians as idolatry, and for this practice Eusebius Emisenus was condemned as engaging in an art unworthy the character of a Christian bishop.

Apotheōsis (ἀπό, from, and Θεός, a god), the deification or the ceremony by which the ancient pagans converted kings, heroes, and other distinguished men into gods. In Rome a decree of the Senate was sufficient to secure to any man divine honors; but in Greece the honor could be conferred only in obedience to the oracle of some god. The following account by Herodian of the apotheosis of the emperor Severus will serve as an illustration of the process: "After the body of the deceased emperor had been burned with the usual solemnities, they placed an image of wax exactly resembling him on an ivory couch, covered with cloth of gold, at the entrance to the palace. The Senate, in mourning, sat during a great part of the day on the left side of the bed; the ladies of the highest quality, dressed in white robes, being ranged on the right side. This lasted seven days; after which the young senators and Roman knights bore the bed of state through the Via Sacra to the Forum, where they set it down between two amphitheatres filled with the young men and maidens of the first families in Rome, singing hymns in praise of the deceased. Afterwards the bed was carried out of the city to the Campus Martius, in the middle of which was erected a kind of square pavilion, filled with combustible matter, and hung round with cloth of gold. Over this edifice were several others, each diminishing and growing smaller towards the top. On the second of these was placed the bed of state, amid a great quantity of aromatics, perfumes, and odoriferous fruits and herbs; after which the knights went in procession round the pile; several chariots also ran around it, their drivers being richly dressed and bearing images of the greatest Roman emperors and generals. This ceremony being ended, the new emperor approached the pile with a torch in his hand, and set fire to it, the spices and other combustibles kindling at once. At the same time they let fly from the top of the building an eagle, which, mounting into the air with a firebrand, was supposed to convey the soul of the deceased emperor to heaven; and from that time forward he was ranked among the gods."

Apparēbit repentina (Sudden will appear) is the beginning of an anonymous Latin poem based on Matt. xxv, 31-46. Like the Lamentations of Jeremiah, it is alphabetic. "This rugged but grand Judgment hymn," as Neale styles it, is certainly as old as, if not a good deal older than, the 7th century; for Bede, who belongs to the end of this and the beginning of the 8th, refers to it in his work De Metris. It was then almost or altogether lost sight of, but Cassander published it in his Hymni Ecclesiastici. Although, according to Trench, "wanting the high, lyrical passion" of the Dies Iræ, yet it is of a very noble simplicity, Daniel well saying of it, "Juvat carmen fere totum e Scriptura Sacra depromptum comparare cum celebratissimo illo extremi judicii præconio, Dies iræ, dies illa, quo majestate et terroribus, non sancta simplicitate et fide, superatur." We subjoin the first lines in the original:

Apparebit repentina dies magna Domini,
Fur obscura velut nocte improvisos occupans.
Brevis totius tunc parebit prisci latus sæculi,
Totum simul cum clarebit præterisse sæculum.
Clangor tubæ per quatuor terras plagas concuens
Vivos una mortuosque Christo ciet obviam.

These run, in Neale's translation,

"That great day of wrath and terror,
That last day of woe and doom,
Like a thief that comes at midnight,
On the sons of men shall come;
When the pride and pomp of ages
All shall utterly have passed,
And they stand in anguish owning
That the end is here at last;
And the trumpet's pealing clangor
Through the earth's four quarters spread,
Waxing loud and ever louder,
Shall convoke the quick and dead."

For the original, see Rambach, Anthol. christl. Gesänge, p. 126; Daniel, Thesaurus Hymnol. i, 194; Trench, Sacred Latin Poetry, p. 290 sq. In English, it is given by Neale, Mediæval Hymns, p. 9 sq.; Benedict, Mediæval Hymns, p. 35 sq.; Schaff, Christ in Song, p. 369. German translations are given by Rambach, Bässler, Simrock, and Königsfeld, in their collections of Latin hymns. (B. P.)

Appendini, FRANCESCO MARIA, an Italian priest, historian, and philologist, was born at Poirino, near Turin, Nov. 4, 1768. He was educated at Rome, took orders in the Roman Catholic Church, and was sent to Ragusa, where he became professor of rhetoric. When the French seized Ragusa, Napoleon placed him at the head of the academy in that city. After the Austrian occupation, he was appointed principal of the Normal Institute at Zara, where he died in 1837. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.), s. v.

Apphia (or Appia), St., the supposed wife of Philemon, the disciple of Paul, is said to have been martyred with her husband at Colosse, Nov. 22, during the reign of Nero. See Baillet, Nov. 22.

Appian (or Apphian). See AMPHIAN.

Appiano, PAOLO ANTONIO, an Italian Jesuit preacher and historian, was born at Ascoli in 1639. Having become a member of the Arcadian Society, he allied himself with the learned Magliabecchi and the poet John Baptist Saginoli. He was appointed recorder of the Inquisition; but he was especially noted as a preacher and an historian. He died at Rome in 1709. He wrote, among other works, Vita di San Emidio, Primo Vescovo d'Ascoli, con una Descrizione della suddetta Città (Rome, 1702, 1704) mentioned in the Journal of Trevoux:—Vita di Cecco d'Ascoli, a poet and philosopher of the 14th century burned as a heretic:—Il Frumento che Produce le Palme: Orazione in Rendimento di Grazie a Dio per le Vittorie ottenute, l' Anno 1687, dall' Armata Cristiana nell' Ungheria, nella Grecia, e nella Dalmazia (Venice, 1688):—and Athenæum Picenum, a biography of the native authors of Picenum (the March of Ancona), his native country, which, however, was never published. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Appianus, St. See AMPHIAN.

Appleby, David, an English Congregational minister, was born at Abberton, near Colchester, Feb.

2, 1819. At fourteen years he was converted through the labors of the Wesleyan Methodists and joined their Society. He became a fisherman at the age of seventeen, and thus continued till his twenty-first year. He was noted for his zeal in conducting services in the Bethels, and thus became a local preacher among the Methodists. Shortly after, he began to preach with great acceptance at Brightlingsea and other places. In 1844 he severed his connection with the Wesleyans, and joined the Congregational Church at Brightlingsea, of which he eventually became pastor. His career of great usefulness was cut short by sudden death, Sept. 7, 1854. "He was a good man and full of faith." See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1855, p. 202.

Appleby, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Tunstall, Oct. 5, 1811. He was converted when sixteen; received into the ministry in 1832; spent fourteen years in Cornwall, where he witnessed extensive revivals of religion; became a supernumerary in 1859, and died Nov. 12, 1860. He evinced deep sympathy with the people of his charge; his ministry was earnest and evangelical, and sometimes accompanied by overwhelming power from on high. See Minutes of British Conference, 1861, p. 11.

Appelford, William Philip, an English Congregational minister, was born in London Sept. 19, 1815. He was admitted to church fellowship Sept. 2, 1831, at Fetter Lane, and entered Homerton College as a student April 23, 1835. Upon the completion of his course he became pastor of the Church at Toxteth Park, Liverpool, in August, 1840, where he remained performing his work with great acceptance and usefulness till his sudden death, March 31, 1854. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1855, p. 202-203.

Applegarth, Robert, originally a Quaker, became a member of the Church of England in the latter part of the last century, and wrote Apology for the Two Ordinances of Jesus Christ, by the Holy Communion and Baptism, recommended to the Quakers (London, 1789). He also published some other works in theology and political economy. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Applegate, Thomas, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in England in 1813, of Baptist parents. He was educated at Stepney College; became a Baptist missionary, and was sent by the London Missionary Society to the Bahamas; returned in failing health, and was a Baptist preacher in England and afterwards in America until 1848, when he joined the Protestant Episcopal communion, and was duly ordained deacon and priest; officiated at Fairfield, Sherburne, Hamilton, and Warsaw, in N. Y. Subsequently he went to Memphis, Tenn., and in 1861 was at Granada, Miss.; returned to Western New York and for two years officiated in Grace Church, Cortland, closing his course in the spring of 1865. He died at Binghamton, N. Y., March 9, 1867. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. July, 1867, p. 335.

Appleton, Samuel G., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of New York, was rector of the Church in Delhi, N. Y., in 1853, and remained there several years. In 1857 he was assistant minister in Waterbury, Conn.; the following year he removed to Morrisania, N. Y., as rector of St. Paul's, and remained in this pastorate until 1868. After a short residence in New York city, he officiated in Saltersville, N. J., and in 1871 officiated in Bayonne, N. J. The following year he removed to Morrisania, without charge. He died Nov. 29, 1873. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1874, p. 139.

Appleton, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born May 17, 1779. He was converted while young, and began his itinerant labors in 1810 at Brighton, continuing them at Sheffield and Rochester. He died June 21, 1817, from injuries received while riding. Mr. Appleton was an exemplary Christian and devoted minister. See Wesl. Meth. Mag. 1818, p. 721, 801; Smith, Hist. of Methodism, iii, 16, 17.

Appleyard, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Selby, Yorkshire, June 12, 1788. He was brought up in the Church of England; joined the Methodist body in 1808; began to itinerate in 1809; preached on the Shepton-Mallet, Banwell, Taunton (1812), Stroud, Redruth, St. Austell, Sherborne, Weymouth, and Frome circuits. He died of pulmonary consumption at the last-mentioned place, June 26, 1826. Mr. Appleyard was an indefatigable student and an excellent and successful preacher. See Wesl. Meth. Mag. 1828, p. 73.

Apponius, who probably lived about the middle of the 7th century, is the author of a commentary on the Song of Songs, which the Venerable Bede cites (Cant. Cant. iv, 5, ed. Migne, PP. Lat. xci, 1162). His exposition may be called the mystico-prophetic. He takes the Song of Solomon to be a continuous picture of the history of revelation from the creation to the final judgment. In viii, 1-13, Apponius finds an indication of the ultimate conversion of the Jews after much suffering. The Expositio was first printed at Freiburg in 1538, then again at Lyons in 1677, in vol. xiv of the Bibliotheca Patrum. See Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs Sacrés (Paris, 1862), xi, 807 sq.; Peters, in Wetzer und Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon (2d ed.), s. v. (B. P.)

Apprice, John, a Christian martyr, because of his unbelief in the Romish Church, suffered death by burning at Stratford-le-Bow, May 15, 1556. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 140.

Approbation, EPISCOPAL, FOR CONFESSION. In the Church of Rome, no priest, regular or secular, can lawfully or validly administer the sacrament of penance without having first obtained permission of the bishop, who has it in his power to limit the permission in any way he likes, and to revoke it when he pleases. This regulation is founded on the pretence of the power to forgive sins having been principally given by our Lord to the apostles themselves, and their successors the bishops, as well as upon the constant practice of the Romish Church.

Appronianus, a martyr at Rome, commemorated Feb. 2.

Aprigius, bishop of Beja (Ecclesiæ Pacensis), in Portugal, not Spain, as Cave and Moréri have it, was a man of great eloquence and learning, who lived about 540, and wrote An Explication of the Apocalypse, of which Isidore of Seville speaks highly. It is now lost; but Loaysa, in his Notes to the Catalogue of Isidore, says that he once saw in Spain a voluminous MS. on the Apocalypse, formed out of the works of Victorinus, Isidore, and Aprigius. See Cave, Historia Literaria, i, 520.

Apringius, bishop of Chalcis, in Syria Prima, was a leading member of the Eastern party at the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, who supported John of Antioch in the deposition of Cyril, etc., and was deputed as one of the commissioners to the emperor at Constantinople as proxy for the metropolitan Alexander of Apamea. He shared in the ultimate reconciliation between Cyril and the East (Labbe, Concil. iii, 1127, 1138; Baluze, Coll. Nov. Concil. p. 497, 507, 577, 719, 720).

Apro, the name of an ancient Egyptian funeral ceremony called the "Opening of the Mouth."

Aprosio, LUIGI (afterwards ANGELICO), a vicar-general of the Congregation of our Lady of Consolation at Genoa, was born at Vintimiglia, in the republic of Genoa, Oct. 29, 1607, and entered the Order of the Augustines at the age of fifteen. He taught philosophy five years; after which he travelled in Italy and settled at Venice in 1639, in the Convent of St. Stephen. He collected the library of the Augustines at Vintimiglia, which made him famous for learning. He died Feb. 23, 1681. His principal work is Bibliotheca Aprosiana (Bologna, 1673). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Biog. Universelle, s. v.

Apsaras, in Hindû mythology, are the heavenly virgins, 600,000,000 in all, whose office it is to solace the gods and the souls of departed men.

Apsund and Sund, in Hindû mythology, were two brothers, who formerly were good spirits; but, tempted by the desire for the earthly, they fell from God, and were therefore banished by him to the Pastals, the hell of the Hindûs. All wars which Indra and his Divs or Dejolas must carry on have their cause in these two evil dæmons, who always stand in the front of his enemies.

Aptëra (guide of the road) was a name of the god Anubis, as conductor of the souls on the road to the lower world, and under which title he was worshipped in Thebes.

Aqua Bajulus, the bearer of holy water; the priest's clerk or assistant, who lived on the alms of the people, certain fees on Sundays and festivals, and certain sheaves of corn in harvest; the mediæval parish-clerk.

Aquamanile is the basin used for the washing of the hands of the celebrant in the liturgy. The aquamanile with the urceus are the basin and ewer of the sacred ceremony. In the work called the Canons of the Fourth Council of Carthage, it is laid down that a subdeacon should receive at his ordination, from the hands of the archdeacon, an aquamanile (corruptly written aqua et mantile) as one of the emblems of his office. These directions are repeated verbatim in the office for the ordination of a subdeacon in the Gregorian sacramentary. In the Greek office, the word used in the same connection perhaps includes both urceus and aquamanile. In the Ordo Romanus, the acolytes are directed to carry an aquamanus (among other things) after the pope in the great procession of Easter-day. Aquamanilia of great splendor are frequently mentioned in ancient records. Desiderius of Auxerre is said to have given to his Church one "weighing two pounds and ten ounces, having in the centre a wreath of lilies," etc. Brunhilda, queen of the Franks, offered, through the same Desiderius, to the Church of St. Germanus one "weighing three pounds and nine ounces, having in the centre Neptune with his trident." See URCEUS.

Aquaminarium (or Amula) is a vase of holy water, placed by the heathens at the entrance of their temples, that the worshippers might sprinkle themselves. Two of these vessels—the one of gold, the other of silver—were given by Cræsus to the Temple of Apollo at Delphi; and the custom of sprinkling themselves was so necessary a part of their religious offices that their method of excommunication was to prohibit to offenders the approach and use of the holy-water pot. It is admitted by Roman Catholics that "hence was derived the custom of holy Church to provide purifying or holy water at the entrance of the churches." This vessel was called by the Greeks perirrhænterion (q. v.).

Aquarius, in mythological astronomy (Gr. Ὑδροχόος), is the constellation in which Ganymedes is thought to be seen, because it comes directly under the Eagle, the bird of Jupiter, that conveyed Ganymedes to this god, and also because he carries a vessel for water. According to others, he is Deucalion or Cecrops: the first, because of the flood which took place in his time; the second, because in his day no wine, but water only, was used. The Waterman is represented as kneeling, upsetting an urn, from which flows a stream of water. He borders on the east on Capricorn, and on the west on the Fishes, and is made up, according to Flamsteed, of 108 stars.

Aquaro, MATTIA D', an Italian ecclesiastic, was born in the kingdom of Naples. He entered, while young, the Order of St. Dominic, and taught philosophy and theology at Turin and Venice. In 1572 he taught at Naples; and in 1584 he was definitor of his province and professor of theology at Rome. He died at Naples in 1595. He wrote some additions to his Commentaries of Capreolus on the Sentences, and published an improved and valuable edition of these commentaries at Venice in 1589. He also wrote a number of works upon the philosophy of Aristotle and the scholastic philosophy, among which are, Oratio de Excellentia Sacre Theologie (Turin, 1559; Naples, 1572):—Lectio in Primum Philosophiam ut dici solet Principium (ibid. 1571; Rome, 1575):—Dilucidate in XII Libros Primæ Philosophiæ Aristotelis (ibid. 1584):—Formalitates juxta Doctrinam D. Thomæ (Naples, 1605, 1623), a work commenced by Alfonso di Marcho of Aversa. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aquatics, a name for certain heretics who believed water to be a principle coeternal with God. See AQUEI.

Aqua-veteri, JOHN DE, was a Carmelite monk of Mechlin, who died in 1507, at the age of seventy-four. He wrote, Fasciculus Temporum sui Ordinis, lib. iii. In the first part, he pretends that Elijah and the prophets were the founders of his order; in the second, he gives the number of saints of the order; in the third, a chronological account of the generals. His other works are, Manuale:—Dialogus inter Carmelitam et Cartusianum:—Epistolæ Familiæres, etc.

Aquaviva (or rather Acquaviva), a name common to several cardinals, viz.:

1. FRANCESCO, of Naples, was born in 1665. Under Innocent XI he was appointed vice-legate of Ferrara, and Alexander VIII appointed him inquisitor of Malta. Under Innocent XII he went as nuncio to Spain, when Charles II and Philip V occupied the throne. Clement XI made him cardinal of San Bartolomeo, and Philip V appointed him the representative and protector of Spain at the Roman see. He died in 1725 as bishop of Sabina.

2. GIOVANNI VINCENTE, in 1537 was bishop of Melfi and Rapolla, and in 1542 cardinal-priest. He died in 1556.

3. GIULIO was born at Naples in 1546. Under pope Pius V he represented the interests of his Church in Spain during the reign of Philip II. To reward him, the same pope made him cardinal-deacon of San Calisto. He died in 1574.

4. OTTAVIO (the older) was born in 1560 at Naples. Under Sixtus V and Gregory XIV he occupied many high ecclesiastical positions, and in 1591 was made cardinal. Under Clement VIII he represented his Church at Avignon, where he had to encounter many difficulties with the Huguenots. At last he succeeded in bringing over Henry IV to the Catholic Church. In 1605 Leo XI made him archbishop of Naples, where he died in 1612.

5. OTTAVIO (the younger) was born at Naples in 1608. In 1654 Innocent X invested him with the purple. He died in 1674.

6. TROJANO was born in 1694 at Naples. He was very intimate with Benedict XIII, and under Clement XII was made cardinal of Santa Cecilia in 1732. Philip V of Spain and Charles III of Naples appointed him their representative at the Roman see. At the wish of Philip, he was made archbishop of Toledo. His influence was of great importance at the election of Benedict XIV. He died in 1747.

Besides, there are mentioned a cardinal PAPINIANO, who flourished in 772 under Adrian I; cardinal STEFANO, who lived under Boniface V; and PASQUALE of Aragon, who was born in 1719 at Naples, and died under Clement XIV in 1788. (B. P.)

Aquei (from aqua, water), a Christian sect which arose in the 2d century, who allege that water was not created, but was coeternal with God. They are thought to have derived this notion from Hermogenes, a celebrated painter at Carthage. The same notion was promulgated by Thales, the founder of the Ionic school of Greek philosophy, who flourished B.C. 640, and whose fundamental tenet was that water was the primary principle of the world. See HERMOGENES; HYLÆ; THALES.

Aquila is the name of several Christian saints: (1.) Wife of Severianus, martyr, commemorated Jan. 23. (2.) Husband of Priscilla, July 8; July 14. (3.) Martyr in Arabia, Aug. 1.

Aquila, Bernardino d', an Italian Franciscan of Fossa (or of Aquila), was made proctor of his order at the court of Rome. He was a man of extreme piety; and Peter Rudolphus does not hesitate to state that he had the gift of miracles. He died, aged eighty-three, in 1503. He wrote, Historia Brevis de Canobiis et Illustribus Viris Provinciae S. Bernardini:—Quodlibet Scholasticum:—Quadragesimale:—Peregrinus, on the Discourse of Jesus Christ to the Disciples on the Way to Emmaus:—Centuria in Memor. Passionis Jesu Christi:—Vita S. Bernardini Senensis:—Vita B. Philippi Aquilani, etc.

Aquila, Francesco Faraone, an eminent Italian designer and engraver, was born at Palermo in 1676, and settled at Rome about 1700. The following are a few of his principal works: The Repose in Egypt, with St. Joseph at Work in the background:—The Last Supper, after Albano:—The Dead Christ in the Lap of the Virgin Mary, with Mary Magdalene and St. Francis, after Caracci:—Our Saviour with a Glory, the Virgin Mary, St. Ambrose, and St. Charles Borromeo, after Carlo Maratti:—The Bark of St. Peter, after Lanfranco.

Aquila, Pietro d' (1) (surnamed Scotus Minor and Doctor Sufficiens), was a Franciscan of the province of St. Bernardino and bishop of St. Angelo. He flourished between 1320 and 1352, and left a small but learned Commentary on the Four Books of the Sentences (Speyer, 1480; Venice, 1584, 4to; Paris, 1585, 8vo; and Venice, 1600, 4to). See Saint-Antoine, Bibl. Univ. Francisc.

Aquila, Pietro (2), an Italian painter and engraver, the younger brother of Francesco, was born at Palermo, and settled at Rome in 1700. While young he prepared himself for the priesthood and became a monk. His principal works are as follows: Subjects after Caracci: The Holy Family:—The Adoration of the Magi:—The Flight into Egypt:—Lions Fighting. After P. da Cortona: The Sacrifice of Polyxena:—The Triumph of Bacchus:—The Rape of the Sabines. After Ciro Ferri: Moses and the Daughters of Jethro:—Moses Striking the Rock:—The Virgin Mary Appearing to St. Alesio. After Carlo Maratti: The Virgin Mary with Five Saints:—The Triumph of Religion. After Gio. Marandi: The Death of the Virgin.

Aquila, Pompeo dell', an Italian painter, was born at Aquila, and lived about 1570. He executed a fine painting in the Church of Santo Spirito at Rome, representing the descent from the cross, of which there is a print by Horatius de Sanctis, 1572.

Aquileiana (Lat. ab aqua elicienda, from bringing forth water) were heathen festivals celebrated at Rome, during a great drought, with the view of obtaining rain from the gods.

Aquilino, RAPHAEL, a convert from Judaism who flourished in Italy about 1571, is the author of a treatise on the "truth of the faith," entitled Trattato Pio, nel quale si contengono cinque Articoli pertinenti alla Fede Cristiana contra l'Ebraica Ostinazione, estratti delle Sacrosante Scritture (Pesaro, 1571, 1581). According to Wolf's testimony, who gives a full description of this work, it is full of mysticism; everywhere he sought for and found Old-Test. types of the cross. He also wrote, Della Hebraica Medaglia, detta Maghen David et Abraham (ibid. 1621), ed. by A. G. Anguisciola. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 47; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 992 sq.; Schudt, Jüd. Merkwürdigkeiten, ii, 75; Kalkar, Israel u. d. Kirche, p. 77. (B. P.)

Aquilinus is the name of several Christian saints, besides the one below: (1.) Martyr in Africa, Jan. 4. (2.) Commemorated Feb. 4. (3.) Of Isauria, commemorated May 16. (4.) Presbyter, May 27. (5.) Saint, July 16; July 17.

Aquilinus, St., was born at Bayeux about 620. He served in the army under Clovis II; and, although married, observed continence with his wife. About 653 he was made bishop of Evreux; after which he entirely devoted himself to the good of his people, and lived in a cell close to his cathedral church, practicing the greatest austerities. In 688 he attended the Council of Rouen, under St. Ansbertus. Towards the close of his life he labored under loss of sight, an affliction which he is said to have demanded in prayer. He died in 695, having ruled his Church forty-two years. His festival is marked on Oct. 19 in the Roman martyrology; but the Church of Evreux commemorates him on Feb. 15. See Baillet, Oct. 19.

Aquinas (St.), THOMAS, Hymns of. Thomas wrote not only in prose, but also in poetry, and the produce of his muse he dedicated, above all things, to the glorification of the Virgin Mary and the eucharist. He composed a Psalterium Mariæ, and a poem (Omni die dic Mariæ laudes, mea anima) known under the title of Soliloquium Soliloquiorum S. Thomæ. When pope Urban IV, in 1261, brought about the general observance of the Feast of Corpus Christi, Aquinas, at the instance of that pope, prepared the officium, or order of worship, for that feast, into which the following hymns, still in use in the Romish Church, were introduced by Aquinas:

1. "Adoro te devote latens veritas;" 2. "Lauda Sion Salvatorem;" 3. "Pange lingua gloriosi corporis;" 4. "Sacris solemnis iuncta sint gaudia;" 5. "Verbum supernum prodiens."

These hymns are not only translated into English, but also into German. The first, by Caswall, in Hymns and Poems (Lond. 1873), p. 161, commences thus:

"O Godhead hid, devoutly I adore thee,
Who truly art within the forms before me;
To thee my heart I bow with bended knee,
As falling quiet in contemplating thee."

Dr. Neale, who renders the same lines thus—

"Humbly I adore thee, hidden Deity,
Which beneath these figures art conceal'd from me;
Wholly in submission thee my spirit haile;
For in contemplating thee it wholly fails," remarks on this hymn, "It is worthy of notice how the Angelic Doctor, as if afraid to employ any pomp of words on approaching so tremendous a mystery, has used the very simplest expression throughout." No. 2 is also translated by Caswall, loc. cit.:

"Sion, lift thy voice, and sing;"

and in another rendering is found in Lyra Eucharistica, p. 125:

"Laud, O Sion, thy Salvation;"

and a third in Hymns for Christian Worship, No. 394:

"Sing, my tongue, the Saviour's glory."

For No. 3 see the art. PANGE LINGUA; and for No. 4, the art. SACRIS SOLEMNIS. No. 5 is given by Caswall, loc. cit., p. 65:

"The Word, descending from above;"

and in Hymns Ancient and Modern:

"The heavenly word proceeding forth."

It is remarkable that Dr. Trench, in his Sacred Latin Poetry, does not mention any of Aquinas's hymns. (B. P.)

Aquino, LOUIS HENRI d', of Paris, son of Philip, was professor of Hebrew at Paris, where he published, פירוש רש"י על אסתר, or Rashii Scholia in Librum Esther in Versione Latina, etc. (Paris, 1622, in Latin). Quinque Priora Capita Libri Job (ibid. 1622, in Latin). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 47; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 992 sq.

Aquisgranense Concilium. See AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.

Ara Maxima (greatest altar), an altar which stood in front of a statue in the Temple of Hercules Victor in Rome, on which, when the Romans had obtained a victory, they were accustomed to place the tenth of the spoils for distribution among the citizens. The Romans used to repair to the Ara Maxima in order to confirm by a solemn oath their promises and contracts.

Arab. The English engineers found a very ancient site, called Kirbet el-Arabiye, east of Hebron (three and a quarter miles on the Ordnance Map), marked by wells and cisterns, which Lieut. Conder is disposed to regard as identical with that of Arab, notwithstanding the substitution of ʿ for ʾ in the name (Quar. Report of the "Pal. Explor. Fund," Jan. 1875, p. 14; in his Tent Work, ii, 334, he spells it Er-Rabiye); and Dr. Tristram adopts the location (Bible Places, p. 63). The place is probably the one indicated by Schwarz (Palest. p. 105). But the situation is rather too far east for the associated names of the group (Josh. xv, 52-54).

Arabesque, a species of ornament used for enriching flat surfaces, either painted, inlaid in mosaic, or carved in low-relief. It was much employed by the Arabs, and by the Saracens or Moors in Spain. In the domestic architecture of England of the 16th and 17th centuries, this mode of ornamentation is very frequent.

Arabesque.

Arabiānus, bishop of Ancyra, was present at the Synod of Constantinople, A.D. 394, when he raised the question whether a bishop could be deposed by two bishops only (Labbe, Concil. ii, 1377, ed. Coleti). He also took part in the synod held by Chrysostom at the same place, A.D. 400, to consider the charges against Antoninus of Ephesus (Palladius, Vit. Chrys. 13). See Labbe, Concil. ii, 1465.

Arabic Version. By way of supplement we add that, prior to the year 1839, two printed versions of the Arabic Bible were known in Egypt and Syria. The one was the edition printed in Walton's Polyglot [see POLYGLOT BIBLES], the other was the Biblia Sacra Arabica Sacrae Congregationis de Propaganda Fide jussu edita, auctis e regione Bibliis Latinis Vulgatis studio et labore Sergii Risii (Romæ, 1671, 3 vols. fol.). But both were regarded, according to the personal observations in the East made by the Rev. C. Schlienz, the agent of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, "with rooted antipathy by the Mohammedans; the Polyglot chiefly for its presumptuous impiety in adopting the phraseology of the Koran and for its inequality of style; and that of the Propaganda for its vulgarity and inelegancy of language." In 1839 the preparation of a new Arabic version was commenced under the superintendence of the Rev. C. Schlienz. The first draft of the whole translation, originally made by Mr. Fares (admitted to be one of the best native Arabic scholars of the day), was carried through the press in 1856. In the meantime the Rev. Dr. Eli Smith, one of the American missionaries in Syria, had commenced an improved version of the Scriptures in the Arabic language; but this work he left unfinished, after years of laborious study and consuming toil. His premature death was probably accelerated by the close and continuous mental application with which he sought the completion of his great task. The translation was subsequently confided to the Rev. Dr. Van Dyck, in order to re-examine the parts already prepared, and to continue the work from the point at which it had been left by his predecessor. Dr. Van Dyck possessed undoubted qualifications for this responsible duty, as a competent and accurate translator having a thorough knowledge of the Arabic language. With immense pains, inflexible perseverance, and unflagging energy, he applied himself to his editorial labors till the entire Bible was finished, and a translation was furnished which, in point of idiomatic exactness, fidelity to the originals, and general excellence, may well satisfy the most fastidious scholars. When it is considered that the Arabic language is spoken by more than one hundred millions of the human race, it would be difficult to exaggerate the value and influence of the great undertaking which had reached its final stage in the year 1865. The text was completed at press in New York in 1867 under the title El-Kutāb el-Mugaddes. The superiority of this translation being recognised everywhere, the British and Foreign Bible Society were induced to adopt it for their own use, and shared in the expense of printing with the American Bible Society. Since 1870 this version has been published with a vowelled text, the work also of the Rev. Dr. Van Dyck. (B. P.)

Aracani are priests among a negro tribe on the West Coast of Africa. The standard or banner which they carry in processions is a white scarf, on which are painted human bones and ears of rice.

Arachiele, CACCIATURO, an Armenian theologian and philosopher, was a native of Erzerüm, in the plain of Armenia. At the age of fifteen years he went to Rome and completed his studies at the College for the Propagation of the Faith; then went to Constantinople, and afterwards to Venice, and became known for his preaching. He died at Venice in 1740. He wrote, Summa Universæ Theologiæ:—Universæ Theologiæ Speculative, Dogmaticæ, Positive, et Moralis Opus:— an Armenian poem in which Jesus Christ is compared with Adam, now in the Library of Paris:—an Introduction to the Christian Life, also written in Armenian. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aradillas, ALFREDO GONZALEZ, a Spanish theologian, who lived in the last half of the 17th century, wrote, Ejercicios del Rosario de la Virgen (Seville, 1622):—Castilla e Spiritual y Divina, a dialogue between Christ and man, the first part of which was published at Granada in 1643. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Araf (or Arafah) is an intermediate place between the heaven and hell of the Mohammedans, which corresponds to the Romish purgatory. See AL-SIRAT.

Arafat, STATION ON. It is laid down as one of the most important practices to be observed by the Mohammedans who go on pilgrimages to Mecca that on the ninth day of the last month of the Arabian year, called Dhu' Chaija, the pilgrims must resort to Mount Arafat, in the vicinity of Mecca, to perform their devotions. The Mohammedans have a tradition that Adam and Eve, after they were turned out of Paradise, were separated for a hundred and twenty years, and that at last, as they were in search of each other, they met on the top of this mountain and recognised each other, to their mutual delight.

Aragon (in Spain), COUNCIL OF (Concilium Aragonense), was held in 1062, in which it was decided that the bishops of Aragon should be chosen from the monks of St. Iago de Peña (see Labbe, Concil. ix, 1173).

Another was held in 1408 in favor of the antipope Benedict XIII.

Aragon (or Boria), Alfonso, a preacher of the Augustinian Order and a Spanish theologian, who lived in the first half of the 17th century, wrote, Vida de la Bienaventura da Rita de Casia (1618). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aragon, Fernando de, archbishop of Saragossa, a Spanish historian, was the son of Ferdinand, king of Castile and Aragon, and became bishop in 1539. He died Jan. 20, 1575. He left in manuscript, Historia de los Reyes de Aragon, and some other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aragon, Fernando Ximenes, a Portuguese theologian, lived in the early part of the 17th century. He became archbishop of Braga, and composed the following works, Restauração o Renovação do Homem: —Doctrina Catolica para Instrução e Confirmação dos Fieis, e Extinção das Sectas Supersticiosas e em Particular do Judaismo. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aragon, Pedro de, a Spanish Augustinian friar and theologian, native of Salamanca, lived near the close of the 16th century. He taught theology, and wrote the following works, In Secundam Secundæ Thomæ de Justitia et Jure: —In Tertiam Thomæ de Mysterioris Vitæ Christi et utriusque Adventus. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aragona, Simone Tagliavia d', an Italian cardinal and Sicilian publicist, was born May 20, 1550. He was son of Charles of Aragon, duke of Newfoundland, and became cardinal in 1583. He died at Rome in 1604. He wrote, Constitutiones pro Cleri et Populi Reformatione: —Sermones Sacri in Synodis Habiti: —Explanatio nonnullorum Decretarum Pontifici. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aragonese, Sebastiano, an Italian painter and designer, a native of Brescia, lived in the last half of the 16th century. His style of design was more remarkable than his painting. He succeeded especially in the reproduction of ancient medals. He designed all the marbles in the city of Brescia with their inscriptions. Lanzi speaks of one of the paintings of Aragonese, Our Saviour between two Saints. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Araldi, Alessandro, an Italian painter, was a native of Parma. His master was John Bellini, of Venice. He painted several pictures for the churches of his native place, among which we especially notice the Annunciation as possessing especial merit. Lanzi ranks him among the good painters of the mixed or old-fashioned style. He died about 1528. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Araldi, Giovanni Francesco, an Italian Jesuit and theologian, was born at Cagli in 1522. He aided in founding the Jesuit college at Naples, and died May 10, 1599. He left a Compendium Doctrinæ Christianæ. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arama, Isaac (also called Baal-Akedah), a celebrated Jewish philosopher and commentator, was born in Zamora about 1460, and was one of the 300,000 Jews who were expelled in 1492 from Spain. He went to Naples, where he died in 1494. The work which immortalized his name is called Akedath Isaac (עקדת יצחק), The Litigation of Isaac, a philosophical commentary on the Pentateuch and the five Megilloth, consisting of one hundred and five sections, and containing some of the severest strictures of the views of Aristotle, as well as some of the most beautiful moral sayings. It is from this work that Arama received the name of Baal-Akedah. He also wrote, a separate commentary on Esther (Constantinople, 1518): —יר אבשלום, The Hand of Abalom, an exposition to the book of Proverbs (ibid. s. a.; Leipsic, 1859): —חזון קשה, The Heavy Vision, written against Mohammedans and Christians (Sabionetta, 1552; Frankfort-on-the-Oder, 1792). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 48; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 45; Kitto, Cyclop. s. v.; Lindo, History of the Jews in Spain, p. 266; Finn, Sephardim, p. 413; Ginsburg, Commentary on Ecclesiastes (London, 1861), p. 66 sq.; Basnage, History of the Jews (Taylor's transl.), p. 693; Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, viii, 226 sq.; Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. u. s. Sekten, iii, 119; Etheridge, Introd. to Hebrew Literature, p. 413. (B. P.)

Arama, Meir (also called, by way of distinction, הרב מאיר, "the Rabbi Meiri"), a Jewish writer, son of Isaac, was born in Saragossa. He accompanied his father to Naples in 1492, and after his death (1494) emigrated to Salonica, where he died in 1556. He wrote valuable annotations on Isaiah, Jeremiah, Job, the Psalms, the Song of Songs, and the book of Esther, which are distinguished for their brevity and for logically evolving the sense of the inspired writers. "His style is very laconic, and being a thorough master of the Hebrew language, he generally gives the true sense of the Scriptures in a very few words, without taking the student through the process of verbal criticism, as Ibn-Ezra does." His commentary on Isaiah and Jeremiah, called אור חיים ופירוש, Light and Perfection, and his exposition of the Song of Songs are printed in Frankfurter's great Rabbinical Bible (Amsterdam, 1724–27, 4 vols. fol.); the commentary on Job, called מאיר אהיב, which he wrote in 1506, was published in Venice, 1517–67; the commentary on the Psalms, מאיר תהלה, composed in 1512, was published in Venice, 1590. See Kitto, Cyclop. s. v.; Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 48 sq.; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 45 sq.; Lindo, Hist. of the Jews, p. 270; Finn, Sephardim, p. 414; Jost, Gesch. d. Judenth. u. s. Sekten, iii, 119; Etheridge, Introd. to Hebrew Literature, p. 413. (B. P.)

Arana, Antonio, a Spanish Jesuit and biographer, was born at Medina del Rio Seco in 1588, and died at Villafranca, Sept. 10, 1650. He wrote Vita P. Andr. Oriedi, Patriarchæ Ethiopie. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arana, Jacinto de, a Spanish Carmelite and publicist, lived in the early part of the 18th century. He became commissary-general of his order and doctor of theology. At the time of the War of the Spanish Succession, he sustained the interests of Philip V. He wrote a work entitled El Señor Felipe V es el Rey de las Españas Verdadero, aado per la Mano de Dios Torre Inconstrastable de Segundo David, Perseguido Victorioso (Pampeluna, 1711). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aranda, Francisco, a Spanish sculptor, native of Toledo, lived at the commencement of the 16th century. He was one of the sixteen sculptors who worked on the tabernacle of the Cathedral of Toledo in 1500. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aranda, Juan, a Spanish sculptor, brother of Francisco, lived at the same period. He was also one of the sixteen sculptors who worked on the tabernacle of the Cathedral of Toledo. He executed some other works for the Cathedral of Jaen, one being the Conception, and two statues of the king of Spain. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Araneus, Clement, a Dominican of Ragusa, in Dalmatia, who lived in the middle of the 16th century, is the author of Commentarius in Epistolam ad Romanos (Venetiis, 1547), in which he is very severe upon the Lutherans. See Miræus, Script. Sæc. XVI, in Fabricii Bibl. Eccles. p. 150. (B. P.)

Ararat. This mountain has lately been ascended by Brice, who gives a graphic description of it (Transcaucasia [Lond. 1877], p. 242 sq.).

Arati, a Hindû ceremony designed to avert the effect of evil glances, consists in placing upon a plate of copper a lamp made of paste of rice flour; and when it has been supplied with oil and lighted, the women take hold of the plate with both hands, and, raising it as high as the head of the person for whom the ceremony is performed, describe a number of circles in the air with the plate and the burning lamp.

Arātor, a subdeacon of the Roman Church in the time of pope Vigilius, was a native of Liguria. In A.D. 526 he gained reputation as an advocate in a mission to Theodoric the Ostrogoth on behalf of the Dalmatians; in consequence of which he was made private secretary and intendant of finance to Athalaric, his successor. He subsequently left court, received ordination, and was elected subdeacon A.D. 541. He wrote Historia Apostolica ex Luca Expressa, in Latin verse, which, with other poetry, he dedicated to Vigilius (ed. princeps, Milan, 1469, 8vo).

Araujo, Antonio de, a Portuguese missionary, was born in the island of Terceira. He entered the company of Jesuits, and went as a missionary to Brazil. He died in 1632.

Araujo, Duarte de, a Portuguese, was for six years general of the military Order of Christ. He was employed for fifteen years at the court of Rome by king Philip II, and wrote the Life of St. Irene (Coimbra, 1579). He died in 1599.

Arauxo, FRANCISCO de, a Spanish theologian, was born in Galicia of a good family. He entered the Order of St. Dominic in 1601, and, having finished his studies, he taught theology at Bruges, Alcalá, and elsewhere. He succeeded Peter de Herrera in the chair of theology at Salamanca, where he taught for twenty years. King Philip IV had formed so high an estimate of him that he used to say that he would follow the opinion of Arauxo alone, though it were opposed to the combined opinion of all the theologians. In 1648 he was made archbishop of Segovia, in which situation he lived precisely as he had previously done, strictly observing in his palace all the rules of his order. He resigned after a time, and retired into a convent of Dominicans at Madrid, where he died in 1664, leaving several works on theological and philosophical subjects.

Arawack Version. The people to whom this language is vernacular inhabit the sea-shores and the banks of rivers in British Guiana, in Surinam, or Dutch Guiana, and in the province of Venezuela. The people of Dutch Guiana were supplied by the American Bible Society with the Acts in their own vernacular in 1851 from a MS. in their possession, but concerning which we have no further information. For linguistic purposes, see Quandt, Arawakische Grammatik, in Schomburgk, Reise in Britisch-Guayana (1840-48); Brinton, The Arawak Language of Guiana, in *Trans. Amer. Phil. Arba Kanphoth (ארבע כנפות), i. e. the four wings, is the common expression for the talith katon, נטליה קטן, or little talith. According to the institution of the rabbins, the Jews are obliged to wear fringes the whole day; but, in order to avoid the odium and ridicule likely to be incurred by the singularity of appearance in such a dress as the talith gadol, or great talith, they use it only at prayers, either in the synagogue, or at home if prevented from going to the synagogue. In order, therefore, that they may fulfil the injunction of wearing fringes the whole day (which were designed to remind them of God's precepts, not only during prayers, but all the day long), they have another kind of vestment for that purpose, called by some talith katon, or "small vestment," and by others arba kanphoth, or "four corners." It consists of two quadrangular pieces, generally of wool, the same as the talith gadol, joined together by two broad straps, and a space left sufficient for the head to pass between, exactly like a popish scapular; from each of the corners hangs a fringe, so that the wearer may act according to the tradition of the rabbins, "two fringes are to be turned in front and two at the back, in order that the wearer may be surrounded by precepts"—מחזיר שתי ציצית לפניו ושתיים לאחוריו כדי שיהיה מסובב במצות. This small talith is worn constantly; some Jews make it into the shape of a waistcoat, or jacket, and use it as an inner garment. The talith katon, as worn by the Jews in Poland, Russia, and the East, is very long, and so made as to present the fringes to their view (although it is used as an inner garment) and thus remind them of God's commandments; but the Jews on the Continent, in England, and America, if they wear it at all, wear it in such a way as not to be visible. See FRINGE. (B. P.)

Arbain (Arab. forty), a word applied by the Mohammedans to denote the forty traditions. Mohammed promised that whosoever should teach the faithful to understand this number of traditions, to instruct them in the way to heaven, should be exalted to the highest place in paradise. The consequence has been that Mohammedan doctors have collected an immense number of traditions in reference to the Mohammedan religion, which in their aggregate form bear the name of Arbain.

Arbasia, CESARE, an eminent Italian painter, was born at Saluzzo, and flourished in the latter part of the 16th century. He studied under Federigo Zuccheri. In 1579 he visited Spain and executed a picture of the Incarnation and some other works in the cathedral at Malaga. In 1583 he executed a fine work in fresco in the cathedral of Cordova, representing the martyrs who suffered in that city. He probably visited Rome in 1588. He died in Spain in 1614.

Arbiele Diez, ANTONIO, a Spanish ecclesiastic, was born at Torrellas, in the diocese of Tarragona, Spain, in 1648, and entered the Order of Franciscans at Saragossa. He was charged with many offices in connection with his own order and the Inquisition, and was distinguished for his learning and the facility with which he resolved the most difficult cases. He lived a quiet and holy life, refused the see of Ciudad Rodrigo, and died in 1726, leaving several theological works, all of which have been more than once printed at Saragossa, Murcia, and Barcelona. Among them is one entitled Defensio Civitatis Mystice Mariæ a Jesu de Agreda, contra Censuram Parisensium.

Arbitrators, ECCLESIASTICAL. At an early period in the history of the Christian Church, bishops came to be invested by custom and the laws of the State with the office of hearing and determining secular causes submitted to them by their people. From the natural respect with which the pastors were regarded, they were considered to be the best arbitrators and the most impartial judges of the common disputes which occurred in their neighborhood. The office thus assigned by custom to the bishops or pastors of the Church was afterwards confirmed and established by law when the emperors became Christian. Eusebius says, in his life of Constantine, that a law was passed by that emperor confirming such decisions of the bishops in their consistories, and that no secular judges should have any power to reverse or annul them, inasmuch as the priests of God were to be preferred before all other judges. By the Justinian Code the arbitration of bishops was restricted to causes purely civil, and it was further decreed that they should only have power to judge when both parties agreed by consent to refer their causes to their arbitration. In criminal causes the clergy were prohibited from acting as judges, both by the canons of the Church and the laws of the State, except such as incurred ecclesiastical censure. Sometimes they found it necessary to call in the assistance of one of the clergy, a presbyter, or principal deacon. Accordingly, the Council of Tarragona mentions not only presbyters, but deacons also who were deputed to hear secular causes. The office of arbitrator was sometimes committed to intelligent and trustworthy laymen, and from this practice the office of lay chancellor (q. v.) may have had its origin.

Arbogast, ST., was bishop of Strasburg from A.D. 669 to 678, the year of his death. He gained the favor of the king, Dagobert, who gave to him, among others, the fortress of Issemburg and the city of Ruffach, with all the surrounding domains. Arbogast ordered that at his death his body should be interred in the place reserved for criminals. His remains were removed some time after to the collegiate church which he had founded at Strasburg. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arboreus, JEAN, a French theologian, native of Laon, lived in the early part of the 16th century. He was doctor in the Sorbonne, and wrote, besides certain commentaries on the Bible, Theophrastus Tomi I et II, seu Expositio Difficillimorum Locorum Veteris et Novi Testamenti (Paris, 1540), an interesting work, bearing some analogy to the Sic et Non of Abelard, an edition of which he also prepared. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arborolatry, the worship of trees, was a very common practice among ancient pagans, and is still in use to a limited extent. In the Greek and Roman mythology, nearly every deity had his favorite tree; as the oak, sacred to Jupiter, and the laurel to Apollo. Among the ancient Canaanites sacred groves were common [see GROVE]; and the people of Syria, Samos, Athens, Dodona, Arcadia, Germany, and many other places had their arboreal shrines. It is said that holy trees still exist among the Northern Finlanders. An enormous oak, called Thor's oak, was cut down by order of Winifred, the Apostle to the Germans. It was beneath oaks that the ancient Druids performed their sacred rites and worshipped the Supreme Being under the form of an oak. The prominent place of the Ygdrasil, in Scandinavian mythology, the Bo-tree and Banian in Buddhism, are further examples of the prevalence of this form of idolatry. See ASHERAH; BUDDHISM; TREE; YGDRASIL.

Arbulo, MARGARETE PEDRO DE, a Spanish sculptor, flourished in the early part of the 16th century. Bermudez says that from 1569 to 1574 he was occupied upon the altar and stalls of the choir of the Church of San Asensio, in the Rioja, Castile. He received for this work 7387 ducats. He died at Briones in 1608. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arca (or Arctula), a name applied to several ecclesiastical receptacles.

1. A chest intended to receive pecuniary offerings for the service of the Church or for the poor (Tertullian). Of this kind was probably the arca pecunie, which pope Stephen (an. 260) is said to have handed over, with the sacred vessels, to his archdeacon when he was imprisoned; and also that which Paulinus Petricordius says was committed to the charge of a deacon chosen for the purpose.

2. It is used of a box or casket in which the eucharist was reserved. Thus Cyprian speaks of an "arca in which the sacrament of the Lord was," from which fire issued, to the great terror of a woman who attempted to open it with unholy hands. In this case the casket appears to have been in the house, and perhaps contained the reserved eucharist for the sick.

3. Among the prayers which precede the Æthiopic canon is one "Super arcam sive discum majorem." The prayer itself suggests that this arca was used for precisely the same purpose as the paten (q. v.), inasmuch as in both cases the petition is that in or upon it may be perfected the body of the Lord. It may have served the purpose of an ANTIMENSUM (q. v.).

Its use was probably not limited to the case of unconsecrated altars. The Copts applied the term "mercy seat" to the Christian altar; and this arca may have been an actual chest or ark, on the lid of which the mercy-seat consecration took place.

Arcadius, ST. (1), martyred in Mauritania during the persecution under Valerian or Diocletian. He was cut to pieces by degrees; and at last, Jan. 12, killed by being cut open. See Baillet, Jan. 12.

Arcadius, ST. (2), martyred, with others, in 437, under Genseric, the Arian king of the Vandals, who carried him and his companions from Spain into Africa. Their memory is honored on Nov. 13. See Ruinart and Baillet, Nov. 13.

Arcadius, surnamed Thaumastorita, bishop of Constance in the Isle of Cyprus, lived in the 8th century. He wrote the Life of Simeon Stylites, the younger, extracts of which are found in the Acts of the Second Council of Nice. Some other MS. works are attributed to him. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arce, JOSÉ DE, a Spanish sculptor, who flourished about 1657, studied under Juan Martinez Montanes, and did several fine pieces of work at Seville, among which are eight colossal stone statues over the balustrade of the Church of the Sanctuary, in the cathedral.

Arcère, LOUIS ETIENNE, a French priest of the Oratory, was born at Marseilles in 1698, and is chiefly known by his History of the Town of Rochelle and the Country of Aunis (1756, 2 vols. 4to, and in 6 vols. 12mo). He died Feb. 7, 1782. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arch IN CHRISTIAN ART. The influence which the arch has had in effecting changes in architecture is much greater than is generally supposed. Not only may the deterioration which took place in the Roman be ascribed to it, but even the introduction of Gothic architecture may be said to be owing to it; for the arch gradually encroached upon the leading principle of Classical architecture—namely, that the horizontal lines should be dominant—until that principle was entirely abrogated, and the principle of the Gothic—namely, the dominant vertical line—took its place.

In the early Christian churches in Rome the arches are usually of brick, resting upon marble columns, and are frequently concealed behind a horizontal entablature. When once the open application of the arch above the columns had been introduced, it appears never to have been abandoned, and the entablature was interrupted to suit the arch, the principal object aimed at being an appearance of height and spaciousness; and in some instances in Roman work the entablature is omitted entirely, and the arch rises directly from the capital of the column, as in Gothic architecture. In the 5th and 6th centuries, a piece of entablature is preserved over the capital in Byzantine work, as at Ravenna, and in the Church of Santo Stefano Rotondo in Rome. When, after the dominion of the Romans was destroyed, and the rules governing the true proportions of architecture, from which they had themselves so widely departed, were entirely lost, the nations of Europe began again to erect large buildings, they would naturally endeavor to copy the structures of the Romans; but it was not to have been expected, even supposing they were capable of imitating them exactly, that they would have retained the clumsy, and to them unmeaning, appendage of a broken entablature, but would have placed the arch at once on the top of the column, as we know they did: hence arose the various national styles which preceded the introduction of the pointed arch, including the Norman.

The earliest Norman arches are semicircular and square-edged, as in the remains of the palace of William Rufus at Westminster, not recessed (or divided into orders) and not moulded. As the Norman style advanced, the arches became much enriched with mouldings and ornaments, and recessed, often doubly or trebly recessed, or what Prof. Willis calls divided into two or more orders. The form of the arch also by this time begins to vary very much: a stilted arch is often used, sometimes for greater convenience in vaulting; in other instances, like the horseshoe arch, apparently from fashion only. The form, however, is of very little use as a guide to the date of a building either in this or in the later styles; it is always dictated by convenience rather than by any rule, and it is probable that the pointed arch came in exceptionally much earlier than has generally been supposed. The mouldings and details both of the arch itself and of the capitals are a much better guide to the date than the form of the arch.

Antiquaries are not agreed upon the origin of the pointed arch, some contending that it is an importation from the East, and others that it is the invention of the countries in which Gothic architecture prevailed. It is, perhaps, more true that the Gothic style in which the pointed arch is so chief a feature was gradually developed from the mixture of the Romanesque and Byzantine. But, be its origin what it may, the pointed arch was not introduced to general use on the western side of Europe till the latter half of the 12th century. From that time it continued, under various modifications, to be the prevailing form in the countries in which Gothic architecture flourished until the revival of the Classical orders. One of the best-authenticated instances of the earliest use of the pointed arch in England is the circular part of the Temple Church of London, which was dedicated in 1185. The choir of Canterbury Cathedral, commenced in 1175, is usually referred to as the earliest example in England, and none of earlier date has been authenticated; although it seems probable that many pointed arches of the transitional character with Norman details are at least as early as the middle of the 12th century, if not earlier, as at Malmesbury Abbey, St. Cross, etc.

The only forms used by the ancients were the semicircle (Fig. 1), the segment (Figs. 2, 3), and ellipse (Fig. 4), all which continued prevalent till the pointed arch appeared, and even after that period they were occasionally employed in all the styles of Gothic architecture.

In the Romanesque and Norman styles, the centre, or point from which the curve of the arch is struck, is not unfrequently found to be above the line of the impost, and the mouldings between these two levels are either continued vertically, to which arrangement the term stilted has been applied (Fig. 5), or they are slightly inclined inwards (Fig. 6), or the curve is prolonged till it meets the impost (Fig. 7); these two latter forms are called horseshoe arches. Pointed arches are sometimes elevated in a similar manner, especially in the Early English style, and are called by the same names (Fig. 8), but they are principally used in Moorish architecture. The proportions given to the simple pointed arch (Fr. ogive) are threefold—viz. the equilateral (Fig. 9), which is formed on an equilateral triangle; the lancet (Fig. 10), formed on an acute-angled triangle; and the drop arch (Fig. 11), formed on an obtuse-angled triangle. These, together with the segmental pointed arch (Fig. 12), are the prevailing forms used in Early English work; although trefoiled arches (Figs. 13, 14, 15), cinquefoiled, etc. (Figs. 16, 17), of various proportions, are frequently met with, especially towards the end of the style, but they are principally used in panellings, niches, and other small openings.

Simple pointed arches were used in all the styles of Gothic architecture, though not with the same frequency. The lancet arch is common in the Early English, and is sometimes found in the Decorated, but is very rarely met with in the Perpendicular: the drop arch and the equilateral abound in the first two styles and in the early part of the Perpendicular, but they afterwards, in great measure, gave way to the four-centred. Plain and pointed segmental arches also are frequently used for windows in the Decorated and Perpendicular styles, but not often for other openings. With the Decorated style was introduced the ogee arch (Fr. arcade en talon), Fig. 18, which continued to be used throughout the Perpendicular style, although less frequently than in the Decorated. It is very common over niches, tombs, and small doorways, and in Northamptonshire in the arches of windows; but the difficulty of constructing it securely precluded its general adoption for large openings. About the commencement of the Perpendicular style the four-centred arch (Fig. 19) appeared as a general form, and continued in use until the revival of Classical architecture. When first introduced the proportions were bold and effective, but it was gradually more and more depressed until the whole principle, and almost the form, of an arch was lost; for it became so flat as to be frequently cut in a single stone, which was applied as a lintel over the head of an opening. In some instances an arch having the effect of a four-centred arch is found, of which the sides are perfectly straight, except at the lower angles next the impost (Fig. 20); it is generally a sign of late and bad work, and prevailed most during the reigns of Henry VIII, Elizabeth, and James I. The four-centred arch appears never to have been brought into general use out of England, although the Flamboyant style of the Continent, which was contemporary with our Perpendicular, underwent the same gradual debasement. The depressed arches used in Flamboyant work are flattened ellipses (Fig. 21), or sometimes, as in late Perpendicular, ogees, and not unfrequently the head of an opening is made straight, with the angles only rounded off (Fig. 22). This last form and the flattened ellipse are very rarely met with in England.

There is also the rampant arch (Fig. 24), the imposts of which are at different levels; and what is called a flat arch (Fig. 25), which is constructed with stones cut into wedges or other shapes so as to support each other without rising into a curve; and considerable ingenuity is often displayed in the formation of these.

Notice must also be taken of a construction which is not unfrequently used as a substitute for an arch, especially in the style which is referred to as perhaps being Saxon, and which produces a very similar effect (Fig. 26). It consists of two straight stones set upon their edge and leaning against each other at the top, so as to form two sides of a triangle and support a superincumbent weight; excepting in the style just alluded to, these are seldom used except in rough work or in situations in which they would not be seen.

There is one form given to the heads of openings which is frequently called an arch, although it is not one. It consists of a straight lintel supported on a corbel in each jamb, projecting into the opening so as to contract its width; the mouldings or splay of the jambs and head being usually continued on the corbels, producing an effect something like a flattened trefoil (Fig. 23): the corbels are usually cut into a hollow curve on the under side, but they occasionally vary in form. This form has been called the shouldered arch, from its resembling a man's shoulders with the head cut off. These heads are most commonly used for doorways. In the southern parts of the kingdom they are rare, and when found are generally of Early English date; but in the North they are much more frequent, and were used to a considerably later period.

As the arch forms so important an element in the Gothic style as distinguished from the entablature of the Greek and Roman styles, it is introduced in every part of the building and receives a great variety of ornamentation. In the Norman style such ornaments as the zigzag and beak-head are most usual; in the Early English style the dog's-tooth in the hollows is very frequent. In the Decorated style the arches are not usually more rich than in the Early English; the mouldings are not so bold nor the hollows so deep, and the plain chamfered arch is very common in this style. When ornament is used, the ball-flower or the four-leaved flower takes the place of the dog's-tooth. The arches of the Perpendicular style are often profusely moulded, but the mouldings less bold and less deep even than in the previous style; they are sometimes ornamented with the foliage peculiar to that style, and sometimes also quite plain.

Archacolyth. Formerly, in some cathedrals, there was a dignitary so named; he was the chief of the acolyths, as the archpriest, archdeacon, and archsubdeacon were of their respective orders.

Archange DE LYON, a French preacher of the Capuchin Order who lived at the close of the 17th century, wrote, Oraison Funèbre de M. Jean de Maupeou, (Chalons, 1677), bishop of Châlon-sur-Saône:—Oraison Funèbre de M. Jean-Armand Mitte de Chevreire, Marquis de Saint-Chamond (Lyons, 1686). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archange DE ROUEN, a French theologian of the Order of St. Francis, lived near the close of the 17th century. He wrote, among other works, Abrégé de la Vie de St. Vincent (Paris, 1687):—Paroles du Nouveau Testament pour Éclairer les Gens du Monde sur l'Importance du Salut (ibid. 1691):—La Vie de Ste. Élisabeth, Fille du Roi de Hongrie, Duchesse de Thuringe (ibid. 1692):—La Règle du Tiers Ordre de St. François (ibid. 1706). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archange DE VALOGNES was a Capuchin of Normandy in the 17th century, who exercised, in the island of Jersey, the functions of apostolic missionary. He wrote a book entitled Le Directeur Fidèle (Rouen, 1645, 6 vols. 8vo).

Archangelo OF BORGO NOVO (or Archangelus de Burgonovo), an Italian theologian of the Order of Minorites who lived in the last half of the 16th century, applied himself to scholastic philosophy, and studied Hebrew and the Talmud. He wrote, Trattato ossia Dichiarazione della Virtù e Dignità del Nome di Gesù (Ferrara, 1557):—Apologia pro Defensione Doctrinæ Cubalæ contra Petr. Garziam (Bologna, 1564):—Cabalistarum Selectiora (Venice, 1569). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archangels are represented as the seven principal angels or rulers of the heavenly choir. Scripture gives us the names of four—viz., Michael, Gabriel, Raphael and Uriel; tradition supplies the other three—viz., Chamuel, Jophiel, and Zadkiel. Michael is represented as the guardian and protector of the Jewish Church; and when the synagogue gave place to the Church of Christ he became the patron of the Church militant. He is mentioned in Scripture five times. Gabriel was the archangel who announced to Mary the conception of our Blessed Lord, and to Zacharias the birth of John the Baptist. Raphael was the guardian and protector of Tobias. Tradition says that it was Raphael who appeared to the shepherds by night, announcing our Blessed Lord's nativity. Uriel appeared to Esdras to interpret God's will to him (2 Esdras iv). It was Chamuel who wrestled with Jacob. Tradition also says it was he who appeared to our Lord in the garden of Gethsemane. Jophiel was guardian of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, and drove out Adam and Eve from Paradise. It was Zadkiel who stayed the hand of Abraham when about to offer up Isaac. See ANGELS.

Archangiolo DELLA PRESENTAZIONE was a monk of the Order of Barefooted Carmelites, and reader in theology in Italy, who flourished about the middle of the last century, published The Thirteen Books of the Confessions of St. Augustine of Hippo (Florence, 1757, fol.), illustrated with various commentaries, etc.:—also wrote a Life of St. Monica (Sienna, 1757, 4to), in Italian.

Archangjos, ANTONIO DOS (in Lat. Antonius de Archangelis), a Portuguese preacher of the Order of St. Francis, was born in 1632. He taught philosophy and theology, distinguished himself in preaching, and died in 1682. He left a number of sermons. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archard was a monk of Cîteaux, and master of the novices at Clairvaux, in the time of St. Bernard, who composed a Life of St. Geseñinus the Hermit (Douai, 1626), edited by Raisius. Archard lived about 1140. Cave calls him "philosophus insignis et theologus illustris." He also wrote some short Sermons to the novices. See Dupin, Bibliothèque Univ. ii, 374; Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, 218.

Archari, the name given to novices in the monasteries of the Greek Church. See CALOYERS; NOVICE.

Archbishop's Cross, a cross affixed to a staff borne before an archbishop, primate, or metropolitan, to signify and symbolize archiepiscopal jurisdiction. See CROZIER.

Archbishop's Mitre, a mitre similar in kind to that worn by a bishop. In England, for the last hundred and fifty years, the fillet or band round the head has been made after the model of a duke's coronet, to signify the high temporal rank of the wearer.

Archbishop's Morse, a cope-brooch or cope-clasp, on which the arms of the see of an archbishop are engraved. Anciently the archbishops of Canterbury commonly left their personal vestments and ornaments for the use of their successors in their see.

Archbishop's Pastoral Letter, a formal letter written to the faithful of his province by an archbishop, relating either to those general or particular subjects of which he can properly and legally treat, or else to some public event or religious duty to be considered by the Christian people under him.

Archbishop's Visitation. 1. A visitation by an archbishop of any particular place, church, religious house, or college within his own diocese and jurisdiction of which he is the ecclesiastical ordinary. 2. A visitation in the diocese of one of his suffragans to reform, amend, correct, or reverse a judgment or determination of the said suffragan in any ecclesiastical question. 3. The visitation of any college out of his own diocese, of which he is the legal and customary visitor and the acknowledged ordinary, for a similar purpose.

Archbold, ISRAEL, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Harrison County, Va., Nov. 24, 1807. He received a careful religious training; experienced religion at the age of twenty; was licensed to preach in 1834; and in 1835 united with the Pittsburgh Conference. Between 1846 and 1852 he held a superannuated relation. He made several attempts to resume the active work, but his health forbade; and he died May 18, 1859. As a man Mr. Archbold was frank, generous, and noble-hearted; as a husband and father, affectionate; as a preacher, original and laborious; and as a Christian, deeply pious and self-sacrificing. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 71.

Archdeaconry is the district over which the authority of the archdeacon extends. Of these there are a number in every diocese proportioned to its extent. See ARCHDEACON.

Archdekin, RICHARD (Mac Gilla Cuddy), a Jesuit, was born about the year 1619 at Kilkenny, Ireland, and joined his society in 1642 in Belgium. For fourteen years he acted as professor of exegesis and scholastic theology at Louvain and Antwerp, and died at the latter place Aug. 3, 1693. He is known as the author of Theologia Tripartita, which was first published at Louvain in 1671 under the title, Præcipue Controversia Fidei ad Fidelem Methodum Redactæ. This work, which was used as a manual among the clergy, was often reprinted; the best edition is the one which appeared at Dillingen in 1694 (3 vols. fol.). By a decree dated Dec. 22, 1700, the work was prohibited with the remark "donec corrigatur." Later editions, as those of Antwerp, 1718; Cologne, 1737, 1744, etc., contain the required corrections. See Sotwell, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jes.; Hurter, Nomenclator, ii, 374 sq.; Cornely, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchen-Lexikon (2d ed.), s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Archdruid was the chief of the Order of Druids (q. v.). The order in every nation, where their religion prevailed, had a chief priest, or Archdruid, who possessed absolute authority over the rest. There were two in Britain, residing in the islands of Anglesey and Man. The Druids rose to their principal dignity through six different gradations, distinguished by their costumes, of which the Archdruids constituted the sixth or highest. They were completely covered by a long mantle and flowing robes, wearing an oaken crown, and carrying a sceptre. On the occasion of the famous ceremony of cutting the mistletoe, it was the office of this functionary to climb the oak and cut the mistletoe with a golden sickle.

Archer, a martyr, was one of seven who were burned at a place called The Little Park, in Scotland, on April 4, 1519. The principal cause of his being martyred was for teaching his children the Lord's Prayer and the Ten Commandments. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 557.

Archer, J. G., a Presbyterian minister, was born near Churchville, Harford Co., Md., in September, 1842. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1861, and in 1865 at Princeton Theological Seminary. He was licensed by the Huntingdon Presbytery, and ordained and installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church of Clearfield, Pa., where he remained until death, which was occasioned by the car in which he was sleeping falling over an embankment three miles west of Pittsburgh, Jan. 12, 1869. See Presbyterian, 1869. (W. P. S.)

Arches, DEAN OF. See ARCHES, COURT OF.

Archevolti, SAMUEL, a Jewish writer of Padua who lived in the 16th century, is known for his labors in Hebrew philology. He is the author of a grammatical work, entitled הַשֵּׁשׁ עָשָׂר, an extensive grammar divided into thirty-two chapters, of which the twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh chapters are devoted to the accents, the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth to the style, the thirtieth to steganography, and the thirty-first and thirty-second to the modern Hebrew metres.

It was first published at Venice (1602, and often). The thirty-second chapter has been translated into Latin by Buxtorf, in his Kusari, p. 424 sq. Archevolti also wrote, דגל אהבה (Venice, 1551), an ethical work:—דגל אהבה, The Fountains of the Gardens (ibid. 1553), a series of model pieces on Hebrew style. He also edited the Aruch of Nathan Jechiel (ibid. 1531). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 49; Etheridge, Introduction to Hebrew Literature, p. 453; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 46; Steinschneider, Bibliog. Handbuch, p. 15; id. Catalogus Libr. Hebr. in Bibl. Bodleiana, p. 2405. (B. P.)

Archflamen, one of the chief priests, or flamens, among the ancient Romans. See FLAMEN.

Archfraternities are those religious orders, in the Roman Catholic Church, which have given origin to others, or have authority over them. They convey to those which are subject to them their laws and statutes, their mode of dress, and their peculiar privileges.

Archl. This place has, with great probability, been identified with the present Ain Arék, a small modern village with a Greek Church adjoining, laid down on the Ordnance map four and one eighth miles west of El-Bireh (Conder, Tent Work, ii, 104; Tristram, Bible Places, p. 176).

Archibald (1), a Scottish bishop, was dean of the Church of Moray, and was consecrated bishop of the see of Moray in 1253. He was bishop here in the years 1256, 1258, 1260, 1268, 1269, and 1287. He was also bishop here in 1290. During his episcopate William, earl of Ross, gave to the Church of Moray the lands of Catboll and other lands lying in the shire of Ross. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 139.

Archibald (2), a Scottish bishop, was archdeacon of Moray, and elected to the see of Caithness in 1275. He is said to have made a solemn composition of an affair that had been long in debate between his predecessors, Gilbert, William, and Walter, bishops of Caithness, and William, father and son, earls of Sutherland. He died in 1288. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 210.

Archibald, Henry, a Baptist minister, was born at Musselburgh, Scotland, in 1786. He came to the United States in 1818. His early religious associations were with the Established Church, but soon after his conversion he united with the Independents. Not long after he came to the United States he changed his views on baptism, and connected himself with the Baptist Church in Chatham, Conn. Feeling that it was his duty to preach the Gospel, he gave up a lucrative business, was licensed by the Church of which he was a member, and was ordained in Suffield, Conn., May 28, 1823. The churches with which he labored were in Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont, his ministerial life continuing until within three years of his death. Mr. Archibald possessed more than ordinary talents, and was especially familiar with the Scriptures. "Gifted by nature with a strong mind, he brought all his powers to bear upon the one work of preaching Christ, and him crucified." He took a prominent part in the great reforms of the day, and was especially active as the advocate of antislavery. He died at the residence of his son, Rev. T. H. Archibald, in Mount Holly, Vt., Dec. 4, 1859. See Watchman and Reflector, Jan. 5, 1860. (J. C. S.)

Archibald, Robert, a Presbyterian minister, graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1772, and was licensed by Orange Presbytery in 1775. In October, 1778, he was ordained and installed pastor of the Church of Rocky River, where he continued to labor with great success until 1792, "when he became an advocate of the doctrine of universal salvation. In consequence he was suspended from the ministry in 1794, and in 1797 was deposed." See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 113.

Archibald, William Kerr, a Presbyterian minister, son of Rev. G. D. Archibald, D.D., professor of pastoral theology in Danville Theological Seminary, Ky., was born at Allegheny, Pa., in 1852. At the age of sixteen he was admitted to the Church; graduated at Hanover College, Ind., in 1874, and studied theology in Danville Seminary. In April, 1877, he was ordained to the ministry by the Presbytery of Pennsylvania upon a call to the pastorate from the Church of Pee Wee Valley, Ky. He was, however, never installed as pastor, but after a year of very acceptable service, he withdrew from the field in consequence of ill-health, which terminated in his death at Danville, Ky., Dec. 8, 1878. Mr. Archibald was gifted with a manly mind, a warm and generous nature, and an ardent piety. (W. P. S.)

Archicantor is the name of the prior or principal of a school of sacred music, of the kind established as early as the 6th century, and which became common in various parts of Europe, particularly in France and Germany. The title of the head officer of these schools at Rome was "Archicantor Ecclesiæ Romanæ," and his post was highly respectable and lucrative.

Archidiaconus is a title given to two noted canonists who were both archdeacons of Bologna—viz. Guido Baifus and John de Anania.

Archimāgus was the sovereign pontiff of the Magi among the ancient Persians. He was the head of the whole religious system. He resided in the principal fire-temple, a building which was held in as great veneration by the Persians as the temple at Mecca by the Mohammedans, and to which every one of that sect thought himself obliged to make a pilgrimage once in his life. Zoroaster first settled the fire-temple at Balch, between the Persian frontiers and Hindustan, where he himself, as the archimagus, had his usual residence. But after the Mohammedans had overrun Persia in the 7th century, the archimagus was under the necessity of removing into Kerman, a province in Persia lying on the coast of the Southern Ocean towards India. This temple of the archimagus, as well as the other fire-temples, was endowed with large revenues in lands. When the archimagus approached the consecrated fire, he was washed from head to foot, perfumed, and dressed in a vestment white as snow. He bowed to the ground before the flaming altar, and then, assuming an erect posture, he offered up the appointed prayers with bitter sighs and groans. See RABMAG.

Archinimus, a Christian confessor, is commemorated in some martyrologies March 29.

Archinto, Alberico, an Italian prelate, was born at Milan in 1698. He was archbishop of Nice in 1747; governor of Rome in 1753; and finally became cardinal. He died at Rome in 1758. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archinto, Alessandro (1), was an Italian theologian. Charles V, for whom he performed various missions in Milan, gave him the title of count. He died at Milan in 1567. He wrote, De Prædestinatione:—De Beatis Mariæ Magdalene Pudicitia ac Virginitate:—Dialogus in quo Philippo Patruo ac Pompilio Disserentibus quis sit Villicus Iniquitatis ex XVI Capite Lucæ quam diligentissime explicatur:—Dialogus Alter, in quo eodem in eos qui pro Salvatore Servatorem scribunt, Colloquentes facit. All of these works are found in MS. at the Ambrosian Library of Milan. The first two are also found in other libraries, particularly in the Casa Archinta. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archinto, Alessandro (2), an Italian Jesuit and a miscellaneous writer, was born at Milan in 1577, and died in 1645. He wrote a Compendium of Rhetoric:—the Rules of Rhetoric:—an historical Treatise, which is preserved in MS. in the Casa Archinta:—also several eulogies upon members of the Jesuit Order, which are preserved in the Library of the Fathers at Milan. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archinto, Carlo Antonio, an Italian ecclesiastic, canon of the Lateran, and author of various works, lived in the early part of the 17th century. He wrote, Encomiastica Oratio in Laudem Alexandri Troili, Abb. Generalis Lateranensis (Ravenna, 1647):—Oratio Panegyrica Theodoro Pontano, Visitatori Generali Lateranensium:—La Scrittura Politica, Discorso (Lucca, 1682). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archinto, Filippo, an Italian prelate, was born July 3, 1500. He was a member of the College of Judges at Milan. As councillor of the emperor Charles V, he participated in important negotiations. Milan often sent him as delegate to the emperor. He attained successively to higher positions, as that of governor of Rome, vice-chamberlain apostolic, and vicar of the pope, an honor accorded only to cardinals. He was also bishop of San Sepolcro and Saluzzo, and finally archbishop of Milan. Paul IV sent him to Venice as legate a latere. He died June 21, 1558. He wrote, among other works, Oratio de Nova Christiani Orbis Pace Habita (Rome, 1544):—De Fide et Sacramentis Libri II (Rome, 1545). These writings remain in MS., and are preserved in the family archives. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archinto, Girolamo, an Italian prelate, and archbishop of Tarsus, was born at Milan about 1671. He was first admitted to the College of the Jurisconsults, then he became priest, and finally attained to the archiepiscopal dignity. He was sent as nuncio to the grand-duke of Tuscany, and went as legate a latere to Germany, then to Poland during the reign of Frederick Augustus. He had scarcely arrived at Warsaw when he died, in 1721. He left in MS. a work upon the Council of Trent. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archinto, Giuseppe, an Italian prelate, cardinal and archbishop of Milan, and author of various works, was born in 1651. He first studied law at Pavia, then entered upon an ecclesiastical career. Vice-legate of Innocent XI at Bologna for six years, he obtained the title of apostolic nuncio in that place. The successors of Innocent sent Archinto, in the same quality, to Venice and Spain. Clement XI charged him particularly to go and celebrate, at Nice, the marriage of Philip V, king of Spain, with the princess of Savoy. A medal was stamped in honor of this cardinal with the following legend: Joseph. S. R. E. Card. Archintus Arch. Med., bearing these words of Isa. xii, 3, graven on the back: Haurietis in Caudis. He wrote, Colum ex Terra, Oratio de Spiritus Sancti Adventu, habita Anno 1670 (Rome, 1670):—Relatio Legationis a Latere, qua Philippum V, Hispaniarum et Indiarum Regem, cum Sabaudie Ducis Filia Matrimonio junxit:—Epistole Plures cum esset Nuntius Apostolicus:—Acta Visitationis Oppidi Abbiati Crassi, per Danielem Parrum, Cancellarium Archiepiscopalem, collecta. These last three works have not been published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archires are the prelates, or first classes of the clergy, in the Russian Church (q. v.). This name includes the whole episcopal order, who are distinguished by the titles of metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops—titles, however, which are not attached to the see, as in England, but are merely personal distinctions conferred by the sovereign, and give the possessors no additional powers, for every bishop is independent in his own diocese, or dependent only on the synod. They are obliged to live rigid and recluse lives, to abstain from animal food, and they are not permitted to marry. See ANTIHIERUS.

Archisubdiacōnus is a word which occurs in the canons of the Synod of Auxerre, but apparently not elsewhere. If the reading be genuine, it would appear that in some dioceses the subdeacons as well as the deacons had their primate; but it is probable that the reading should be subarchidiaconum, which may have been another name for the officer known to some Western dioceses as secundarius, and by another title among the Greeks.

Architrave (Gr. and Lat. = chief-beam), the lowest division of the entablature, in Classical architecture, resting immediately on the abacus of the capital; also the ornamental moulding running round the exterior curve of an arch, and hence applied to the mouldings round the openings of doors and windows, etc. See COLUMN; ORDER.

Archive was the title of a record which was kept in the early African churches, by which bishops might prove the time of their ordination—an important consideration, inasmuch as the oldest bishop, by the rules of these churches, was regarded as chief bishop or metropolitan. One record was kept in the primate's church, and another in the metropolis of the province.

Archivolt (French from Lat. arcus solutus), the under curve or surface of an arch, from impost to impost. The archivolt is sometimes quite plain, with square edges, in which case the term soffit is applicable to it. This kind of archivolt is used in the Roman and Romanesque styles, including those buildings in England which are by some considered as Saxon and in the Early Norman. In later Norman work it usually has the edges moulded or chamfered off; and towards the end of that style, and throughout all the Gothic styles, it is frequently divided into several concentric portions, each projecting beyond that which is beneath (or within) it.

Archon (ἄρχων, ruler), a name in the Greek Church for several officers.

1. Archon of the Antiminsia, the keeper of the antiminsium.

2. Archon of the Contakion, or keeper of the book containing the kontakia, or hymns used on various occasions in the Greek Church (Goar says, "i. e. Librum Missalem in Liturgia"), which seem to have been composed by Romans.

3. Archon of the Phota or Illuminati (ἄρχων τῶν φωτῶν) had charge of the newly baptized.

Archon, Louis, a French ecclesiastical writer, was born at Riom, Sept. 4, 1645. At the age of fifteen years he completed his studies at Paris, and having won the favor of the cardinal of Bouillon, he was appointed chaplain to Louis XIV and priest of Saint-Gilbert-Neuf-Fontaines, in the diocese of Clermont. He died Feb. 25, 1717. He wrote, Histoire Ecclésiastique de la Chapelle des Rois de France sous les Trois Races de nos Rois jusqu'au Règne de Louis XIV (Paris, 1704, 1711). The third volume, which includes the reign of Louis XIV, has not been published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Archontici. See ASCOPHITES.

Arcimboldi, Antonello, a Milanese ecclesiastic, was son of Giovanni Angelo, archbishop of Milan. He studied law at Pavia in 1556; and, among other ecclesiastical functions, he performed those of apostolic protonotary. Philip II, king of Spain, conferred on him, in 1567, the honor of senator of Milan, and he became, under the title of l'Avvertito, member of the Academy of the Affidati. He was versed in the Greek language. His death occurred in 1578. From him we have the following translations: D. Basilii Magni Homiliæ Octo Antonello Arcimboldo vertente (Milan, 1573):—D. Basilii Magni de Vera et Incorrupta Virginitate Liber A. A. Interprete (ibid. eod.):—D. Basilii Magni de Gratiarum Actione Liber e Græco in Latinum translatus (ibid.):—Gregorii Nazianzeni Homiliæ II, e Græco in Latinum translatus A. A. Argellati and others attribute to him a translation of certain fragments of St. Chrysostom. Picinelli believes him to be the author of Catalogo degli Eretici, published under the name of Arcimboldi, archbishop of Milan. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arcimboldi, Giovanni, an Italian prelate, cardinal, and archbishop of Milan, author of various works, was born at the commencement of the 15th century. Being a member of the College of Jurists in 1436, he was intrusted by the dukes of Milan with important missions. He became successively ducal councillor, president of the tribunal of Entrate Straordinarie, bishop of Novara in 1468, cardinal in 1473, and archbishop of Milan in 1484. In 1488 he resigned the archiepiscopal functions in favor of his brother Guido Antonio. He died at Rome, Oct. 2, 1491. His works, which still remain in MS., are as follows: Statuta Plebis Gandiani, Anno MCDLXIX:—Statuta Riparie S. Julii, Annis MCDLXXIII et MCDLXXXII:—Statuta pro Cleri Reformatione:—Homilia et Orationes:—De Ponderibus, Mensuris, et Monetis Libri III. The work entitled Catalogo degli Eretici, published in 1514, has been attributed to him, but is probably the work of his son, Giovanni Angelo. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arcimboldi, Guido Antonio, an Italian prelate, was archbishop of Milan. In 1476 he accompanied the celebrated John James Trivulzi to Palestine; and was many times sent by the dukes of Milan to the Florentines, the Venetians, and the kings of Naples, Hungary, and Spain. He became archbishop of Milan in 1488 by the resignation of his brother Giovanni. He died Oct. 18, 1497. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arcimboldi, Ottavio, an Italian prelate, was born at Milan in 1471. He was a member of the College of Jurists in 1491, and distinguished himself by his great learning. He had, it is said, a perfect knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. Appointed archbishop of Milan in 1503, he died before taking possession of his see. The six sonnets which Argellotti attributes to him, and which he indicates as first in the collection of the Academy of Transformation of Milan in 1548, are rather the work of Ottavio, son of Giovanni Angelo. This academy was not founded until 1546. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arciszewski, ELIAS, a Polish theologian, father of the celebrated governor of Brazil, lived in the 16th century in the city of Schmiegel, where he was pastor. He wrote and published the preface of a celebrated treatise of Sozzini, entitled De Jesu Christo Servatore. Ruar and Sozzini spoke with high praise of the knowledge of Arciszewski. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arco, ALEXIS (or ALFONSO DEL), a Spanish painter (also called el Sordillo de Pereda, on account of his deafness and from the name of his master, Pereda). He executed historical paintings. But his wife, impelled by motives of cupidity, wished him to unite himself with coadjutors less skilled than himself. He died at Madrid in 1700 in great poverty. His wife then accepted relief from the marquis of Santiago, and her two daughters took the veil. His works are found in many villages of Spain. The most noteworthy is the Baptism of St. John, in the Church of that saint, at Toledo. Other paintings of his are the Miraculous Conception, and The Assumption, in the Cloister of the Trinitarios Descalzos at Madrid:—also a picture of St. Teresa, in the Church of San Salvador. His coloring was charming, but his designs were faulty. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Arconati (1), an Italian Franciscan monk and a composer of music, was born about 1610. He entered this order while very young, applied himself diligently to the study of music, and wrote for the Church a large number of masses, motets, and other fragments of music. He was appointed master of the chapel of the Convent of St. Francis of Bologna in 1653, in place of Guido Montalbani; but he died soon after, in 1657. His musical works may be found in the library of the convent. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arconati (2), a learned Italian Jesuit, was born in 1675. He came of a noble family of Milan, entered the Order of Jesuits in 1692, and died in 1702. He wrote, Prolusiones Posthumæ in Gratium Rhetorum Braydensium (Milan, 1702). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

ARCOS, CRISTÓVAL, a Spanish priest and translator, a native of Seville, lived in the early part of the 16th century. He wrote a translation of De Bello Rhodio of J. la Fontaine, and not of Pontanus, as Jöcher claims:—La muy Lamentable Conquista y Cruenta Batalla de Rodas (Seville, 1549):—Itinerario del Venerable Varron Patricio Romano (ibid. 1520). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arcosolium is a term supposed to denote those tombs hewn in the rock of the Catacombs of Rome (and elsewhere) in which there is an arched opening above the portion reserved for the deposition of the body, the grave being dug from above downwards into the reserved portion below the arch. Others suppose it to mean the sepulchral chambers, or cubicula, in which the great majority of these tombs are found. In the tombs of this kind the receptacle for the corpse was sometimes covered by a slab of marble, or sometimes a marble sarcophagus was inserted. In a few cases the sarcophagus projects forward into the chamber, and the sides of the arch are continued to the ground beyond the sarcophagus. Such slabs or sarcophagi have been supposed to have served as altars during the period of persecution, as being the resting-places of saints or martyrs, and in some instances this may have been the case; but the far greater number of these tombs are, no doubt, of later date, being simply the monuments used by the wealthier class. The bishops and martyrs of the 3d century were placed, not in these arcosolia, or monumenta arcuata, but in simple loculi—excavations in the wall just large enough to receive a body placed lengthwise. In the 4th and 5th centuries the humble loculus was altered into the decorated monumentum arcuatum, and the whole sepulchral chamber, in many cases, was richly adorned with incrustations of marble, with stucco, and with paintings. An excellent example of this is afforded by the chamber in the Cemetery of Calixtus, in which the remains of the popes Eusebius (309-311) and Miltiades (or Melchades, 311-314) were placed, a part of which is represented in the annexed wood-cut. In the walls of this chamber are three large arcosolia, in front of one of which was a marble slab, with an inscription by pope Damasus commemorating pope Eusebius. The whole chamber has been richly decorated with marble incrustations, paintings, and mosaics. These decorations it would seem reasonable to assign to pope Damasus, who undoubtedly set up the inscription. In the year 1859, in the Cemetery of St. Calixtus, an unviolated arcosolium was discovered; in this a marble sarcophagus was found, in which lay a body swathed in numerous bands of linen exactly in the manner shown in the early representations of the raising of Lazarus. These arcosolia were often decorated with paintings, either on the front of the sarcophagus or on the wall above it. One of the most remarkable instances is the tomb of St. Hermes, in the catacombs near Rome called by his name. The tombs of this class are more usually found in the cubicula, or small chambers, than in the galleries of the catacombs; in the former, two, three, or more are often found. Martigny seeks to draw a distinction between those found in the cubicula, which he thinks may often or generally be those of wealthy individuals made at their own cost; and those in the so-called chapels or larger excavations, which he thinks were constructed at the general charge of the Christian community. In one such chapel in the Cemetery of St. Agnes, near Rome, there are eleven such tombs. It is claimed that such chapels, specially connected with the veneration of martyrs, do not usually date from an earlier period than the 4th or 5th century.

Arcula. See ARCA.

Arculf, a French bishop, lived in the last half of the 7th century. He is known by his journey into Palestine, which he undertook with Peter the Hermit, a native of Burgundy. He spent nine months in exploring the holy places, especially of Jerusalem and its surroundings. He then visited Damascus and Tyre, going afterwards to Alexandria, to the Isle of Crete, and to Constantinople. He returned to Rome by sea, visiting Sicily on his way. It is said that, desiring to revisit his native country, he again embarked on the sea, and was thrown by a tempest upon the coast of Great Britain, and came to the Isle of Hy, in Ireland. Adamnan, priest of the Monastery of the Isle of Hy, treated him very kindly, and to him he related his adventures. Adamnan wrote out this recital, and in 698 presented it to Alfred, king of Northumberland. It consists of three books, of which the first contains Arculf's description of Jerusalem, the second gives his travels in the Holy Land, and the third presents the wonders of Constantinople. Bede gives an extract of it in his Hist. Eccles., and the Jesuit Gretser published it at Ingolstadt in 1619. Mabillon published it in vol. iv of his collection of the Acta Sanct. Ord. S. Bened. A translation in English is printed in Bohn's Early Travels in Palestine, p. 1 sq. See Hist. Lit. de la France, iii, 650-652; Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 599, ed. Oxon.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ardée, JACQUES D', a French poet and theologian, was born at Liege, and lived in the first half of the 17th century. In 1615 he entered the Monastery of the Croisiers at Huy, and taught theology. He wrote, in Latin verse, a History of the Bishops of Liege (Liege, 1634):—and a paraphrase of the book of Ecclesiastes, under this title Ecclesiastæ Encomia de Vanitate; item, Rosarium Marianæ Sanctitatis et quodlibetæ Questiones ex Fontibus Grammaticorum, sive Padotechnia et Enigmata Puerilia (ibid. 1632). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ardely, JOHN, a Christian martyr, was burned in Essex, England, May 25, 1555, for his faithful adherence to the cause of Christ. During his examination many articles were brought up and read by the bishop of London, at Fulham, against him; but they were wisely answered. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, vii, 86.

Ardemans, DON TEOFILO, a Spanish painter and architect, was born at Madrid in 1664. In 1689 he went to Granada, and there did much painting. In 1694 he was appointed chief master of the Cathedral of Toledo; in 1700 he received a similar appointment at Madrid; and again in 1702, from Philip V, who placed him over the Alcázar and other palaces of Madrid, with a salary of four hundred ducats per annum. As an architect he designed the decorations at the celebration of the funeral of the dauphin of France in 1711, and of the queen Maria Louisa of Savoy in 1715, at the Convent of the Incarnation at Madrid. In 1719 he designed the principal part of the palace and gardens, the Collegiate Church, and the great altar of San Ildefonso. He was known also as an architectural and scientific writer. He was living, probably, in 1730.

Ardène, JEAN PAUL de Rome d', a French priest of the Oratory, and brother of Esprit Jean (de Rome d'Ardène), was born at Marseilles in 1689, and gained several academical prizes for his poetical essays. He became superior of the college of his congregation. The last half of his life was passed at Sisteron, where he died, Dec. 5, 1769. His works are, Traité des Tulipes;—Année Champêtre;—Traité des Oeillettes (1762).

Ardente, ALESSANDRO, a Piedmontese painter who flourished from 1565 to 1592. There is a picture of the Conversion of St. Paul by him, at Turin, in the Monte della Pietà, which is considered a grand piece of painting. Ardente was painter to the Court of France, and died at Paris in 1575.

Arderne, JAMES, an English divine, dean of Chester, was a native of Cheshire, and was educated in Christ's College, Cambridge. In 1673 he became a fellow-commoner of Brasenose College, Oxford. He held the living of St. Botolph, Aldgate, London, from 1666 to 1682, when king Charles II bestowed upon him the deanery of Chester. He died Sept. 18, 1691. His writings are, Directions concerning the Matter and Style of Sermons (1671, 12mo):—Conjectura circa Επινουμην D. Clementis Romani, cui subiunguntur Castigationes in Epiphanium et Petavium de Eucharistia, de Celibatu Clericorum, et de Oratationibus pro Vita Functis (London, 1683, 4to). He printed some single Sermons. See Chalmers, Biographical Dictionary, s. v.; Allibone, Dictionary of British and American Authors, s. v.

Ardia, a goddess, said by Pliny to have had a temple adorned with fine paintings, under the name of Juno Ardia, and an altar under that of Lucina.

Ardingelli, NICOLA, an Italian cardinal, was a native of Florence. After having been associated with cardinal Farnese (elected pope afterwards under the name of Paul III), he became secretary of cardinal Alexander Farnese, nephew of the pontiff. Paul III charged him with the reconciliation of Charles V with Francis I. He accompanied cardinal Alexander into Spain, then to Germany and France, and on his return was made cardinal himself. He died in 1547 at the age of forty-five years. He wrote a book, entitled De Negotiatione sua pro Pace Ineunda inter Carolum V et Franciscum:—also some poetical sketches. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ard was a monk of the Abbey of Ariane, in the diocese of Montpellier. He was originally called Smaragdus, and was one of the first disciples of St. Benedict of Ariane, whose Life he wrote. Many other works go under the name of Smaragdus; but there is a great controversy among the learned whether they belong to this or another writer. The Life of St. Benedict is certainly his, and may be found in Menardus, Observ. ad Martyrolog. Benedict. lib. ii; also in Mabillon, Sac. Benedict. iv, 1. He was highly esteemed by Charlemagne, and died March 7, 845, aged sixty. See Cave, Historia Literaria, ii, 23.

Arduino, BENJAMIN, a German rabbi, lived probably in the 16th century. He wrote a treatise entitled Mitzvot Nashim, i. e. "Precepts for Women," first printed at Venice in 1552, which was a work of authority among the Jews. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arduino, MAESTRO, an Italian architect and sculptor, a native of Venice, lived in the 15th century. There is at the monastery del Carmine, of that place, a Madonna and Child, bearing the name of this artist; and it is said he laid the first foundations of the Church of San Petronio of Bologna. He has been confounded with another Arduino, beadle of the College of Medicine at Bologna, a painter and engraver upon wood, and a botanist. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Area, a space within which monuments stood, being protected by Roman law from the acts of ownership to which other lands were liable. In the Roman catacombs care has evidently been taken lest the subterranean excavations should transgress the limits of the area on the surface. This reverence of the Roman law for burial-places enabled the early Christians, except in times of persecution, to preserve their sepulchres inviolate. The areas about the tombs of the martyrs were especially so preserved, where meetings for worship were held and churches frequently built. So the Acta Proconsularia of the trial of Felix speak of the area, "where you Christians make prayers." These areas were frequently named from some well-known person buried there; thus St. Cyprian is said to have been buried "in the area of the procurator Candidus." In another work, certain citizens are said to have been shut up in area martyrum, where, perhaps, a church is intended. The name area is also applied to the court in front of a church.

Areghius (or Aridius; vulgarly Arey), Sr., bishop of Nevers, is only known by his subscriptions to the acts of the Councils of Orleans (549) and Paris (551). He is honored on Aug. 16 at Decize, near Nevers. See Baillet, Aug. 16. See also ARIDIUS.

Areius (or Arens), that is, the warrior, or, to whom prayers are addressed, was a title of Jupiter, as AREIA was of Minerva.

Aremberg, CHARLES D', a French monk of the Order of Capuchins, was born in 1593. He was son of Charles of Ligne, duke of Aremberg, and entered his order in March, 1616. He wrote, Flores Seraphici, sive Icones, in quibus continentur Vitæ et Gestæ Illustrum Ordinis Fratrum Minorum Sancti Francisci Capucino-rum, qui ab Anno 1525 usque ad Annum 1612 in eodem Ordine, Miraculis ac Vitæ Sanctimonialia floruerent (Cologne, 1640-41):—Clypeus Seraphicus, sive Scutum Veritatis in Defensionem Annalium Fratrum Minorum Capucino-rum (ibid. 1643). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arēna (Lat.), the floor of an amphitheatre, a wooden floor covered with sand for the athletes to wrestle upon; sometimes applied to the amphitheatre itself; often confounded with the area or open space, and in that sense applied also to the body of a church.

Arenaria is a name sometimes applied to the Catacombs (q. v.).

Arend (or Arents), Balthazar, a German theologian, studied theology in the German universities at Jena, Leipsic, and Copenhagen, and died in 1687. He wrote, Geistlicher Krieg, das Himmelreich mit Gewalt zu stürmen (Glückstadt, 1671):—Des Leibes und der Seelen Zustand nach dem Tode (ibid. 1776):—Disputatio Historico-theologica de Resurrectione Christi adversus Hæreticos et Hostes alios (Strasb. 1664):—Exilium Mortis, etc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arend (or Arents), Caius, a German theologian, was born in the Duchy of Holstein in 1614. In 1633 he went to the University of Rostock to study under Lauremberg; and the year following he was made professor of logic and metaphysics. In 1636 he went to Sweden as instructor of the young and as merchant. There he performed ministerial functions in several localities. During the Thirty Years' War he was often the victim of a long series of hostilities, against which he opposed this maxim: "Patience devours the Devil." He died in 1691. He wrote, Goldhaus christlicher und von Gott gesegneter Ehefrauen (Glückstadt, 1666):—Drei schöne Amanden auf dem Sarg Dr. Christiani von Stöcken (ibid. 1685). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arenda, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Arendense), was held in December, 1473, at Arenda, in Spain, in order that some remedy might be applied to correct the ignorance and immorality of the clergy. Alfonso, archbishop of Toledo, with his suffragans, made there twenty-nine rules of discipline, among which are the following:—viz. that no one shall be admitted to holy orders who is not acquainted with Latin; that the clergy shall not wear mourning; that bishops shall not appear in public without the rochette; that they shall never wear any garment made of silk; that they shall cause the Holy Scriptures to be read at their table, etc. The other canons relate to such cases as fornication among the clergy, clandestine marriages, simony, shows and dramatic representations held in churches, sports forbidden to clerks, duels, rapes, etc. This is the same with the Council of Toledo of the same year. See Labbe, Concil. xiii, 1448.

Arentius, BERNARDUS (Bernard Arint), a Lutheran minister, was one of the earliest clergymen of his denomination in New York city, succeeding the Rev. Jacob Fabritius as pastor of Trinity Lutheran Church, at the south-west corner of Broadway and Rector Street. This church was erected in 1671, and was built of logs. Mr. Arentius became its pastor about the year 1700, the services being held in the Low Dutch language. The date of his death is unknown. See Quar. Rev. of Evang. Luth. Church, vii, 272.

Arents. See AREND.

Arepol, SAMUEL, a Jewish writer of Safed, in Upper Galilee, who lived during the 16th century, is the author of אמרת אלה, or expositions on the Pentateuch (Venice):—לכ חכם, a commentary on Ecclesiastes (Constantinople, 1591):—מזמור לזכרון, or a commentary on the alphabetic Psalms and the Songs of Degrees (Venice, 1576):—שר שלום, a commentary on the Canticles (Safed, 1579). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 50; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 46; Etheridge, Introd. to Hebr. Literature, p. 415. (B. P.)

Aresi, PAOLO, an Italian theologian and preacher, was born at Cremona in 1574. He was of a Milanese family, and his father was invested with the dignity of podestà at Cremona. He entered the Order of Theatines in 1590. Eight years afterwards he was professor of philosophy and theology at Naples and Rome. His success in preaching was not less; and his renown in this capacity extended throughout Italy. He became confessor to the princess Isabella of Savoy; and in 1620 pope Paul V made him bishop of Tortona, which position he held for twenty years. But he did not relinquish his theological studies. His devotion to literature did not interfere with his episcopal functions. He died June 13, 1644. He wrote, In Libros Aristotelis de Generatione et de Corruptione (Milan, 1617):—De Aquæ Transformatione in Sacrificio Missæ (Tortona, 1622; Antwerp, 1628):—Velitationes in Apocalypsim (Milan, 1677, with the Life of the author by P. Sfondrati):—Arte di Predicar Bene (Venice, 1611):—Impresse Sacre con Triplicati Discorsi Illustrate ed Arricchite (Verona, 1613; Frankfurt, 1702). This is the most remarkable work of this author. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Areson, JOHN, an Icelandic bishop and poet, was born in 1484. While very young the death of his father left him to the care of his mother. His uncle taught him to write and to chant Latin. At the age of twenty years he took holy orders, and acted as preacher in the parish of Helgastad, in Reikiadal. At that time bishop Gotschalk, of Holum, sent him on a mission to Norway; and so well did he execute his commission, and so much skill did he display, that he was chosen to succeed the bishop at his death. This excited the jealousy of certain aspirants for the position, especially of a certain Boduar, who founded his protestation against the election on the ground that Areson was ignorant of Latin. Areson responded to him in Icelandic verse. But another and more formidable opposition presented itself. Ogmund, bishop of Skalholt, claiming the vacant see, marched against him at the head of troops. After some difficulty, Areson was established in his position in 1524. He passed the remainder of his life in religious disputes. A conflict was raised between him and the king of Denmark, Frederick III, occasioned by the tendency of that prince to introduce Lutheranism into the States. Areson claimed that he overreached his prerogative in meddling with spiritual affairs. After a long struggle Areson and his two sons were put to death, Nov. 7, 1550; after which Protestantism made rapid progress in Iceland. Areson was the first to introduce printing into his country. At Holum he published, in 1530, a Manuale Pastorum. As a poet he was, without doubt, the most distinguished of his time. He wrote a poem, entitled Pinslargratr, or Lamentation on the Passion:—and a paraphrase upon Psalm li in the Thorlakson Visabok of 1612. His other poems are found in Harboe's History of the Reformation in Iceland. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aretas, Sr., was an Arabian martyr who, together with three hundred and forty Christians, was beheaded by Dunaan, king of the Homerites, about the year 522, in the city of Nagran. The Greek menologia mark his festival on Oct. 24. See Baillet, Oct. 24.

Arethas, archbishop of Cappadocia, composed a Commentary on the Apocalypse, which was printed in Greek at Verona in 1532 and 1568, fol. Œcumenius subsequently published it in Greek and Latin at Paris (1631). See Cave, Historia Literaria, i, 520.

Arethas (or Aretas), a Greek priest and theologian of Cæsarea, lived in the early half of the 10th century. He left a work upon the Translation of St. Euthymius, patriarch of Constantinople. Aretas the priest must not be confounded with the bishop of Cæsarea. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aretino, Francesco, a Franciscan of the strict observance, in the 16th century, wrote, Expositio in Regulam FF. Minorum (Florence, 1594):—Interpretatio Commentariorum Chrysostomi in Evang. S. Johannis (Paris, 1415).

Aretino, Guido, of AREZZO, so called because he was born in that city, was a Benedictine monk, and, according to some, abbot of the Monastery of Pomposia, near Ravenna. He discovered six notes in music, in chanting the hymn of St. John, thus:

Ut queant laxis
Re sonare fibris,
Mi ra gestorum
Fa muli tuorum,
Sol ve polliti
La bii reatum.

In the time of pope John XIX, Guido went to Rome, and was favorably received by the pontiff. Baronius, in his Annals, gives a letter written by him to a monk of Pomposia, in which he describes his journey. This monk had assisted him in compiling his Antiphonarium, which he presented to the monastery upon his return. He also wrote a musical work, called Micro- logus, and another on the Measure of the Monochord.

Aretino, Leonardo Bruno, an Italian writer of the fifteenth century, was born at Arezzo. At the solicitation of Poggius, his intimate friend, he was made secretary of pope Innocent VII, and afterwards, in 1413, of John XXIII, with whom he attended the Council of Constance. Poggius addressed to him his celebrated letter upon the punishment of Jerome of Prague. After the council he was made chancellor of the republic of Florence, which office he held till his death, in 1443. He was buried in the Church of Santa Croce, where a fulsome epitaph adorns his splendid tomb. He was guilty of the dishonesty of translating the (Gothic) History of Procopius into Latin, and publishing it as his own; but the deceit was discovered shortly after his death. He wrote also, Contra Hypocritas Libellus, in Fasciculus Rerum Expet. (Cologne, 1543):—Historia Florentinis Libri xii (Argentina, 1610):—Epistolarum Libri VIII (ibid. 1521; Basle, 1535, 8vo), etc. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, App. p. 122.

Aretino, Pietro, an Italian writer, was born at Venice, and died in 1556. His boldness in criticising public men obtained for him the sobriquet of the Flail of Princes. He composed paraphrases on the Penitential Psalms:—The Life of the Blessed Virgin; of St. Thomas Aquinas; St. Catharine of Sienna, etc.

Aretusi, CESARE, an Italian painter, was born at Modena, and lived about 1590. He imitated the works of Bagnacavallo, and surpassed all artists then living as a copyist of the works of great masters; for he could assume the style of almost any painter, and pass off many of his copies as genuine. He was so successful in imitating the works of Correggio that he was employed to restore the painting executed by that artist for the tribune of the Church of San Giovanni at Parma, where it still remains. In the Church of San Giovanni del Monte at Bologna is a fine altar-piece by this master, representing the Virgin and Infant, with two female figures embracing each other.

Arey, St. See AREGIUS, St.

Arez, in Persian mythology, is one of the six mighty fish spirits (agathodemons in fish forms) which Ormuzd created as protecting spirits of the tree of life, Gorgad, which stands in the Ferakhand sea, against the monster which Ahriman created. The latter has the appearance of a frightfully large turtle. It seeks to gnaw at the tree and to swallow the fish. Arez is the life-giving principle of the water, therefore figuratively father of the aquatic beings. Arez is also called king of all people of the sea.

Arezzo, Francesco d', an Italian friar of the Franciscan Order, was born in 1553. He filled various positions, particularly that of confessor of Ferdinand I, grand-duke of Tuscany. His sermons were eloquent, and he wrote several theological works. He died in 1616. The following works have reached several editions: Summa Theologiæ Speculativæ et Moralæ, ac Commentaria Scholastica in Tertium et Quartum Sententiarum Librum Joannis Duns Scoti (Venice, 1581, 1613, 1616, 1619):—Criminale Canonicum (ibid. 1617; Perugia, 1669). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arezzo, Scipione Burali d', an Italian cardinal, was born at Atri, near Gaeta, in 1511. He studied law, received the degree of doctor at Bologna, and met with so great success as advocate at Naples that Charles V appointed him, in 1550, member of the collateral council of the kingdom of Naples. In 1557 he retired to a monastery of the Order of the Theatines, where he took the name of Brother Paul. His talents and services were not, however, overlooked, for in 1562 Philip II appointed him to the archiepiscopal see of Brindisi, which honor he declined. Several bishoprics were successively offered him, but he persisted in his refusal of them. Two years after, delegated by the city of Naples, he undertook a difficult mission in Spain; he went to protest against an attempt of Philip II to introduce the Spanish Inquisition into Italy. His success greatly augmented his popularity among the Neapolitans. He was immediately called to Rome, where he occupied successively different ecclesiastical positions until 1568, when he was made bishop of Placentia. In 1570 he was made cardinal, and in 1576 the pope made him archbishop of Naples, where he died in 1578, and was interred in the Theatine Church of St. Paul. His testament and a letter in Latin upon the motives which prompted him to refuse the see of Brindisi are found in his biography published by Bagatta, a brother of his order (Verona, 1698). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arezzo, Tommaso, an Italian cardinal, was born at Orbitello, Tuscany, Dec. 17, 1756. He was the younger son of Claudio Maria Arezzo, says Aretius, the historiographer of Charles V. He was placed in the College of Nazareno at Rome, which at that time had illustrious professors. He studied rhetoric under Francis Tasso, philosophy under the celebrated Beccaria, and theology under Molinelli. In 1777 he entered an ecclesiastical college in order to study civil and canonical law. Among his ecclesiastical honors, he was charged with the duties of chancellor. Pius VI sent him as vicelégate to Bologna, and appointed him successively governor of Fermo, of Perugia, and of Macerata. In 1798 Arezzo abandoned this position and retired into Sicily, where his family originated. Two years after, he returned to Rome and was appointed archbishop in partibus of Seleucia, in Syria, and in 1781 ambassador extraordinary to the court of Russia, in order to co-operate in the union of the Greek Church. The death of Paul I caused him to leave St. Petersburg, and he went as legatè to Dresden. Upon the invitation of Napoleon, he presented himself before the emperor at Berlin (1807), who sent him to Rome to arrange the difficulties which existed between France and the Holy See. Not having succeeded in this mission, his conduct was taxed with perfidy, the more so as he was appointed governor of Rome in place of the prelate Cavalchini. He was arrested in September, 1808, but finally obtained his liberty and retired to Florence. He escaped sentence of death by fleeing to Sardinia in the guise of a seaman. In 1815 Pius VII made him priest-cardinal of St. Peter's, and on Sept. 23 of the same year he went as legatè to Ferrara. He refused the bishopric of Novara and the archbishopric of Palermo, which the king of the Two Sicilies offered him. In 1830 he was called to the vice-chancellorship of the Church and appointed bishop of Sabina. He died at Rome, Feb. 3, 1832, and was interred in the Church of St. Lawrence. The memoirs of Arezzo, so valuable concerning the ecclesiastical history of his time, were never published. Cardinal Arezzo was the founder of the academy called "Degli Ariostei" at Ferrara, and he re-established the College of Jesuits founded in that place by St. Ignatius. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arteria, in Roman mythology, was the name of the water which was sprinkled about at death-sacrifices as a libation for the subterranean gods.

Argaiz, Gregorio, was a Spanish Benedictine of the 17th century. In a monastery of Old Castile he wrote a history of the Spanish Church, entitled Poblacion Ecclesiastica de España, y Noticia de sus Primeras Honras Hallada en los Escritos de San Gregorio, Obispo de Granada, y en la Cronica de Hauberto, Monge de San Benito. The first volume of this work was published at Madrid in 1667, the second in 1668, and two others in 1669. Argaiz was convicted of having forged the documents from which he had written this work; but this was one of the frauds considered justifiable by the ecclesiastics. He published in 1675 a defence of his work entitled Instruccion Historica apologetica para Religiosos, Ecclesiasticos, y Seglares (Madrid). Besides several other works, he also wrote Teatro Monastico y Obispos de España, which was never published. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Argall, John, an English clergyman and writer, was born in London, and educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated A.M. in 1565. He afterwards studied divinity, took holy orders, and obtained the living of Halesworth, in Suffolk. He died at Cheston, near Halesworth, in October, 1606. He published, De Vera Pœnitentia (1604):—and Introductio ad Artem Dialecticam (1605). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Wood, Athenæ Oxonienses; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Argelli, Cesare (also called Paltroni, after his mother), an Italian canonist, archbishop of Avignon, was born at Bologna in 1577. He studied jurisprudence, was made LL.D., became judge of the Court of Appeals at Rome, and archbishop of Avignon the year before his death, which occurred in 1648. He wrote, De Legitimo Contradictore ad L. Final. Cap. de Edict. Div. Adrian. tollend. (Venice, 1611):—De Acquirenda Possessione, etc. (ibid. 1655). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Argentan, Louis François d', a French theologian of the Capuchin Order, lived in the last half of the 17th century, and wrote, Les Exercices du Chrétien Intérieur (Paris, 1662):—Conférences sur les Grandeurs de Dieu (Rouen, 1675). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Argimír, St., of Cabra, in Andalusia, was martyred by the Saracens June 28, 856, for abusing the false prophet Mohammed. See Baillet, June 28.

Argiva, a name of Juno, from the Argivi, among whom the sacrifices called Heraia were celebrated in her honor. They made her image in gold and ivory, holding a pomegranate in one hand, and in the other a sceptre, upon the top of which stood a cuckoo, because Jupiter changed himself into that bird when he fell in love with her.

Argonauts of St. Nicolas and the Shells was a military order instituted by Charles III of Naples towards the end of the 14th century. The patron of the order was St. Nicolas, and the knights wore a collar formed of shells and silver hooks, from which hung a ship, with the motto Non credo tempori. Their name of "Argonauts of St. Nicolas and the Shells" arose from this collar. They followed the rule of St. Benedict, and wore on days of ceremony a large cape or mantle of white silk, over which they hung the collar.

Argonne, Noël, a Carthusian who was born at Paris in 1634, and died at Gaillon in 1704, published in 1688 a work entitled Traité de la Lecture des Pères de l'Eglise. The second edition was published in 1697, and is divided into four parts. Part i treats of the authority of the holy fathers, by whom he intends the doctors of the first twelve centuries. He remarks that Protestants are agreed neither as to who are to be considered as the fathers of the Church, nor as to the degree of deference to be paid to their writings. In pt. ii he treats of the necessity of scholastic theology; in pt. iii he delivers a scheme for reading the fathers with advantage; and in pt. iv he speaks of the use to be made of these writers.

Argota, Hieronimo Contador d', a learned Portuguese Theatine monk, was born at Collares, in Estremadura, July 8, 1676, and was one of the first members of the Portuguese Academy of History, and contributed various historical papers to their Memoirs. His chief works are, De Antiquitatibus Conventus Bracara-Augustani (lib. iv, 1728, 4to, and 1738, an improved edition):—Memorias para a Historia Ecclesiastica de Braga (Lisbon, 1732-44, 3 vols. 4to). His other works were sermons and lives of saints. He died at Lisbon in 1749.

Argue, JAMES, a preacher among the English Methodists, was an Irishman, from Crossforts, County Cavan, born in 1803. He was brought under the influence of religion in early life with the New Connection; became a missionary to his brethren in 1828, and for thirty years he labored with much success in Irish circuits. In 1861 he was removed to England, and travelled in seven circuits, enjoying good health for more than seventy years. He died in his work, at Clay Cross, County Derby, May 12, 1875. See Baggaly's Digest.

Argyle, JEREMIAH, an English Congregational minister, was born at Dorchester in 1782, and brought up to the trade of a white-smith. At the age of eighteen he enlisted as a soldier, and served two years, when he again resumed his trade; was converted, joined the Wesleyans, and went to preaching. In 1830 Mr. Argyle became a Congregational minister, and was ordained at Poole, where he labored till his death, Nov. 5, 1858. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1859, p. 190.

Arias, FRANCISCO, a Spanish Jesuit, was born at Seville in 1533, and died May 23, 1605. He left some religious works, translated into French by Belon (Lyons, 1740). St. Francis of Sales commends them. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aribo, fourth bishop of FREISINGEN, in the 8th century, was a German Benedictine and abbot of the Monastery of Schelekdorf, in Bavaria, founded in 753. In 760 he was made bishop of Freisingen, and died in 783, leaving two works—Vita S. Corbiniani, the first bishop of Freisingen:—and Vita S. Emmerani. Mabillon has given the first in his Acts, vol. iii; the second will be found in Surius, Sept. 22. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 631.

Aribo, archbishop of MAYENCE, after Erkenbalus, held many councils, made a voyage to Rome, and was very zealous in all that related to ecclesiastical discipline. He died in 1031. He wrote a Commentarius in XV Psalmos Graduum, dedicated Saône in 603, but his treacherous murder on his return home in 607; and Aimonius corroborates this accusation. Le Cointe tries hard (tom. ii, upon this year) to exculpate Aridius. However, the Church of Lyons commemorates him on Aug. 12.

Arillaga, BASILIO MANUEL, D.D., superior of the Jesuits in Mexico, and rector of the College of San Ildefonso, of whose early life we have no record, died in the prison of San Ildefonso, Aug. 25, 1867, of the privations to which he was subjected. Dr. Arillaga was over eighty years of age, and was arrested by the Liberal authorities, together with bishop Ormalchea of Vera Cruz. He was probably the most erudite scholar that Mexico ever produced; and had, at one time or another, under his tutorship the most prominent and eminent men of his country. In 1865 the abbé Testory, head-chaplain of the French forces, wrote a pamphlet in defence of the nationalization of Church property, characterizing the Mexican clergy as ignorant and corrupt; to which Dr. Arillaga replied in three pamphlets, a masterpiece of learning, statistics, wit, and sarcasm, bringing upon the abbé Testory the indignation of all uninterested foreigners then in Mexico, and contributing more to the estrangement between the native Imperialists and foreign interventionists, and to the downfall of the empire, than any other power. The memory of Dr. Arillaga will ever be revered by Mexicans, without distinction of party. See Appletons' Annual Cyclop. 1867, p. 597.

Arimathæa. The only suggestion of a modern site for this place, except Ramleh, which has been offered, is that of Renthieh, "a miserable hamlet on an isolated ledge of rock which protrudes in the midst of the plain" not far south of Ludd; but Dr. Robinson, who suggests the possible identity, gives urgent reasons against it (Later Researches, p. 141). In the absence of any other plausible site, we may as well acquiesce in that of Ramleh. For a further description of this place see Porter, Handbook for Syria, p. 112; Bäderker, Palest. p. 133 sq.; Conder, Tent Work i, 6 sq. See RAMAHL.

Aridius (Aredius, or Aregius; vulgarly called Arige, or Aride), St. bishop of Lyons, succeeded Secundinus about 603, and died in 613. What possible title this bishop has to be enrolled among the saints of the Church it is hard to conceive. Fredigarius, in his Chronicle (p. 605, 609, Ruinart's ed.), plainly attributes to him not only the deposition and banishment of St. Desiderius, bishop of Vienne, in the Synod of Châlon-sur-

Ariminum, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Ariminense), held in 359 by order of the emperor Constantius, at Rimini, or Rimino, in Italy. All the bishops of the West were summoned, the emperor promising to supply them with the means of travelling and subsistence. The whole number present was about four hundred; collected from Italy, Illyria, Africa, Spain, Gaul, and England. Of this number eighty were Arians, headed by Ursaces and Valens. The Catholic bishops wished to anathematize the Arian and all other heresies; but were opposed by Ursaces and Valens, who objected to the use of the word "consubstantial," maintaining that it was far better to use the expression "like to the Father in all things." The orthodox bishops then declared the formulary of Valens and Ursaces to be utterly at variance with the true faith, and confirmed the acts of Nicea, asserting that nothing whatever should be added to them. As Valens and his party refused to acquiesce in this decision, the council proceeded to declare them heretics, and excommunicated and deposed them. This decree was signed by three hundred and twenty bishops; and the doctrine of Arius, as well as that of Photinus and Sabellius, was anathematized. Both parties appealed to the emperor, whose mind had been so prejudiced by the Arians that when the Catholic deputies arrived at Constantinople they were refused an audience, and were for a long time, upon one pretext or other, kept without any answer; the emperor delaying matters with the hope that the bishops, wearied out and separated from their churches, would at last yield to his wishes and give up the terms "substance" and "consubstantial." Further, the Arians having compelled the ten deputies of the council, in spite of themselves, to come to Nice, in Thrace, and having intimidated them by threats and worn them out by violence and ill-usage, obliged them at last to consent to abandon the two obnoxious expressions, and to receive a confession conformable to that drawn up at Sirmium two years before. The emperor sent orders to the præfect Taurus not to suffer the council to separate until this confession, which entirely suppressed the words ὁμοία and ὁμοούσιος, had been subscribed by all the bishops. With the exception of twenty they all gave way, and signed this confession of faith, known as the formulary of Nice or Ariminium. This triumph being won, a deputation, headed by Valens and Ursaces, was sent to Constantius; and the formulary was circulated throughout the eastern part of the empire, with orders to exile all who should refuse to sign it. St. Hilary says that the acts of the Council of Ariminium were annulled throughout the world; and pope Liberius assured the whole East that those who had been deceived or overcome at Ariminium had since returned to the truth; had anathematized the confession agreed to in that council; and had subscribed the Nicene Creed. See Labbe, Concil. Sacr. ii, 791 sq.

Arindodi, in Hindû mythology, is a highly honored half-goddess of the Tamul inhabitants of India. She was an example of virtue and of household ruling; and even now she is placed over the heavenly household duties.

Aringhi, PAOLO, an Italian theologian and writer, died in 1676. He published Roma Subterranea Novissima (Rome, 1651). This is a translation of an Italian work, in which Bosio gave interesting observations upon the Catacombs, published after his death by Severano; Aringhi has added his own discoveries to the original:—Monumenta Infelicitatis, sive Mortes Peccatorum Pessimæ (ibid. 1664):—Triumphus Penitentiae, sive Selectæ Penitentium Mortes (ibid. 1670). Aristeas, EPISTLE OF. In spite of the many editions and translations which exist of this famous epistle, furnishing us with the history of the origin of the Septuagint (q. v.), no critical Greek text has as yet been given to the learned world. That it could have been done we may see from Hody's remark in his De Bibliorum Textibus, etc. (Lond. 1685): "Non me fugit servari in Bibliotheca Regia Parisiana, aliisque quibusdam, exemplaria istius MS. Sed de tali opusculo, quod tanquam fœtum suppositicium penitus rejicio, amicos sollicitare et in partes longinquas mittere, vix operæ pretium existimavi! Eas curas relinquo illis, quibus tanti esse res videbitur." But such a disparaging opinion is not becoming any scholar, and the world at large will never be served by such measures. Perhaps others have been of the same opinion as Hody. At any rate, whatever has been written on this subject will needs be sifted, since we now possess the first critical edition, published with great acumen, from two Parisian MSS., by Prof. Schmidt, in Merx's Archiv für wissenschaftliche Erforschung des Alten Testaments (Halle, 1869), i, 242 sq. Schmidt is inclined to the opinion that the author of this ὀνταγμα, as Epiphanius calls it, was neither a Greek nor one sufficiently acquainted with the Greek language. On the contrary, he thinks that the author was a Jew who lived at the court of Ptolemy. See Van Dale, Dissertatio super Aristeam de LXX Interpretibus (Amsterd. 1705), and especially the most recent work by Kurz, Aristee Epistula ad Philocratem (Bern, 1872). See ARISTEAS. (B. P.)

Aristian, one of the elders from whom Papias professed to have derived traditional information (Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. iii, 39), and described by him as a personal follower of our Lord. Beyond this notice there is no trustworthy information about him. The Roman martyrology (p. 102) states, on the authority of Papias, that he was one of the seventy-two disciples of Christ. It commemorates his martyrdom at Salamis on Feb. 22. Cotelierius thinks that he may be identical with the Aristo who is given as the first bishop of Smyrna (Apost. Cons. vii, 45).

Aristo is mentioned by Lucianus (Cyp. Ep. 22) as the last of the group of Christian martyrs imprisoned with him (A.D. 250) at Carthage; and already dead of hunger, thirst, heat, and crowding into two cells. They seem to be the same commemorated in Africa as saints on April 17.

Aristo, St., and his companions, martyred in Campania about 286, having been originally converted to the faith by St. Sebastian. See Baillet, July 2.

Aristo OF PELLA, in Palestine, by birth a Jew, but converted to the true faith, flourished about 136. Mention is made by the author of the Chronicle of Alexandria of Apelles and Aristo, who presented apologies to Hadrian, and whom, he says, Eusebius praises in his Ecclesiastical History; but nothing of the kind is to be found in Eusebius, and Cave thinks it likely that he has confounded the names of Aristides and Aristo. However this may be, Aristo of Pella wrote a book, entitled A Disputation between Jason and Papias, so, at least, St. Maximus says. Whether this Jason was the same Jason of Thessalonica (Acts xvii, 5; Rom. xvi, 21) is very doubtful. Papias was an Alexandrian Jew, who, as it appears, was convinced by the argument, and baptized. This Disputation for a long time existed in Greek; and Origen entirely refuted the arguments of Celsus, who endeavored to bring it into contempt. It is now entirely lost, although some writers (upon the strength of an expression used by Rigaltius, by which he appeared to them to quote from Nicolas Fabrus, when, in reality, he quotes from Jerome) have imagined that it is still in existence. It was translated into Latin by another Celsus, who lived before the time of Constantine. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 39.

Aristocrītus, a Manichæan author, of whom nothing is known except that he wrote a book entitled Theosophia. His name is only mentioned in the Greek form of abjuration (ap. Cotelier, Patres Apost. i, 544), which states that he endeavored in this work to prove that Judaism, Paganism, Christianity, and Manichæism were one and the same religion; and that, to deceive Christian readers, he occasionally attacked Manes with vehemence. See Beausobre, Hist. du Manich. i, 435.

Aristotile (called also Fioravanti; his family name was Alberti), a celebrated Italian architect of the 15th century, was a native of Bologna. He went to Russia at the entreaty of the czar Ivan III, and, with the permission of the Senate of Venice, to Moscow, where he repaired the Kremlin, which threatened to fall into ruins, owing to the poor quality of cement which had been used. He then taught the Russians to make cement. Among his finest works we notice a very beautiful bridge; the Church of the Assumption, a magnificent work of Græco-Roman architecture, dedicated in 1479; the Cathedral of St. Michael; the Belvedere Palace; and the walls of the Kremlin. He was given, it is said, as an honorary distinction, the right to stamp his likeness upon coins; and in certain cabinets of medals pieces are found bearing the name Aristoteles. He wished to return to his native country, but the czar would not allow him to do so. Aristotile then summoned the engravers and founders from Italy, among the latter Bossio, who made in 1488 the famous cannon known under the name of Iyar poushka. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ariuth, in the Gnostic book Pistis Sophia (367 sq.), was a female archon presiding over the second place of punishment; in form an Ethiopian negro.

Arivurdia (children of the sun) were a sect found in Asia, and particularly in Armenia and the adjacent countries, where they had maintained themselves from the olden times; having sprung from a mixture of Zoroastrianism with a few elements of Christianity. They derived their name from their worship of the sun. Between 833 and 854 this sect took a new form and a new impulse from a person named Sembat, who settled at Thondrac, whence his sect received the name of Thondracians (q. v.).

Arje, Jacob Judah, a Spanish rabbi of the 17th century, who exercised his functions at Hamburg, then at Amsterdam. He wrote, Talmith Hecal (in Spanish, Middelburg, 1642; translated into French in 1643 under the title Portrait du Temple de Solomon):—Tractatus de Cherubinis (Amsterd. 1647), in Latin:—a Spanish version of the Psalms, with the text (ibid. 1671), and other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arje, Judah ben-Zeviltiroh, a Jewish rabbi of Carpentras, who lived in the 17th century, wrote Ahob Jehudah (Jesnitz, 1719), a Hebrew dictionary in two parts. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arkhat was an Etruscan divinity who was represented as an old bald-headed man in a cloak, who warns Famu against the blandishments of the goddess Alpanu.

Arjadi, ALESSANDRO, an Italian historical painter, was born at Parma about 1470. He studied at Venice under Giovanni Bellini. In the Church of the Carmelites at Parma is a picture by this master, representing the Annunciation, which is highly praised by the critics. He died in 1528.

Arleri, PIETRO, an Italian architect, was born at Bologna in 1333. His family were of German origin (named Arler). In 1356 he was employed in the construction of the Cathedral of St. Vita at Prague, commenced in 1343 under the direction of Matthias of Arras. Arleri continued this work until 1386. He also constructed the Church of the Saints at Prague; that of Kolin upon the Elbe; and the bridge of Moldau. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.; Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.

Arles, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Arelatense). Arles (Arelate) is an ancient archiepiscopal see in Lower Provence, on the left of the Rhone, seven leagues from its mouth, about one hundred and eighty-six leagues from Paris. It is said to derive its name from ara elata, a high altar raised here in pagan times. Several councils were held here.

I. The first was a general council of the West, held in 314, by the emperor Constantine, upon the subject of the Donatists. The emperor, in order to get rid of the importunities of these schismatics, who were dissatisfied with the Council of Rome in the preceding year, granted them a fresh hearing, which gave rise to this council. The number of bishops present was very large—from Africa, Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, and, above all, from Gaul. Among the names subscribed we find those of the bishops of Arles, Lyons, Vienne, Marseilles, Autun, Rheims, Cologne, Rouen, and Bordeaux. Pope Sylvester sent two priests and two deacons. It appears that the matter was examined with even greater care than at Rome in the preceding year. Cecilianus was acquitted, and his accusers condemned. It was also ruled by this council, in opposition to the general practice before this time in the African Church, that persons who have received the form of baptism at the hand of heretics ought not to be rebaptized; and that if it shall appear from their answer that they have been baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, it shall be enough that they be confirmed in order to receive the Holy Ghost. Here were also composed the twenty-two celebrated canons of discipline which bear the name of this council. See Labbe, Concil. i, 1421.

II. Held in 353, by Constantius. The emperor, happening to be in Arles, lent himself to everything that the Eusebians suggested to him. Already they had invited pope Liberius to attend the council, who, however, sent Vincentius, the aged bishop of Capua, and Marcellus, a Campanian bishop, to demand of Constantius that the place of rendezvous should be Aquileia instead of Arles. Many other bishops also came to Arles to request the same thing; but, reasonable as the request was, Constantius took offence at it. In the council the first thing which the Arians required was the condemnation of St. Athanasius. Vincentius, on his part, insisted that the true faith should be set forth and defended; but Valens and his accomplices persisted in requiring that before anything else was done, the legates should renounce communion with Athanasius; which they, carried away by the example of others, and, it may be, induced by threats, did, promising no more to communicate with him. When, however, the council had gained this point, they refused to condemn Arius. Photinus of Sirmium, Marcellus of Ancyra, and St. Athanasius were condemned here.

III. This numerous council of French bishops was held in 428 (or 429) at Arles or Troyes, at which deputies from the English Church were present, seeking help against the heresy of Pelagius. Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, and Lupus, bishop of Troyes, were deputed to proceed to England, in order that, "having confounded the heretics, they might lead back the Britons to the Catholic faith."

IV. Held about 442, and seems to have been gathered from several ecclesiastical provinces, since it speaks of the obligation of the metropolitans to submit to its decrees, and gives itself the title of the great council. It was assembled by Hilary of Arles, and drew up fifty-six canons. One forbade the elevation to the rank of subdeacon of any one who had married a widow. According to Pagi, this council opposed St. Leo against Hilary, who assumed the right of assembling councils in Gaul.

V. Held about the year 453. The subscriptions of the bishops are lost. Fifty-six canons were published, many of which are taken from the councils of Nicæa, Constantinople, and Orange.

10 and 11. Relate to the penance of those who relapsed in time of persecution.

15. Forbids a deacon to administer the communion when a priest is present.

26. Permits a priest to grant the chrism to heretics at the point of death who wish to become Catholics.

See Labbe, iv, 1010.

VI. Held in 455, under Ravennius, bishop of Arles, owing to a dispute between Faustus, abbot of the monastery of Lerins, and Theodore, bishop of Fréjus, concerning the jurisdiction of the latter over the monastery.

Thirteen bishops were present; and it was determined that ordinations should be celebrated by the bishop of Fréjus alone, and that no clerk, not belonging to the monastery, should be received into communion or to minister without the bishop's license; Theodore, on his part, leaving the care of the lay portion of the monastery in the hands of the abbot. See Labbe, iv, 1023.

VII. A provincial council, convened in 463 by Leontius, archbishop of Arles, to oppose Mamertinus, archbishop of Vienne, who had encroached upon the province of Arles.

VIII. This council was held about A. D. 705, to consider the errors of Lucidus, and was composed of thirty bishops. According to Faustus, they spoke strongly upon the subject of predestination; condemned the opinions of Lucidus upon the subject; and insisted that he should condemn them himself. Lucidus obeyed, and in a letter to the council retracted his errors.

IX. Held in 524, under Cæsarius, bishop of Arles. Sixteen bishops were present, and four canons were drawn up relating to ordinations, one of which enacts that no man be made deacon under twenty-five years of age. See Mansi, iv, 1622.

X. Held in 554, under Sapaudus, archbishop of Arles. Here seven canons were drawn up, the second and fifth of which are to the effect that monasteries, whether for men or women, should be placed under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese. See Mansi, v, 779.

XI. Held in May, 813, convoked, by order of Charlemagne, for the correction of abuses and the restoration of ecclesiastical discipline. The number of canons made was twenty-six. Among other things, it was ruled that bishops ought to be well instructed in the Holy Scriptures and in the canons of the Church, and that their sole occupation should consist in preaching and instructing others. 2. That all shall pray for the king and his family. 15. Orders just weights and measures everywhere. 17. Enjoins that bishops shall visit their dioceses annually. 19. That parents should instruct their children, and godparents those for whom they had answered at the font. The 21st orders that with regard to burials in churches, the ancient canons shall be observed. See Labbe, v, 1231.

XII. Held on July 8, 1234, under John Baussan, archbishop of Arles. Twenty-four canons were enacted, chiefly directed against the Albigenses and Waldenses, enforcing those of Lateran in 1215, and of Toulouse in 1229. Bishops are directed to preach the Catholic faith frequently, both themselves and by means of others. All confraternities are forbidden, except those which have the sanction of the bishop. Bishops are directed to apply themselves diligently to the correction of morals, especially among the clergy; and for that purpose they are enjoined to have spies in every diocese. No one was permitted to make a will save in the presence of the curate of his parish. The reason given for this last injunction, which is very common in the acts of councils about this time, is that persons who favored the opinions of the heretics might be thereby prevented from assisting them with legacies. See Labbe, xi, App. p. 2339.

XIII. Held in 1261, or subsequently, by Florentine, archbishop of Arles, with his suffragans, against the extravagances of the Joachimites, who said that the Father had operated from the creation until the coming of Jesus Christ; that from that time to the year 1260 Jesus Christ had operated; and that from 1260 unto the end of the world the Holy Spirit would operate. That, under the operation of the Father, men lived after the flesh; under that of the Son, they lived partly after the flesh and partly after the Spirit; but that during the third period they would live more entirely after the Spirit. Seventeen canons were also drawn up, in the third of which it is enjoined that confirmation shall be administered and received fasting, except in the case of infants at the breast. This shows that the confirmation of little children was at this time still practiced in the Church. The fifth canon orders that in all parish churches belonging to the religious, curates taken from the community, or perpetual vicars, shall be appointed, with a suitable provision out of the proceeds of the benefice. Further, it forbids the regulars to receive the people to the holy office in the churches attached to their priories, etc., on Sundays or other holydays, or to preach during those hours in which mass was said in the parish church, in order that the laity might not be drawn away from the instruction of their own parochial minister. The seventh canon forbids the use of wooden candles painted to look like wax in churches, processions, etc. See Labbe, xi, App. p. 2359.

XIV. Held about the year 1257, by Bertrand de St. Martin, archbishop of Arles. Twenty-two canons were drawn up, of which the first are lost.

7. Forbids to sell or pawn the chalices, books, and other ornaments of the Church, under pain of excommunication.

12 and 13. Of cases to be reserved to the bishop or pope.

14. Forbids all persons in holy orders to buy corn or wine for the purpose of selling it again.

16. Orders silver chalices in churches.

See Labbe, xi, App. p. 2369.

Arlotti, LUIGI, an Italian poet and theologian, lived in the first half of the 16th century. He was attached as canon to the Cathedral of Reggio, and became vicar-general at Ferrara, and later the auditor of cardinal Alexander of Este. The poems of Arlotti have been printed in Scajoli, Parnaso de' Poeti Ingegni, and in the collection of Guasco. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Armaganus. See FITZ-RALPH.

Armagh, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Armachianum), was held in 1171, and ordered that all the English who had been kept in a state of slavery in Ireland should be set free. The council acknowledged that the Irish were subject to the authority of England. This appears to be the same with the Council of Waterford in 1158, in Labbe, Concil. x, 1183. See ibid. x, 1452; Wilkins, Concil. i, 471.

Armagil, one of the potent names said by Jerome (Ep. lxxv, 3) to have been current among the "Basilidians" of Spain in the 4th century. Probably identical with Armogen.

Armandus OF BELLEVUE was a native of France, who entered the Order of St. Dominic, and was made master of the sacred palace. He flourished about the year 1296, and died before the year 1334. He wrote, Sermons on the Psalms (Paris, 1519):—Meditations and Prayers (Mentz, 1503):—An Explanation of Difficult Terms used in Philosophy and Theology (Venice, 1586).

Armani, PIERMARTINO, an Italian historical painter, was born at Reggio, in the Modenese, in the year 1613. He studied under Lionello Spada, with whom, according to Lanzi, he painted some works in the Church of Santa Maria at Reggio. He died in the year 1669.

Armarius, in monastic establishments, is the precentor and keeper of the church books. Armarius is continually used by Bernard for cantor and magister ceremoniarum.

Armellini, GERONIMO (called also Armenini and Jerome of Faenza), a native of Faenza, was general inquisitor of the Catholic faith at Mantua about 1516. He is supposed to have filled the same position in several other cities of Lombardy. He was a strong adversary of heretics. According to Sextius Senensis, he wrote against a Calabrian astrologer named Tiberio Rossiliano, who believed that one could easily foretell the deluge by the aid of astronomical calculations, based upon the conjunction of the planets. Echard affirms that the MS. of this work is preserved in the Library of the Vatican; but Mazzuchelli states that he was unable to find it either printed or in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Armellini, Mariano, a Benedictine monk and voluminous historian of his order, was born at Ancona, and became an abbé in the Church. He died in the Monastery of Foligno, May 4, 1737. His works are, Bibliotheca Benedictino-Cusinensis:—Bibliotheca Synoptica Ordinis Sancti Benedicti.

Armenia, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Armenium). A council was held in Armenia, simultaneously with another at Antioch, in 435, condemning the works of Theodorus of Mopsuestia and Diodorus of Tarsus, lately translated into the language of Armenia and circulated there.

Armenian Versions. At present there exist three Armenian versions—viz. the Ancient, the Ararat, and the Modern Armenian versions.

I. Ancient Armenian.—Part of the history of this version has already been given under ARMENIAN VERSION (q. v.), and we add here the following: In 1775 a body of learned men at Paris undertook a new and corrected edition of the Armenian Scriptures, to be accompanied with a Latin translation. One of the savants was the abbé Villefroy, for many years a resident among the Armenians. Of this edition the book of the prophet Habakkuk alone appears to have been published. In 1789 the New Test. was printed at Venice, under the editorship of Zohrab, a learned Armenian divine, from MS. authorities, and it was reprinted in 1806. The same scholar prepared and published in 1805 a critical edition of the entire Bible at Venice, at the expense of the monks of the Armenian convent of the Island of St. Lazarus, in the lagoons of Venice. This edition was printed chiefly from a Cilician MS. of the 14th century (A.D. 1319); but the editor collated it with eight MSS. of the whole Bible and twenty of the New Test., the various readings of which are subjoined in the lower margin. From this edition the Psalms were published very often; the last edition in 1856. The New Test. was published repeatedly, lastly in 1863; the gospels alone in 1869. A new critical edition of the entire Scriptures was published again in 1859. Besides the Venetian editions, the Armenian Bible was published at St. Petersburg in 1817, and at Moscow in 1843. Some years ago a colony of the Mechtarists established a printing-office at Vienna, and published the New Test. in 1864.

II. Ararat Armenian.—This idiom is spoken in the whole of Armenia, except in the pashalik of Erzerûm, and in the Georgian provinces; and by thousands of Armenians who are dispersed between the Black Sea and the sources of the Euphrates, and thence through Persia and part of Mesopotamia, down as far as the Persian Gulf. The first edition of the New Test. in this dialect, as translated by the German missionary A. H. Dittrich at Shushi, was completed in 1835 and printed at Moscow. A second edition was soon found necessary, and was ordered by the British and Foreign Bible Society. In the meantime the German missionaries had been proceeding (encouraged by the Basle Missionary Society) in the translation of the Psalter from the Hebrew, which was not published till the year 1844. Of late a revision of the text was undertaken by Mr. Amirchanyanz, in behalf of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The Psalms and the New Test. were published in 1879, after having been revised by the Rev. Dr. Riggs of the American Bible Society. As for the Old Test., Mr. Amirchanyanz is now proceeding with the same, and it is to be made in four parts. Half of it is now finished.

III. Modern Armenian.—This dialect, which has adopted many Turkish words, has Constantinople for its centre, and is spoken in the neighboring territories, in Asia Minor, and in the pashalik of Erzerûm. From its centre it is also called the dialect of Constantinople. Into this dialect the New Test. was translated by the learned Armenian Dr. Zohrab, of Constantinople. In the year 1824 he completed his work, which he had commenced in 1821. In the year following an edition of one thousand copies of this version was printed at Paris, at the expense of the British and Foreign Bible Society. A new and revised edition was printed at Smyrna, which was followed by another edition, in parallel columns with the ancient version, in 1856. In the meantime, with the aid of the American Bible Society, the missionaries in Smyrna proceeded with the translation of the Old Test. into modern Armenian, and completed the work in 1857, which was printed by the American mission at Constantinople for the British and Foreign Bible Society. From time to time this version has been revised and new editions printed. See Bible of Every Land, p. 79 sq.

For linguistic purposes we add, besides the works mentioned in the art. ARMENIAN LANGUAGE in this Cyclopædia, Riggs, A Grammar of the Modern Armenian Language as Spoken in Constantinople (Constant. 1856); id. A Vocabulary of Words Used in Modern Armenian, but not Found in the Ancient Armenian Lexicons (Smyrna. 1847); Lauer, Grammatik der classischen armenischen Sprache (Vienna, 1869); Müller, Beiträge zur Lautlehre der armenischen Sprache (ibid. 1862-63). Armenini. See ARMELLINI.

Armett, THOMAS, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Staffordshire, Dec. 29, 1787. He entered the ministry in 1813; became a supernumerary in 1844; and died Oct. 22, 1864. He was happy and useful. See Minutes of British Conference, 1865, p. 13.

Armillum (armill), an embroidered band of cloth of gold, jewelled; sometimes, but not invariably, used at the coronation of English sovereigns. In the form for the coronation of king George II, the following direction occurs: "Then the king arising, the dean of Westminster taking the armill from the master of the great wardrobe, putteth it about his majesty's neck," etc. Its symbolism was the divine mercy of the Great Ruler of all things encompassing the sovereign crown.

Arminius, FULGENTIUS, bishop of Nusco in 1669, voluntarily renounced the episcopacy in 1680 in order to live in retirement. He wrote, Gli Immortali Cipressi: Descrizione de' Funerali d'Ant. Carrafa, duca d'Andria (Zerani, 1645);—Panegirici Sacri, Discorsi, etc. (Bologna, 1651; 1669);—L'Ambasciata d'Ubbidenza fatta alla Santità di Clemente X, in Nome di Carlo II, Re della Spagna, etc. (Rome, 1671);—Il Trionfo del Dolor, Funerali per Donna Giovi di Sangro (Naples, 1674). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Armitage, John, an English Independent minister, was born at Chester in 1788. He was educated with a view to commercial pursuits, apprenticed at Liverpool, and converted when sixteen years of age. About 1808 he went to reside in London, but did not unite with the Church until 1815. In 1816 he removed to Newport, Monmouthshire, and soon afterwards began to preach in different places as he had opportunity. In 1822 he, with others, established in Newport a Seaman's Society; and afterwards succeeded in obtaining the erection of the Mariner's Church. He was also engaged in the establishment and working of the Religious Tract Society, and was an active supporter of the British and Foreign Bible Society and other institutions of a similar character. In 1831 he gave up business, and retired to the village of Bassaleg. Here, through his efforts, a chapel was obtained, a Church was formed, and a Sunday-school was established; and in 1833 he was ordained pastor of the Church which he had thus gathered. In the following year he became pastor of the Independent Church at Horningsham, Wilts; and having served it a little more than three years he returned to the business which he had forsaken. In 1842 he again retired from commercial pursuits and took up his abode at Carleton; and while resident here he commenced raising a congregation at Pillgwenly, near Newport, and succeeded in providing a chapel and forming a Church, which he soon handed over to a suitable successor. In 1845 he entered upon the pastorate of the Independent Church at Oakhill, Somerset, where he remained till his death, Oct. 9, 1848. Mr. Armitage was pious, amiable, and in the discharge of all life's duties, prompt and conscientious. See the (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, 1850, p. 567.

Armitage, William Edmond, S.T.D., a bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in New York city Sept. 6, 1830. He graduated at Columbia College in 1849, and at the (Episcopal) General Theological Seminary in 1852. He was assistant minister, in 1853, at Portsmouth, N. H.; and was missionary in Augusta, Me., during the following year. Subsequently, until 1859, he was rector there; in that year he became rector of St. John's Church, Detroit, Mich., and continued to serve this parish until 1866, when he was consecrated in that place as assistant bishop of Wisconsin, Dec. 6. His episcopal residence was in Milwaukee. He died in New York city, Dec. 6, 1873. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 144.

Armogastus, Sr., suffered martyrdom in Africa about A.D. 458, under Genseric, king of the Vandals. He was first tied with cords, which, says the legend, snapped like spider's webs at the prayer of the saint, who was then condemned to the mines. He is commemorated March 29. See Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Armogen is, in the system of the Barbelutæ (Ophites) as expounded by Irenæus (108 ed. Massuet), the second "syzygy," consisting of "Christ" (the Primal Light) and "Incorruption." It thus brings into existence four luminaries or derivative lights to attend upon "Autogenes," the product of the first "syzygy." Of these "the first and great" luminary was "Soter" (Saviour), who was called Armogen. The name is variously written Armogenes, Armoge, and apparently also with the aspirate. See Vallarsi's note on Jerome, Ep. lxxv, 3. No satisfactory derivation is known; for conjectures, see Harvey, On Irenæus, loc. cit.

Armorica, COUNCIL IN (Concilium Amoricum), was held A.D. 555 to excommunicate Maclon, bishop of Vannes, who had renounced tonsure and celibacy on the death of his brother, Chanao, count of Brittany.

Armorican Version. See BRETON VERSION.

Armorium is an ancient term, sometimes applied to a shrine or temporary receptacle for the eucharistic elements. It is in the form of an architectural recess or niche without doors, and is not to be confounded with the tabernacle or aumbry. See SACRAMENTUM.

Armour, JOHN, an English Congregational minister, was born at Glasgow in 1796. In youth he was of a trifling disposition, but at the age of eighteen he was converted, and became very active in Christian labor and in visiting the sick. Mr. Armour received his education at the University of Glasgow, maintaining himself by the labor of his own hands. In 1820 he was licensed to preach, and after a time became co-pastor of the Independent Church. In 1842 he went to Canada, organized a Church in Stewarton, Halton, and afterwards was pastor at Warwick, Plympton, Sarnia, New Durham, and Kelvin, which last he resigned in 1868. He died Dec. 16, 1869. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1871, p. 301.

Arms. In the early Church it was generally forbidden to bear arms within the sacred enclosure, even when seeking an asylum. The clergy were also generally forbidden to wear arms. The Council of Macon, A.D. 581, inflicted on offenders the penalty of thirty days' imprisonment, with fasting on bread and water. The Synod of Winchester, A.D. 1070, also forbade it. Clement V allowed the clergy to carry arms when necessary for self-defence, as did also St. Charles Borromeo. See WAR, CHRISTIAN VIEWS OF.

Arms, Clifford S., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Canaan, Columbia Co., N. Y., June 4, 1796. He graduated at Union College, Schenectady, in 1824, and at Princeton Theological Seminary in 1827. He was pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Madison, Morris Co., N. J., from 1832 to 1851, and Ridgebury, Orange Co., N. Y., from 1851 to 1863. He died Sept. 25, 1863. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 157.

Arms, Selah Root, a Congregational minister, was born at Deerfield, Mass., Feb. 21, 1789. His preparatory studies were with the Rev. W. B. Stow, of Wilmington, Vt., and at Williamstown (Mass.) Academy. He graduated at Williams College in 1818, and at Andover Theological Seminary in 1821. For two years he preached at Windham and Cavendish, Vt., and for eight years at Grafton and Windham, over which two churches he was ordained in 1825. In 1834 he removed to Livingstonville, N. Y., returning in a year and a half to Windham again. In 1849 Mr. Arms removed to Springfield, Vt., hoping to find the climate more congenial. He carried on a farm, preaching, however, as occasion offered. He died suddenly, Nov. 9, 1866. Mr. Arms was a well-read theologian of the old school, an instructive preacher, and faithful pastor. See Cong. Quarterly, 1867, p. 206.

Armson, THOMAS, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Shropshire, Jan. 16, 1799. He was converted among the Methodists in youth, was a Congregational preacher for three years, withdrew on account of inquiries into theology, was received into the Methodist ministry in 1824, and died Aug. 3, 1863. Armson was a man of devout spirit; his ministrations were evangelical, and he combined sterling integrity with much kindness and generosity of disposition. See Minutes of British Conference, 1863, p. 25.

Arms-Royal. These unauthorized additions in a church were made before 1555, when we find the taunt made to Cranmer, "Down with Christ's arms" (the rod), "and up with a lion and dog" (the Tudor greyhound). Wolsey first changed the arms of York into their present form—the keys of Peter with the crown, instead of gules, a pall, and crozier or.

Armstrong, Amizi, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Florida, Orange Co., N. Y., Dec. 1, 1771. He was never connected as a student with any college; was licensed to preach by the New York Presbytery in 1794; and in 1796 was appointed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Mendham, Morris Co., N. J. He died at Perth Amboy, N. J., March 4, 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 156.

Armstrong, Francis, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born in the County of Fermanagh, probably in 1756. He was converted in youth under the Methodist ministry; was called into the work in 1787, and continued therein until his settlement as a supernumerary at Rathmullen in 1822. Yet he was still active in furthering the work of God in the mission on which he resided. He died June 3, 1836, aged eighty. His sermons were plain, his piety sincere, and his friendship steadfast. See Minutes of British Conference, 1836.

Armstrong, George R., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Woodford County, Ky., in 1810. He was educated at Hanover College, Ind., and studied theology in Hanover Seminary. He was ordained by the Madison Presbytery in 1842, and labored as a missionary in Crittenden, Richmond, and Lebanon, Ky. He died May 18, 1865. Energy and fidelity marked the whole course of his ministry. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1866, p. 91.

Armstrong, Gustavus, an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born probably in 1758. He entered the connection in 1792, labored long and successfully, and died March 25, 1832, aged seventy-four years. "He was a sincere and unalterable friend." See Minutes of British Conference, 1832.

Armstrong, J. S., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Hillsborough, O., about 1825. He studied and practiced law during his young manhood; emigrated to Illinois in 1854, and, after laboring several years as local preacher, in 1869 entered the Southern Illinois Conference. He died June 10, 1874. Mr. Armstrong possessed a brilliant intellect, and was a thorough student, a fluent speaker, a popular preacher, and an excellent disciplinarian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 126.

Armstrong, James (1), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the County of Leitrim, Ireland, Dec. 25, 1803, and emigrated to the United States when about twelve years old. In 1827 he entered the Ohio Conference; became a member of the Cincinnati Conference on its organization, and in 1871 superannuated, which relation he sustained until his death, July 1, 1874. Mr. Armstrong was eminently social and cheerful in disposition, extremely modest, fervent in piety, sound and practical in mind, and a success as a pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 100; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Armstrong, James (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in 1823. His early life is unrecorded. He entered the Maine Conference in 1854, served efficiently fifteen years, and afterwards sustained a supernumerary and superannuated relation until his death, in Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 22, 1877. As a preacher, Mr. Armstrong was original, able, and eloquent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 65.

Armstrong, James Francis, a Presbyterian minister, was of Irish extraction. He was born at West Nottingham, Md., April 3, 1750. He graduated at Princeton College in 1773; was licensed by the New-castle Presbytery in 1777, and in 1782 was settled at Elizabethtown, N. J. He died Jan. 19, 1816. He was an able preacher and a good pastor. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 390.

Armstrong, John (1), an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born near Newton-Butler, Fermanagh, in November, 1788. He was converted in youth, and with Arthur Noble was appointed to the Derry and Antrim Mission in 1816. He spent forty-four years of active service in the province of Ulster, and fifteen years in retirement. He died at Lurgan, Aug. 1, 1875. His mind was naturally vigorous, and his sermons were quaint, original, and delivered with dramatic power. He was one of the most popular and useful preachers of his day in the north of Ireland, and an indefatigable pastor. See Minutes of British Conference, 1876, p. 33.

Armstrong, John (2), D.D., a bishop of the Church of England, was born at Bishop Wearmouth, Aug. 22, 1813. He was educated at Charterhouse School; became Crewe exhibitor at Lincoln College, Oxford; took his degree of A.B. in 1836; was soon after ordained deacon and priest, and served a curacy in Somersetshire; was afterwards curate of Clifton; was elected in 1841 priest-vicar of Exeter Cathedral, and subsequently became Saints-day preacher in that cathedral; was presented to the rectory of St. Paul's, Exeter, in 1843; and about this time began writing for the press. In October, 1845, he exchanged livings with the Rev. J. H. S. Barr, vicar of Tidenham, Gloucestershire, to which he then removed. Soon after he commenced the reform of the female-penitentiary system, begun by an article in the Quarterly, which resulted in an entirely new system, the distinguishing feature of which is, that the penitents are under the care of unpaid gentlewomen instead of paid matrons. The Tracts for the Christian Seasons, edited by him and published at Oxford, began in 1849, and met with great success. These were followed by a second series; and then he began the Parochial Tracts, during the issue of which he published the Sermons for the Christian Seasons, all of which were successful literary ventures. He was designated bishop of Grahamstown, South Africa, and consecrated at Lambeth in 1853. He died May 16, 1856. During his short episcopate bishop Armstrong had established a grammar-school and begun a diocesan college for the training on the spot of a ministry for his diocese. He also wrote, Pastor in his Closet (2d ed. 1857):—Essays on Church Penitentiaries (1858):—and other works. His Life has been written by Rev. T. T. Carter (1857). See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1856, p. 468.

Armstrong, John (3), D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Oxford, Pa., March 11, 1825. He received his preparatory education at New London Academy. He passed through his sophomore year at Lafayette College, Pa., and then went to Washington College, Lexington, Va., where he graduated in 1850. The same year he entered Princeton Seminary, and graduated in 1853. He was licensed by the Newcastle Presbytery and ordained an evangelist. After serving as a missionary at Platte City, Mo., he became a stated supply at Hazelton, Beaver Meadow, and Weatherly, Pa., where he remained ten years. He then preached as stated supply at Muscatine, Ia.; and after remaining a year was installed pastor. After laboring with great zeal and success ten years, he was released. In 1874 he was appointed, by the Synod of Iowa, South, as financial agent to establish a college; and, as the result of his labors and self-sacrificing devotion, Parsons College was founded and located at Fairfield, Ia. He was elected professor of history and moral philosophy, and subsequently its president. He died at Fairfield, Aug. 13, 1879. See Necrological Report of Princeton Alumni, 1880. (W. P. S.)

Armstrong, John W., D.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Woolwich, England, Sept. 20, 1812. He emigrated with his parents to Quebec, Canada, in 1824; received an early religious training; experienced religion at the age of sixteen; entered Cazenovia Seminary in 1835; became principal of the Nichols Academy, Tioga Co., in 1839; of Red Creek Academy, Wayne Co., N. Y., in 1841; and in 1842 was admitted into the Black River Conference. In 1850 he was elected to the chair of natural sciences in Cazenovia Seminary; and later, principal of the Gouverneur Seminary. In 1854 he became principal of Falley Seminary, Fulton; in 1856 he returned to pastoral work; in 1857 he accepted the principalship of Amenia Seminary; and in 1859 again resumed pastoral work. From 1865 to 1869 he was head-master of the State Normal School at Oswego; and then became principal of the Normal and Training School at Fredonia, N. Y., where he remained until his death, Aug. 12, 1878. He was a man of rare intellectual endowments, and by habit and desire a student in the highest sense of the term; and by his own personal efforts attained great eminence as a linguist, scientist, physiologist, mathematician, and artist. Yet he stood highest in his character as a cultured Christian man and minister. Meek, sympathetic, edifying, and zealous in the relations he bore to humanity, he everywhere won the highest esteem. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1878, p. 25; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Armstrong, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Carlisle in 1777. He was converted at the age of twenty-three, and entered the ministry in 1808, preaching the first five years in Wales. Some of his circuits were Workop, Thetford, Middleham, Ulverstone, Belper, and Poole. In 1836 he became a supernumerary at Tavistock; in 1845 he removed to Hennock, near Ashburton, where he died, April 2, 1849. See Minutes of British Conference, 1849.

Armstrong, Richard (1), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Ireland Dec. 25, 1775. He experienced conversion in his twenty-fifth year, and united with the Wesleyan Methodist Church. Soon after he was licensed to preach. In 1812 he emigrated to America, and was four years employed as a missionary in Nova Scotia, under the auspices of the British Conference. In 1817 he became connected with the Baltimore Conference; and when the Pittsburgh Conference was formed he was made one of its members. In 1842 he became a superannuate, which relation he continued to sustain until his death, Aug. 16, 1859. As a Christian Mr. Armstrong's piety was profound, consistent, and uniform, absorbing all his affections, and employing all his energies. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 70.

Armstrong, Richard (2), D.D., a missionary to the Sandwich Islands, was born in Northumberland County, Pa., in 1805. He graduated at Dickinson College in 1827, and studied theology at Princeton. In 1832 he went as a missionary to the Sandwich Islands, where he served as minister of instruction, privy-councillor, and president of the Board of Education. He died Sept. 23, 1860, from the effects of injuries received by a fall from his horse.

Armstrong, Robert, an Associate minister, was a native of Midholm, Roxburghshire, Scotland; but the date of his birth is not known. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, and afterwards studied theology at Whitburn, under the Rev. Archibald Bruce. He was ordained to the ministry June 15, 1797; and shortly afterwards sent to the United States in answer to a call from Lexington, Ky., where he arrived in 1798. He was installed as pastor of certain churches in that vicinity April 23, 1799. Here he remained until 1804, when he removed with his entire congregation to Greene County, O. They organized into two congregations—Massie's Creek and Sugar Creek. Here he labored for seventeen years, when the charge was divided, and he labored only at Massie's Creek until Jan. 9, 1821. From this time onward he had no pastoral charge, and died Oct. 14 of the same year. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, IX, iii, 58.

Armstrong, Robert Lealie, a Congregational minister, was born at Carlisle, Cumberland, England, Nov. 9, 1803. He was religiously educated, but his aversion to religion was very great; he therefore engaged in most of the follies and sins of his time. Removing, however, from Carlisle to Wigton, his manner of life was somewhat changed. Here he became greatly concerned for his soul's welfare when about fourteen years of age. He was converted, and at the age of fifteen he joined the Wesleyan Society, and became at once a class-leader and local preacher. On account of his youth, which excited sympathy and astonishment, as well as his preaching and addressing large audiences, he became extremely popular in that district. These efforts proving too great for his strength, his health gave way, causing him to retire from active life for a time. Upon his recovery he joined the Independent Church at Wigton, and for a time labored at Brompton, Blennerhassett, and other villages. He now entered the academy at Idle, in 1822, and left in 1826. Having been invited to Wortley, he accepted the call on leaving school. He entered on his duties with courage and hope; and during his ministry of twenty-five years he paid off the debt, enlarged the chapel, built a new schoolroom capable of accommodating three hundred children, and increased the membership to one hundred and thirty-five. He was seized with apoplexy, and died July 4, 1856. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1857, p. 165.

Armstrong, Sylvester, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in the State of New York in 1826. No record of his early life is accessible. In 1852 he entered the Troy Conference, and soon afterwards discontinued ministerial work and engaged in secular business. In 1856 he joined the New Jersey Conference. When the Newark Conference was formed, he became a member of it. He died at Plainfield, N. J., Jan. 7, 1863. Mr. Armstrong's ministerial career was brief; but there have lived few men who concentrated more vitality and zeal into so short a space of time. It was his habit to completely exhaust himself in the delivery of his sermons. He was original, had a ready command of language, was very pointed in discourse, and thrillingly eloquent. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 38.

Armstrong, William (1), an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born at Glaslough, County of Monaghan, probably in 1764. He was converted in youth, and entered the itinerancy in 1791. After a ministry of eight years he was obliged, by an injury received from his horse, to retire from the work. He died Feb. 20, 1837. He was a man of sincere piety, and manifested much patience during a long affliction. See Minutes of British Conference, 1837.

Armstrong, William (2), an Irish Wesleyan minister, was born at Sydere, County Fermanagh. He early sought the Lord. In 1805 he entered the ministry; became a supernumerary at Dungannon in 1841; removed to Lisburn in 1844; and died at Armagh, Feb. 4, 1855, in the seventy-first year of his age. He was a zealous preacher. See Minutes of British Conference, 1855.

Armstrong, William (3), a Protestant Episcopal clergyman. His ordination occurred in 1819; and his first parish was St. Matthew's, Wheeling, Va., having succeeded his father, Rev. John Armstrong, who was the first rector of the parish. After serving twenty-two years in Wheeling, he resigned his charge, and became rector of Zion parish, Urbanna, Frederick Co., Md., where he died, April 15, 1857, aged fifty-eight, beloved and regretted by all who knew him. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1857, p. 309.

Arnaia, NICOLAS, of Segovia, in Spain, became a Jesuit in 1577, and passed the remainder of his life in South America, where he was superior for thirty years. He died at Mexico in 1622, leaving some works of piety.

Arnaldo, PIETRO ANTONIO, an Italian theologian, was born at Villafranca, near Nice, in 1638. He studied theology at the College of Brera, and performed the duties of apostolic protonotary after having received the degree of doctor. He died near the close of the 17th century. He wrote, Il Triciglio Celeste in Lode de' Nomi Santi di Gesù, di Maria, e di Giuseppe (Milan, 1653), and published it at the age of fifteen:—Elogio in Laudem Episcoporum Nicæensis:—Sanctum Optatæ Pacis Augurium ex Emblemata Aciati cuius est Inscriptio:—Ex Bello Paz, Disertatio Parænetica (ibid. 1658):—Honorato II, Principi Monaco, Valentino Duci, etc., Poetica Gratulationes (ibid.):—Il Giardin del Piemonte Oggi Vivente nell' Anno 1673, Diviso in Principi, Dame, Prelati, Abati, Cavalieri, Ministri, etc. (Turin, 1683). This is a collection of odes and sonnets in praise of the more important personages of the court of Turin at that time:—Le Grandezze e le Glorie della R. Casa di Savoia, Oda Lirica, etc., con Lettere al Duca di Savoia Carlo Emanuele II. This is preserved in the Royal Library of Turin. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnason, JOHN MAGNUS, a Danish theologian, was born in 1665, at Dyrafiord, Iceland. He was appointed bishop of Skalholt shortly after having received minor's orders, and engaged in religious controversies with the clergy. He died Feb. 8, 1743. He wrote, The Life of Einar Thorsteinsson, bishop of Holum (Copenhagen, 1700):—a Perpetual Calendar (Holum, 1707):—Translation of the Catechism of Luther, with a commentary (ibid. eod.):—Donatus, Grammatica et Lexicon Latino-Islandicum (Copenhagen, 1734). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnaú, JUAN, a Spanish historical painter, was born at Barcelona in 1595. He studied under Eugenio Caxes, and was chiefly employed in works for the churches and convents of Barcelona. In the Church of Santa de la Mar is a picture of St. Peter, to whom angels are presenting the keys; and in the Augustine Monastery there are several pictures representing scenes from the life of St. Augustine. He died in the year 1698.

Arnaud (or Ernaud) was abbot of Bonneval, in the diocese of Chartres, about 1144. He was twice driven by the persecutions which he endured in that office to Rome, where popes Lucius II and Adrian IV received him honorably. From the latter he begged permission to resign and retire into his first monastery of Marmoutier, which he did, and died there. He was the friend of St. Bernard, and, at the request of the monks of Clairvaux, continued the History of the Life of St. Bernard, which had been commenced by William de St. Thierry. Another work of Arnaud's, entitled Tractatus de Cardinalibus Christi Operibus (Paris, 1500, 1726; Oxford ed. of Cyprian, 1682), has sometimes been erroneously printed among the works of St. Cyprian. It is proved not to be the work of the latter—(1) because in a MS. of it in the library at Clairvaux it is plainly attributed to Arnaud; (2) because the work itself declares the validity of baptism, by whomsoever administered, which is contrary to the well-known opinion of Cyprian; and it also alludes to many ecclesiastical rites which are subsequent to the time of Cyprian. Arnaud also wrote, Tractatus de VII Verbis Domini in Cruce Prolatis (Antwerp, 1532):—Sermo de Laudibus S. Mariæ Virginis (in Bibl. Patr. xxii, 1280):—Tractatus de Operibus VI Dierum (Auxerre, 1609):—Meditationes Variæ; all the above are contained in the Oxford edition of Cyprian in 1682. at the end:—Commentariolus in Psalmum CXXXII, et Opusculum de VII Donis S. Spiritus, discovered by Mabillon at Cîteaux (published by Cassimir Oudin, Leyden, 1692). See Cave, Historia Literaria, ii, 236.

Arnould, JACQUELINE MARIE ANGÉLIQUE de Sainte Madeleine, elder sister of Antoine Arnould, was born Sept. 8, 1591; became a nun at the age of eight years, and, contrary to the usual order, abbess of Port-Royal-des-Champs at eleven years of age. At the age of seventeen she introduced the rule of Cîteaux into her abbey, and also revived the discipline of St. Bernard. She died Aug. 6, 1661.

Her sister, JEANNE CATHERINE AGNES de St. Paul, who died Feb. 19, 1671, published two books, one entitled L'Image d'une Religieuse Parfaite et d'une Imparfaite (Paris, 1660):—the other, Le Chapelet Secret du Saint Sacrement (1663):—also Constitutions de Port-Royal (1721).

Arnavon, FRANÇOIS, a French theologian, was born at l'Isle, a little city upon the Sorgue, near the Fountain of Vaucluse, about 1740. A bachelor in the Sorbonne, he was appointed canon of the collegiate church of l'Isle, and prior-curate of Vaucluse. In 1790 Arnavon was sent to Rome by the assembly convened at Carpentras. He was to arrange with Pius VI the interests of the part of the County of Venaissin which was under the dominion of the Holy See. After the compact of 1802, he was appointed titular canon of the metropolitan see of Paris, with the title of dean. He also had the title of vicar-general of the archbishop of Corfu. He died Nov. 25, 1824. He wrote, Discours Apologétique de la Religion Chrétienne au Sujet de plusieurs Assertions du Contrat Social et contre les Paradoxes des Faux Politiques du Siècle (1778):—also a description of the Fountain of Vaucluse and its surroundings. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnd (or Arndt), CHRISTIAN, a German theologian, was born in 1628. He studied at Leyden, Wittenberg, Leipsic, and Strasburg, and taught logic at Rostock. He died in 1653. He wrote, Dissertatio de Philosophia Veterum (Rostock, 1650):—Discursus Politicus de Principiis Constituentibus et Conservantibus Republicam (ibid. 1651):—De Vero Usu Logicæ in Theologia (ibid. 1650):—Programma de Elegantioribus Logices Appellationibus (ibid.). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arndt, Ernst Moritz, a German historian, was born Dec. 26, 1769, at Schoritz, in the Island of Rügen. In 1806 he became professor of philosophy at Greifswald, where his political writings so aroused the national spirit against the hated dominion of Napoleon that they may be regarded as having mainly influenced the combination which eventually restored the independence of Germany. After the restoration, he was appointed professor of history at Bonn in 1816, where he died Jan. 30, 1860. Arndt was one of the noblest German patriots, and, at the same time, a sincere, childlike Christian, whose spiritual poems belong to the finest gems of German hymnology, and for which cause he deserves to be mentioned here. He composed, Ich weiss an wen ich glaube (Eng. transl. in Lyra Germ. ii, 216, "I know in whom I put my trust"):—Geht nun hin und grabt mein Gräb (ibid. i, 241, "Go and dig my grave to-day"). See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenliedes, vii, 20, 35, 140 sq. (B. P.)

Arndt, Friedrich, a Protestant doctor of theology, and one of the most prominent German pulpit orators of the 19th century, was born May 24, 1802. From 1833 he was preacher at the Parochial Church at Berlin, where he died, May 8, 1881. Zuchold, in his Bibliotheca Theologica, containing the literature from 1830 to 1862, fills almost five printed pages with the publications of this learned divine. There is hardly anything in the homiletical department upon which he did not preach. He published sermons on the life of Christ, his sermon on the mount, parables, passion, etc. His lectures on the Bible, which were also reprinted by the American Tract Society, belong to the best productions of ascetical literature; and so likewise his Morgen- und Abendklänge, being prayers and meditations for the Christian year. He was a very warm friend of the Berlin Bible Society and the Home Mission. For almost half a century this servant of the Master bore witness to the truth of the Gospel in the capital of the German empire; and Dr. Schaff, in his Germany: its Universities, Theology, and Religion, while speaking of the ministers at Berlin, mentions Arndt as belonging to those "most fearless, pungent, heart-piercing preachers of the age, who attract the largest crowds of devout hearers, often bathed in tears of repentance and gratitude for the infinite mercy of God in Christ." (B. P.)

Arnee, FRANK, a minister of the Society of Friends, was born in Bristol, England, Sept. 22, 1766. In 1787, after having spent several years as an apprentice at Milverton, he returned to Bristol, his native city, and entered into business as a wool-stapler. He was received as a minister in 1811. He visited many of the societies of England and Scotland, and by his influence contributed much to the cause of Christ. He died June 10, 1858. See (Lond.) Annual Monitor, 1859, p. 91.

Arnett, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Hasley, near York, in 1785. He was converted in 1805, entered the itinerancy in 1811, became a supernumerary after twenty-seven years' labor, and died at Halsbam Moor, near Bolton, Dec. 13, 1838. "He was a man of deep and ardent piety, of indefatigable diligence and inflexible integrity." See Minutes of British Conference, 1839.

Arnett, William W., D.D., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, was born in Marion County, Va.,

April 14, 1815. In early life he studied medicine, and afterwards was a Methodist preacher, but became an Episcopalian, and was ordained in 1839. Having officiated at Circleville and Dayton, O., he became rector of the Church of the Mediator, Philadelphia; and in November, 1852, he accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's parish, Milwaukee, Wis. His health failing in September, 1856, he resigned, and in the summer of 1857 became rector of Emanuel parish, Cumberland, Md., where he remained until his death, which occurred April 21, 1859. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1859, p. 352.

Arnheim, CHAJIM, a Jewish teacher, who died Sept. 22, 1870, at Glogau, is the author of, Leitfaden beim Unterricht in der mos. Religion (Glogau, 1830):—Dus Buch Job übersetzt, und commentirt (ibid. 1836). Besides the translation of Job, he also contributed to the German translation of the Old Test. which was edited by Zunz (Berlin, 1838); translated and edited the Jewish ritual, and is the author of a Hebrew Grammar, edited by D. Cassel (ibid. 1872). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 54; Steinschneider, Hebräische Bibliographie, 1874, p. 28; id. Bibliograph. Handbuch, p. 15. (B. P.)

Arnkief (or Arnkil), TROGILLUS, a German historian and theologian, studied at Leipsic, Dorpat, and Kiel, and became minister of the Church of Apenrade. In 1672 duke Christian Albin of Holstein-Gottorp gave to him the superintendence of the Church of which he was already pastor, but Arnkief lost this position in 1684 by refusing to render homage to Christian V, king of Denmark, who had invaded a part of Holstein and Sleswick. In compensation for this sacrifice, the duke gave to him in 1686 the administration of the churches of the duchy. The peace of 1689 led to his return to Apenrade, when he resumed his ministerial functions, holding them until his death, which occurred in 1713. He wrote, Disputatio de Officio Redemptionis Christi (Kiel, 1668):—Disputatio de Paradiso Terrestri (ibid. eod.):—Tractatus de Philosophia et Schola Epicuri (ibid. 1671):—Theologische Betrachtung des grossen schreckhaften Cometen der A. 1680 und 1681 gesehen ist (Sleswick, 1681). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arno. See ARNON.

Arnold BOSTIUS (or BOSCHIUS), a German Carmelite of Ghent who flourished in 1489, was the intimate friend of Trithemius, Gaguinus, and other learned men of his day. He died at Ghent in 1499, leaving two books on the illustrious men of his order (printed at Cologne, 1609, 8vo). He is said to have written a third volume, and other works which remain in MS. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, App. p. 211.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold (Arnoldus) of BÜDERICH, a German theologian, was born at Buderich, on the Lower Rhine, in the second half of the 15th century. He was prior of the Augustines in the vicinity of Oudenarde. He wrote, Odarium de Laude Dei, Libr. XII, contra De tractores Monasteriorum:—De Modo Servandi Ordinem Canoniorum Regularium et Dietarium. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold (Arnoul, or Arnulf) of CORBIE, a German theologian, lived probably in the last half of the 11th century. But little is known concerning this person. He is supposed to be the author of a translation, or paraphrase, of the Proverbs of Solomon in hexameter verse. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold (Arnoldus) of FREIBURG, a German friar of the Order of St. Dominic, was an astrologer, a native of Freiburg, in Brisgau, and lived in the 14th century. He left a German translation of the work entitled Alchabitii Libellus Isagogicus Judiciorum Astrorum, in MS., in the Library of Vienna. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold AB ISCHA (or Isca), a German monk and theologian, was persecuted and imprisoned for his opinions at the time of the religious wars of the Low Countries, near the close of the 16th century, and was obliged to take refuge in Louvain. He sojourned here several years, and finally returned to Coblenz, where he died, in 1619. He wrote, Sermones V quomodo salubriter in Christum sit Credendum:—Officium B. Mariæ, in Flemish. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold, a Scottish bishop, was abbot of KELSO, and became bishop of St. Andrews in 1158. The consecration was performed within the Church of St. Andrews by William, bishop of Moray, the pope's legate, in the presence of king Malcolm IV, and of the bishops, abbots, and princes of the land. He founded the Cathedral of St. Andrews, but died before the work was scarcely begun, in September, 1160. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 10.

Arnold of LEYDEN (also called Arnold de Tongres), a Flemish theologian, studied theology at Cologne, and attached himself to Eyraud, bishop of Liege. He afterwards took the direction of the Laurentine Gymnasium of Cologne, and became canon of the metropolitan chapter of the same place. He was a lively opponent of John Reuchlin. Arnold died in 1466. He wrote, Articulorum seu Propositionum XLIII male Sonantium ex Libello Johannis Cupionis sive Reuchlini cui Titulus: Tractatus Propositionum Alphabeticarum contra Judæos et Blasphemum eorum Talmud (Cologne, 1512):—a Commentary on Juvenal, in MS. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold of LIEGE, a German theologian and friar who lived at Liege in the 14th century, wrote, Narvacom et Liber de Mirabilibus Mundi, in alphabetical order. It is supposed that he is the same person as Arnulf of Liege. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold of LUBECK, first provost of Hildesheim, and then abbot of Lubeck, died in 1212. He continued the Slavonian Chronicle of Helmoldus from 1171 to 1209, which is very important for the history of Denmark and the introduction of Christianity into Livonia. It was printed at Frankfort in 1556, more fully at Lubeck in 1659, and with the last four chapters in 1660 by Mabonius, Opusc. Hist. Lappenberg edited it in the Monum. Germ. SS. xxi; Laurent translated it into German (Berl. 1853). See Samus, Die Slavenchronik Arnold (Lubeck, 1872); Schrödl, in Wetzer u. Welte's Kirchenl. s. v. (B. P.)

Arnold of MELDORF, a German theologian, who lived in the 12th century, wrote, Liber Meditationum et Adhortationum ad Fratres in Varia Loca Sacre Scripturæ, printed in Staphorst's Historia Ecclesiastica Hamburgensis, vol. iii.

Arnold, archbishop of MENTZ, was chosen prince elector of the empire in 1153. According to certain historians, he assisted greatly in the deposition of the emperor Henry I by the pope. During a revolt of the inhabitants of Mentz, he was massacred by the people in the cloister of St. James, in 1200, and his body interred without honor. Three years after, the emperor Frederick I destroyed the convent and the ramparts of the city. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold OLORINUS (or CYCNEUS), a German theologian, was a butt of persecution during the religious wars which desolated the Low Countries; and was not secure until he retired to Bois-le-Duc. He died in 1622. He wrote, Thesaurus Salutaris Sapientiæ (1610):—Explicatio Missæ et Canonis (1611):—Summa Virtutum et Vitiorm (1615):—Doctrina Consolatoria contra Serpulos et Pusillanimitatem (1612), written in Flemish, the title only being in Latin. All these works were printed at Bois-le-Duc. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold of ROTTERDAM (or of HOLLAND), a Dutch theologian, was also called Geilhoven. He studied at Bologna and Padua, and became doctor of canonical law. He died Aug. 31, 1442. He wrote, Ἡ πρώτη σεαυρόν, or Speculum Conscientiæ, in two books—the first entitled De Legibus et Statutis; de Peccatis Mortalibus, written in 1418:—the other, De Excommunicatione et aliis Censuris, written in 1424. This book is still known under the odd title of Gnotosolitos, and was published at Brussels in 1479. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold (or Arnald) of VERDALA, bishop of Maguelonne, in Languedoc, was also a historian. He applied himself with ardor to the study of civil and canonical law, and afterwards had charge of repressing the Albigenes, who troubled the southern part of France. Pope Benedict XII conferred upon him on this occasion, in token of his approbation, the title Jurum ac rerum personarum reformatore for the province of Narbonne. He also went in behalf of the same pontiff as ambassador to the emperor Louis IV of Bavaria, which mission he honorably fulfilled. He died in 1351. He wrote, Episcoporum Magalona Insulae Series, from 770 to 1333. This work appeared for the first time in the first vol. of Labbe, Nova Bibliotheca MSS. p. 796. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold of WESEL (Haldrenius Vesaliensis), a learned German theologian, was a native of Wesel. He taught the Greek language and literature at Cologne, and became canon of the metropolitan chapter of that place. He died in 1534. Among other works he wrote, Exegesis Decalogi Pia maximeque Dissertissima, cum nonnullis aliis (Cologne, 1536):—Consultatio Quadruplex super Confessione Augustana quorundam Protestantium una cum Io. Cochleæ (1554):—Partitio Locorum Communium Christianæ Religionis (ibid. and Louvain, 1557):—De Vera Ecclesia Christi, contra Phil. Melancthonis Responsionem pro Bucero (Ingolst. 1544). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold, André, a German theologian, was born at Nuremberg, Nov. 24, 1656. He first applied himself to the study of languages and theology at the University of Altdorf; then from 1680 to 1685 he travelled over the different countries of Europe. In 1687 he became professor of eloquence and the Greek language at Nuremberg, where he died in 1694. He edited the Syntagma Doctrinæ of Athanasius, and De Unione et Incarnatione of Theodore Abucara (Paris, 1685). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold, Christian, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Chester County, Pa., Feb. 21, 1815. He was converted in his seventeenth year, and in 1848 joined the Illinois Conference. In 1869 he became a supernumerary, and continued to hold such a relation until his death, April 19, 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 133.

Arnold, Daniel Heinrich, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born Dec. 7, 1706, at Königsberg, where he studied, and where, in 1729, he was appointed professor of practical philosophy. In 1732 he was made member of consistory and doctor of theology; in the following year he was appointed professor of theology; and in 1734 he was made second court preacher. In 1763 he was appointed director of the Collegium Fridericianum and superintendent of the Lithuanian and Polish theological seminaries. In 1772 he was made first court preacher and first professor of theology; and died July 30, 1775. Of his publications we mention: Diss. de Scopo Epistolæ ad Ephesios (Regiom. 1735):—Progr. de Acquiscentia Dei in Hominibus ex Luc. ii, 14 (ibid. 1735):—Progr. de Adamo, Primo Resurrectionis Christi Vate, ex Genes. iii, 20 (ibid. 1736):—Progr. Celsii, Orobi et Woolstoni Cogitata de eo, quod Christus Redivivus Hostibus suis non adparuit, expendens (ibid. 1741):—Progr. de eo, quod et cur Christus Redivivus Hostibus suis non adparuerit, Spinozæ aliisque oppositum (ibid. 1742):—Progr. de Judæis Christo Defectum Eruditionis male Objicientibus ad Joh. vii, 15 (ibid. 1750). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 14 sq.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit., i, 808, 809. (B. P.)

Arnold, David W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Frederick County, Va., March 16, 1816.

He experienced religion at the age of sixteen; filled with marked efficiency the offices of class-leader, exhorter, and local preacher for several years; and in 1852 united with the Baltimore Conference, in which body he served with deep interest and great vigor, with but short intermissions of illness caused by overwork, until his decease, Dec. 23, 1875. Mr. Arnold was a devoted parent, a generous, confiding friend, genial in temperament, sound in intellect, and untiring in industry. As a preacher he was practical, faithful, impressive; as a pastor he excelled everywhere. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1876, p. 18.

Arnold, E. P., a Presbyterian minister whose name first appeared in the Minutes of the General Assembly for 1859 as a licentiate of Montgomery Presbytery, was on a visit to Independence, Mo., with a view of settling there or in its vicinity. Here he was taken ill, and died in February, 1861. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1862, p. 81.

Arnold, Ephraim, a Methodist Episcopal minister, of whose birth or early life no record is accessible. About 1853 he was a class-leader in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. In 1856 he joined the Arkansas Conference, and labored devotedly till his death, July 6, 1859. Mr. Arnold was a young man of great promise. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1859, p. 21.

Arnold, Franz, a German theologian, native of Cologne, lived in the early part of the 16th century. He was one of the most distinguished adversaries of Luther. He wrote, Antwort auf das Büchlein Lutheri wider den kaiserlichen Abschied (Dresden, 1531):—Der Unpartheyische Laye (without the name of the author). This was a violent attack against Luther, who replied in the pamphlet entitled Wider den Meuchler zu Dresden, which called forth from Arnold, Auf das Schmähbüchlein Luthers (Dresden, 1531). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold, Friedrich August, a German linguist, was professor of Oriental languages and literature at Halle, where he was born, Nov. 16, 1812. He commenced his Oriental studies in his native city under Gesenius and Rödiger, and continued the same at Berlin under Benary, Bopp, and Wilken. He belonged to the German Oriental Society from its origin till his death, which occurred Aug. 18, 1869. He wrote, Septem Moallakât, Carmina Antiquissima Arabum (1850), an excellent edition of the text with critical notes:—Chrestomathia Arabica (1853):—Abriss der hebr. Formenlehre zum Gebrauche auf Gymnasien u. Universitäten (1867):—Sammlung und Beleuchtung aller Stellen der Bibel und des Josephus, welche auf die Topographie Jerusalems Bezug haben (1865, 1866). He also contributed to the first edition of Herzog's Real-Encyclop., and to the quarterly of the German Oriental Society, for which see Der wissenschaftliche Jahresbericht über das Jahr 1853. (B. P.)

Arnold, George Adam, a German painter, native of Bamberg, in Bavaria, lived in the last half of the 17th century. He was a skilful painter of historical scenes. His Passage of the Red Sea by the Israelites was reproduced by the engraver Weygant in 1680. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnold, George Cavit, a Presbyterian minister, was born Feb. 19, 1825, in Allegheny County, Pa. In 1845 he entered Duquesne College, Pittsburgh, and two and a half years later the junior class of Jefferson College. In 1850 he entered the Reformed Theological Seminary of Allegheny; in 1852 was licensed by the Monongahela Presbytery; and in 1853 was sent as a missionary by the General Synod to La Salle, Ill. He was for many years one of the editors of the Christian Instructor. He wrote with great facility, and had a special fondness for the study of languages. He died Nov. 30, 1865. See Wilson, Presb. Hist. Almanac, 1865, p. 193.

Arnold, Isaac M., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Brunswick County, Va., June 13, 1804. His literary and religious education was greatly neglected in early life, but he was naturally affable and winning. In 1825 he entered the Virginia Conference and labored diligently nearly forty years. He died June 23, 1870. Mr. Arnold was remarkable for his uniform, cheerful Christian experience. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1870, p. 403.

Arnold, Joel Ranney, A.M., a Congregational minister, was born at Westminster, Vt., April 25, 1794. His father was a soldier in the Revolutionary War, made a profession of religion at the age of eighty-nine, and lived to be nearly a hundred and two years old. Joel was fitted for college at the academies in Pawlet, Vt., and Walpole, N. H., and entered Middlebury College in 1811. Subsequently he studied medicine and practiced about a year; then studied theology with his brother, Rev. Seth S. Arnold, and was ordained pastor of the Church in Chester, N. H., in 1820, remaining there for ten years. He was afterwards pastor successively at Waterbury, Conn.; Colchester and Westminster, Vt.; Middlebury, Conn.; Coventry and Vassalborough, Me. He died at Chester, July 4, 1865. Mr. Arnold published two sermons and two articles in the New-Englander. See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 45.

Arnold, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Great Barrington, Mass., in 1780. He was converted in 1796, and in 1815 joined the Genesee Conference. In 1830, on the division of the conference, he became a member of the Oneida Conference. In 1831 he became superannuated, and so remained till his decease, April 23, 1872. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 131.

Arnold, Ralph, an English Wesleyan missionary, was born at Macclesfield. He was converted when eighteen; was accepted by the conference for mission work in 1857; sailed for the West Indies, and died at Basse-Terre, St. Christophers, Aug. 11, 1865, aged thirty-five years. Of humble, unassuming spirit, he was in all things exact and honorable; in pastoral work he was assiduous, and his piety was both seen and felt. See Minutes of British Conference, 1866, p. 46.

Arnold, Samuel, Mus. Doc., a celebrated composer of music, son of Baron Arnold, was born in London, Aug. 10, 1740. He became composer to the Covent Garden Theatre about 1762, and was appointed organist to the king in 1783. He died Oct. 22, 1802. His published works are numerous, including four oratorios, eight odes, three serenatas, forty-seven operas, three burlettas, and other pieces. His most famous oratorio was that of the Prodigal Son. His Cathedral Music (4 vols.) is still popular. At the particular request of George III, he superintended the publication of a magnificent edition of all the works of Handel, in score, of which he completed thirty-six folio volumes. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Arnold, Seth Shaler, a Congregational minister, was born at Westminster, Vt., Feb. 22, 1788. Mostly under the instruction of his pastor, Rev. Sylvester Sage, he prepared for Middlebury College, from which he graduated in 1812. He began the study of theology with the Rev. J. Breckenridge, of Washington, D. C. Returning to Westminster in 1814, he continued his studies, and was licensed to preach in September of that year. During the winter, he was engaged in preaching in Massachusetts; and in June, 1816, was ordained pastor of the Church in Alstead, N. H., after having served them from May, 1815, as a supply. Here he remained eighteen years, experiencing three great revivals of religion in the years 1816, 1819, and 1826. During this period, he was one of the directors of the Home Missionary Society, and interested in all the benevolent and religious movements in the state. Leaving Alstead, he spent two years as a supply for the Church in Gilson, N. H. In 1836 he removed to Westminster, partly to relieve his aged father of the care of the farm, and partly on account of impaired health. For two years he supplied the Church in Walpole, N. H., and also, about the same length of time, the Church in Westminster. He was employed as a minister in Halifax, Vt., from October, 1852, to March, 1856; in Roxbury, N. H., for two years; and in West Townshend for six years. In 1864 he retired from the ministry and resided in Ascutneyville, but was still active in the Sabbath-school, etc. He died there, April 3, 1871. He was erect and dignified in his carriage, and of a noble presence. As a preacher, he was instructive rather than sensational. See Cong. Quarterly, 1872, p. 83.

Arnold, Thomas Kerchever, an English clergyman and author, was born in 1800. He was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge, and in 1838 began the publication of a series of introductory textbooks for the study of Greek, Latin, Hebrew, German, French, and Italian, which have been extensively used both in England and America. He prepared next a series of Greek and Latin texts for the use of schools and colleges, covering a wide range of scholarship. He also published some articles on ecclesiastical subjects and a volume of Sermons.

Arnold, Wesley P., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. No mention is recorded of his birth and early life. He united with the South Carolina Conference in 1827, and served the various appointments assigned him with zeal and fidelity until his death, by apoplexy, Dec. 25, 1869. Mr. Arnold was a devoted husband, an able, diligent, patient minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1870, p. 425; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Arnold, William, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born at Ashborough, N. C., March 4, 1786. He joined the Church at the age of sixteen; was licensed to preach in his twentieth year, and in his twenty-second year united with the South Carolina Conference. During the following twenty-two years he was an active worker; twice he was elected to the General Conference, and sixteen years he served as presiding elder. He died of pneumonia at Eatonton, Ga., Jan. 12, 1860. Mr. Arnold ranked among the first of the preachers of his day. He was a man of exceeding gentleness and amiability of spirit, and was beloved by all. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1860, p. 257.

Arnoldi (or Arnold), Albert Jakob, a Reformed theologian and Oriental scholar of Germany, was born Oct. 1, 1750, at Herborn. He studied at Groningen and Leyden, in the latter place under his uncle, the famous J. J. Schultens. In 1778 he was called to Hanau as professor of sacred philology and church history, and in 1789 he accepted a call to Marburg, which he retained until his death. Here Vilmar, Hupfeld, and others were his pupils, who were always loud in praising his learning, piety, and theological moderation. He died Sept. 4, 1835. He wrote, Anmerkungen über Stellen der Sprüche Salomons (Frankfort, 1781);—Chronici Aulpharagumi e Scriptoribus Græcis Illustrati Specimen (Marburg, 1805);—Observati. ad quedam Jesuæ Loca (ibid. 1796). See Rehm, Marburger Programm vom 13. Sept. 1835; Hupfeld and Bickell, Marburger Gratulationsschrift, zum 28. Juli, 1827; Vilmar, in Gerland's Fortsetzung von Strieder's Hess. Gelehrten-gesch. p. 133; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v.; Winer, Handbuch der theol. Lit. i, 212, 218, 277, 305. (B. P.)

Arnoldi (or di Arnoldo), Alberto, a Florentine sculptor of the 14th century, executed the colossal group in marble of the Madonna and Child, with two angels, in the Church of Santa Maria del Bigallo at Florence, which, until lately, has been ascribed to Andrea Pisano through the error of Vasari.

Arnoldi, Daniel Heinrich. See ARNOLD, DANIEL H.

Arnoldi (or Arnold), Valentin, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Dillenburg, Jan. 26, 1712. He studied theology and the Oriental languages at Herborn. In 1739 he went to the Netherlands and spent seven years at Utrecht, Leyden, and the Hague in continuing his studies. In 1745 he was called as professor of philosophy and first preacher to Herborn. He lectured on almost all departments of theology. In 1755 he was made member of consistory; and in 1757 he took charge of the Academic Library. In 1764 all churches of the duchy of Nassau were committed to his care; and six years later, in 1770, he was made first professor of the theological faculty. Arnoldi died April 16, 1793. With all his vast learning, he wrote hardly anything.—Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Arnolfe (or Arnoul), archbishop of Milan, was raised to the archiepiscopacy in 1093, and was almost immediately deposed by the apostolic legate. He resumed his functions in 1095, after having made a reconciliation with Rome; accompanied Urban II to the meeting at Clermont; and preached in favor of the Crusade in the provinces of Lombardy. He was sent as an ambassador to the emperor Henry IV. In Argellati we find mention of a volume of Arnolfe, or Arnoul, entitled Conciones ad Populum, ut Crucem suscipiant. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnon. This stream, the modern Wady Mōjeb, is still the boundary between the Arab clans of the Beni Sâker on the north and the Keraki on the south. The southern bank is about 2130 feet deep and very precipitous, the northern about 200 feet less in height. The valley between is a tremendous chasm, about two 1175, having written against Folmarus, provost of Trifenstein, in Franconia, on the subject of the holy eucharist. His work is in the Bibl. Patrum (Cologne ed.), tom. xiii, and in the Auctuarium of Le Mire. He also wrote, Scutum Canonicorum, in the Miscellanea of Duelli (Augsburg, 1723), vol. i, the design of which was to bring back the brethren of his order to live in its true spirit. This work is interesting, as showing the manner of life, customs, and observances of the regular canons at that period.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Arnot, David, a Scottish bishop, was elected to the see of Galloway in 1509. He was a native of Carnbee, and abbot of Cambuskennith in 1503, which abbey he possessed until his election to the see of Galloway in 1509, where he sat until his death, in 1526. See Keith, Scottish Bishops, p. 277.

Arnot, William, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born in Scotland in 1808, being the son of a farmer. After having passed through the University of Glasgow, he was licensed to preach in connection with the Church of Scotland. In 1843 he went out with the Free Churchmen, and became pastor of Free St. Peter's Church, Glasgow. For twenty years he stood in this pulpit, and gave to that people and the city of Glasgow the best days of his life. He then succeeded Prof. Rainey in the pastorate of the Free High Church, Edinburgh; and in that prominent position he spent the remaining years of his ministry. His excessive labors, in the prosecution of his duties as a pastor and in literary work, impaired his health; and a few days prior to the meeting of the Free Church General Assembly he left Edinburgh to try the effect of a change of scene and climate. But no permanent effect was experienced, and he realized that his work was done. Dr. Arnot was well known in America. He was twice in the United States—first as a deputy to the General Assembly which met in Philadelphia in 1870, and then as a miles wide at the top, which has been worn by the action of the stream in reaching the deep basin of the Dead Sea. See Porter, Handbook for Syria, p. 296; Bäder, Palest. p. 302. The descent is graphically described by Tristram (Land of Moab, p. 140 sq.).

Arnon (or Arno) was a regular canon, who followed the rule of his order at Reicherspergh, in Bavaria, where he was dean of that community. He died in member of the Evangelical Alliance which met in New York in the fall of 1873. He died in Edinburgh, June 3, 1875. He was the author of a number of popular works; among others we mention his Illustrations of the Book of Proverbs:—Parables of Our Lord:—The Church in the House. His first publication bears the quaint title, Race for Riches, and Some of the Pits into which the Runners Fall. But the book, bearing his name on the title-page, which has been read with more interest than any other is his Life of Dr. James Hamilton. He also wrote a Memoir of James Halley, who, with Hamilton and himself, were college classmates. See Presbyterian, June 26, 1875. (W. P. S.)

Arnoul (or Arnulf), bishop of RHODES, patriarch of Jerusalem, became chaplain to Robert II, duke of Normandy, whom he accompanied on the First Crusade; and was charged in 1099, by the Christian princes, with the administering of the revenues of the Church of Jerusalem. He plotted afterwards to obtain the patriarchate of the holy city, and he attained it in 1111, in via divinitate, according to the strong expression of an historian. He died in 1118. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnoul (Arnulph, or Earnulph), of ROCHESTER (hence called Roffensis), who died March 15, 1124, was at first a monk at Beauvais, afterwards prior of Canterbury, then abbot of Petersburg, and in 1114 or 1115 bishop of Rochester. He wrote Tectus Roffensis, a history of his bishopric (in Warthon, Anglia Sacra, i, 329-334, and ed. Hearnian, Oxon. 1720):—Epist. ad Walchelinum, etc. (D'Achery, Spicil. iii, 464-471)—Responsiones ad Lamberti Quaestiones, etc. (ibid. iii, 471-474). The De Opere sex Dierum and De septem Verbis Domini belong to Arnold of Bonneval (q. v.). See Wetzler u. Welte's Kirchenlex. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Arnoul of ROTTERDAM. See ARNOLD of ROTTERDAM.

Arnoux, JEAN, a French theologian and preacher, was born at Riom near the middle of the 16th century. He entered the Jesuit Order at the age of seventeen, and taught successively philosophy and theology. He preached at the court with success; became in 1617 confessor to Louis XIII, at the death of the celebrated Cotton. He attempted the reconciliation of the king with his mother, Mary de' Medici. He engaged with the four ministers of Charenton—Montigny, Dumoulin, Durand, and Mestrezat—in a lively contest, which arrayed against him all the anger of the Protestant party. Already acknowledged a good preacher, he also proved himself not less able in controversy. He plotted more or less to maintain himself in his position, from which he was removed in 1621 by the jealousy of the constable De Luynes; and he was constrained to retire to Toulouse. The duke of Montmorency, who was decapitated Oct. 30, 1632, chose Arnoux to prepare him to meet death. Arnoux died at Lyons in 1636. He wrote, Oraison Funèbre de Henri IV prononcée à Tournon le 29 Juillet, 1610, which appears to have served as a model for the eulogy of Marcus Aurelius by Thomas. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnschwanger, JOHANN CHRISTOPH, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Nuremberg, Dec. 28, 1625. He studied at Jena, Altdorf, and Leipsic. In 1651 he received his first pastoral appointment in his native city, where he also died, Dec. 10, 1696. He is the author of many hymns, which were published in Neue geistliche Lieder (Nuremberg, 1659; 2d ed. 1711):—Anweisung zur Gottseligkeit (ibid. 1663):—Heilige Psalmen und christliche Paulinen (ibid. 1680):—Heiliger epistolischer Bericht und Licht, Geleit und Freud (ibid. 1663). See Koch, Geschichte des deutschen Kirchenlieds, iii, 517 sq.; Wezel, Hymnopoëgraphia, i, 86-91; Anal. Hymnol. I, ii, 13-19; Winterfeld, Der evangel. Kirchengesang, ii, 456-462. (B. P.)

Arn, NICHOLAS, a French Roman Catholic theologian, was born Sept. 11, 1629, at Merancourt, near Verdun, in Lotharingia. In 1644 he joined the Dominicans at Perpignan, and after completing his studies, he lectured on theology at Tarragona and Perpignan with such success that the first theological chair was given to him. The general of his order, John Thomas de

Raccaberti, appointed him in 1675 professor of theology at Rome; but in 1679 he went to Padua as professor of metaphysics. He died there Aug. 8, 1692. He wrote, Clypeus Philosophiæ Thomisticæ veridica, S. Thomæ Aq. et Alberti M. Doctrina munita contra novos impugnatores (Béziers, 1672, 6 vols.; enlarged edition, Padua, 1686, 8 vols.):—Doctor angelicus d. Thomas Aq. Divinæ Voluntatis in "Summa Theologiæ" interpres (Romæ et Lugd. 1679, 1686, 4 vols.). Several other works of his still remain in MS. See Quetif, Scriptores O. Præd. ii, 703; Wetzler and Welte's Kirchenlexikon, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Arnulf (or Arnoul), a learned prelate of the 10th century, was elected bishop of ORLEANS in 986. On Jan. 1, 988, he crowned Robert, son of Hugh Capet; he rebuilt the Cathedral of Orleans; and took charge of the council in June, 991, in the church of the Abbey of St. Basil, in order to depose Arnoul, archbishop of Rheims. Some years later he assisted at another council, held at the Abbey of St. Denis, near Paris. There it was proposed to take away the tithes from the monks and laymen and give them to the bishops. Abbo of Fleury, sustained by the people, opposed this proposition violently. The writings of Arnulf are, for the most part, unpublished. One is a Discourse delivered before the Council of St. Basil:—another, De Cartilage, in the Library of the Vatican. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnulf, archbishop of RHEIMS, natural son of king Lothaire, was first priest, then canon of Laon; and was elected archbishop of Rheims in 988. But as he had taken the part of prince Charles, his uncle, and had delivered to him the city of Rheims, the king, Hugh Capet, deposed him in 991, and placed upon the archiepiscopal see the celebrated Gerbert (Sylvester II). Imprisoned at Orleans, Arnulf did not recover his liberty until the death of Hugh and the accession of Gerbert to the pontifical throne. He died about the year 1023. Certain letters of his are found in the Spicilegium of D'Achéry. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arnulph (St.), bishop of SOISSONS, son of Fulbertus, a gentleman of Brabant, was born in the 11th century. After his father's death he entered the Monastery of St. Médard at Soissons, where he lived three years in the practice of the greatest austerities. At the end of that time he was made abbot, and in 1080 bishop of Soissons. He did great good in his diocese—reforming abuses, exterminating superstitions, and re-establishing religion in its purity. Gregory VII sent him into Flanders to restore peace to that province, torn by the dissensions of the nobles. While there he founded the Monastery of Oudenbourg, near Ostend, where he retired after resigning the bishopric of Soissons, and where he died, Aug. 15, 1087. See Baillet, Aug. 15.

Arnway, JOHN, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1604, and educated at St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford. He received holy orders in 1618. Soon after he obtained the rectories of Hodnet and Ightfield, which he enjoyed until the Civil War. In 1640 he returned to Oxford to serve the king, and was made archdeacon of Coventry. After the political troubles were over he went to Holland. While at the Hague, in 1650, he published two little pieces—The Tablet and The Moderation of Charles I, the Martyr. Failing in his supplies from England, and his hopes becoming frustrated, he was compelled to accept an offer to go to Virginia, where he died in 1653.

Aroer of JUDAH. The only noticeable relics of the ancient city at Wady Ararah are a few wells in the valley, two or three of them built up with rude masonry, and some of them containing water. The valley is, in part, well watered and fertile, but contains no inhabitants at present.

Arondeau, PETER, a French martyr of the 16th century, was born in Paris. In 1559 he went to the town of Rochelle with a little parcel of wares to sell, and there joined the Church of Christ. When asked by certain popish priests why he did not attend mass, he said "he had been there too much already." They immediately imprisoned him, and he was condemned to death. He was faithful to the truth, and died Nov. 15, 1559. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 445.

Arondeus, JOHANNES, one of the Holland ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church in America, came hither in 1742, and was chiefly known as a violent opposer of all efforts to secure a ministry independent of the mother Church in the old country. He was settled over the churches in Kings County, L. I. (1742-47); and afterwards in New Jersey in Somerset and Middlesex counties, Readington, Raritan, Harlingen, Six Mile Run, and Three Mile Run (1747-54). His name frequently occurs in the civil and ecclesiastical records; but he was always "a troubler in Israel." He was finally suspended by the Cœtus, or American Classis. His death probably occurred in 1754. Full accounts of his movements are found in the Millstone Centennial, by Rev. E. T. Corwin, and New Brunswick Historical Discourse, by R. H. Steele, D.D. (W. J. R. T.)

Arrot and Marot are two angels who, according to the Koran, were sent by God to teach men not to commit murder, not to give unrighteous judgment, and not to drink wine.

Arppana, among the Buddhists, is one form of entire self-control, or samadhi, which is "like a man who rises from his seat and walks steadily for the space of a whole day; as when it is received the mind continues in one even frame, undisturbed and unshaken." To attain this calm self-possession, it is necessary for a man to be careful in seven matters—viz. his residence, the road he traverses, his conversation, his company, his food, the season, and the position of the body.

Arrabo. See ARRHÆ.

Arraes (or Arraiz), AMADOR, a Portuguese theologian, bishop of Portalegre, was born in 1530. He studied philosophy and theology, gave his attention to preaching, and became chaplain of king Sebastian. Philip II made him bishop of Portalegre. He performed the episcopal functions until 1596, when he resigned them and retired to the University of Coimbra. Arraes died in 1600. He wrote, Dialogos Morais (Coimbra, 1589):—Dialogi decem de Divina Providentia (1604). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arrafa is the name of the female diviners of the ancient Arabians of the North Peninsula. They belonged to a distinct tribe, and held their office by hereditary succession; and they possessed the guardianship and right of service of various local temples. The male diviners were called Kahin.

Arrebo (or Arreboe), ANDERS CHRISTENSEN, a

Danish theologian and poet, was born in 1587. He studied at Copenhagen, and became master of arts, then preacher under the patronage of the court of Denmark. In 1618 he was elected bishop of Trondhjem, at the advice of king Christian IV. Accused of wrong conduct, he was deposed, Nov. 13, 1621. For five years he was an outcast, during which time he became changeful, wrote psalms, and was finally appointed minister at Vordingborg, which position he held until his death, in 1637. He was one of the most distinguished poets of Denmark. He wrote, Relation i Vers om Christian IV, des Sejer over de Svenske (Copenhagen, 1611):—David's Psalter sangviis Udsat (ibid. 1623, 1662). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arrenius, CLAUDIUS (Clas Arrhen), a learned Swedish historian, was born at Linköping in 1627, being the son of Arvid Claessen, a London merchant who had gone to Sweden. The son, after having studied at Linköping and Upsala, became (in 1657) a travelling companion of young Oxenstierna; afterwards was professor of logic, etc., in the University of Upsala (1667–68); and eventually librarian (1689) and royal secretary (1693). He was ennobled in 1664, and died at Stockholm in 1695. Among other works he left, Vita S. Augustini sive Anscarii Gemina (Stockholm, 1677, 4to), the one by Rembertus, the other by Gualdonus:—Historia Suecorum Gothorumque Ecclesiastica, Libri 4 Priores, etc. (ibid. 1689, 4to); this is only a part of the entire work, the remainder of which is yet in MS. (in 13 vols.):—Hagiologium Suevo-Gothicum:—Historia Episcoporum et Sacerdotum Sueciae, Gothiae, et Finlandiae:—Historia Episcoporum Lincolnensium:—Bullarium Romano-Suevo-Gothicum, seu Codex Bullarum quas Pontifices Romani quibuscunque de Causis Miseraunt in Sueciam:—Historia Monasteriorum Sueciae. See Scheffer, Suecia Lit. p. 255.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arrephoria was a festival observed among the ancient Greeks. It has been attributed to different deities, but most generally to Athena, in honor of whom it was celebrated at Athens. Four young girls were chosen every year from the most distinguished families. Two of these superintended the bearing of the peplus to Athena, while two others were employed to carry the mysterious and sacred vessels of the goddess. At the close of the ceremony, the girls were dismissed and others chosen in their place.

Arrhæ or Arræ Sponsalitæ (also Arrhabo, Arrabo) was earnest-money on betrothal. The practice of giving such pledges of espousal, of which traces are to be found in all parts of the world, has its root evidently in the view, common yet to many savage races, of marriage as the mere sale of a wife, to which betrothal stands in the relation of contract to delivery. Among the Jews, betrothal was strictly a contract of purchase for money or money's worth (although two other forms were also admitted), the coin used being, however, the smallest that could be had. The earnest was given either to the wife herself or to her parents. It could not be of forbidden things or things consecrated to priestly use, or things unlawfully owned, unless such as might have been taken from the woman herself; but a lawfully given earnest was sufficient to constitute betrothal without words spoken. The first legal reference among the Romans to the arrha on betrothal, and the only one in the Digest, belongs to the 3d century, i. e. to a period when the Roman world was already to a great extent permeated by foreign influences, at this time chiefly Oriental. About eighty years later, however, at a time when the Northern barbarians had already given emperors to Rome, the arrha appears in full development. Julius Capitolinus, who wrote under Constantine, in his Life of Maximinus the Younger (killed 313), says that he had been betrothed to Junia Fadella, who was afterwards married to Toxotius, "but there remained with her royal arrhæ, which were these, as Junius Cordus relates from the testimony of those who are said to have examined into these things: a necklace of nine pearls, a net of eleven emeralds, a bracelet with a clasp of four jacinths, besides golden and all regal vestments, and other insignia of betrothal." Ambrose, indeed (A.D. 346–397), speaks only of the symbolical ring in relating the story of St. Agnes, whom he represents as replying to the governor of Rome, who wished to marry her to his son, that she stands engaged to another lover, who has offered her far better adornments, and given her for earnest the ring of his affiance. To a contemporary of Ambrose, pope Julius I (336–352), is ascribed a decree that if any shall have espoused a wife or given her earnest, his brother or other near kinsman may not marry her. About a century later, the word arrha is used figuratively in reference to the Annunciation considered as a betrothal by Peter Chrysologus, archbishop of Ravenna in 433. In the days of Justinian we see from the Code that the earnest-money was a regular element in Byzantine betrothal. The reason of this development of the arrha within the Roman or Byzantine world of the 6th century is to be sought in some foreign influence. Among the barbarian races which overran the empire from the end of the 4th century, we find almost everywhere the prevalence of that idea of wife-buying, which is the foundation of the betrothal earnest. In the earlier writers there is nothing to connect the betrothal earnest with a religious ceremony; and, indeed, the opinion has been strongly held that church betrothals did not obtain before the 9th century. While pope Nicolas recognises the practice of betrothal by arrha, symbolized through the ring, yet the only benediction which he expressly mentions is the nuptial, not the sponsal. See BETROTHAL; SPONSALITY.

Arriaga, GONZALO DE, a Spanish theologian of the 17th century, was born at Burgos, in Castile. He belonged to the Order of St. Dominic, and occupied an elevated position. He became censor of the Inquisition and director of the College of St. Thomas at Madrid. He died in 1657. He wrote, Santo Tomás de Aquino, Doctor Angélico de la Iglesia, en Vida y Doctrina Predicada (Madrid, vol. i, 1648; vol. ii, 1651).

Arrighetti, FILIPPO, an Italian clergyman, was born in Florence in 1582. He studied at Pisa and Padua, and was appointed canon of the cathedral by pope Urban VIII. He died Nov. 27, 1662. He wrote a great many good works, among them a Life of St. Francis and a Treatise on Vocal and Mental Prayer. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arrighetti, NICOLÒ, a learned Italian Jesuit, was born at Florence in 1709. He taught natural science in the University of Sienna, and wrote several interesting treatises on fire and light. He died in 1767. See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arrighi, GIAMBATTISTA, a theologian of Florence, was first prior of the order of St. Augustine, and professor of theology at Bologna. He died Oct. 22, 1607. He wrote, Elementorum S. Theologiae Libri IV (Florence, 1569):—De Beatitudine Hominis Libri III (ibid. 1575). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arrighi, LORENZO, a monk of Bologna, of the Order of Santa-croza, lived in the former half of the 17th century. After the suppression of the order he became a secular priest. He left, besides several Latin and Italian poems, Vita pont. Urbani VII (Bologna, 1614, 1624, 4to). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arrighi, PAOLO, an Italian theologian and publicist, was born in Florence in 1549, and died Dec. 16, 1587. He wrote De Bonitate Principis (Florence, 1577). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arrigoni, POMPEIO, an Italian cardinal, was born in Rome in 1552. At the close of his course of studies at Bologna and Padua he was made doctor of laws, and a little later the king of Spain chose him for his representative at Rome. He was appointed consistorial advocate by Gregory XIII, and auditor of the suits of the apostolic court by Gregory XIV. At last Clement VIII made him cardinal. He died at Naples, April 4, 1616. We have from him a Latin discourse delivered at Rome, in the consistory, upon the Canonization of St. Diego of Alcalá (Rome, 1588). Other works are attributed to him which have been contested by Mazzuchelli. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arrington, JOEL, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born and reared in Iredell County, N. C., date unknown. He experienced conversion when about twenty, soon began to exhort, and in 1807 entered the Virginia Conference, wherein he labored with zeal and fidelity until sickness, in 1815, obliged him to retire. He died in 1816. Mr. Arrington was correct and discriminate in mind, sound in doctrine, vigilant in duty, pious in example. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1816, p. 276.

Arroy, BÉSIAN, a French theologian, lived at Lyons near the middle of the 17th century. He wrote, Questions Décidées sur la Justice des Armes des Rois de France et l'Alliance avec les Hérétiques et les Infidèles (1634):—Apologie pour l'Eglise de Lyon, contre les Notes et Prétendues Corrections sur le Nouveau Bréviaire de Lyon (1644):—Briève et Dévote Histoire de l'Abbaye de l'Île Barbe (Lyons, 1664). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arsacius (vulg. Ursacius), St., was a solitary of Bithynia, by nation a Persian, who suffered much for the faith under Licinius, A.D. 320, after which he shut himself up in a tower in Nicomedia, where he was distinguished by the gifts of miracles and prophecy, according to Sozomen (iv, 16). He is said to have been divinely forewarned of the coming destruction of the city of Nicomedia by an earthquake, which happened Aug. 24, 358; before which, according to his own desire, he is said to have died in his tower, and while on his knees at prayer. The Roman martyrology marks his festival on Aug. 16. See Ruinart, p. 522; Baillet, Aug. 16.

Arsacius was the intruding archbishop of CONSTANTINOPLE, after the violent expulsion of Chrysostom, A.D. 404, under whom he had served as archpresbyter. Eudoxia and Theophilus, having succeeded in their designs against Chrysostom, found in Arsacius, who had passed his eightieth year, a facile tool. He was consecrated June 27, 404. Notwithstanding the influence of the court party, it was soon shown that the diocese considered him an intruder. The people of Constantinople refused to worship with him, but gathered in the outskirts of the city. The whole Western episcopate refused to acknowledge him, and pope Innocent strongly condemned his intrusion. His episcopate was short, for he died November 11, 405.

Arsenians, a party which arose in the Greek Church in the 13th century, deriving their name from Antorianus Arsenius (q. v.).

Arsenius, a monk of the Greek Church, lived in the first half of the 17th century, during the reign of Michael Feodorovitch. His most cherished desire was to introduce a reform into the old Church of Slavonia. He was finally regarded as a heretic, and banished by the patriarch Joseph to the monastery of Solowetz. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arsenius, St. See ATER, St.

Arsenius, ARISTOBULUS, archbishop of Monembasia, or Malvasia, in the Morea, was born near the middle of the 15th century. He was the son of Michael Apostolius, and was a distinguished scholar and philologist. Excommunicated by the patriarch of Constantinople for his alliance with Rome, he sought refuge in Venice, where he died in 1535. We are indebted to him for a very rare book, entitled Præclara Dicta Philosophorum, Imperatorum, Oratorum, et Poetarum (Rome, s. a.). He also wrote Greek scholia on seven tragedies of Euripides, dedicated to Paul III (Venice, 1534). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arsesius (or Arsisius) was a monk of Nitria, a contemporary and survivor of St. Antony (Pall. Hist. Laus. vii, 117). He is styled "great" by Sozomen (Hist. vi, 30) and Nicephorus (Hist. xi, 37).

Arsh is a name given by the Mohammedans to the throne of God, which they regard as the empyreal heaven. Mohammed calls it, in the Koran, the Arsh Adhim, the great throne, by way of excellence. In speaking of its creation, he says that God placed it upon the waters, and put forth all his power in its production. The Mohammedans, following the traditions, allege that this throne is supported by 8000 pillars; that these are ascended by 300,000 stairs; that the space between each of these is 300,000 years' journey; and that each of these spaces is filled with angels ranged in battalions, among whom some are appointed to carry the throne, and are therefore called Hammelin el-Arsh.

Artabanus (or Artapanes), a historian, mentioned by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. ix, 18, 23, 27), is the author of ἱουδαϊκά, or περί ἱουδαίων. From the fragments—which are mentioned by Eusebius, and which treat on the history of Abraham, Joseph, and Moses—we may assume that he was of Jewish origin. (B. P.)

Artaud (Lat. Artaldus), archbishop of Rheims, was first a Benedictine monk of the abbey of St. Remi at Rheims, and was, in 931 or 932, placed in the archiepiscopal see of that place, in the room of Heribert, son of the count of Vermandois, a child who had occupied the archbishopric from the age of five years (926-931) with the consent of the pope and the king of France. In 936 Artaud crowned at Laon Louis of Outre-mer. Four years after he excommunicated the count of Vermandois, who, with the support of certain powerful vassals, had revolted against the king. The count of Vermandois went to besiege Rheims; he invaded the city, banished Artaud, and attempted to place his son Hugh, who had been consecrated at a council held at Soissons, in the archiepiscopal see. In 946 Louis of Outre-mer, to aid the emperor Otho I, went to Rheims, banished Hugh, and re-established Artaud, who was confirmed in his see by the Council of Verdun (947) and of Ingelheim (948). He afterwards became chancellor of the king of France, and in 954 crowned Lothaire successor of Louis of Outre-mer. He died in 961. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Artaud, PIERRE JOSEPH, a French prelate, was born in 1706 at Bonieux, in the county of Venaissin. He went to Paris, and there distinguished himself as a preacher; became rector of St. Merry's, and in 1756 bishop of Canaillon. He died Sept. 5, 1760. He wrote, Panegyrique de St. Louis (1754):—Discours sur les Mariages, on the occasion of the birth of the duke of Burgundy (1757):—Mandements:—and Instructions Pastorales. All these works breathe a true Christian eloquence. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arteaga y Alfaro, MATIAS, a Spanish painter and engraver, was born at Seville. He studied under Juan de Valdes, and painted a number of perspective pieces in which he represented subjects from the life of the Virgin. He was secretary to the Academy at Seville, and died in 1704.

Artemisia, a festival celebrated at Syracuse, Sicily, in honor of Artemis, or Diana. It lasted three days, during which feasting and amusements of various kinds were incessantly kept up. Festivals bearing the same name, and dedicated to the same goddess, were held in different parts of Greece, chiefly at Delphi, Ephesus, and Cyrene.

Artemius (or Arthemius), saint and martyr, was a commander of the troops in Egypt, and was beheaded by Julian the Apostate in 362 for breaking idols and destroying the temples of false deities. He is commemorated by Greeks and Latins on Oct. 20. See Athanasius, Ep. ad Solitarios.

Arter, RICHARD, an English Wesleyan minister, was converted in early life, entered the work in 1809, but in three months sank under his labors, and died in 1810, aged twenty-four. See Minutes of British Conference, 1810.

Arthur, Archibald, a Scottish clergyman, was born at Abbots-Inch, Renfrewshire, Sept. 6, 1744, and was instructed in his youth in the Grammar-school at Paisley. He afterwards finished his education at the University of Glasgow, where he became professor of moral philosophy; took a course in theology in the same institution; was licensed to preach in 1767, and soon after was appointed chaplain to the university and assistant to the Rev. Dr. Craig of Glasgow. In 1780 he was appointed assistant and successor to the learned Dr. Reid, professor of moral philosophy, and he continued to deliver lectures for fifteen years. He died June 14, 1797. One of his best works was Discourses on Theological and Literary Subjects.

Arthur, James Hope, a Baptist missionary to Japan, was born at Hartford, Conn., May 27, 1812, his family being emigrants from Scotland. He graduated at Brown University in the class of 1870, and took the course of study at the Newton Theological Institution. In July, 1873, he was ordained at Hartford, having been previously appointed as a missionary by the American Baptist Missionary Union to enter the Japan field. He spent a year at Yokohama in learning the language, at the end of which time he removed to Tokio, the capital of the empire, where he gave himself with great zeal and earnestness to his work as a missionary. Four years were devoted to this laborious service, and he had gathered a Church of twenty members, when disease compelled him to retire from his labors. He crossed the Pacific in May, 1877, with the hope that in California he might recover his health, but died at Oakland, Cal., Dec. 9, 1877. (J. C. S.)

Arthur, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Radnor, Pa., May 4, 1818. He received a careful religious training; experienced conversion at the age of sixteen, and, after spending several years as exhorter and local preacher, he, in 1840, entered the Philadelphia Conference. In 1868 he became superannuated, and remained so till his death, Oct. 21, 1871. Mr. Arthur was amiable, frank, generous, confiding, sincere, uniform, and uncompromising. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1872, p. 24.

Arthur, Thomas, a Presbyterian minister, graduated at Yale College in the class of 1743, and on being licensed he was employed as a supply at Stratfield, Conn. He was ordained and installed, by the New York Presbytery, pastor at New Brunswick in 1746, and died Feb. 2, 1750. "He was a good scholar, a graceful orator, a finished preacher, an excellent Christian, steadfast, without a tincture of bigotry, cheerful in conversation, without the appearance of levity, of an amiable and engaging behavior, the darling of his people." He was one of the original trustees of New Jersey College. Two of his Sermons were printed. (W. P. S.)

Arthur, William, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Peebles, Scotland, in April, 1769. He received a classical education at Edinburgh, and was ordained to the work of the ministry at Paisley. In 1793 he came to America, and having preached for some time in New York and Albany, he was installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Pequea, Pa., which position he held for more than twenty years. He died in 1827. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iii, 208.

Artigni, ANTOINE GACHAT D', a French clergyman, was born in Vienne, Nov. 8, 1706. He was canon of the Church in his native place, and spent his life in literary researches, as the result of which he published several important works (1749-56). He died at Vienne, May 6, 1778. See Chalmers, Biog. Hist. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, & v.

Artis, GABRIEL D', a French Protestant theologian, was born about 1660 at Milhaud, in Rouergue. He is known by his works of controversy, directed especially against the Socinians. He died in London in 1732. Some of his works, though incomplete, are found in the Biographie Universelle of Michaud, according to the references given by Barbier. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Artom, BENJAMIN, chief rabbi of the Spanish and Portuguese Jews of Great Britain, was born at Asti, in Piedmont, in 1834. He received his theological education at Padua, and became minister of the Naples Jewish community. While Miss A. M. Goldsmid was travelling through Italy, she heard him preach at Naples, and was so charmed by his grace and eloquence that she immediately wrote to London, where the position of Hacham of the Sephardim had been vacant since the death of rabbi Meldola, in 1828. After a brief correspondence, Dr. Artom was invited to London, and was elected in 1866 for life to the position of Hacham. For the first year he lectured in French, but soon mastered the English language; his sermons, a volume of which appeared in print a few years ago (1874), being models of pulpit eloquence. Dr. Artom's ministrations have been blessed with much success. The establishment of a Portuguese congregation at Manchester and of a branch synagogue in London are proofs of his activity. Personally popular on account of his gifts of mind and person, he was energetic in his efforts to revive the Sephardim of England, who for decades, satisfied with their reputation for respectability, had allowed their German-English brethren easily to advance in communal eminence. This reproach Dr. Artom had rolled away, and in his decade in office he had commanded the esteem of the entire community. He died at Brighton, Jan. 6, 1879. At the funeral, which took place on the 8th inst., chief rabbi Dr. Adler and Rev. Prof. Marks assisted, while almost every Jewish notability in England was present. See Morais, Eminent Israelites of the Nineteenth Century (Philadelphia, 1880), p. 15 sq. (B. P.)

Artonius (originally Krzesikhele, i. e. "Cut-bread"), PETER, a Polish ecclesiastical poet, was born at Groziski (Great Poland), July 26, 1552. After having studied at Wittenberg, he returned to Poland, where he displayed great zeal in behalf of Lutheranism, and was for twenty-three years Protestant minister at Thorn, where he died, Aug. 2, 1609. He wrote, Kancjonal, to jest Pieśni Chreścianskie (Thorn, 1758), a collection of sacred songs:—Thanatomachia czyli Bóg Śmierci (ibid. 1600):—Dieta Duszna (ibid. 1601), a reply to an attack against the preceding work:—Nomenclator Rerum, Appellationes Tribus Linguis, Latina, Germanica, Polonica, Explicatas Judicans (ibid. 1597; reprinted 1684). The hymns of Artonius are very highly esteemed, and they are still used in the Protestant churches of Poland. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Artopæus (originally Becker), Johann Christoph, a German historian, was born in 1626 at Strasburg. He devoted himself entirely to study, and was canon of the chapter of St. Thomas at Strasburg. He died at his native place, June 21, 1702. He published a great number of theses and dissertations, both theological and historical, of which Audiffredi has given a list in his Bibliotheca. He also wrote Seria Disquisitio de Statu, Loco, et Vita Animarum, postquam discesserunt a Corporibus præsertim Fidelium, inserted in the Fasciculus Rarorum ac Curiosorum Scriptorum Theologorum de Anima (Frankfort, 1692). Artopæus took part in the publication of the Compendium Histor. Ecclesiastica, etc., in Usum Gymnasii Gothani (1666). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Artopæus (originally Bekker), Peter, a Lutheran theologian, was born in 1491 at Cöslin. He studied at Wittenberg; in 1528 was rector at Stettin, and in 1549 first pastor of St. Mary's there. His friendly position towards the friends of Osiander caused him many difficulties, which finally resulted in his deposition from office. He died in 1563. He wrote scholia on some parts of the Old and New Testaments, which are enumerated in Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v. (Supplement); Steinschneider, Bibliogr. Handbuch, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v. (B. P.)

Artzeburst (Armenian, a messenger) is a name given in the Greek Church to the Wednesday and Friday in the eleventh week before Easter, which are not observed as fasts, although these days are so observed in every other week throughout the year. The following account is given of the origin of this practice. A favorite dog which served in the capacity of messenger to some Armenian heretics having died, its owners immediately accused the orthodox Greeks of having caused the animal's death. The Armenians set apart the two days above mentioned as fast-days in commemoration of the dog's services, and as a public testimony of their unfeigned sorrow for his untimely end. The Greeks, that they might not even seem to conform to this practice of the Armenian heretics, were excused by the Greek Church from fasting on those two days.

Aruch (or Aruk). We add here to the art. NATHAN BEN-JECHIEL that a new and critical edition of the Aruch is in process of publication by A. Kohut, under the title Plenus Aruch, Targum-talmudico-midrash Verbale et Reale Lexicon, Auctore Nathane Filio Jechielis Rabbinio Celeberrimo . . . ex Discipulis Contextus Aruchani Venetiis (anno 1531) editi et Typis Mandatorum Optimi, ita ex hujus cum Editione Principi (ante 1480), nec non cum septem Manuscriptis Aruchinis Veteribus bono cum animo facta comparatione corrigiti, explet, critice illustrati et edit. (Vienna, 1878 sq.). Bamberger has collected and published various readings to the Aruch under the title Hegyon Schelomoh (Mentz, 1878). The epilogue to the Aruch is given in Hebrew by Reifmann in the Hebrew part of the Magazin für die Wissenschaft des Judenthums, 1878, p. 69-84, and remarked upon by Güdemann in the Monatsschrift für Geschichte u. Wissenschaft des Judenthums, 1878, p. 282-285. (B. P.)

Arumah. The site proposed for this place by Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 288), and adopted by Tristram (Bible Places, p. 192), is laid down as El-Ormeh on the Ordnance Map, six and three fourth miles south-east of Nablûs, as a square ruin on the western edge of a tongue or spur projecting southwards from the general range of hills (2700 feet above the sea), with two or three old cisterns just to the north, and some other remains of a circular form a little to the east. A spring called 'Ain 'Aûlam or 'Aûlun lies half a mile to the west, just across the valley.

Arun, in Hindû mythology, is the wagon-driver of the sun. He was a son of Kasyapa and Abidi, born in an egg, and only finished in the upper part of his body. He sits before Surya, the god of the sun, and drives the seven green horses which draw the wagon. According to the arrangement of Menu, he is at the same time the protecting genius of the morning and evening twilight. His bed is the Eastern ocean, and the drama Sakuntala says he disperses the shades of night, because the god has placed him with a thousand bright rays before his wagon.

Arundel, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Selby, Yorkshire, Dec. 10, 1778. He was introduced to business at the age of eleven, and converted at sixteen. In 1799 he began to study for the ministry, and in 1800 entered Rotherham College. His first charge was at Whitby, where he was ordained July 12, 1804, and in which he remained fifteen years. In 1819 he became the home secretary of the London Missionary Society; and in 1822 he accepted the pastorate of the Congregational Church in Union Street, Borough, which he held jointly with his secretaryship. In this Church he ministered with great efficiency for more than twenty years, when he was compelled, through protracted indisposition, to resign his charge; and in 1845 he retired from his office in the Mission-house. He died March 5, 1848. Mr. Arundel was an humble Christian, a faithful friend, a practical preacher, a devoted pastor, and a zealous officer of the society with which he was so long identified. See the (Lond.) Evangelical Magazine, 1848, p. 212, 561.

Arupa, in Hindû mythology, are the bodiless pure spirits, one of the three classes of living beings. They are subdivided into four classes, each of which has a separate dwelling; and the lowest is so high above the earth that it would take four years for a stone to fall from that point to the earth. The souls of the dead are born again as Arupa, and do not need a transmigration through various stages in order to reach the heavenly bliss. They immediately step into heaven after their new birth as blessed spirits.

Aruspices (Lat. ab aris inspicendis, from inspecting the altars), soothsayers or diviners among the ancient Romans. They are supposed to have come originally from Etruria to Rome; and their chief duty was understood to be that of ascertaining the will of the gods from the appearance which the entrails of animals exhibited when offered in sacrifice upon the altars. But they were not limited to this mode of exercising their art; they were expected to examine all kinds of prodigies. See DIVINATION.

Arvahur (early awake), in Norse mythology, is a courser, which, with another horse, Alswidur, is harnessed to the wagon of the sun.

Arvâles, Fratres (Lat. field brothers), a college of priests, among the ancient Romans, whose office it was to offer sacrifices for the fertility of the fields. They were twelve in number, and are said to have owed their original appointment to Romulus. Their distinctive badge of office was a chaplet of ears of corn fastened round their heads by a white band. Once a year they celebrated a three-days' festival in honor of Ceres, towards the end of May. See AMBARVALIA.

Arvanel, in Zendic mythology, was the sacred river from which the first created human beings drank.

Arvine, KAZLITT, a Baptist minister, was born in 1820, and was a graduate of Wayland University, in the class of 1841. He pursued his theological studies at the Newton Theological Institution, and graduated in the class of 1845. His ordination took place Nov. 6 of the same year, and he became pastor of the Church in Woonsocket, R. I. His other pastorates were with the Providence Church, New York city, and with the Church in West Boylston, Mass. He died at East Brookfield, July, 1851. As an author, Mr. Arvine is known as the compiler of Cyclopædia of Moral and Religious Anecdotes and Cyclopædia of Literary Anecdotes. See Newton General Catalogue, p. 29. (J. C. S.)

Arya is one of the four paths which, in the religion of the Buddhists, when entered upon, leads either immediately or more remotely to the attainment of nirvâna, or cessation of existence. He who enters upon the Arya, or Aryahut, has overcome or destroyed all evil desires and the cleaving to existence. He is understood to know the thoughts of any one in any situation whatever. See ANNIHILATION; BUDDHISM.

Aryanem Vaejo, in Iranian mythology, was the name of the original birthplace of the human race.

Arysdaghes, Sr., an Armenian prelate, was born about 279 at Cæsarea, in Cappadocia. He was brought up by St. Gregory the Illuminator, first patriarch of Armenia; and, after having finished his studies at Cæsarea, he went to Vasasabad, in Armenia, where he was consecrated bishop of Greater Armenia in 318. In 325 he assisted, as bishop of Diospontus, at the general council of Nicea, and about 332 succeeded Gregory as patriarch of Armenia. He was active in ecclesiastical labors, but was assassinated in 339 by Archelous, governor of Sophenia. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arysdaghes (surnamed KRASSER, i. e. the lover of books), an Armenian writer, was born in High Armenia in 1178. He pursued his studies in the Monastery of Sghévra, near the castle of Lamprou, in Cilicia, taught rhetoric in several provinces of Armenia, and died at Sis in 1239, leaving an Armenian Grammar and Dictionary, which have not been printed. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Arzere, STEFANO DELL', an Italian painter, was born at Padua, and executed a number of paintings for the churches and convents of that city. In the church of the Monastery of the Padri de' Servi he painted the principal altar-piece; and in the Chiesa degli Eremitani, subjects from the Old Test. and two pictures of St. Peter and St. Paul.

Asa and Asaël are two angels in the Talmud, who, having dared to reason with God for his creation of sinful men, were changed into men and placed on the earth. Here they led a sinful life. When they returned to heaven they were cast out, and sent to the dark hills in the East, where they teach men the art of sorcery. Balaam and Solomon were their disciples.

Asaheim, in Norse mythology, is the eastern country from which the Asas (q. v.) come. It is doubtful where the same lies. Some designate it as being in ancient Troy, and believe that the Asas emigrated from that place after its destruction. Others maintain that Asaheim lay on the river Don. Asaheim must not be confounded with Asgard. The latter is the palace in which the Northern gods and goddesses live until the end of the world.

Asa-horses, in Norse mythology. The Asas (q. v.) could not dispense with their horses in heaven, as their employment, mainly, is that of knights. Odin possessed an especially beautiful horse, which had eight feet and never got tired, as four of his feet were continually resting. Baldur also had a magnificent horse, which was burned at his funeral service. The steed Goldtoppr (Goldhair, or Goldhead) belonged to Heimdal, etc. There are twelve such horses; to which of the gods they belonged is not known, neither the name of Baldur's horse. The other nine are Gladr, Falhofer, Letsete, Gjæl, Glenr, Gyller, Siner, Skejdbriemer, and Silfrintoppr. Also the sun, the night, and other goddesses had steeds with special names.

Asam, COSMOS DAMIAN, a Bavarian historical and portrait painter and engraver, studied several years at Rome, and subsequently settled at Munich about 1730. Some of his own designs are, A Franciscan Monk kneeling with the Virgin in the clouds, surrounded by Angels;—and St. Joseph Presenting a Book to a Bishop.

Asamal, in Norse mythology, is the language of the gods among the Asas; i. e. the tongue which was only used among the poets and priests of the northern people. It was a kind of Sanscrit, an inheritance only of the learned.

Asanyasatta, an unconscious state of being, one of the forms of existence in the Buddhist religion.

Asaph, Sr., is said to have been the disciple of St. Kentigern, who followed him in all of his excellences. Kentigern committed to his charge, at first, the care of his monastery; and when he was recalled to his first charge, with the consent of the people, consecrated him his successor in the bishopric. Asaph wrote the Ordinations of his Church:—a Life of St. Kentigern;—and some other works. How long he filled the see, and when he died, is altogether unknown, as also are the names of his successors until Gilbertus. We read, indeed, of a bishop of St. Asaph in a general British council in 943, but his name does not appear.

Asas, in Norse mythology, was the general name of the Scandinavian gods. A clew to the origin of the name is found in Suetonius, Life of Augustus, where the author says, "Among some of the premonitions of Augustus's death, is the circumstance that on one of his statues the lightning struck off the letter C from his title (name), so that instead of Cæsar Augustus only æsar remained, which, in the Etruscan language, signifies the gods; and it was considered as a sign that Augustus within C (one hundred) days would be placed among the gods." Although it cannot be denied that the similarity between the Etruscan Æsar and the Icelandic Æsir is very remarkable, still this example stands so isolated here that we would not be justified in building upon it, especially as further evidences of linguistic and religious connection are missing. Three hundred years later we find the word Asa in Hesychius, who says, Ἄσοι θεοὶ ἀπὸ Τυρρηνίων (the Asas, gods of the Tyrrhenians). Three hundred years later still, A.D. 550, we hear from Jornandes that the Goths, after a brilliant victory over the army of Domitian, held their generals as gods and called them Asas. It is remarkable that in many languages the word As is found as the designation of the supreme deities. Still more remarkable is it, if philologists are to be trusted, that Mithras, the supreme god of the Persians, signifies nothing less than "the glorious, the great Asa." One of the oldest historians of Northern Scandinavia, Snorri-Sturleson, maintains that this divine name designated an ancient people of the North. He says:

"The great river Tanais (Don) divides the world into three parts: the east is called Asia, the west Europa. The country in the east has been called Asaheim, and the capital city Asaburg. In this latter city the celebrated chief Odin resided. There was a large place arranged for sacrifices in this city, with twelve priests. The latter were called Diar, or Drotnar (gods, or masters), and all the people were obliged to do them high honour. In Turkey Odin possessed great tracts of land and other property. About this time the Romans carried on war and became the rulers of the world. As Odin was a prophet and knew that his nation was predestined to possess the northern country, he placed We and Will over his kingdom, and with the twelve priests he went to Gardariki (Russia), where many traces of a former kingdom of Northmen remain. Odin left his sons in this country; he himself, however, took his residence on an island, which is now called Odense-øi (Odensee). Now they sent Gefion (one of the four supreme goddesses of the Asas) out in quest of new land; she came to Gylfe, who gave her as much land as she might plough over with four steeds in one day. As she was mother of four sons by a giant in Jötunheim, she changed them into steeds; and they drew so powerfully that a large tract of land was cut off from the country of Gylfe and brought into the sea, wherefrom it was called Sealand. Here she lived and married Odin's son, Skioeld. Odin, later, hearing of the richness of the country, selected a place of residence, and built there a great temple of Asas, and gave each of the twelve priests a dwelling. Thus sacrifices were brought to Odin as well as to his twelve companions, both in the north and south, and they were worshipped just as so many gods."

Thus, according to the oldest Northern historian, the Asas were a foreign people, civilized, educated, spreading arts and sciences, thus winning the divine respect of the people. The male Asas were: Odin, the chief; Thor, the most powerful of gods and men; Freyr, the most gracious; Vidar, the silent; Baldur, the best, of shining form; Ali, or Vali, the archer; Heimdal, the watchman at the door of heaven; Uller, the warrior; Tyr, the courageous; Braga, the poet; Hoder, the blind. The female Asas were: Frigga, Odin's wife; Iduna, goddess of immortality; Freya, goddess of love; Gerda, Laga, Rinda, Gefona, Fulla, etc. But all these gods and goddesses, notwithstanding their power and greatness, will perish at the destruction of the world. Alfadur only, whose service is not connected with time or space, lives forever; he is no mortal Asa, but an immortal, eternal god. See NORSE MYTHOLOGY.

Ascelin (or Anselm), NICHOLAS, a missionary sent by Innocent IV to a Mongol chief in 1247. A description of his voyage, though incomplete, is found in the Miroir Historique of Vincent of Beauvais, which gives Simon of St. Quentin as companion of Ascelin. This was translated into French by Bergeron, with the voyage of Carpin (Paris, 1634). Ascelin followed the south of the Caspian Sea and traversed Syria and Persia. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Ascension of Isaiah. The earliest notice of an apocryphal work attributed to Isaiah is found in Justin Martyr's Dial. cum Tryph. c. 120, where Isaiah is mentioned as ὁ πρῶτον ἐξ ἡμῶν ἐκτίσας. The quotation is not, indeed, a direct one, but its peculiar wording points to the first part of the Ascension as its source, as the Jewish traditions concerning the death of Isaiah do not say that he was sawn asunder with a wooden saw, but that, when Isaiah was pressed by his enemies, a cedar-tree "opened and swallowed him," and that this tree was sawn through, and Isaiah perished in this manner. The tradition, according to the treatise Yebamoth (Talm. Bab.), fol. 49, col. 2, runs thus: "It is related that rabbi Simeon ben-Azai found in Jerusalem a genealogy wherein it was written that Manasseh had killed Isaiah. Manasseh said to Isaiah, 'Moses, thy master, said, There shall no man see God and live (Exod. xxxiii, 20). But thou hast said, I saw the Lord seated upon his throne (Isa. vi, 1). Moses said, What other nation is there so great that hath God so nigh unto them (Deut. iv, 7)? But thou hast said, Seek ye the Lord while he may be found' (Isa. iv, 6). Isaiah thought, 'If I excuse myself, I shall only increase his guilt and not save myself;' so he answered not a word, but pronounced the incommunicable name, and a cedar-tree opened and he disappeared within it. Then Manasseh ordered, and they took the cedar and sawed it lengthways; and when the saw reached his mouth he died." In Tertullian (De Patientia, c. 14) we read: "His patientia viribus secatur Esaias et de Domino non tacet"—evidently referring to v, 14 of the Ascension. The Apostolic Constitutions mention an ἀπόκρυφον Ἠσαίου. The existence of this work is made certain by the two citations in Origen, Comm. in Matt. xiii, 57, and Epist. ad African. c. 9. In the latter place he says, Σαφές δ' ὅτι αἱ παραδόσεις λέγουσι περὶ σθαι Ἠσαίαν τὸν προφήτην· καὶ ἐν τινὶ ἀποκρύφῳ τοῦτο φέρεται κ. τ. λ. Epiphanius, when speaking of the ἀρχοντικοί, says their heresy was partly taken from the ἀναβατικὸν Ἠσαίου. Until the 5th century the work was known, then it disappeared. In 1819 Richard Laurence, of Oxford, discovered an Ethiopic MS. in the Bodleian Library, which he published, with translations into Latin and English, under the title Ergata Isaïus Nabi. Laurence's book has of late been superseded by the excellent work of Dillmann, Ascensio Isaïæ Æthiopice et Latine. Cum Prolegomenis, Adnotationibus Criticis et Exegeticis, Aditis Versionum Latinarum Reliquiis edita (Lipsia, 1877).

The work as it now exists was, according to Dillmann, originally two works—one, the Ascension proper, was written by a Christian; the other, by a Jew, excepting what was added by a later editor. Dillmann analyzes the books as follows: (1) ii, 1 to iii, 12 and v, 2-14 are Jewish, not showing the least trace of Christian influence; (2) vi, 1 and xi, 1, 23-40, the proper As- cension, is the work of a Christian. That this once circulated as a separate book is probable from the fact that the old Latin translation, published by Angelo Mai (in Scriptorum Veterum Nova Collectio [Romæ, 1824], ii, 238 sq.), contains this part only. (3) These two parts were united by a Christian editor, who added ch. i (except ver. 3, 4a) and xi, 42, 43. (4) This was again revised by another Christian hand, which added iii, 13-v, 1 and xi, 2-22, together with i, 3, 4a; v, 15, 16; xi, 41. That the whole work as such was also extant in the Western Church is seen from the second Latin translation, found by Gieseler (Vetus Translatio Lat. Visionis Isaïæ [Göttingen, 1832]), where different parts of the whole work are quoted.

As to the time of the composition of the Ascension no certain date can be given, although there is no doubt that it existed in the 3d century, and we may presume that it was composed towards the end of the 2d century. For the literature and other information, see Dillmann's Prolegomena; also Baring-Gould, Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets, p. 373 sq.; Langen, Das Judenthum in Palestina zur Zeit Christi, p. 157 sq.; Bissel, The Apocrypha (N. Ascensione (or Ascensam), ARSENIUS, a Portuguese theologian, entered the Order of the Augustines, and became provincial of that order at Rome. He died Feb. 29, 1648. He wrote, La Vita dell' Ammirabile Servo di Dio Fra Giov. di Guglielmo (Fermo, 1629, 1630):—Li Affettuosi Sospiri di S. Agostino Vescovo, nuovamente ritrovati nella Libreria Vaticana, in the Estasi dell' Anima Contemplante (Venice, 1639). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ascetriae is a name frequently applied to consecrated virgins in the ancient Church. See NUNS.

Aschaffenburg, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Aschaffenburgense). This is a town of Germany, lately in the territory of Mentz, but now a principal town of Bavaria. Gerard of Eppenstein assembled a council here in 1292, after the death of pope Nicholas IV, while the papal chair was vacant. Some salutary constitutions for the good of the Church were drawn up.

Aschari (or Achari), a Mussulman doctor, and chief of the Ascharians, maintained that the Supreme Being acts by general laws. He also held absolute predestination. He died at Bagdad in 940. See Chalmers, Biog. Diet. s. v.

Ascharians, a Mohammedan sect, the disciples of Aschari (q. v.). They hold that God acts only by general laws, and upon this they ground the liberty of man and the merit of good works; but being the Creator, he must concur in all the actions of men according to their view of the subject. See MORAL GALE.

Ascheim, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Aschaimense). A council was held here, A.D. 763, under Tassilo II, duke of Bavaria, that passed fifteen decrees on discipline.

Aschenbrenner, BEDA, a Roman Catholic theologian of Germany, was born March 6, 1756, at Viereich, in Lower Bavaria. At a very early age he joined the order of the Benedictines; from 1775 to 1780 studied dogmatics and church history; was appointed in 1781 professor of rhetoric at Neuburg, on the Danube; and in 1786 professor of canon law and church history in the monastery of his order at Oberalteich. Three years later he was called to Ingolstadt, where he died July 24, 1817. He wrote, Elementa Praelectionum Canoniarum (Ratisbon, 1788, 3 pts.):—Breviarium Historiae Ecclesiasticae (ibid. 1789):—Commentarius de

Obliatione, quæ Nationi Germanicæ Incumbit, Concor-data Aschaffenburgensia seu Vindobonensia etiamnum Illibate Servandâ, etc. (Ingolstadt, 1796). See Döring, Die gelehrten Theologen Deutschlands, i, 23 sq. (B. P.)

Aschenfeldt, CHRISTOPH CARL JULIUS, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born March 5, 1792, at Kiel. He studied at Göttingen; in 1819 was pastor at Windbergen, in Holstein; in 1824 deacon at Flensburg, and in 1829 pastor primarius there; in 1850 was appointed provost at Flensburg, where he died, Sept. 1, 1856. He is the author of some hymns, as Aus irdischem Getümmel (Eng. transl. in Schaff, Christ in Song, p. 533, "Amid life's wild commotion"). See Koch, Gesch. d. deutschen Kirchenliedes, vii, 156 sq. (B. P.)

Aschkenasi (אַשכּנזי), a general name for German Jews. See also ASHKENAZI.

Asclēpas (or Æsculapius), bishop of GAZA, warmly advocated the Nicene faith in the Council of Tyre in 335, and was deposed by the Arian majority on the charge of having overturned an altar. He joined Athanasius and Marcellus in their appeal to Julius, bishop of Rome; and was, with them, restored to his see by Julius in 341. In 343 he appeared at the Council of Sardica; and it is stated in the Synodical Letter drawn up by the orthodox bishops that he there produced a report of what had taken place at Antioch, where he had been acquitted by the verdict of the assembled bishops. His name appears among the seventy bishops to whom Alexander addressed an encyclical letter against those who had received Arius (Epiphanius, Hæret. lxi, 4).

Asclepiādes, ninth bishop of ANTIOCH and confessor, succeeded Serapion as bishop in 203. Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. vi, 11) mentions him as "having become conspicuous in the confessions during the time of the persecution" (of Severus). He was succeeded by Philetus in 218 (Nicephorus, Hist. Eccles. iii, 19; v, 26). See Baronius, sub ann. 203, 218.

Asclepiades, bishop of TRalles, is the reputed author of a letter to Peter Fuller against the clause added by the latter to the Trisagion, about A.D. 483. The letter is contained in the collections of the councils; but both its authenticity and the existence of Asclepiades are disputed.

Asclepieia were festivals celebrated among the ancient Greeks wherever temples existed in honor of Æsculapius (q. v.); god of medicine. The most celebrated of these festivals was that which was held at Epidaurus every five years, and at which a contest took place among poets and musicians, on account of which it received the name of the sacred contention. A similar festival was said to have been held at Athens.

Asclepiodoteans were a small Christian sect which arose in the 3d century, in the reign of the emperor Heliogabalus. It derived its name from Asclepiodotus, who taught, like the modern Socinians, the mere humanity of Jesus Christ. They were excommunicated by Vibianus, bishop of Rome, in 221.

Asclepius, a Marcionist bishop, who suffered martyrdom by fire at Casarea, in Palestine, Jan. 11, 308 (or 309), in the Diocletian persecution.

Asclepius, NICHOLAS, a Hessian theologian, surnamed Barbatus, was a native of Cassel. He was first master of the school at Homberg; then professor at Marburg, shortly after the foundation of that university. He died March 20, 1571. Among his works are, De Antiquo et Profundo Concilio Dei Exegesis tam Pia quam Erudita in Prosa de Divisione Apostolorum Cantari Solitam et ad Puerorum Usum Ostenso Artificio, et ad eorum Gloriam Scripta, qui in Ministerio Verbi fideliter laborant (Frankfort, 1553); — Perioche Dodecas- tichæ, Summam singulorum Capitulorum, Actorum Apostolicorum a Luca Evangelista Conscriptorum Mira Breuitate, verum multæ Eruditionis Recessu Continentes (Marburg, 1558). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ascoudroupites (or Ascodroutēs) were a heretical sect of the 2d century which sprang from the Marcosians. They rejected the sacraments, maintaining that spiritual things could not be communicated by visible and corporeal means (Theodoret, Hæret. Fab. I, x, 11). See Bingham, Christian Antiquities, (Index).

Ascodrugitæ (or Ascodrōbes), a sect at An-cyra, in Galatia, described by Philastrius (Hæret. 75) as setting and covering an inflated wine-skin in their churches, and dancing wildly round it in Bacchanalian fashion. He has also been understood as saying that the Ascodrugitæ grounded their practice on Matt. ix, 17; but he alone is responsible for the reference.

Ascolius (or Ashcolius) (St.), of Cappadocia, became bishop of Thessalonica, in Macedon; and, in 380, baptized the emperor Theodosius, who fell sick in that city. He was at a council in Rome in 382, and died the following year. St. Basil (Ep. 338) greatly praises Ascolius for the earnest zeal with which he encouraged the Gothic Christians who suffered in the persecution. St. Ambrose also applauds him; and Ruinart credits him with being the author of the Epistle of the Gothic Church to the Church in Cappadocia, concerning the martyrdom of St. Sabas. See Ruinart, p. 600; Baillet, Dec. 30.

Ascondo, FRANCISCO, a Spanish architect, was born in the province of Biscay in 1705. In 1731 he entered the Convent of San Benito, at Valladolid, in quality of lay brother and also in his professional capacity. In 1742 he erected the churches at Hornija and Villar de Frades; also the church of the Priory of Santa Maria de Duero, near Tudela.

Ascopites were a sect of the heretics, also called Archontici, who appeared about 173. They broke the sacred vessels in churches in hatred of the oblation; rejected the Old Test., and denied the use of good works, pretending that it sufficed to know God. They also believed that each sphere of the universe was governed by an angel (Theodoret, Hæret. Fab. I, x).

Asella, Sr., was a Roman virgin who, at twelve years of age, began to dedicate herself entirely to the service of God by fasting, mortification, silence, and prayer. After the retreat of St. Jerome, which was preceded by that of Sts. Paula and Eustochia, Asella remained alone at Rome, where Palladius testifies to have seen her, in 404, in a monastery, where she presided over several virgins. She died about 405, and is commemorated in the Roman martyrology on Dec. 8 (Jerome, Ep. 15, 99, 140).

Asenath, HISTORY OF. "The Life and Confession of Asenath, daughter of Pentepheps of Heliopolis; a Narrative (of what happened) when the beautiful Joseph took her to wife." Such is the full title of a short religious romance published by Fabricius. He gave at first a Latin text; afterwards a much fuller Greek original of eight out of the nineteen chapters from an imperfect MS. The British Museum possesses a Syriac version, made from the Greek by Moses of Agil, about 550. The story is very simple. Asenath, a proud beauty, disdained all suitors excepting Pharaoh's eldest son, and treated with scorn her father's wish that she should marry Joseph. But when she saw him she declared that by his beauty he must be "a son of God," and repented the bitter words she had spoken about his imprisonment and the occasion of it. She came to him with the greeting, "Hail, my lord, blessed of the Most High God." Joseph, however, repelled her; but, seeing her tears, laid his hand on her head, and prayed God to bless her. A few days later an angel appeared to her, and promised that Joseph should be her spouse. On his departure Joseph arrived, and the next day asked her of Pharaoh; and Pharaoh celebrated the marriage with great pomp. The book ends with a strange story: Pharaoh's son, being enamoured of Asenath, endeavored to procure the murder of Joseph, but was unsuccessful. The purpose of this history is not very evident; the signs of Christian origin are not to be mistaken, though Jewish legend may have supplied materials. There is no evidence to show in what country the book was written.

Asenheim. See ASAHEIM.

Asera is the title of an Etruscan goddess who is armed with a hatchet. Aisera occurs in Etruscan inscriptions; and asar, according to Suetonius, meant "a god." See also ASHERAH.

Asgard, in Norse mythology, is sometimes called the capital city of the fabulous country Asaheim; sometimes, again, the residence of the Asa deities. As the latter, it is a city, or a beautiful extended palace, which the Asas built in the centre of the earth. Around this palace are the loveliest evergreen woods, in which, after their meals, the deities roam about. This will continue until Ragnarok, the great night, shall break in upon them, when the deities will disappear. One of the palaces in Asgard is Walhalla (q. v.). There is still another palace in Asgard, Walaskialf, the residence of Odin, in which there is a high tower, from which he can view the whole world. Wingolf is the friendly residence of the goddesses, and Glaadscheim the greatest place in Asgard, on which each of the twelve gods has an honorary residence. Over all these abodes, however, Odin's residence may be seen. There they hold judgment upon men and deities.

Ash, Benjamin, an English Congregational minister, was born at Malmesbury, Wilts, Sept. 26, 1797, of pious Moravian parents. He received his early education at the Fulneck Moravian Seminary. He entered the ministry in 1820 as pastor of several country districts, supporting himself by teaching school and farming. About 1836 he removed to Laxton, Nottinghamshire, where he continued until 1871. In later years he lived at Upton, and afterwards at Rampton, where he died, March 17, 1873. Mr. Ash was earnestly devoted to the Bible and Missionary societies and to evangelistic work in the country, and travelled many thousands of miles in his own conveyance to preach the Gospel. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1874, p. 310.

Ash, Edward, a minister of the denomination of Friends, was born at Bristol, England, in 1797. He was converted when only ten years old, while attending a boarding-school at Melksham, Wiltshire. In his twenty-fourth year he entered on a course of medical study in London and Edinburgh, taking the degree of M.D. in 1825. In 1826 he removed to Norwich and began practicing as a physician. In 1832 he was led to obey a call, which he had long felt, to the public ministry. In 1837 he retired from medical practice and returned to Bristol, his native city, where he died in 1873. Dr. Ash made a diligent and careful study of the original Greek. In 1849 he published a work in three volumes, consisting of Explanatory Notes and Comments on the New Testament. While on his death-bed he wrote several tracts, to be circulated after his death—viz. A Christian Believer in the Near Prospect of Death:—An Invitation. See Annual Monitor, 1875, p. 198.

Ash, James (1), an English Wesleyan minister, was born, probably, in 1789. He was received into the work in 1813; preached on the Brixham, Axminster, Dunster, Hungerford, Tavistock, etc., circuits; became a supernumerary in 1828; was reduced by disease to great weakness, both of body and mind; and died, probably at Ax-minster, May 14, 1840. See Minutes of British Conference, 1840.

Ash, James (2), a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of Ireland. His early life is unrecorded. At the age of twenty he embraced religion; served as a class-leader several years in Montreal, Canada; in 1838 removed to Milwaukee, Wis., where he received license to preach; and in 1840 entered the Rock River Conference. In 1844 he became superannuated. He held that relation until his death, by consumption, in 1849. Mr. Ash was a plain, practical, and useful preacher, a faithful pastor, and a deeply pious Christian. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1849, p. 352.

Ash, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born near Castleton, Yorkshire, in 1785. The greater part of his youth was spent at Farndale. He was moral from boyhood. He entered the ministry in 1811; retired from its active duties in 1859; settled at Whitby; and died in that city Oct. 8, 1863. Ash delighted in open-air preaching, and he frequently addressed crowds in this way. He was a diligent student of the Bible; and he read it through, consecutively, one hundred and twenty times. He was open and confiding, simple and genial, with no small fund of humor; his sermons were sometimes illumined with quaint satire. See Minutes of British Conference, 1864, p. 14; Wesl. Meth. Mag., April, 1869, art. i.

Ashamnu (אֲשָׁמְנוּ, we have transgressed) is the beginning of a penitential confession, written in Hebrew characters, and offered on the Day of Atonement. It runs thus:

"We have trespassed; we have dealt treacherously; we have stolen; we have spoken slander; we have committed iniquity; and have done wickedly; we have acted presumptuously; we have committed violence; we have framed falsehood; we have counselled evil; we have uttered lies; we have scorned; we have rebelled; we have blasphemed; we have revolted; we have acted perversely; we have transgressed; we have oppressed; we have been stiff-necked; we have acted wickedly; we have corrupted; we have done abominably; we have gone astray, and have caused others to err; we have turned aside from thy excellent precepts and institutions, and which hath not profited us; but thou art just concerning all that is come upon us; for thou hast dealt most truly, but we have done wickedly." (B. P.)

Ashan. Lieut. Conder suggests (Tent Work, ii, 324) as sites for the two cities of this name Aseleh and Hesheth respectively. Dr. Tristram adopts the former of these (Bible Places, p. 43).

Ashburnham, Sir WILLIAM, an English prelate, became dean of Chichester in 1742, and was consecrated bishop of Chichester March 31, 1754. He died in September, 1797. He published a number of Sermons (1745-64). See Le Neve, Fasti, i, 253, 258; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Ashby, Benjamin S., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was a native of Kentucky. Nothing definite remains of his early history other than his emigration to Missouri in 1818, being at the time about twenty years old. He was then a local preacher. In 1823 he entered the Missouri Conference. Between 1830 and 1834 he sustained a superannuated relation. He then located; and in 1845 he was readmitted into the active ranks, and thus remained until 1857, when declining strength obliged him again to become a superannuate. He died of epilepsy at the close of his last pulpit effort, Aug. 29, 1860. Mr. Ashby was a man of prayer, and a zealous, faithful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1860, p. 201.

Ashby, George, F.S.A., an English divine and antiquary, was born in Red Lion Street, Clerkenwell, Dec. 5, 1724, and educated at Croydon, Westminster, and Eton schools. He was admitted to St. John's College, Cambridge, in October, 1740, and graduated in 1744. He was presented to the rectory of Hungerton, and in 1759 to that of Twyford, both in Leicestershire. In 1774 he accepted the college rectory of Barrow, Suffolk, where he resided constantly for thirty-four years. In October, 1780, he was inducted into the living of Stansfield, Suffolk. He died June 12, 1808. He was a valuable contributor to several important works. Bishop Percy, Mr. Granger, Richard Gough, Thomas Harmer, James Barrington, and others acknowledge his intelligent aid. See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Ashby, John, an English Congregational minister, was born at Kettering, June 29, 1805. In 1823 he united in fellowship with the Church, and engaged in village preaching. He entered the Newport Pagnel Institution in 1830 for better ministerial preparation. In 1835 he was ordained pastor at Thetford, Norfolk, where he labored until the close of 1847, when he accepted the pastorate at Stony Stratford, Bucks, where he died, June 1, 1863. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1864, p. 198.

Ashby, John Eyre, LL.D., F.R.A.S., an English Congregational minister, was born in London in 1820. From an early age he earnestly desired to enter the Christian ministry. In 1840 he took the degree of A.B. in the London University; in 1842 he entered Homerton College; on leaving it, in 1845, he became pastor of the Congregational Church at Arundel, and in the following year was ordained. In 1848 he accepted, in addition to his pastoral duties, a professorship at Brighton School; in 1852 he resigned his charge at Arundel, and took the oversight of the Church at Wardour. Subsequently he retired to Enfield, where he died, in January, 1864. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1865, p. 219.

Ashby, Mary, a minister of the denomination of Friends for nearly twenty years, was born in Middlesex County, England, in 1773. She was naturally of a timid disposition. Her convictions of duty were so strong that she could not desist from preaching, though her communications were short and infrequent. She made a constant study of the Holy Scriptures, especially those of the New Test. She lived an exemplary Christian life, and died in the triumphs of Christian faith, July 6, 1835. See Annual Monitor, 1837, p. 1.

Ashby, Thomas, a minister of the denomination of Friends, was born near London, Jan. 10, 1762. Perhaps there were few, if any, of his brethren who had a deeper sense of ministerial responsibility than he had. After fifty years of ministerial labor, his life was terminated very suddenly, Dec. 20, 1841, by an affection of the heart. See Annual Monitor, 1843, p. 1.

Ashcollius, St. See ASCOLIUS.

Ashdod. The modern "Esdūd" is a moderate-sized village of mud houses, situated on the eastern declivity of a little flattish hill. On approaching it from the south, we have in the foreground a lake, 400 or 500 yards in circumference; beyond it a large ruinous khan and modern wely; beyond these the hill, its southern face covered by a multitude of diminutive gardens with stone fences that look like sheep-pens in the distance. Leaving the pond and khan on the left, we advance to the village over a naked slope of threshing-floors and brick-fields. The site is beautiful and commanding. Groves of olives, figs, and palms adjoin it on the east and north, covering the sides of the hill, and stretching along the undulating ground at its base. The plain, too, unfolds itself before us till it meets the dark mountains of Judaea. The village is entirely modern, and does not contain a vestige of antiquity; but in the old khan to the south-west there is a granite column, and beside the little wely, near the khan, is a sculptured sarcophagus, with some fragments of small marble shafts. The southern side of the hill appears, also, as if it had been once covered with buildings, the stones of which are now thrown together in the rude fences. The khan is comparatively modern, certainly not older than that at Ramleh" (Porter, Handb. for Syria, p. 279). Ancient masonry and fragments of columns are also detected in the walls of the houses and mosques. See also Conder, Tent Work, ii, 166.

Ashdodth-Pisgah. This expressive term is now well ascertained to designate the springs known as Ayūn Mūsa (Fountains of Moses) in the valley leading to the foot of Nebo or Jebel Neba on the north. They are thus described by Tristram (Land of Moab, p. 348 sq.). See PISGAH.

"There are two fountains, or rather two groups of springs, bursting from the foot of a tall blue of cliffs. The first group run for a short distance over a shelf of rock, shaded by some old fig-trees. A few yards farther on several smaller springs issue from fissures in the cliffs, soon unite their streams on a broad shelf of rock, and then form a pretty cascade about twenty-five feet high. . . . The second of the twin 'Springs of Moses' bursts from a deep horizontal tunnel in the rock, about fifteen inches in diameter. The volume of water is greater than that of the other spring; and both fountains and streams are clear as crystal. This stream joins the other, after the cascade, by a series of smaller leaps." (See following page.)

Ashe, ROBERT HOADLY, D.D., an English divine was born about 1751, and was educated at Pembroke College, Oxford. In 1775 he was presented to the perpetual curacy of Crewkerne-cum-Misterton, Somerset, which he held till his death, May 3, 1826. He published, for the benefit of an ingenious pupil, some Poetical Translations from Various Authors, by Master John Browne, of Crewkerne, a Boy of Twelve Years (1797, 4to):—also A Letter to the Rev. John Milner, D.D., F.S.A., Author of the Civil and Ecclesiastical History of Winchester; Occasioned by his False and Iliberal Aspersions on the Memory and Writings of Dr. Benjamin Hoadly, formerly Bishop of Winchester. See the (Lond.) Annual Register, 1826, p. 249.

Asher (the city of Manasseh). Lieut. Conder (Tent Work, ii, 334) and Tristram (Bible Places, p. 196) identify this with Asirah or Asireh, which is laid down on the Ordnance Map under the name Teiāsir, one and three fourth miles north-east of Tubas (Thebez), as a village in a valley (995 feet above the sea), with ancient cisterns, tombs, milestones, and wine-presses adjacent; being the same place indicated by Van de Velde (Memoir, p. 289) and Porter (Handbook, p. 348).

Asher, WRIGHT, a Presbyterian minister, was a member of the Presbytery of Buffalo, and a missionary among the Seneca Indians for more than forty years, being very successful in his labors. He died at Cattaraugus, N. Y., April 13, 1875. See Presbyterian, May 1, 1875.

Asher Manuscript. This Hebrew codex is called after its author, Rabbi Aaron ben-Mose ben-Asher, who flourished about A.D. 900 at Tiberias. Asher was the most accomplished scholar and representative of the Tiberian system of vocalization and accentuation, and his model codex of the Bible (ספר בן אשר), furnished with the points and according to the Western school, became the standard text of our present Hebrew Bibles. Of this codex Moses Maimonides (q. v.), who lived in the 12th century, writes thus: "The copy which we have followed is the famous codex of Egypt which contains the twenty-four books, and which has been at Jerusalem for many years, in order that other codices might be corrected by its text; and all followed it because ben-Asher had minutely revised it for many years and corrected it many times" (Yad ha-Chazaka, Seph. Thora, viii, 4). This codex, which for centuries had not been seen, is said to be still preserved at Aleppo. See Strack, Prolegomena Critica, p. 44 sq.; Bär and Strack, Dikduke ha-Tamim, p. 14 sq. (B. P.)

Ashkelon. The present site, called Askulan, is thus described by Porter (Handbook for Syria, p. 276; comp. Conder, Tent Work, ii, 164 sq.):

"The ruins of this ancient city occupy a splendid site facing the Mediterranean. Along the shore runs a line of cliffs nearly a mile in length, and varying from fifty to eighty feet in height. The ends of the cliffs are connected by a ridge of rock which sweeps round inland in the form of a semicircle. Within the space thus enclosed stood Ashkelon, and along the top of the ridge ran its walls. The ground sinks gradually for some two hundred or three hundred yards towards the centre, and then rises again as gradually into a broad mound, culminating at the sea. The walls are strangely shattered, and one wonders what mighty agency has been employed in their destruction. Huge masses of solid masonry, ten, fifteen, twenty feet in diameter, are thrown from their places and lie on the sides and at the base of the rocky bank. The cement that binds the stones together seems as firm as the stones themselves; and the old battlements, instead of having crumbled to pieces as most buildings do, rest in immense disjointed fragments, which, had we power enough to move them, we might almost arrange in their places again. On the eastern side of the semicircle, at its apex, was the principal gate; and here is still the most convenient entrance. The path winds up through heaps of stones and rubbish, among which are great numbers of marble and granite columns; on the left are the shattered walls of a large tower, still of considerable height, and affording from the top the best general view of the ruins. Clambering up the broken battlements, we have Ashkelon spread out before us—no! not Ashkelon, only the place where it once stood. The northern and larger section of the site is now covered with gardens, divided by rough stone fences, and filled with vines, pomegranates, figs, and apricots, in addition to luxuriant beds of onions and melons. Scarcely a fragment of a ruin can be seen from this spot except the broken wall. As I sat here one morning I counted five yokes of oxen plunging, two drawing water for irrigation, and twenty-eight men and women engaged in agricultural work! Such is one section of Ashkelon. The remaining portion is even more terribly desolate. The white sand has drifted over its southern wall, almost covering its highest fragments, and now lies in deep wreaths upon the ground within. The scene presents such an aspect of utter desolation that it is painful to look upon it—old foundations of houses, palaces perhaps, and the little vines that men still living had planted over them being alike swallowed up by sand. And the sand is fast advancing; so that probably ere half a century has passed the very site of Ashkelon will have disappeared. How true are the words of Zephaniah spoken twenty-five centuries ago, 'Ashkelon shall be desolation' (ii, 4); and the words of Zechariah too, 'Ashkelon shall not be inhabited' (ix, 8)!

"A walk through the gardens and orchards that cover the site still shows us something of the former magnificence of the city. Proceeding from the gate towards the top of the central mound, now crowned with a ruinous wely, we observe traces of a street once lined with columns. At about two hundred yards we have on the left a low area partially excavated, round which are from twenty to thirty large granite shafts and several smaller ones of marble, some of them nearly covered with soil and stones. Not a solitary column stands upright, and not a building can be traced even in outline, though a few stones of a wall are here and there seen in their places. Deep wells are frequently met with, with curb-stones of marble or granite; columns, mostly of granite, exist in vast numbers—scores of them may be seen projecting from the ruins wall along the cliff over the sea, and some lie half buried in the sands below. Hewn stones are not so plentiful as one would expect. But this is explained by the fact that Ashkelon formed the chief quarry from which the materials were taken to build the ramparts and adorn the mosques of Acre. The houses and walls of Yafa have also made large draughts on this place. And poor Lady Hester Stanhope, strangely enough, contributed to the work of ruin. Having heard or dreamt of some vast treasure buried beneath the old city, she got a firman from the sultan, assembled a band of workmen, and made extensive excavations; but the only treasure discovered was a portion of a theatre. Thus a variety of agencies have combined to render Ashkelon 'a desolation.' There is a little village beside it, but not a human habitation within its walls."

Plan of the Remains of Ashkelon.

The following additional particulars are from Bäder's Palestine, p. 316 sq.:

"On the hill, in the Wely Mohammed, which is shaded by sycamores [the sycamore fig, which flourishes here], are seen the still tolerably preserved towers which defended the principal gate, that of Jerusalem; but the remains are deeply buried in the sand. The outlet to the road is closed by a thorn hedge. The north side of the ramparts is not easily visited, as they are concealed by luxuriant orchards, both outside and inside the walls. Among the orchards are found remains of Christian churches, and other relics of uncertain date. The orchards, enclosed by prickly-cactus hedges and thorn-bushes, belong to the people of Jôra, a village of three hundred inhabitants, situated to the east of the ancient Ashkelon. Sycamores abound, and vines, olives, many fruit-trees, and an excellent kind of onion thrive in this favored district. This

3. ZEBI BEN-JACOB, of Wolna, a famous Talmudist, went to Buda in 1666, where he remained till 1678. He then went to Adrianople, Sarajevo in Bosnia, Lemberg, Amsterdam, Altona, Hamburg, etc. He is also called Chacham Zebi (חכם צבי). He is the author of a great many "decisions" touching the most varied topics. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 64; Frankel, Hirsch ben-Jacob Aschkenasi: eine Biographie, reprinted in Literaturblatt des Orients, 1846, No. 47. (B. P.)

Ashlar (Achelor, or Ashler), hewn or squared last was called by the Romans ascalonia, whence the French échalotte and our shalot are derived."

For further details, see the Zeitschr. d. Paläst.-Vereins, 1879, p. 164 sq., where a plan is given, of which the one here exhibited is a reduction.

Ashkenazi is a name common to many Jewish writers, of whom we mention the following:

1. BEZALEL BEN-ABRAHAM, rabbi in Egypt, is the author of glosses and novellas on the Talmud, known in Talmudic literature under the title of שנה בשנה (Lemberg, 1861-71, 4 vols.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 60 sq.

2. ELIESEK BEN-ELIA ROFE lived in Egypt till 1561, when he went to Famagusta, in Cyprus. In 1576 he stood at the head of the Jewish congregation at Cremona, where he completed his לחם לחם, or commentary on Esther (Cremona, 1576). In 1580 he completed at Gnesen his commentary on the historical parts of the Pentateuch, entitled מנשה (Venice, 1583). About this time he was rabbi at Posen. He stone used in building, as distinguished from that which is unhewn, or rough as it comes from the quarry. It is called by different names at the present day, according to the way in which it is worked, and is used for the facings of walls. "Clene heven" or finely worked ashlar is frequently specified in ancient contracts for building, in contradistinction to that which is roughly worked.

Ashley, George Herod, a Congregational minister, was born at Ashbourn, Derbyshire, England, Sept. 19, 1844. He graduated from Olivet College in 1872, remaining there as tutor until 1873. From 1873 to 1877 he was professor of English literature, rhetoric, and Greek in Drury College, Mo., being the first professor of that college. He was ordained as an evangelist at Carthage, Mo., Dec. 28, 1874, and remained as such until his death, which occurred at Springfield, Mo., July 20, 1877.

Ashley, Jonathan, a Congregational minister, was a native of Westfield, Mass. He graduated from Yale College in 1730, and was ordained pastor of the Church at Deerfield, Mass., in 1738. He died in 1780, aged sixty-seven years. He possessed a vigorous mind, and was an earnest, pungent preacher. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 207.

Ashley, William, a Baptist minister, was born at Hillsborough, N. C., in 1793. In early life he removed with his parents to Claiborne County, Tenn. While pursuing his studies at Anderson Seminary, he enlisted, in November, 1814, in a company of volunteers to serve in the war against Great Britain, and was in service at Mobile when the battle of New Orleans was fought. His conversion, in connection with that of his brother, occurred in the autumn of 1815, and he united with a Freewill Baptist Church. In 1817, having decided to give himself to the work of the ministry, he was an itinerant preacher in several of the Southern and South-western States. Coming east, he spent a winter in St. Catherine's, Canada, and in 1820 and 1821 was engaged in abundant and successful evangelistic labors in the Eastern States and Nova Scotia. In the town of Liverpool it is said that an extensive revival broke out, and such was the general interest that business was for the time partially suspended, and great numbers were converted. He was settled in several places for brief periods as a Freewill Baptist minister. Later in life he united with the Calvinistic Baptists, and was pastor of several churches in that denomination. He died at South Gardiner, Mass., June 6, 1860. See Watchman and Reflector, July 19, 1860. (J. C. S.)

Ashley, William H., a Congregational minister, was born in 1713, and graduated at Yale College in the class of 1730. He was ordained in 1738, and became pastor of the Church in Deerfield, Mass. He died in 1780. He is said to have "possessed a strong and discerning mind and a lively imagination, and was a pungent and energetic preacher. He published a few discourses, among which was a sermon at the ordination of John Norton, Deerfield, in 1741." See Allen, Amer. Biog. s. v. (J. C. S.)

Ashman, William, an early Methodist preacher, was born at Colford, Somersetshire, England, in 1734. He was converted as a result of Wesley's visit to the parish in which he was born. From the age of twenty-one to thirty he was a class-leader and steward; a local preacher at thirty-one; and, at the age of thirty-four, he left a lucrative business to preach, at Wesley's request, in the east of Cornwall. He desisted from the work in 1798, and thereafter was a class-leader in his native place. He died at Halcomb, Somersetshire, Feb. 9, 1818. See Jackson, Early Meth. Preachers, v, 296; Wesl. Meth. Mag. 1818; Minutes of the British Conference, 1818.

Ashnah. Tristram identifies one of the cities thus named (Josh. xv, 33) with the modern Asolin (Bible Places, p. 48), which is laid down on the Ordnance Map under the name of Aslin, one mile north-east of Surah (Zoreah), as a ruined village with a cistern adjoining. The other Ashnah (Josh. xv, 43) he regards (Bible Places, p. 43) as the present Iahnah, six miles south-east of Beit-Jebirim; but this is certainly the Jedna of Eusebius and Jerome, who both speak of Asna as a separate place. Lieut. Conder merely gives (Tent Work, ii, 334) Ghasheina as the site of one of the two towns called Ashnah, without indicating its locality or distinguishing which.

Ashor is the general name of the four months which, among the Mohammedans, as well as among the ancient Arabians, were regarded as sacred. These months were Moharram, Resjele, Dulkadha, and Dulhaggia. No war could be lawfully begun or carried on in these months; and most of the Arabian tribes observed this so punctually that even the murderer of a father or brother was not to be punished or any violence offered to him at that time. The institution of the sacred months is recognised in the Koran, and their careful observance enforced, except in the case of war against infidels.

Ashton, Charles, D.D., an English clergyman, was born in 1665. He became chaplain to Patrick, bishop of Ely, who presented him to the living of Retenden, in Essex. He was also, for a time, chaplain of Chelsea Hospital; and in 1701 became master of Jesus College, Cambridge. He died in March, 1752, leaving an edition of Justin Martyr, published after his death by Mr. Kellet. See New General Biographical Dictionary, s. v.

Ashton, James, a Bible Christian minister, was born at Beaford, in the County of Devon, England, Jan. 20, 1819. His conversion took place at a prayer-meeting in 1836. He commenced his itinerant ministry on the Falmouth Circuit in 1841. After laboring sixteen years in England, in 1857, at the earnest request of the Missionary Committee, he left the home work for the distant field of Australia. He and his family landed at Adelaide, Feb. 15, 1858. After filling, acceptably, several appointments in the early part of the year 1874, he died on Dec. 14 of the same year. See Minutes of Conferences, 1875.

Ashton, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born at Hull, March 1, 1798. He joined the Church in early life; entered Hoxton College in 1819; settled at Dedham in 1824, at Warminster in 1832, and at Putney in 1839. Mr. Ashton relinquished the regular pastorate in 1850; and became secretary successively of the Wycliffe Society, of the Christian Instruction Society, of the Surrey Mission, and of the Christian Witness Fund. In 1847 he became joint secretary of the Congregational Board of London Ministers; in 1849 editor of the Congregational Year-book; and in 1852 joint secretary of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. He died July 21, 1878. Mr. Ashton published, by subscription, an edition of the works of John Robinson, with a memoir and annotations, in 3 vols. 1851. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1879, p. 297.

Ashton, Thomas (1), an English clergyman, was born at Tanderly, Lancashire, in 1631, and was educated at Oxford, where he took his degree of A.B. Feb. 7, 1650. He was chosen fellow of this college and took holy orders. He was appointed to preach at St. Mary's July 25, 1654; and his sermon proved so very indecent that he came very near being expelled. He was finally obliged to quit his fellowship. In 1656 he was intrusted with a commission from the protector to be chaplain to the English forces in the Island of Jersey. He died soon after. His publications were not very important.

Ashton, Thomas (2), an English divine, was born in 1716, and educated at Eton and at King's College, Cambridge. He was tutor to the earl of Plymouth in 1740. Soon after this date he was presented to the rectory of Aldingham, in Lancashire, which he resigned early in 1749. On May 3 of that year he was presented to the rectory of Sturminster-Marshall, in Dorsetshire. In 1752 he was collated to the rectory of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate; and in May, 1762, was elected preacher at Lincoln's Inn, which he resigned in 1764. He died March 1, 1775. He published a number of single Sermons (1745-70):—some Letters and Pamphlets on the question of electing aliens into the vacant places in Eton College (1771). See Chalmers, Biog. Dict. s. v.; Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Ashton, Thomas (3), an English Wesleyan minister, was born in London in 1768. He feared God from his youth, and received his first ticket of membership from Wesley. He entered the ministry in 1801; continued therein until 1837, when he settled in Bath, where he died, May 18, 1854. See Minutes of British Conference, 1854.

Ashtūr is the tenth day or tenth night of Moharram, which is the first month of the Arabic year. The word also signifies ten days or ten nights. In ch. lxxxix of the Koran, God is introduced swearing by the ten nights. The Mohammedans generally fast on this day for three reasons: (1) because the ancient Arabians observed it as a fast-day before the time of Mohammed; (2) because on this day Noah left the ark; and (3) because on this day God pardoned the Ninevites.

Ashtwell, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, was born at Faversham, Kent, about 1804. In due time he joined the Wesleyans, and began his first ministerial labors among them. Ultimately he joined the Independents, and did his first ministerial work for them at High Wycombe. Bromsgrove next enjoyed the benefit of his labors, from 1833 to 1847. His health failing, he resigned his charge, returned to his native county, and, when sufficiently restored, accepted a light charge at Pembury. In 1853 he took the oversight of the Church at Redditch, which he held until his death, Aug. 23, 1860. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1861, p. 198.

Ashtworth, Caleb, an English Dissenting minister, was born in Northamptonshire in 1709. He served an apprenticeship to a carpenter; but having a taste for learning he was sent to the academy kept by Dr. Doddridge. He was afterwards ordained minister of a Dissenting congregation at Daventry; and succeeded Dr. Doddridge as president of the academy, a post which he held with eminent success for twenty-three years. He died at Daventry in 1774. He published three Funerel Sermons on the deaths of Dr. Watts, Mr. Floyd, and Mr. Clark:—also a Collection of Tunes and Anthems:—a Hebrew Grammar:—and an Introduction to Plane Trigonometry.

Ashtworth, Richard, an English Baptist minister, was born at Cloughfold, in the Forest of Rosendale, Lancashire, Oct. 4, 1799. He lost both his parents when a child, and, until his twenty-fourth year, he had no fixed dwelling-place. In 1823 he united with the Baptist Church in Goodshaw; and in 1827 was invited by the Church to engage in the work of the ministry. In the fall of 1828 a Church was formed at Lumb; and March 24, 1831, a new meeting-house, capable of seating six or seven hundred persons, was dedicated, the lot of ground on which it was built being given by a benevolent gentleman who was a member of the Established Church. In this place he labored with success until death removed him, Aug. 19, 1837. See English Baptist Magazine, 1837, p. 207, 208. (J. C. S.)

Asia, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Asiaticum). A council was held A.D. 245 in Asia Minor, against Nectus; but at what place is uncertain.

Asiæ. Nymphs thus named attended Diana.

Asiah, according to Mohammedan legend, was the daughter of Mozaheh and wife of Pharaoh, who lived at the time of Moses. As she was willing to give ear to Moses, Pharaoh tortured her; but the angels mitigated her sufferings and took her up into Paradise. The Mohammedans worship her as divine, as she was one of the four women who reached perfection.

Asinarii, a term of reproach against the early Christians. That the Jews worshipped an ass, or the head of an ass, was a current belief in many parts of the Gentile world. Tacitus says that there was a consecrated image of an ass in the Temple; the reason for this special honor being that a herd of wild asses had been the means of guiding the Jews, when they were in the desert, to springs of water. Plutarch tells virtually the same story. Diodorus Siculus says that Antiochus Epiphanes found in the Temple a stone image representing a man sitting upon an ass; but, on the other hand, Josephus adduces the fact that no such image had been found in the Temple by any conqueror as an argument for the groundlessness of the calumny. The same belief appears to have prevailed in reference to the early Christians. It is mentioned by both Tertullian and Minucius Felix; but, though referred to in later times, appears to have died out in the course of the 3d century. (The same reproach made by the Turks against the Christians in Africa is probably to be connected with the mediæval "Festival of the Ass" rather than with the earlier calumny.)

The origin of the reproach has been a subject of various speculations: (1.) It has been considered to have arisen somewhere in the Gentile world, and to have been applied to the Jews before the Christian era. (2.) It has been considered to have arisen in Egypt, and on this hypothesis two explanations have been given. Tanquil Faber thought that it was a corruption from the name of Onias, who built a Jewish temple at Heliopolis; and Bochart thought that the Egyptians willfully perverted the expression "Pi iao" ("mouth of God") into "Pieo," which, in an Egyptian vocabulary edited by Kircher, signifies "ass." (3.) It has been viewed as a calumny of the Jews against the Christians, which was reflected back upon the Jews themselves. (4.) It has been regarded as having originated from the use of the ass as a symbol by some Gnostic sects. That the ass was thus used is clear from the statement of Epiphanius. Between these various hypotheses the question must be left undecided.

A slight additional interest has been given to it by the discovery at Rome, in 1856, on a wall under the western angle of the Palatine, of a graffito which forcibly recalls the story mentioned by Tertullian. The graffito in question represents a caricature, evidently directed against some Christian convert of the 2d century. Upon a cross is a figure with a human body wearing an interula, but with an ass's head. On one side is another figure lifting up his head, possibly in the attitude of prayer. Underneath is written "Alexame-nos is worshipping God." The form of the letters points to the graffito having been written towards the end of the 2d century, about the very time at which Tertullian wrote. This graffito is now preserved in the Library of the Collegio Romano in Rome. See ASS-WORSHIP.

Ask, in Norse mythology, is the first created man. The three mighty Asas—Odin, Wile, and We—once assembled together on the sea-shore. There they found two trees, an ash and an alder. Odin gave them breath and life; Wile (or Hönir), spirit and power of motion; We (or Lodur), blood, speech, beauty, and the sense of hearing and seeing. The Asas called one of them Ask (Ash), and the other Embla (Alder). Thus originated the first man and the first woman.

Askew, Josiah F., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Burke County, N. C., in 1814. He experienced religion at the age of fourteen; received license to preach while a student at Randolph Macon College, Va., in 1837; and in 1840 entered the Virginia Conference. During the few years that his health permitted, his services were highly acceptable and exemplary. A pulmonary difficulty obliged him to locate, and he retired to Georgia. He died Nov. 7, 1848. Mr. Askew was characterized by whole-heartedness, piety, zeal. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1849, p. 202.

Askin, George, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was a native of Ireland. His early life is wrapped in obscurity. On emigrating to America he, in 1801, entered the Virginia Conference, and in it served the Church with more than usual zeal and acceptability until his death, Feb. 28, 1816. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1816, p. 277.

Askin, Thomas, a Christian martyr, was burned at Newbury, with Julius Palmer, July 25, 1556, because he would persist in reading the Scriptures and saying his prayers, contrary to the popish orders. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 201.

Askins, WILLIAM H., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Virginia July 8, 1803. He experienced religion in 1820; and in 1823 joined the Kentucky Conference. In 1830 he was transferred to the Illinois Conference, and labored faithfully until poor health compelled him to desist in 1832. He died July 6 in that year. Mr. Askins was a popular and successful preacher. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1833, p. 214.

Aslin, JOHN, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Gedling, near Nottingham, in 1785. He entered the ministry in 1804, and labored with fidelity, acceptance, and usefulness for forty-two years. He retired from the active work in 1846; and died suddenly, May 27, 1849. Aslin was a faithful minister and diligent student, especially of the Scriptures. See Minutes of British Conference, 1849.

Asman, in Persian mythology, was an Ized, the director of the twenty-seventh day of each sun-month; heaven, also, and the genius of the same, carry this name.

Asmoug (or Asmog), the name of a demon which, according to the Magi, or Zoroastrians, is one of the principal emissaries of Ahriman, who is their prince, and author of all the evil in the world. Asmoug's function is to sow discord in families, lawsuits among neighbors, and wars between princes.

Asnekoth, SAADIA BEN-LEVI, a Jewish writer of Morocco, who lived in the 17th century, is the author of an Arabic version of Genesis, Psalms, and Daniel, which is preserved in the British Museum at London, MS. No. 5503. That he is the author of this version may be seen from the superscription given at the beginning of the book of Genesis: חֲנוּכָה עֲרַבִי עַל הַתּוֹרָה סֵפֶר בֶּרֶשִׁית לִי יִצְחָק מִמְרוּקָשׁ וְיָאָה. As this version is of recent date, its value cannot be great. See Döderlein, in Eichhorn's Repertorium für bibl. und morgenländische Literatur, ii, 153 sq.; Wolf, Bibl. Hebr. iii, 863; De Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 49; Bauer, Crítica Sacra, p. 324. (B. P.)

Asor, in Hindū mythology, are evil spirits. As their teacher and leader they have Shukra, the planet Venus. They appear in frightful, giant-like forms, have a human appearance, possess all human attributes, marry, have descendants, etc. After death their spirits transmigrate into other bodies. Their residence is the infernal region. They can take on any form. The most celebrated among them are Moiasur and Rhabun. Sorcery is their main employment, and also all their wisdom.

Asorath is an important Mohammedan book of religion, a catechism of religious doctrines, compiled by the first caliph and the greatest learned men of his time. It is a sort of commentary to the Koran.

Asoron, in Chaldean philosophy, is the first uncreated substance which arose out of chaos; which, with Kisara, likewise an uncreated substance, produced the three fundamental principles—Anos, Illinos, and Aos.

Asovahisto (the pure better one), in Zendic mythology, is the second of the heavenly Amshaspands.

Asp, MATTHIAS, a Swedish theologian and philologist, was born May 14, 1696. He studied at Lund and at Upsal, and was made master of arts in 1716. After having travelled in Holland, England, France, and Germany, he obtained, on his return to Upsal, the chair of Greek and Hebrew, which he exchanged in 1737 for that of theology. He died July 8, 1763. He wrote, Disputationes de Homero (Upsal, 1714):—De Ordine et Prærogativa Facultatum Mentis (1715):—De Templo Cathedrali Lincopiensi (1732):—De Usu Archæologiæ Romanæ in Sacris (1735):—De Suderkopia (1736). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aspeleklji, in Slavonic mythology, was one of the household goddesses who inhabited the dwellings of men. It was said that they dwelt in dark corners.

Asperges, THE, is a short service introductory to the mass in the Roman Catholic Church, consisting of portions of the fifty-first Psalm, certain versicles and responses, and a collect, during which the congregation is sprinkled with holy water by the priest-officiant.

Aspersorium. 1. The stone stoup or holy-water basin commonly found at the right-hand entrance of ancient churches, from which the faithful, taking holy water on entering, blessed themselves, making the sign of the cross. Many of these stoups, however, were destroyed, both by the Reformers and the Puritans. In the accounts of All-Souls' College, Oxford, in 1548, there is a charge pro lapidibus ad aspersorium in introitu ecclesie, the remains of which may still be seen. 2. The term is sometimes applied in Church inventories to the aspergillum, or holy-water brush. See ASPERGILLUM.

Aspertino, GUIDO, a Bolognese painter, was born about 1460; studied under Ercole di Ferrara, and became a distinguished historical painter. His chief work was The Crucifixion, in the cathedral at Bologna, in 1491. He died in the prime of life.

Aspertus (or Ansbertus), a German ecclesiastical writer, was born about 830. It is an error that he was surnamed Albert. He was archchancellor, first secretary, and guard of the seals of king Arnulf. In 891 he became bishop of Ratisbon. He is regarded as the author of a part of the Annales Fuldenses. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aspetti, TIZIANO, an Italian nobleman and sculptor, was born at Padua in 1565, and was the nephew of Titian. He studied under Jacopo Sansovino at Venice, and did excellent work there in marble and in bronze. There are a number of his works in the Church of Sant' Antonio at Padua.

Asphalius, a presbyter of Antioch and a zealous adherent of the heretic Aetius, was deputed by Eudoxius, after he had taken forcible possession of the see of Antioch, A.D. 358, to proceed to Constantinople and obtain the recognition of his episcopate from the emperor Constantius. Asphalius had obtained his object, and was just about to start for Antioch with the emperor's letters of authorization when the deputies from the Council of Ancyra arrived, and by their representations induced the weak Constantius to declare himself against the Anomœans and recall his letters. A document of a very different kind was substituted, denouncing the intrusion of Eudoxius, speaking of him in the most violent terms, and forbidding him to appear in the Christian assemblies (Sozomen, Hist. Eccles. 1314).

Aspilcueta, Juan (surnamed Navarro), a Spanish missionary, was born in the kingdom of Navarre. He was related to the family of Xavier and of Loyola, and entered the Order of Jesuits in 1544. He went to Brazil in company with Nobrega in 1549, and surpassed all the other missionaries in the art of subduing the Indians. He was the first to gain a correct use of their language and preach in their forests. He also made important discoveries in the geography of Brazil, and was placed at the head of an exploring party. This expedition is one of the most important of the 16th century. He died at Bahia in 1555. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aspilcueta, Martin (styled the Doctor of Navarre), was born in that country, at Varasayn, Dec. 13, 1493. He studied in his youth among the Regular Canons of Roncesvalles; thence he proceeded to Alcalá, and lastly to France. When his education was finished, he returned to Spain and became first professor of canon law at Salamanca, but was induced afterwards to accept an office in the new university of Coimbra, Portugal, which John III had just founded. He returned subsequently to Spain, and at eighty years of age went to Rome to defend his friend, Bartholomew Caranza, archbishop of Toledo. At Rome he was received with the most unusual honors, and was held in the highest esteem by the popes Pius V, Gregory XIII, and Sixtus V. One author says that he was not only the oracle of Rome, but of the whole Christian world (Ja-mus N. Erythraeus). He said mass daily, lived frugally, and carefully observed all the ordinances of the Church. He died at Rome, June 21, 1586. His Life was written by Simon Magnus, canon of St. Peter's at Liege, and is inserted in his Manual. Hortinus also prefixed a Life of this eminent doctor to the edition of his works (Rome, 1590, by his nephew Michael). All the works of this writer relate to the moral or canon law; they were collected and printed (Rome, 1590; Lyons, 1597; Venice, 1602, 5 vols.; Cologne, 1615, 5 vols. in 2). The latter editions contain his Consilia, which is not found in the Roman edition. See Antonio, Bibl. Hisp. ii, 74 sq.

Aspinall, Robert, an English Congregational minister, was born at Darwen, Lancashire, Jan. 28, 1801. In early life he became a Christian, and united with the Church at Lower Chapel, Darwen. He directed his attention towards the ministry, and began to preach before he was sixteen years of age. He entered the academy at Idle in September, 1817, where he remained four years and a half. His first charge was at Grasington, a mining village in the mountains of Craven, and he was ordained in the summer of 1822. In May, 1825, he took the oversight of the Church at Bethel Chapel, Bury. In 1831 he received and accepted a call from the independent Church at Colne, where he removed in September. He devoted himself assiduously to the work here, preaching three times on Sunday, and during the week in the neighboring villages. He died Jan. 19, 1856. He was retiring in disposition, labored principally among his own people, and did much spiritual good. "His sermons—carefully prepared, rich in evangelical truth and scriptural illustration, practical in tendency and affectionate in spirit—could not fail to be instructive and edifying to the devout hearer." See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1857, p. 165, 166.

Aspinwall, Nathaniel W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Bradford, Vt., Jan. 26, 1801. He was converted at the age of twenty-one, and in 1823 entered the New England Conference. For forty-one years he did effective work in the New England, New Hampshire, and Vermont conferences. In 1863 he retired to Chicago, and there died, Nov. 17, 1873. Mr. Aspinwall possessed a deeply sympathetic nature, and was a good preacher and pastor. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 70.

Asplund, John, an early Baptist minister, was born in Sweden not far from the year 1750. About 1775 he visited England for the purpose of obtaining employment, and for a short time was a clerk in a mercantile house. Subsequently he entered the British navy, and came in an English man-of-war to America. While his ship was on the coast he deserted, and settled in North Carolina. In 1782 he united with Ballard's Bridge Church, Chowan Co., N. C. Subsequently he removed to Southampton, Va., where he was set apart to the work of the ministry. He returned to Europe in 1785, and visited England, Denmark, Finland, Lapland, and Germany. Returning to America, he spent much time travelling through the states for the purpose of collecting statistics concerning the Baptist denomination. The results of his labors he published in a small folio volume in 1791. In the prosecution of his work, he travelled about seven thousand miles in about eighteen months, chiefly on foot, and gathered up a vast fund of information. In order to enlarge his Register and to make it as perfect as possible, he again set forth on his extended tours, travelling this time ten thousand miles, and forming the acquaintance of seven hundred Baptist ministers. He published the second edition of his Register in 1794. In his quaint way he says, "Having been brought up with a view to carrying on merchandize, I have been accustomed to keeping accounts; and I now prefer accounts of souls with their faces set Zionward to those which only respect money or trade." His death occurred in Maryland, whither he had removed, and where he was drowned in 1807. See Lives of Virginia Baptist Ministers, p. 241-243. (J. C. S.)

Aspril, Joseph, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born near Delaware City, Del., Nov. 12, 1817. He embraced religion in his fifteenth year; received license to preach in 1837, and in 1840 united with the Philadelphia Conference, in which he labored zealously until his death, May 28, 1876. Mr. Aspril was an exemplary Christian, a clear expounder of the Word of God, a devoted husband and father, and a pure and true friend. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1877, p. 32.

Asrael is an angel to whom the Mohammedans believe the souls of the dead are intrusted.

Asrar is a name for the mysteries of the Koran, which, according to some of the Mohammedan doctors, are so profound that those who have obtained a knowledge of them are unable to explain them to others, either by tongue or pen.

Ass. We give the following additional particulars on this animal:

I. This is the rendering in the A. V. of several Hebrew and Greek words.

1. Chamôr (חֲמוֹר) from the reddish color; Sept. ὄνος, ὑποζύγιον, γομάρι in 1 Sam. xvi, 20; Vulg. asinus; A. V. "ass," "he-ass") denotes the male domestic ass, though the word was no doubt used in a general sense to express any ass, whether male or female. The ass is frequently mentioned in the Bible; it was used (a) for carrying burdens (1 Sam. xxv, 18; Gen. xlii, 26; xlv, 23; 2 Sam. xvi, 1, 20; 1 Chron. xii, 40; Neh. xiii, 15); (b) for riding (Gen. xxii, 3, etc.); (c) for ploughing (Deut. xxii, 10; Isa. xxxiii, 20); (d) for grinding at the mill (Matt. xviii, 6; Luke xvii, 2); (e) for war baggage (2 Kings vii, 7, 10); (f) for breeding mules (Gen. xxxvi, 24; 1 Kings iv, 28; Esth. viii, 10, etc.).

Although the flesh of the wild ass was deemed a luxury among the Persians and Tartars, yet it does not appear that any of the nations of Canaan used the ass for food. The Mosaic law considered it unclean, as "not dividing the hoof and chewing the cud." In extreme cases, however, as in the great famine of Samaria, when "an ass's head was sold for eighty pieces of silver" (2 Kings vi, 25), the flesh of the ass was eaten. Many commentators on this passage, following the Sept., have understood a measure (a chomer of bread).

by the Hebrew word. Dr. Harris says, "no kind of extremity could compel the Jews to eat any part of this animal for food;" but it must be remembered that in cases of extreme need parents ate their own offspring (ver. 29; Ezek. v. 10). This argument, therefore, falls to the ground; nor is there sufficient reason for abandoning the common acceptance of these passages (1 Sam. xvi, 20; xxv, 18), and for understanding a measure and not the animal. For an example to illustrate 2 Kings loc. cit., comp. Plutarch, Artax. i, 1023, "An ass's head could hardly be bought for sixty drachms." The Talmudists say the flesh of the ass causes avarice in those who eat it; but it cures the avaricious of the complaint (Lewysohn, Zool. des Talm. § 165).

The Jews were devoted of worshipping the head of an ass. Josephus (Contr. Apion. ii, 7) very indignantly blames Apion for having the impudence to pretend that the Jews placed an ass's head of gold in their holy place, which the grammarian asserted Antiochus Epiphanes discovered when he spoiled the Temple. Plutarch (Sympos. iv, 5) and Tacitus (Hist. v, 3, 4) seem to have believed in this slander. It would be out of place here to enter further into this question, as it has no scriptural bearing; but the reader may find much curious matter relating to this subject in Bochart (Hieroz. iii, 199 sq.). See ASS-WORSHIP.

2. Athón (אַתּוֹן, of uncertain etymology; Sept. ἡ ὄνος, ὄνος, ὄνος θηλεία ἡμίονος, ὄνος θηλεία νομός; Vulg. asina, asinus; A. V. "ass," "she-ass"). There can be no doubt that this name represents the common domestic she-ass, nor do we think there are any grounds for believing that athón indicates some particular valuable breed which judges and great men only possessed, as Dr. Kitto (Phys. Hist. Pal. p. 383) and Dr. Harris (Nat. Hist. of the Bible, art. "Ass") have supposed. Athón in Gen. xii, 16; xiv, 23, is clearly contrasted with chamôr. Balaam rode on a she-ass (athón). The asses of Kish which Saul sought were she-asses. The Shunammite (2 Kings iv, 22, 24) rode on one when she went to seek Elisha. They were she-asses which formed the especial care of one of David's officers (1 Chron. xxvii, 30). On the other hand, Abraham (Gen. xxii, 3, etc.), Achsah (Josh. xv, 18), Abigail (1 Sam. xxv, 20), and the disobedient prophet (1 Kings xiii, 23) rode on a chamôr.

3. 'A'yîr (אֵייר, from its heat; Sept. πῶλος, πῶλος νίος, ὄνος, βοῖς [in Isa. xxx, 24]; Vulg. pullus asinae, pullus onagri, jumentum, pullus asini; A. V. "foal," "ass colt," "young ass," "colt"), the name of a young ass, which occurs Gen. xlix, 11; xxxii, 16; Judg. x, 4; xii, 14; Job xi, 12; Isa. xxx, 6, 24; Zech. ix, 9. In the passages of the books of Judges and Zechariah the 'ayîr is spoken of as being old enough for riding upon; in Isa. xxx, 6 for carrying burdens, and in ver. 24 for tilling the ground. Perhaps the word 'ayîr is intended to denote an ass rather older than the age we now understand by the term foal or colt; the derivation "to be spirited" or "impetuous" would then be peculiarly appropriate.

4. Père (פֶּרֶה; Sept. ὄνος ἄγριος, ὄνος ἐν ἀγρῷ, ὄναγρος, ὄνος ἰσημιτης, ἄγριοκος ἀνθρωπος; Vulg. ferus homo; A. V. "wild man," in Gen. xvi, 12; elsewhere onager, "wild ass"), the name of a species of wild ass mentioned in Gen. xvi, 12; Job vi, 5; xi, 12; xxiv, 5; xxxix, 5; Psa. civ, 11; Isa. xxxii, 14; Jer. ii, 24; Hos. viii, 9. In Gen. xvi, 12, Père Adám, a "wild-ass man," is applied to Ishmael and his descendants, a character that is well suited to the Arabs at this day. Hosea (viii, 9) compares Israel to a wild ass of the desert; and Job (xxxix, 5) gives an animated description of this animal, and one which is amply confirmed by both ancient and modern writers.

5. 'Arôd (אֲרֹד, perhaps from its flight; omitted by the Sept. and Vulg., which versions probably supposed

'arôd and père to be synonymous; A. V. "wild ass"). The Hebrew word occurs only in Job xxxix, 5: "Who hath sent out the père free, or who hath loosed the band of the 'arôd?" The Chaldee plural 'aradayâh (אַרְדַּיָּא) occurs in Dan. v, 21; Nebuchadnezzar's "dwelling was with the wild asses." Bochart (Hieroz. ii, 218), Rosenmüller (Schol. in V. T. loc. cit.), Lee (Comment. on Job, loc. cit.), and Gesenius (Thesaur. s. v.) suppose 'arôd and père to be identical in meaning. The last-named writer says that père is the Hebrew and 'arôd the Aramæan; but it is not improbable that the two names stand for different animals.

II. The subject which relates to the different animals known as wild asses has recently received very valuable elucidation from Mr. Blythe, in a paper contributed to the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, 1859, a reprint of which appears in the October number of The Annals and Magazine of Natural History, 1860. This writer enumerates seven species of the division Asinus. In all probability the species known to the ancient Jews are Asinus hemippus, which inhabits the deserts of Syria, Mesopotamia, and the northern parts of Arabia; and

Asinus vulgaris of North-east Africa, the true onager or aboriginal wild ass, whence the domesticated breed is sprung; probably, also, the Asinus onager, the koulán, or ghorkhur, which is found in Western Asia from 48° north latitude southward to Persia, Beluchistan, and Western India, was not unknown to the ancient Hebrews, though in all probability they confounded these species. The Asinus hemionus, or jiggetai, which was separated from Asinus hemippus (with which it had long been confounded) by Is. Saint-Hilaire could hardly have been known to the Jews, as this animal, which is, perhaps, only a variety of Asinus onager, inhabits Thibet, Mongolia, and Southern Siberia—countries with which the Jews were not familiar. We may therefore safely conclude that the Athón and Père of the sacred writings stand for the different species now discriminated under the names of Asinus hemippus, the Assyrian wild ass; Asinus vulgaris, the true onager; and, perhaps, Asinus onager, the koulan, or ghorkhur, of Persia and Western India. See WILD ASS.

Wild Ass. (On monuments of Persepolis.)

Ass-worship was attributed to the Jews by the Gentiles, according to Josephus and Tacitus, and afterwards to the Christians, owing to the mention of the animal in the history of Balaam, the victory of Samson, the stable of Bethlehem, the flight into Egypt, and the entry on Palm-Sunday into Jerusalem. At Beauvais, on Jan. 14, the Feast of the Ass was observed yearly. An ass bearing the image of the Madonna was led in procession to St. Stephen's Church, where an absurd prose was sung, with the refrain "Hez, Sire Assne," during the mass. At Chalons-sur-Marne the bishop of fools rode mounted on an ass. At Autun the principal canons held the four corners of the golden housings of the ass; and at Cambay a picture of the ass was placed behind the high-altar from Palm-Sunday to Maundy-Thursday. Naogorgus says that on Palm-Sunday a wooden ass with a rider was drawn upon wheels through the streets to the church door, where the priest blessed the palms as talismans against storm and lightning, and then lay down before it and was beaten with a rod by another priest. Two "lubberers" then alluded to the entry of our Lord into Jerusalem, and the ass, smothered with branches, was drawn into the church. In some places the ass was hired out and led through a town, while boys collected bread, eggs, and money, half of which was given to the hirer. See ASINARI; ONOLATRY.

Assaf, an idol of the Koreishite Arabians. Every tribe and every family, as well as that of Koreish, had a particular idol, which they worshipped.

Assarotti, OTTAVIO GIOVANNI BATTISTA, an Italian philanthropist, founder of the Institution of the Deaf-mutes at Genoa, was born at Genoa, Oct. 25, 1753. At the age of eighteen he entered the Order of the Piarists in Italy, and devoted himself to the teaching of poor children. He himself wrote all the works necessary for the instruction of his pupils. He died Jan. 29, 1829. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Asse, Rabbi, the colleague of rabbi Ame (q. v.), was a teacher of the 4th century. The coming of the Messiah he placed at the end of the world. "The Son of David will not come until all souls have left their bodies" (Yebamoth, p. 62). His method of instruction was especially praised, because he always adhered to his subject and laid down the general principle: "When I lecture on one treatise, do not ask me concerning another" (Jerus. Sabbath, xix, 1). One of his maxims was, "He that exalts himself shall be lowered" (Sota, fol. 5). See Hamburger, Real-Encyklop. ii, 76 sq. (B. P.)

Asseline, JEAN RENÉ, a learned French prelate, was born in Paris in 1742. He was the son of a domestic of the house of the duke of Orleans, who bore the expense of his education. He studied at Paris at the College of Navarre, and became professor of Hebrew at the Sorbonne. Appointed bishop of Bologna in 1790, he showed himself opposed to the principles of the Revolution. By his eloquence he converted the celebrated count of Stolberg to Catholicism. In 1798 he edited the Instruction Pastorale sur l'Autorité Spirituelle de l'Eglise, which was approved by four bishops of France. At the death of abbot Edgeworth, Asseline succeeded him as confessor of Louis XVIII, whom he accompanied in his retreat to Hartwell in 1808. He died April 10, 1813. He wrote, Considérations sur le Mystère de la Croix (Lyons, 1806):—Exposition Abrégée du Symbole des Apôtres (Paris, 1806):—Œuvres Choies (ibid. 1823). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Assen, JOHN WALTHER VAN, a Dutch wood-engraver, was born in Holland about the year 1490. Little is known of him. The following are some of his principal prints: Our Saviour Praying in the Garden, three of the disciples sleeping below, and in the distance Jews, conducted by Judas, entering the garden:—Jesus, Betrayed by Judas, Seized:—Peter Cutting Off the Ear of Malchus:—The Scourging of Christ:—Christ Bearing his Cross:—The Entombing of Christ.

Assessors is the name given by Egyptologists to forty-two judges, who, each in the Hall of Judgment, interrogate the soul of the deceased respecting different crimes which he may have committed, from which crimes he is able to absolve himself by repeating the so-called negative confession of ch. xxv of the Ritual of the Dead. The deceased is then, in turn, declared by the assessors to be justified; and after undergoing various transformations he passes into the highest heaven of the spiritual world.

Assheton, WILLIAM, an English clergyman, was born at Middleton, Lancashire, in 1641, and educated at Brasenose College, Oxford. He took orders, and published at Oxford, in 1670, A Treatise against Toleration, which reached a second edition in the following year. Four years after appeared his work Of Scandal and of Persecution, which obtained for him the living of Beckenham, in Kent, in 1676. At this period he was a warm advocate of the divine right of kings, and published the Royal Apology, in favor of king James II, in which he upheld the scriptural doctrine of obedience to the kingly authority (Lond. 1685). But in the course of three years his opinions changed, and he put himself forward as the champion of the prince of Orange and his wife, in a work called An Apology for the Reigning Sovereigns (ibid. 1688). He also wrote many works against the Dissenters, especially the Anabaptists and Socinians. In 1701 he published the first part of his Explication of the Church Catechism; and in the year following, Directions for Prayer, as well as A Project for Establishing in each Diocese a Fund for the Relief of Poor Clergymen. In 1703 he published his Defence of the Immortality of the Soul; and in 1706 his chief devotional work —viz. A Praxis of Devotion for the Sick and Dying. He also gave to the public, in that year, A Treatise on the Possibility of Apparitions; and subsequently, A Collection of Prayers for all Occasions, taken from Taylor, Cosin, Ken, and others; and a Defence of the Clergy, in reply to a work entitled The Rights of the Christian Church. The above are but a few of the many writings which he left. He died at Beckenham, Sept. 17, 1711. See Wood, Athen. Oxoniæ.

Assignies, JEAN D', a French monk of Cîteaux, and a Brabantine theologian, was born in 1562. He became subprior of the Monastery of Cambron; then, in 1618, priest of the Monastery of Nizelle, in Brabant. He died in 1642. He wrote, Vies des Personnes Illustres en Saincteté de l'Ordre de Cîteaux (Douay and Mons, 1598, 1606):—Allumettes Vives pour embrazer l'Âme à la Haine du Pêché et à l'Amour de la Vertu, par la Considération de la Passion de Jésus-Christ (Douay, 1629). He also wrote several other works. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Assiri (אסיירי), a city of Manasseh, mentioned in the Talmud (Tosephtah Mikva'oth, iv), and, according to rabbi Schwarz (Palest. p. 160), identical with Azirah, a village five miles (one hour) north of Nablûs (Van de Velde, Memoir, p. 291), meaning, probably, the Asiret el-Hatab laid down on the Ordnance Map two miles north of Nablûs.

Assomption, Charles de l', a Flemish theologian of the Order of Carmelites, was born in 1625. He was son of the count of Brias, governor of Marienburg, and became professor of theology, then prior, then pro-

Charles de l'Assomption:—l'indictum Postulatio a Jesu Christo, Peccatorum Omnium Pœnitentium et Impœnitentium Redemptore adversus Rigoristas Homines a Sacro Confessionis Tribunali Retrahentes (Liege); in French under this title: Défense de la Pratique Commune de l'Eglise présentée au Roi, contre la Nouveauté des Rigoristes sur le Sacrement de Pénitence (Cambray, 1684). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Assomption, Juste de l' (called also Alexander Roger), a French theologian, was born at Touraine in 1612, and died Oct. 8, 1679. Among other works, he wrote, Manus Communicantium, Piissimas Meditationes continens, per Modum Colloquii Melliflui Christum inter et Animam, Nomine Discipuli ad Sacras Epulas se Præparantis (Douay, 1660):—Tractatus de Frequenti Confessione et Communione, adversus Neotericos:—Spiritualia decem Dierum Exercitia, transl. into French by father Pierre de la Mère de Dieu. Assoros, in Græco-Babylonian mythology, is the brother and husband of Kissare, and father of the first divine triad—Anos, Illinos, and Aos. His analogue was the Assur of the Assyrians, with his wife Serua.

Assos. The present condition of this town, although in ruins, fully illustrates the language of Luke in speaking of Paul's journey, being about half-way between Troas (q. v.) and Mitylene (q. v.), and therefore a convenient resting-place in the track of the coasting-trade (see Lewin, Life and Letters of St. Paul, ii, 83). Assumpção, JOZÉ DE, a Portuguese theologian, whose father was called Anthony of Sylva. He himself became prior of the Convent of Torres-Vedras. Versed in the ancient classics, he wrote Latin verse with great facility. He died in 1751. He wrote, Epigrammata Sacra Vitæ B. Andræ de Comitibus . . . Explanantia (Lisbon, 1731):—Hymnologia Sacra, em sex Partes dividida (ibid. 1737, 1744):—Funiculus Triplex; scilicet, Assumptio Mosis. The earliest notice of a work known as The Assumption of Moses (Ἀνάληψις Μωϋσέως) we receive through Origen (De Princip. iii, 2), who remarks that what is said in Jude (ver. 9) concerning a strife between the archangel Michael and Satan over the body of Moses is taken from it (he names it the "Ascension of Moses"). It is also referred to by other Church fathers and later writers (comp. Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigr. i, 839 sq.; Hilgenfeld, Nov. Test. i, 108-110; Fritzsche, Proleg. p. xxxiv sq., etc.). In modern times a large portion of this work was brought to light by Ceriani in a Latin translation belonging to the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and which he published in the first part of his Monumenta (1861). The MS. itself is without a title; but it is evident that it is a version of the original Greek, as may be seen from a passage found at the beginning (i, 14), which corresponds with an earlier citation. Since the appearance of Ceriani's publication, the composition has been republished by Hilgenfeld (Nov. Testam. extra Canonem, etc., 1866), Volkmar (Mose Prophetie und Himmelfahrt, 1867 [Lat. and Germ.]), Schmidt and Merx (Merx's Archiv, 1868, i, 111-152), and Fritzsche (Libri Apoc. Vet. Test. Græce, 1871). A retranslation into Greek was attempted by Hilgenfeld, in his Zeitschrift, 1868, and Messias Judæorum, 1869.

I. Contents of the Work.—The work seems to be a sort of historical and prophetic address of Moses to Joshua on the occasion of his succeeding him as leader of Israel. After a brief sketch of Jewish history, in which allusion is made to Herod the Great and his character, a graphic description of the end is given. The MS. ends abruptly in the twelfth chapter. But, from the whole tenor of the context, and as the fragments show, there is no doubt that the lost portion contained the account of the alleged strife over the body of Moses, which lent to the work the title Ἀνάληψις Μωϋσέως.

II. Age of the Composition.—According to Wieseler, it was written soon after the death of Herod, about the year B.C. 2. Ewald places it in A.D. 6; while Hilgenfeld makes the date A.D. 44-45, and Schmidt and Merx A.D. 50-64. Schürer rather prefers the date as given by Ewald or Wieseler.

III. Author of the Work.—From the attitude taken by the author towards the leading Jewish sects in ch. vii and x, some regarded him as a Pharisee, others as a Sadducee; but since he does not appear to coincide fully with either of these parties, Schürer agrees with Wieseler that the author belonged to the so-called Zealots.

IV. Place of Composition.—It is hardly doubtful that the book was written in Palestine; and, with this supposition, it was originally written in Hebrew or Aramaean. With certainty it cannot be asserted, although there is no doubt that the present Latin translation was made from the Greek.

For the literature, see Schürer, Handbuch der neutestamentlichen Zeitgeschichte, p. 536 sq. (B. P.)

Assunto, ONORIO DELL', an Italian monk of the Order of Carmelites, and theologian, was born in 1639. When he entered this order, he gave up the name Giulio Carlo Guidetti, and taught philosophy and theology in several Italian cities. He was admitted to all the degrees of the hierarchy, and became provost-general of the order. He died at Rome Jan 15, 1716. He wrote, among other works, L'Anima Divota in Spirito e Virtù verso il Bambino Iddio (Milan, 1677, 1680):—La Vita Ragionevole dell' Uomo fatto per Dio (ibid. 1678):—Breve Istruzione per Ispendere bene il Tempo della Presente Vita (Venice, 1683):—La Prudenza dello Spirito che conduce alla Vita Eterna (Rome, 1707). Assurance, THE, is a name for a test fixed by the Parliament in 1680, when it repealed the Act of Supremacy in Scotland and established Presbytery, by which all that should be elected to fill any vacancy that should happen in Parliament were obliged to declare before God that they believed William and Mary to be king and queen de jure as well as de facto, and engaged to defend their title as such. The same, together with the Oath of Allegiance, was required to be signed by all in any public trust or office, civil, military, or ecclesiastical.

Assurians (or Assuritans) were a Christian sect which sprang up in the middle of the 4th century, being an offshoot of the African Donatists. They held that the Son is inferior to the Father, and the Holy Ghost to the Son. See DONATISTS.

Assyria. The recent explorations in that country, especially those of Messrs. Smith and Rassam, have been so intimately connected with those relating to Babylonia that some of them will be more appropriately considered under that head; but in many respects both countries can conveniently be considered together. Indeed, the two powers were nearly coextensive as to territory, the one merely being the sequel of the other. The separate history of the Assyrian empire is, in fact, but that of Nineveh, its capital, in the treatment of which, in connection with that of the several kings mentioned in Scripture, especially Pul, Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, Sargon, and Sennacherib, details of special Biblical interest are given. We here gather up some additional particulars under general heads.

I. Origin.—The name Assyria itself primarily denoted the small territory immediately surrounding the primitive capital, "the city of Assur" (thought to be the Ellasar of Genesis), which was built, like the other chief cities of the country, by Turanian tribes, in whose language the word signified "water meadow." It stood, according to the latest Assyriologists, on the right bank of the Tigris, midway between the Greater and the Lesser Zab, being represented by the modern Kalah Sherghat. It appears to have remained the capital city long after the Assyrians had become the dominant power in Western Asia, but was finally supplanted by Calah (supposed by many to be the present Nimrūd), Nineveh (now Nebbi Yunus and Kuyunjik), and Dur-Sargina (now Khorsabad), some thirty miles farther north. See NINEVEH. The city of Babylon itself, however, was of earlier origin, and formed the centre of a province or monarchy at times more or less prominent, until it at length rose into imperial importance on the downfall of its rival Nineveh. See BABYLON.

II. The Assyrian Monarchy.—Under this head we present a historical abstract in the words of an acknowledged expert (Prof. Sayce, in the last ed. of the Encyclopædia Britannica, s. v. "Babylonia"), although we dissent from many of its synchronisms.

"We possess an almost continuous list of Assyrian kings; and, as from the beginning of the 9th century downwards there exists a native canon, in which each year is dated by the limmu, or archon, eponymos, whose name it bears, as well as a portion of a larger canon which records the chief events of each eponymy, it is evident that our chronology of the later period of Assyrian history is at once full and trustworthy. Similar chronological lists once existed for the earlier period also, since an inscription of a king of the 14th century B.C. is dated by one of these eponymies; and the precise dates given in the inscriptions for which occurrences took place in the reigns of older monarchs cannot otherwise be accounted for. How far back an accurate chronological record extended it is impossible to say; but astronomical observations were made in Babylonia from a remote period, and the era of Cudur-nakundi was known, as we have seen, more than 1600 years afterwards; while in Assyria not only can Sennacherib state at Bavian that Tiglath-pileser I was defeated by the Babylonians 418 years before his own invasion of that country, but the same Tiglath-pileser can fix 701 years as the exact interval between his restoration of the temple Anu and Rimmon at Kalah Sherghat and its foundation by the dependent viceroy of the city of Assur.

"This Tiglath-pileser, in spite of his subsequent defeat by the Babylonians, was one of the most eminent of the sovereigns of the first Assyrian empire. He carried his arms far and wide, subjugating the Moschians, Comagenians, Urumians, and other tribes of the north, the Syrians and Hittites in the west, and the Babylonians (including their capital) in the south. His empire, accordingly, stretched from the Mediterranean, on the one side, to the Caspian and the Persian Gulf, on the other; but, founded as it was on conquest, and centralized in the person of a single individual, it fell to pieces at the least touch. With the death of Tiglath-pileser, Assyria seems to have been reduced to comparative powerlessness; and when next its claims to empire are realized it is under Asur-natsir-pal, whose reign lasted from B.C. 883 to 858. The boundaries of his empire exceeded those of his predecessor; and the splendid palaces, temples, and other buildings raised by him, with their elaborate sculptures and rich painting, bear witness to a high development of wealth and art and luxury. Calah, which had been founded by Shalmaneser I some four or five centuries previously, but had fallen into decay, became his favorite residence, and was raised to the rank of a capital. His son Shalmaneser had a long reign of thirty-five years, during which he largely extended the empire he had received from his father. Armenia and the Parthians paid him tribute; and, under the pretext of restoring the legitimate monarch, he entered Babylon and reduced the country to a state of vassalage. It is at this time that we first hear of the Chaldei, or Chaldeans—carefully to be distinguished from the Casdim, or Shemitic, 'conquerors' of Scripture—who formed a small but independent principality on the sea-coast. In the west Shalmaneser succeeded in defeating, in B.C. 854, a dangerous confederacy, headed by Rimmon-Idri or Ben-Hadad of Damascus, and including Ahab of Israel and several Phœnician kings. Later on in his reign he again annihilated the forces of Hazael, Ben-Hadad's successor, and extorted tribute from the princes of Palestine, among others from Jehu of Samaria, whose servants are depicted on the black obelisk. The last few years, however, were troubled by the rebellion of his eldest son, which well-nigh proved fatal to the old king. Assur, Arbela, and other places joined the pretender, and the revolt was with difficulty put down by Shalmaneser's second son, Samas-Rimmon, who shortly after succeeded him. Samas-Rimmon (824-811) and Rimmon-Nirari (811-782) preserved the empire of Assyria undiminished; but their principal exploits were in Babylonia, which they wasted with fire and sword and converted into an Assyrian province.

"The first Assyrian empire came to an end in 744, when the old dynasty was overthrown by a usurper, Tiglath-pileser, after a struggle of three or four years. Once settled on the throne, however, Tiglath-pileser proceeded to restore and reorganize the empire. Babylonia was first attacked; the Assyrian monarch offered sacrifices and set up his court in its chief cities; and the multitudinous Arab tribes who encamped along the banks of the Euphrates were reduced to subjection.

"The Chaldei in the south alone held out, and to them belonged the first four kings given in Ptolemy's canon. Indeed, it may be said that from the invasion of Tiglath-pileser to the revolt of Nabopolassar Babylonia ceased to have any separate existence. It was governed by Assyrian kings, or the viceroys they appointed, and the only attempts to recover independence were made under the leadership of the Chaldean chiefs. It becomes nothing more than an important province of Assyria.

"The second Assyrian empire differed from the first in its greater consolidation. The conquered provinces were no longer loosely attached to the central power by the payment of tribute, and ready to refuse it as soon as the Assyrian armies were out of sight; they were changed into satrapies, each with its fixed taxes and military contingent. Assyrian viceroys were nominated wherever possible, and a turbulent population was deported to some distant locality. This will explain the condition in which Babylonia found itself, as well as the special attention which was paid to the countries on the Mediterranean coast. The possession of the barbarous and half-deserted districts on the east was of little profit; the inhabitants were hardy mountaineers, difficult to subdue and without wealth; and, although Tiglath-pileser penetrated into Sagarin, Ariana, and Aracosia, and even to the confines of India, the expedition was little more than a display of power. The rich and civilized regions of the west, on the contrary, offered attractions which the politicians of Nineveh were keen to discover. Tiglath-pileser overthrew the ancient kingdoms of Damascus and Hamath, with its nineteen districts, and, after receiving tribute from Menahem (which a false reading in the Old Test. ascribes to a non-existent Pul) in 740, placed his vassal Hoshea on the throne of Samaria in 730 in the room of Pekah. Hamath had been aided by Uzziah of Judah; and on the overthrow of the Syrian city, Judah had to become the tributary of Assyria. Tiglath-pileser seems to have met with a usurper's fate, and to have fallen in a struggle with another claimant of the throne, Shalmaneser. The chief event of Shalmaneser's reign (727-722) was the campaign against Samaria. The capture of that city, however, was reserved for his successor, Sargon, in 720, who succeeded in founding a new dynasty. Sargon's reign of seventeen years forms an era in later Assyrian history. At the very commencement of it he met and defeated the forces of Elam, and so, prepared the way for the future conquest of that once predominant monarchy. He came into conflict also with the kingdoms of Ararat and Van in the north; and the policy of the countries beyond the Zagros was henceforth influenced by the wishes of the Assyrian court. But it was in the west that the power of Nineveh was chiefly felt. Syria and Palestine were reduced to a condition of vassalage, Hamath was depopulated, and Egypt, then governed by Ethiopian princes, came first into collision with Assyria. The battle of Raphia in 719, in which the Egyptians and their Philistine allies were defeated, was an omen of the future, and from this time onward the destinies of civilized Asia were fought out between the two great powers of the ancient world. As the one rose the other fell; and just as the climax of Assyrian glory is marked by the complete subjugation of Egypt, so the revolt of Egypt was the first signal of the decline of Assyria. The struggle between the representative states of the East led, as was natural, to the appearance of the Greek upon the stage of history. Sargon claims the conquest of Cyprus as well as Phenicia, and his effigy, found at Idalion, remains to this day a witness of the fact. Babylonia, however, was the point of weakness in the empire. It was too like, and yet too unlike, Assyria to be otherwise than a dangerous dependency; and its inhabitants could never forget that they had once been the dominant nation. New blood had been infused into them by the arrival of the Chaldei, whose leader, Merodach-baladan, the son of Yacin, called Mardokempados in Ptolemy's canon, had taken advantage of the troubles which closed the life of Tiglath-pileser to possess himself of Babylonia; and for twelve years he continued master of the country, until, in 710, Sargon drove him from the province and crowned himself king of Babylon. Merodach-baladan had foreseen the attack, and endeavored to meet it by forming alliances with Egypt and the principalities of Palestine. The confederacy, however, was broken up in a single campaign by the Assyrian monarch; Judæa was overrun and Ashdod razed to the ground. Sargon, who now styled himself king of Assyria and Babylon, of Sumir and Accad, like Tiglath-pileser before him, spent the latter part of his reign in internal reforms and extensive building. A new town called after his name was founded to the north of Nineveh (at the modern Kuyunjik), and a magnificent palace erected there. The library of Calah was restored and enlarged, in imitation of his semi-mythical namesake of Agane, whose astrological works were re-edited, while special attention was given to legislation. In the midst of these labors Sargon was murdered, and his son Sennacherib ascended the throne on the 12th of Ab, B.C.

705. Sennacherib is a typical representative of the great warriors and builders of the second Assyrian empire, and is familiar to the readers of the Old Test. from his invasion of Judah, which the native monuments assign to the year 701. The check he received at Eltakhel, where he was met by the forces of Egypt and Ethiopia, saved the Jewish king; not, however, before his towns had been ravaged, a heavy tribute laid upon the capital, and his allies in Ascalon and Ekron severely punished. At the commencement of this campaign, Sennacherib had reduced Tyre and Sidon, and the overthrow of these centres of commerce caused a transfer of trade to Carchemish. Babylonia had shaken off the yoke of Assyria at the death of Sargon under Merodach-baladan, who had escaped from his captivity at Nineveh, but was soon reduced to obedience again and placed under the government of the Assyrian viceroy, Belibus. In 700, however, the year after the Judean war, Babylon rebelled once more under the indomitable Merodach-baladan and Sazub, another Chaldean. Sennacherib was occupied with a naval war—the first ever engaged in by the Assyrians—against a body of Chaldeans who had taken up refuge in Susiana, and the revolt in his rear was stirred up by the Susianian king. But the insurgents were totally defeated; Assur-nadin-sum, Sennacherib's eldest son, was appointed viceroy of the southern kingdom; and the Assyrian monarch felt himself strong enough to carry the war into the heart of Elam, wasting the country with fire and sword. A last attempt made by the Susianians and the Chaldeans of Babylonia to oppose the power of Assyria was shattered in the hardly contested battle of Khaluli. The interregnum, however, which marks the last eight years of Sennacherib's rule in Ptolemy's canon shows that Chaldæa still continued to give trouble and resist the Assyrian yoke.

“Meanwhile, Sennacherib had been constructing canals and aqueducts, embanking the Tigris, and building himself a palace at Nineveh on a grander scale than had ever been attempted before. His works were interrupted by his murder, in 681, by his two sons, who, however, soon found themselves confronted by the veteran army of Esar-haddon, their father's younger and favorite son. Esar-haddon had been engaged in Armenia; but in January, 680, he defeated them at Khanirabbat and was proclaimed king. Soon afterwards he established his court at Babylon, where he governed in person during the whole of his reign. After settling the affairs of Chaldæa, his first campaign was directed against Syria, where Sidon was destroyed and its inhabitants removed to Assyria, an event which exercised a profound influence upon Asiatic trade. The most remarkable expedition of his reign was into the heart of Arabia to the kingdoms of Huz and Buz, 980 miles distant from Nineveh, 280 miles of the march being through arid desert. The Assyrian army accomplished a feat never since exceeded. In the north, also, it penetrated equally far, subjugating the tribes of the Caucasus, receiving the submission of Telsapes the Cimmerian, and taking possession of the copper-mines on the most remote frontiers of Media. All this part of the country was now in the hands of Aryan settlers, and each small town had its independent chief, like the states of Greece. In fact, on two sides, on both north and west, the Assyrian empire was in contact with an Aryan population, and among the twenty-two kings who sent materials for Esar-haddon's palace at Nineveh were Cyprian princes with Greek names. But the most important work of Esar-haddon's reign was the conquest of Egypt, which left the ancient world under the rule of a single power for some twenty years, and, by fusing the nations of Western Asia together, broke down their differences, spread an equalized civilization, and first struck out the idea of universal empire. In B.C. 672 the land of the Pharaohs was invaded, Tirlinakah, the Ethiopian, driven beyond its borders, and the country divided into twenty governments. Vain efforts to shake off the Assyrian supremacy were made from time to time; but, just as Babylon had to look to the foreign Chaldei for the championship of its independence, so Egypt found its leaders in Ethiopian princes. In 669 Esar-haddon fell ill, and on the 12th day of Iyyar in the following year he associated his son, Assur-bani-pal, with him in the kingdom. On his death at Babylon in 667, Assur-bani-pal was left sole king. One of his first acts was to appoint his brother Savul-sum-yucin (Saunngghes) governor of Babylonia.

“Assur-bani-pal, the Sardanapalus of the Greeks, was the ‘grand monarch’ of ancient Assyria. The empire on his accession was at the height of its glory and magnitude; the treasures and products of the world flowed into Nineveh, and its name was feared from the frontiers of India to the shores of the Ægean. Constant wars asserted the superiority of the Assyrian troops, though they drained the empire of money and men; and the luxury which had come in like a flood was sapping the foundations of the national strength. Assur-bani-pal, in spite of his victories, his buildings, and his patronage of literature, left a diminished inheritance to his son; and the military expeditions formerly conducted by the king in person were now intrusted to his generals. His first work was to check the southward advance of the Cimmerians, who were thus driven upon Asia Minor, and to quell a revolt which had broken out in Egypt. Two campaigns were requisite to effect this, and meanwhile Gyges of Lydia had sent tribute to the formidable Assyrian monarch. War had also broken out with Elam, which ended, after a long and hard struggle, with the complete conquest of the country. It was divided into two states, each ruled by Assyrian vassals. But soon after this (in 652) the first blow was struck which eventually led to the downfall of the empire. A general insurrection then suddenly took place, headed by Assur-bani-pal's own brother, the viceroy of Babylonia. Elam, Arabia, Egypt, and Palestine made common cause against the oppressor. Egypt alone, however, under the guidance of Psammetichus, and with the help of Gyges, succeeded in recovering her independence; the wandering tribes of Northern Arabia—Kedar, Zobah, Nabathæa, etc.—were chastised, and summary vengeance taken on Babylonia and Elam. Babylon and Cuthah were reduced by famine (649), Saunngghes was captured and burned to death, and fire and sword were carried through Elam. After a protracted war, in which Assur-bani-pal was aided by internal dissensions, Shushan was plundered and razed, and the whole of Susiana reduced to a wilderness. This happened in 645. Assur-bani-pal's buildings were unrivalled for size and grandeur. Assyrian culture reached its culminating point in his reign, and his palaces glittered with the precious metals and were adorned with the richest sculpture. The library which he formed at Nineveh far surpassed any that had ever existed before; literary works were collected from all sides; the study of the dead language of Accad was encouraged, grammars and dictionaries were compiled, and learned men of all nations were attracted to the court. Patron of the arts as he was, Assur-bani-pal's character was stained by cruelty and sensuality. Under his second name of Sin-inadina-pal, he appears as king of Babylon in Ptolemy's list; and the complete amalgamation of Assyria and Babylonia in the later years of his rule is shown by the appearance of a præfect of Babylon among the Assyrian eponyms. He was succeeded in 625 by his son Assur-ebil-ilili. His death was the signal for a general revolt. Nabopolassar, the viceroy of Babylonia, made himself independent; and Assyria, shorn of its empire, was left to struggle for bare existence, until, under Saracus, its last monarch, Nineveh was taken and burned by the Babylonians and Medes.”

III. Government and Military Operations.—Both the Assyrians and the Babylonians evidently were ruled by an absolute despotism lodged in the hands of a hereditary autocrat, subject to all the caprices and fluctuations of Oriental custom. Revolutions, insurrections, and arbitrary depositions were the natural and frequent consequence. Sargon was evidently a usurper of obscure parentage, and Sennacherib was removed by assassination. In these respects these nations resembled their neighbors or successors the Persians. The king was surrounded by guards and attended by a pompous retinue. His harem was filled with the captives or hostages of conquered royalty. In the kindred passion for hunting, he was a veritable successor of the famous Nimrod.

War was the great occupation of the nation, and battle the favorite theme of the artist. Invasion, rapine, butchery, and enslavement or transportation were the constant policy towards other nations, until they were reduced to vassalage, and a continued system of tribute was relentlessly exacted. Defection was regarded as treason, and a revolted viceroy was flayed alive. The army was thoroughly equipped and trained, both horse (chiefly chariots) and foot; and military engines were in habitual use. Of the field manoeuvres of the troops we have little knowledge, but the siege operations are frequently depicted on the monuments; and of the courage and endurance of the soldiers in engagements we have abundant proof. See each of these topics in its alphabetical place.

IV. Civil and Mercantile Regulations.—Legal transactions are frequently referred to in the records lately exhumed by Mr. Smith from the ruins of Mesopotamia, which show a high degree of advancement in social order. In the family relation, as in the East generally, the mother occupies a ruling influence, and the wife a subordinate position. Wills were made, and contracts were respected. Slaves were common, but were under legal protection. The rate of interest was limited, and debts were secured as well as titles to real estate. Money was coined, and leases executed. The trade of Assyria was chiefly with adjoining or subject provinces, and yet became quite considerable from her position as an entrepôt; but the commerce of Babylon was proverbially extensive and lucrative. Both nations imported as well as exported; and the shipping upon the Tigris and Euphrates must have been enormous. See COMMERCE.

V. Arts and Sciences.—These included both useful and ornamental branches. Architecture was highly developed; but, from the nature of the two regions, the buildings of the Babylonians were of brick and painted panels, on artificial platforms, and carried up to an imposing height with terraced stories, while those of the Assyrians were of stone (at least for facing), especially the soft alabaster of the adjoining mountains, carved with elaborate figures, and usually of two stories only. See ARCHITECTURE. For similar reasons imposing tombs were common among the Assyrians, while the Babylonians chiefly buried the dead in terra-cotta caskets. See BURIAL. The progress of luxury is easily traced in both nations, in the effeminacy of personal ornaments, in the later period. The massive limbs of kings, soldiers, and even private persons are seen on the monuments loaded with jewelry, decked with embroidery; and the hair is always elaborately curled, even to the beard. See ORNAMENT. Sculpture and painting were highly cultivated; but there is a total lack of perspective in the productions of both. Intaglio was the favorite method of engraving, and bass-relief in carving. Music was pursued, as the instruments depicted on the monuments show; but under what system remains unknown. The decorative arts were proportionally well developed. Pottery was of an elegant form, and glass was known. Among the metals, gold and copper were highly wrought, but iron appears to have been scarce.

Astronomy was the chief science, and for this Babylon became famous. Observatories were erected in Ur, and the Tower of Belus probably had some such use. The stars were designated, and a calendar was adopted, with an intercalation as often as required. The year, however, was the vague or defective one. Eclipses were calculated, cycles were in use, and the night was divided into watches. The lunar changes were noted, and some traces of meteorological observations are found. Arithmetic was systematized, the unit being 60, and squares and cubes were calculated. The sundial, the clepsydra, the lever, and the pulley were known; and the minuteness of some of the cuneiform inscriptions argues the use of the lens.

VI. Language and Literature.—The speech of the original inhabitants of the Mesopotamian valley is a question of great difficulty and dispute, as is, indeed, their ethnological relation. The extant records, however, are all in the cuneatic character, which, so far as the region in question is concerned, may conveniently be divided into two branches—the Assyrian and the Babylonian dialects—the latter being characterized by a preference for the softer forms and a fuller use of the vowels. Both belong to the Shemitic class of languages, and thus are strongly akin to the Hebrew and the Arabic. With the aid of the texts, grammars, and lexicons now readily accessible, scholars have no difficulty in mastering the elements of the written language of either nation, and in satisfactorily determining the meaning of the literature remaining. (Classes are regularly formed in London for instructing beginners in cuneatic philology.) Much of this has been translated into European languages, and convenient abstracts may be found in Baxter's series of little volumes entitled Records of the Past, and in the Transactions of the (Lond.) Society of Biblical Archaeology. More elaborate works, giving the original texts, have been published by the learned Assyriologists Rawlinson, Oppert, Lenormant, Menaut, Schrader, and others. See Sayce, Assyrian Grammar (Lond. 1872), p. 18 sq.

The literature of Assyria and Babylonia, so far as hitherto discovered, is almost entirely buried in the mounds of those ruined cities of that region, and consists of arrow-headed inscriptions on clay tablets, sculptured walls and figures, or engraved gems and cylinders. The late Mr. George Smith succeeded in disinterring and bringing home to England a vast store of the terra-cotta inscriptions, which have added immensely to our knowledge of the literature of those lost empires. Among them we may especially mention the records of the early traditions of the nations, on the Fall and the Deluge, which so remarkably illustrate the scriptural narratives; and the remains of what that explorer regarded as the library of Sargon at Nineveh. Manuscripts on papyrus or other materials of a frail character, if they existed among these people, have utterly perished. The works thus far recovered, besides the sculptured inscriptions (which chiefly relate to regal annals), are largely religious, consisting of hymns and mythological poems. Two whole epics have been restored from pieces of different copies—one on the Deluge, and the other on the descent of Ishtar into Hades; while the fragment of a third describes the war of the seven spirits against the moon. See the recent volumes of Mr. Smith and the other works above cited. Other treatises exhumed contain fables, and a few exhibit legal documents and chronological treatises of later date and little interest. See Sayce, Babylonian Literature (Lond. 1878).

VII. Religious Beliefs.—The basis of these appears to have been a polytheistic conception of dæmoniacal powers residing in natural objects; and this led to superstitious practices for the purpose of appeasing the supposed spirits. Prominent among these supernatural influences was a sort of triad, consisting of Na or Anna (the sky), Ea (the earth), and Mulge (the underworld). This reveals an astronomical element, which was eventually developed into urology under various new deities allied to the other Oriental forms of idolatry. Thus in Babylon especially, where the mythology was more elaborately refined, Bel as the sun-god was the principal deity; and his female counterpart (under whatever title) was associated with him in power. Subordinate deities innumerable crowd the Pantheon. From the distinction of sex thus introduced, naturally sprang a licentious worship, notices of which abound in all ancient authorities, and traces of which clearly appear in the legend of Ishtar (the Assyrian Venus) above mentioned. The whole system, at length, was characterized by the grossest features of sensuous image-worship. At the same time, the superstitious fears of the ignorant devotees were wrought upon by the sprites and goblins of the nature-deification, and sorcery and magic were the ruling arts of professional experts. See DIVINATION.

Asta, ANDREA DELL', a Neapolitan painter, was born in 1673, and studied in the school of Solimena. He afterwards went to Rome, and introduced something of an imitation of Raphael into the Neapolitan style. He died at Naples in 1721. His works, especially the Nativity and the Adoration of the Magi, in the Church of Sant' Agostino, were greatly admired.

Astathians were heretics of the 9th century who followed a certain Sergius. He renewed the Manichæan errors, and the emperor Michael Curopalates enacted very severe laws against these sectarians. See BARONIUS, Annales, A.D. 813.

Aste, FRANCESCO MARIA DELL', an Italian prelate, archbishop of Otranto, was born Aug. 23, 1654, at Naples, and died at Otranto in 1719. His principal works are, Prima Diocesana Synodus Sancta Tusculanæ Ecclesiæ, a Card. Vincentio Maria Thesino celebrata, An. 1703 (Rome, 1704):—Metodo della Santa Visita Apostolica (Otranto, 1706):—Martyrologium Romanum, Disceptiones Literales, Topographice, etc.; adjectis Martyrologiis Ordinum S. Benedicti, Dominici, Francisci, Augustini, Carmeli, etc. (Benevento, 1716). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Asten is a name of the ibis-headed deity Thoth, by which he was venerated in the Temple of Denderah.

Aster (or Asterisk) is an instrument used by the Greeks in the liturgy—resembling a star of precious metal, surmounted by a cross, which is placed on the paten to cover the host, and support a veil from contact with the eucharist. It recalls the mystic star of the magi, which is commemorated as the priest censes the aster. In modern times the arches are riveted together at the point of intersection, but so loosely as to admit of one arch being turned within the other for convenience of carriage. See Neale, Eastern Church, Introd. p. 350; Daniel, Codex Liturgicus, iv, 336, 390.

Asterisk.

Asterius (1) (or Asturius), Sr., was a Roman senator who undertook the care of burying St. Marinus, martyred at Cæsarea, in Palestine, in 261 or 262. The Latins honor St. Asterius on March 3 as a martyr, together with Marinus; but Eusebius says nothing of this story, which appears to depend upon Rufinus (Hist. vii, 13). The Greeks also honor him as a martyr, separately, Aug. 7. See Ruinart, Acta Sincera, p. 264.

Asterius (2) was the teacher of Acacius, bishop of Beroëa, whom he accompanied in 372 to Edessa, to summon thence the famous solitary St. Julian Sabbas, whose pupil he had been, to support the orthodox faith at Antioch during the persecution of the Catholics by Valens (Theodoret, Vel. Patr. p. 380).

Asterius (3) (Comes Orientis), in 398, carried out with prudence and tact the orders of the emperor Arcadius for the secret removal of Chrysostom from Antioch when elected to the see of Constantinople (Pallad. 43). See CHRYSOSTOM.

Asterius (4) was a presbyter belonging to the Arian party at Antioch without a head. By compelling Dorotheus to leave his see, Asterius took the lead, in conjunction with some neighboring bishops, in an application to the Eunomians to be received into communion with them. This negotiation broke down in consequence of the demands of the Eunomians that the condemnation of Ætius should be recalled and all abuses reformed (Philostorgius, Eccles. Hist. x, 1).

Asterius, Turcius Rufus, was a patrician who, in 494, enjoyed the consular dignity together with Flavius Præsidius. He is plainly different from Flavius Asturius, who was consul in 449, although sometimes confounded with him. When out of office he edited some poems of Sedulius, and among them a Collection of the Old and New Testaments, in elegiac verse, which has sometimes appeared under the name of Asterius himself, as in the Bibl. Patr. ix, 464, and which some writers maintain to be the actual work of Asterius. See Cave, Hist. Lit. i, 464.

Asterius, Urbanus, was a writer in the Montanist controversy of the 2d century. He is only known by a reference to a Λόγος κατὰ Ἀστίριον Οὐρβανόν, which occurs in an anonymous work against Montanism, fragments of which are preserved by Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. xvi, 17). On the supposition that this reference was a note by Eusebius or by some ancient scholiast, Valerius, Tillemont, Cave, and others have ascribed to Asterius the authorship of the work in question. Since, according to the most obvious interpretation, the reference to Asterius forms part of the quotation, Asterius was probably a Montanist replied to by the writer.

Astesano, an Italian theologian, native of Asti, in Piedmont, gained a certain celebrity as a casuist. He died in 1330. He wrote Summa de Casibus Conscientie, or Summa Astesana, published for the first time in 1469, and reprinted several times down to the 16th century. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aston, D. W., an English Congregational minister, was born at Kenilworth in 1773. In 1779 he became a scholar in the free grammar-school of his native town. He was entirely ignorant of evangelical truth till he was sixteen years old, when he heard a local preacher in a cottage. This resulted in his conversion, when he also became an occasional preacher among the Wesleyans, though never formally connected with that body. He studied for two years under a Mr. Moody, of Warwick, his friend and guide; after which, under the same man's direction, he settled at Stratford-on-Avon, where he was the means of converting his own mother and also the lady who afterwards became his wife, as well as many others. In 1803 he removed to Buckingham, where he toiled excessively for forty-seven years. It was his privilege, during his life here, to see quite a transformation of this till now "unenlightened neighborhood." He was for more than forty years the secretary of the North Bucks Association. Increasing infirmities caused him to resign his charge in 1850, and he retired to Hull to pass his remaining days. He died Jan. 9, 1852. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1853, p. 205, 206.

Aston, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, son of a farmer, was born at Kenilworth in 1785. When about ten years of age his family moved to Hill-Morton, Leicester. In early manhood he forsook the Established Church and became an Independent. In 1814 Mr. Aston was admitted to the Academy at Hackney. His first pastorate was at Creaton, Northamptonshire, where he was ordained in 1817, and preached in a bold and heart-searching style. In 1825 he removed to Wingrave, and for thirty-three years labored with great success. He was regarded as "the father of his people." To him the anxious and distressed carried their sorrows and joys, their burdens, and the remembrances of their deliverances. He died at Birmingham, Feb. 3, 1867. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1868, p. 249.

Astorga, EMANUELE D', Baron, an eminent musical composer, was born in Sicily, Dec. 11, 1681. He was patronized by the emperor Leopold I, at whose court he passed some years. After the death of that sovereign, in 1705, he travelled considerably throughout Europe. He died Aug. 21, 1736. His chief work is a Stabat Mater, which is much admired. He also composed operas and cantatas.

Astori, GIOVANNI ANTONIO, a learned Italian clergyman and antiquary, was born at Venice, Jan. 16, 1672, and soon made extraordinary proficiency in classical and polite literature. In 1698 he entered the Church. He became a member and secretary of the Academy of the Animosi at Venice, and was also a member of that of Arcadia at Rome, under the name of Demade Olimpico. In his latter days he was master of the choir and canon of the ducal Church of St. Mark. He died at Venice, June 23, 1743. He carried on an extensive correspondence with the most eminent scholars of his age. His writings are few in number.

Astorini, ELIA, an Italian theologian, was born at Calabria in 1651. He took holy orders at the age of sixteen years, and devoted himself with ardor to the study of philosophy; and with so much zeal did he propagate the new doctrine throughout the kingdom of Naples that he was accused of magic. Fortunately for him, the Inquisition decided to spare him on account of his learning. In order that he might not further expose himself, he resorted to Zurich; then to Basle; next to Marburg, where he was appointed vice-chancellor of the university. He then went to Groningen, where he was made doctor of medicine in 1686, and taught mathematics. The religious wars which were waged in the Low Countries cooled his ardor for the principles of Protestantism, and he returned to his Church. He went to Hamburg, and procured a safe-conduct from the Inquisition at Rome. Having arrived at the capital of the Christian world, he was made general preacher at Pisa. In 1690 he became professor of mathematics at Sienna, and there founded the academy of the Fisiocritici. He then returned to his monastery at Cosenza, where he was appointed general commissary. But his philosophical ideas made for him a good many enemies. He quitted Cosenza, and died, April 4, 1702, at Terra Nova di Tarsia. He wrote, De Vitali (Economia Fœtus in Utero (Groningen, 1686):—Elementa Euclidis, ad Usum Novæ Academicæ Nobilium Senensium, Nova Methodo et Compendiaria Demonstrata (Sienna, 1791; Naples, 1791):—Prodromus Apologeticus de Postatate S. Sedis Apostolicæ (Sienna, 1793):—De Vera Ecclesia Jesu Christi contra Lutheranos et Calvinianos (Naples, 1700). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Astræa (fairness), in Greek mythology, was a goddess whose descent is given differently. She was either a daughter of Jupiter and Themis, or of Astræus and Hemera (goddess of the day), or of Apollo and Chrysothemis, and she is also often declared one and the same with Ceres, Isis, Fortuna, and Themis. In the Golden Age she caused justice and equity among men. When this age ceased, she left the earth, and was placed in the heavens as the constellation of Virgo.

Astragal.

Astragal (the knuckle-bone), a small semicircular moulding or bead either encircling a column or in other situations.

Astragalomancy is a species of divination anciently practiced in a temple of Hercules in Achaia. It consisted in throwing small pieces with marks corresponding to the letters of the alphabet, the accidental arrangement of which formed the answer required. See DIVINATION.

Astras, PAUL THÉRÈSE DAVID D', a French prelate, was born at Tours (Var), Oct. 15, 1772. The sentiments of piety which he manifested from early youth were never abandoned in his ecclesiastical career, though beset by vicissitudes and painful tests. He bore the evils of the Revolution with a grand Christian resignation. Secretary, in 1798, of M. Portalis, his uncle, he was appointed, several years after, vicar-general of the metropolis. In 1807 he delivered a discourse at Notre Dame on the re-establishment of religion in France. At the death of the cardinal of Bellay, archbishop of Paris, he managed the vacant see until the coming of cardinal Maury. Charged by the pope, in 1809, to send to this prelate a brief enjoining him to return to his bishopric in Montefiascone, it appears that he received at the same time the bull of excommunication hurled against Napoleon. On March 16, 1850, he succeeded the cardinal of Clermont-Tonnerre as archbishop of Toulouse and Narbonne. Liberty of instruction, reclaimed by the French clergy at first as a right, then as a promise of the charter of 1830, had in Astras an intrepid defender. He protested on this occasion against the doctrines of M. Glatien Arnould, professor of philosophy of Toulouse. An attempt was made to reform the liturgies, but he opposed it. It is said that these difficulties at Toulouse prevented him from being made cardinal for a time, but this honor was finally accorded to him Sept. 29, 1850. He died Sept. 29, 1851. He wrote, Discours sur le Rétablissement de la Religion en France (1807):—Des Appels comme d'Abus en Matière de Religion (Paris, 1814):

Picot does not believe him to be the author of this work:—La Vérité Catholique Démontrée, ou Lettres de Monseigneur l'Évêque de Bayonne, actuellement Archevêque de Toulouse, aux Protestants d'Orthez (Toulouse, 1833). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Astujat, in Persian mythology, is an evil dæmon sent by Ahriman to capture the souls of the dead and take them to the infernal regions. To prevent this, the nearest relatives of the deceased are obliged to watch three days after the death and unceasingly repeat certain prayers.

Asturius, Sr. See ASTERIUS.

Asulai, a name common to several Jewish writers, viz.:

1. ABRAHAM, who died in 1644, had devoted his life to the study of the Cabala, and published זוהר חמה, a commentary on the Zohar to Genesis (Venice, 1655):—חסד לאברהם, a Cabalistic exposition of the leading articles of that science (latest ed. Lemberg, 1860). His grandson was

2. CHAJIM JOSEPH DAVID, born at Jerusalem in 1726, and died at Leghorn in 1807. He is the author of about fifty works in many branches of Jewish learning, but is best known by his שם הגדול, a bibliographical history of Hebrew literature (pt. i, Leghorn, 1774; Krotoschin, 1843; pt. ii, Leghorn, 1784; best ed. Wilna, 1864, 2 vols.):—דבר לחכמים, a continuation of the above (Leghorn, 1796; pt. ii, 1798; further appendices in 1796 and 1801). An entire edition of these several portions was published (Wilna, 1852, 2 vols.) by J. Ben-Jakob, preceded by a biography of Asulai by Carmolg. He wrote also, ארחות דוד, derashas, or homilies, on the Pentateuch (Leghorn, 1799):—נחל קדושים, a commentary on the same part of Scripture (ibid. 1800):—פני חמה, a commentary on the five Megilloth (ibid. eod.):—and יוסף החלום, on the Psalms (ibid. 1801; Vienna, 1859). Besides, he wrote commentaries on the Zohar:—דברי און, an introduction to the Talmud, in 2 pts. (Leghorn, 1790-93). His Iggroth, or correspondence with contemporaries, was first published in 1867. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 66-70; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (German transl.), p. 50; Etheridge, Introd. to Heb. Literature, p. 481; Zunz, Zur Gesch. u. Literatur, p. 240 sq. (B. P.)

Asuman, in Persian mythology, was one of the good genii, whose protection, however, is only vouched for on the twenty-seventh day of each month, which day also carries his name. The affirmation of the Magi that he is the angel of death is contradictory, for the latter is not bound to certain days.

Asynia, in Norse mythology, was the general name of the goddesses in the family of the Asas, and also of the maiden descendants of the former.

Atachon, in the mythology of the North American Indians, was the name of the supreme god, the god of the creation among the Algonquins.

Ata-entsik, in the mythology of the North American Indians, was the female ancestor (foremother) of human beings; but because she allowed herself to be enticed by Hogouaho she was thrown into the sea. A turtle carried her on its back, and the fishes built for her an island of clay, the earth. She is now the goddess of death, an enemy to all living beings, and lives only on snakes and blood. As queen of souls she lives in the kingdom of the spirits, and receives that which is buried with the dead as a tribute.

Atahokan (the great rabbit), in the mythology of the North American Indians, is a curious surname of the creator of the earth among the Iroquois. He is generally called Michabu. The aborigines of the banks of the St. Lawrence River believe he created the great lakes—Ontario, Huron, Erie, and Superior—for catching beavers; therefore after a successful fishing expedition thank-offerings are brought to Atahokan. The great lake Ontario is a sacred body of water with them, and the large pieces of copper which are found on its banks are held and preserved as presents of this god, yet without using them. According to some, Atahokan brooded on the face of the waters and thus produced animals of various kinds; next he went down into the deep and brought forth a grain of sand, and out of this he created the earth, and then placed his animals on this planet and populated it with human beings.

Atarbius, bishop of Neocæsarea, was apparently a relative of St. Basil (Ep. 210); but there had been a long estrangement between them, and Basil writes to him to resume friendly relations for the sake of the Church (Ep. 61). He does not appear to have responded. Betrayed into Sabellianism, he avoided Basil, who endeavored to hold a personal interview with him upon the subject at Nicopolis. At the Council of Constantinople (A.D. 381) we find him subscribing through Cyril the reader. Although Tillemont makes him an Armenian bishop, there can be but little doubt that his see was Neocæsarea; for (1) he is so designated in some MSS. of Basil's letters; (2) his character, etc., entirely agree with those of an unnamed bishop of Neocæsarea (Ep. 204, 207, 210); (3) he represents the province of Pontus Polimaniacus, of which Neocæsarea was the metropolis.

Ataroth-Addar. This place, if the same as Ataroth simply in the same enumeration of cities on the boundary between Benjamin and Ephraim, cannot have been situated between Janohah and Naarath, and at the same time between Archi and Japhleti; therefore Josh. xvi, 7 seems to mean that the line went from Janohah in opposite directions to Ataroth and Naarath respectively. See TRIBE. Lieut. Conder appears to regard this as a different place from that called simply Ataroth, which he locates at Tell el-Truny, without defining its position (Tent Work, ii, 334); while he identifies (ibid. p. 105) Ataroth-Addar with Ed-Dârieh, a small ruin laid down on the Ordnance Map as Khurbet Dâriah, one mile and an eighth south of west from Beit-Ur el-Tahta. Dr. Tristram makes this Ataroth to be the same with Ataroth-Addar, but fluctuates as to its position, in one place (Bible Places, p. 116) identifying it with "the modern Atâra or Dariah, two miles and a half north of Ramah" (two widely different places; he evidently means Attara), while in another (ibid. p. 176) he calls it "the village of Tireh," which the Ordnance Map lays down as Et-Tireh, one mile and an eighth south-east of Beit-Ur el-Tohka. The true modern site is probably 'Atâra, which the Ordnance Map lays down on the thoroughfare half-way (a mile and three fourths) between Bireh (Beeroth) and Er-Râm (Ramah), with ruins and a pool and tombs adjacent.

Atavanti. See ATTAVANTI.

Atef Crown is the crown generally worn by the Egyptian deity Amen-Ra. It consisted chiefly of two upright ostrich feathers besides a tall white cap, with the ram's horns, uræi, and solar disk in front. It was supposed to represent the kingdom of Egypt, the white cap signifying light, the two feathers truth, the uræi serpents royalty, the ram's horns generative power, and the solar disk divinity. It is repeatedly mentioned in the Ritual of the Dead, and represented on the bass-reliefs, colossi, and statuettes.

Aten-nefru (the most lovely disk) was the name under which the special worship of the solar deity Aten-Ra was introduced to the Egyptians by Amenhotep III at the instigation of his queen, Taia.

Aten-Ra was the name of the deity of the solar disk, who was originally one of the minor deities of the Egyptian mythology. He was represented as a solar disk giving forth rays, each of which terminated in a hand holding the cross of life. In the time of Amenhotep IV, the wife of that monarch, queen Taia, attempted to make absolute and universal the worship of Aten-Ra, whom she maintained to be the same as the Syrian deity Adon-Ra, or Adon-ai. The king, at first, slowly introduced the new form of deity under the name of Aten-nefru, and then gradually declared the sun under that name to be the supreme deity alike of Egypt and its dependencies; and, to carry out this plan, he closed the temples of the older divinities, degraded their priests, and ultimately removed the capitol of the empire to a new site at Tel el-Amarna. This total subversion of the natural religious principles, and the unwise haste with which it was accompanied, led to a revolution, which resulted in the overthrow of the 18th dynasty and the degradation of Aten-Ra. There is, in many points, a considerable resemblance between some of the rites of Aten and the ceremonial observances of the Jewish nation. In both systems there was no visible representation of the Supreme Deity. There were altars of incense, burnt-sacrifice, and, more remarkable still, a table of shewbread in both. The plans of the temples were very similar to each other, as also were the robes of the officiating priests. Whether there ever was such a strong affinity between them as to imply one common origin cannot now be well ascertained; certain it is that the troubles of the Jews in Egypt appear to have synchronized pretty closely with the religious disturbances which followed the death of queen Taia.—Lenormant, Chaldean Magic, s. v.

Ater (or Arsenius), St., was an Alexandrian martyr, burned alive with Heron and Isidorus during the Decian persecution in 250. See Ruinart, Acta Sinc. p. 127.

Atesh, in Persian mythology, is the holy fire which breaks forth from the naphtha-springs; and, lighted by Ormuzd himself, is worshipped as divine. As a consequence of this high honor, various other words are joined to Atesh—as, for instance, Ateshbehram, the prayer, which is said five times a day, when the wood is brought for building a fire; Ateshdan is a metallic vessel formed like a vase, with a great cover, to preserve the holy fire; Ateshgah is the small chapel in the temple where the Ateshdan was with the fire in it; Ateshkaneh, the fire-temple itself.

Atha BEN-HAKEM (or AL-HAKEM IBN-ATTA), surnamed Mokanna (the veiled), a Moslem impostor, was born at Merv, Khorassan, in the 8th century. He was by trade a fuller, and pretended to be the embodiment of the living spirit of God. By his knowledge of philosophy and chemistry he was enabled to perform wonders and draw about him a large number of followers. Having lost an eye, and being of a repulsive countenance, he always wore a veil, declaring that no one could behold his face and live. The caliph Mahdi sent an army against him, which besieged him in the castle of Keh, and caused him to put an end to his own life in 780. Some say that he set fire to his castle and threw himself into the flames, followed by many of his disciples; others, that he poisoned himself and his followers; and still others, that he threw himself into a caldron of acid, which he hoped might consume his body and create the impression that he had been removed by divine agency. He is the hero of The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan, in Moore's Lalla Rookh.

Athanasia, Saint and widow, was abbess of Tymia, in Greece; and was born in the island of Egina, about the beginning of the 9th century, of noble and pious parents. She was first married, against her will, to an officer of the imperial army, who was soon killed, and the emperor Michael, having by an edict commanded all the marriageable virgins and widows to marry, she was compelled to receive a second husband, with whom she lived in the practice of every kind of penance and charitable work, and whom she finally induced to renounce the world; upon which she converted her house into a religious community, which she ruled as abbess four years. At the end of that time she retired with her sisterhood into a desert place, to which she gave the name of Tymia, and where she died. The Greeks commemorate her on Aug. 14. See Baillet, Aug. 14.

Athanasius, Saint and martyr, was a deacon of the Church of Jerusalem. He was scourged and put to death by order of Theodosius, an impious and wicked monk and zealous upholder of Eutyches, who had intruded himself into the see of Jerusalem, during the absence of the patriarch Juvenal, about the year 452. During the twenty months which Theodosius held possession of the see, he perpetrated the most unheard-of cruelties against the Catholics. St. Athanasius is commemorated on July 5. See Baillet, July 5.

Athanasius, bishop of ANAGASTUS, in Cilicia Secunda, and metropolitan, was a disciple of St. Lucian of Antioch, reckoned by Arius, in his letter to Eusebius of Nicomedia, among the bishops who coincided with him in doctrine. The great Athanasius accuses him of having, previous to the Council of Nicæa, written blasphemies equal to those of Arius, of which he gives a specimen. He is said by Le Quien, on the authority of the Lib. Synod. Græc., to have supported Arius at the Council of Nicæa. Philostorgius tells us that when Aetius was expelled from his master's house, after his unlucky victory in argument, Athanasius received him and read the Gospels with him.

Athanasius, bishop of ANCYRA, was raised to that see by the Arian Acacius of Cæsarea in 360. Notwithstanding this inauspicious beginning, he gave unquestionable proofs of his orthodoxy by taking an active part in the Synod of Tyana, in 367, at which the Nicene symbol was accepted. By St. Basil he is commended as "a bulwark of orthodoxy;" and Gregory Nyssen praises him as "valuing the truth above everything." At his death, in 368 (or 369), Basil wrote a letter of condolence to the Church of Ancyra, on the loss of one who was truly "a pillar and foundation of the Church." See Smith, Dict. Christ. Biog. s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Athanasius, patriarch of CONSTANTINOPLE, lived in the latter half of the 13th century. He succeeded George, or Gregory of Cyprus, in 1289. Four years afterwards he abdicated and John was put in his place. He recovered this position in 1304, and six years later was again deposed. Some treatises attributed to him are found in the Library of the Fathers. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Athanasius, bishop of NAPLES in 877, through the influence of his brother Sergius, duke of Naples, against whom he conspired the following year. Sergius was deposed, made prisoner, and delivered to pope John VIII. Athanasius became duke in place of his brother; but he did not long enjoy the fruits of his crime. He was excommunicated in 887. Athanasius joined the Saracens, took part in their enterprises, and shared their booty. He seems to have failed neither in courage nor military talent. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Athanasius, bishop of PERHA, known to us in connection with Domnus II, bishop of Antioch, in the middle of the 5th century. He was present at the first Council of Ephesus, supported Cyril of Alexandria, and signed with him. Having had grave charges brought against him by his clergy, he refused to meet them when summoned by his metropolitan Panolbius of Hierapolis, and voluntarily resigned his see. Domnus summoned a council to consider the matter; but Athanasius refused to appear, on the ground that Domnus was his personal enemy, and he was unanimously condemned by default and deposed from his bishopric. See Cave Hist. Lit. i, 479; Labbé, Council. iv, 717-754.

Athanasius, an Arian bishop who succeeded Philip in the see of SCYTHOPOLIS about 372. He is charged by Epiphanius with pushing his Arian tenets to the most audacious impiety, asserting that the Son and Holy Spirit were creatures, and had nothing in common with the divine nature (Hær. lxxiii, 37, p. 885).

Athar, CHAJIM IBN-, a Jew of Sala, in Barbary, went to Jerusalem in 1742, where he became the teacher of Chajim Asulai. He died there in 1743. He is the author of אורי חוריים, a commentary on the Pentateuch (Venice, and often). He also wrote novellas on some treatises of the Talmud. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 70; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 49 sq. (B. P.)

Atharvan (or Atharveda), in Hindû mythology, is the fourth part of the Veda, formerly lost, and reconstructed from tradition. It contains prayers for the pacification of the gods, and maledictions on enemies.

Athelard. See ADELARD.

Athelm, archbishop of Canterbury, was first heard of as a monk of Glastonbury, and then as bishop of Wells. He was translated to Canterbury in 914, and occupied the metropolitan see for nine years. During this period nothing memorable occurred in the Church. Athelm appears to have had the happiness of reaping the fruits which resulted from the seed wisely sown by his immediate predecessors, under the direction of Alfred. He died Jan. 8, 923. See Hook, Lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury, i, 334 sq.

Athena, a name given Minerva by the Greeks, because she was never nursed as other children, but was brought forth from her father's head in full strength. Plato, however, thinks she was so named because of her skill in divine things, while others say because she was never enslaved.

Athenæa, a festival held in honor of Athena (q. v.) among the ancient Greeks.

Athenæum is a general name for the temples of Athena; a temple at Athens, dedicated to Athena, in which poets and orators assembled to recite their works and instruct the young. From this the name was applied to a school founded at Rome, on the Capitoline Hill, by the emperor Hadrian, which long continued an institution of great influence. In the reign of Theodosius II it had ten professors of grammar, three of oratory, five of dialectics, one of philosophy, and two of jurisprudence. In modern times the term is applied to literary institutions, public reading-rooms, lyceums, etc.

Athenogènes was a martyr who lived at the same time with Clement of Alexandria, and who is said by St. Basil to have been burned to death. Before his death he composed a morning and an evening hymn, which he left as a memorial of him to his disciples (St. Basil, De Spiritu S. cap. 29). See Fabricius, Bibl. Græc. v, 1.

Atherton, John, a minister of the Methodist New Connection, was born at Liverpool near the close of the 18th century; was converted in 1809, and devoted all his time to acquiring religious knowledge and to useful Christian labor. He entered the ministry in 1814, and for six years earnestly preached the Gospel in five circuits. In December, 1818, he took cold, which led to his death, at Chester, Aug. 3, 1819. He was a sincere Christian, and zealous in the service of God. See Minutes of the Conference.

Atherton, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was born at Lamberhead-Green, Lancashire, in 1775. He entered the ministry in 1797, and occupied some of the most important charges, such as Aberdeen, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Durham, Liverpool, Bath, London, etc.; was elected president of the conference in 1846, and was actively engaged in the ministry until within a fortnight of his death, which took place after a most painful illness, Sept. 26, 1850. Mr. Atherton had a clear, vigorous intellect, and an independence of thought and purpose, together with an ability on pulpit and platform which made his influence widely felt throughout the Methodist Connection in England. He wrote a Life of Lady Maxwell, with an Introduction by Rev. J. Gilchrist Wilson (Lond. 8vo). Atherton is the subject of one of Everett's powerful and beautifully written literary portraits—not greatly to the advantage of the former—in the Wesleyan Centenary Takings (3d ed. Lond. 1841), No. VII, i, 147–171. “But,” says the artist, “take him as a whole, rather than in detail, and we have at once a rarity—a man of much more exalted powers than many who are more generally held in request; a man under whose lash vice, in every discourse, is made to writhe, and error is compelled to shelter itself in darkness,” etc. (p. 170). He published also an Address on Wesleyan Methodism (1839). See Minutes of the British Conference, 1851, p. 562; also Hill, Alphabetical Arrangement of the Wesleyan Ministers (Lond. 1847).

Athey, WALTER, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Virginia, Sept. 14, 1798. Little is known of his early life. In 1827 he was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference; in 1868 was smitten with paralysis, and remained in a helpless condition until his death, Oct. 24, 1874. Mr. Athey was a plain, earnest preacher, thoroughly versed in Methodism and one of her most powerful defenders. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1875, p. 34.

Athias is a name common to several Jews who excelled as typographers and writers, of whom we mention the following:

1. ISAAC was of Spanish descent, and flourished at Amsterdam in the beginning of the 17th century. He wrote a treatise in Spanish on the six hundred and thirteen precepts, Tesoro de Preceptos (Venice, 1627; Amsterdam, 1649). He also translated the book דְּוִיָּק אֲתִיָּא of A. Troki into Spanish, Fortificación de la Fé, which is in MS. See Fürst; Bibl. Jud. i, 71; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 50.

2. JOSEPH, the printer, contributed largely to the cause of Biblical learning by his correct editions of the Hebrew Scriptures, of which two (1661, 1667) appeared. The States-General of Holland decreed him a gold chain and medal as a mark of their appreciation of his merit. But the correctness of these editions was tested by Samuel Maresius of Groningen, who published an epistle in 1669 against both editor and printer. In reply to this epistle Athias wrote Cæcus de Coloribus h. e. Josephi Athias Justa Defensio contra Ineptum, Absurdum, et Indoctam Reprehensionem Viri Celeb. D. Sam. Maresii, reprinted in Crenius, Animadversiones Historico-philologicae, ii, 121 sq. He also edited the Biblia Hispanica, published at Ferrara in 1553 (Amst. 1661), and the Bible in Judæo-German, by Joseph Wittenhausen (ibid. 1679). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 71; Basnage, History of the Jews, p. 741.

3. SOLOMON of Jerusalem. In 1549 his Commentary on the Psalms, פְּרִישׁ הַיְיִלִּים, based on Rashi, Kimchi, and others, was published together with the Hebrew text of the Psalms at Venice. See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 71; De' Rossi, Dizionario Storico (Germ. transl.), p. 50. (B. P.)

Athingani. See PAULICIANS.

Athonaf is a name given by the Mohammedans to the procession made by pilgrims seven times round the Kaaba, or Black Stone, in the Beit-Allah, or Temple of Mecca, during the feast of Ramadân (q. v.).

Athor (or Athyr), in Egyptian mythology, was a goddess of night, who, as such, was the hidden cause of all things. She was principally worshipped at Athribis, in the Delta, which city is said to have received its name from her. Upon certain coins of Athribis she appears as a womanly figure, with a spear in her left and a bird in her right hand. The Egyptians declared their Athor to be the Aphrodite of the Greeks and the Venus of the Romans. Therefore the bird in her hand possibly represents the dove sacred to Venus as a symbol of fruitful brooding. Later Egyptologists, however, doubt this identification. Her name signifies “the abode of Hor,” and she is closely associated with Isis (q. v.). She probably represented the lower hemisphere, into which the sun sinks at night, and so came to be regarded as the goddess of the under-world. She appears on the monuments in various forms, such as a female, a cow, or a hawk, with the characteristic emblem of the disk and the horns. See Rawlinson, Hist. of Egypt, i, 364 sq.

Atkin, Daniel, an English Congregational minister, was born at Kendal, Jan. 10, 1770. In 1788 he removed to Warrington, and became united in Christian fellowship with the Independent Church. In 1820 he became pastor at Tyldesley, near Bolton; thence he removed to Hilton Lane, Worsley, near Manchester, and from there to Tideswell, Derbyshire. In 1834 he became pastor of Bethesda Chapel, Leigh. He died Oct. 12, 1858. Mr. Atkin was mighty in the Scriptures. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1859, p. 191.

Atkin, George, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in High Hall, Lincolnshire, England, April 16, 1793. He emigrated to New York state with his parents at the age of seven; experienced conversion in his twelfth year; removed to Kentucky in his twenty-first year, spent four years in school-teaching, and in 1818 entered the itinerancy in the Kentucky Conference. In 1819 he located and retired to Knoxville, where for seven years he taught school. In 1826 he re-entered the travelling connection, and died Aug. 29, 1827. Mr. Atkin was argumentative, agreeable, benevolent, zealous. See Methodist Magazine, xi, 172.

Atkin, Thomas, an English Congregational minister, was born at Warrington in 1806. He received his collegiate training at Rotherham College and at the University of Glasgow. He began his ministry in 1832 at St. Paul's, Wigan, where he labored six years, and then became pastor at Glossop, remaining there till his death, Jan. 30, 1876. Mr. Atkin was clear in discernment, forcible in expression, and fearless in everything. His thorough devotedness, genial, unassuming kindness, faithfulness, and zeal gave him great influence. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1877, p. 341.

Atkins, Elisha, a Congregational minister, was born at Middletown, Conn., Oct. 28, 1750. He graduated at Yale College in 1773, and was a chaplain in the Revolutionary army. He was ordained pastor of the Church in Killingly in 1784, where he remained until his death, June 14, 1839. “He was esteemed a good scholar and a handsome writer, and did much in education, especially in training pupils for college.” He published three sermons. See Cong. Quarterly, 1861, p. 16.

Atkins (or Etkins), James (1), D.D., a Scotch prelate, was born in the town of Kirkwall, in the stewardry of Orkney, and was educated at Edinburgh; from here he went to Oxford in 1638 to finish his theological studies under Dr. Prideaux. On his return to England, he obtained from the king the Church of Birse, in the stewardry of Orkney. He was excommunicated for drawing up a declaration in behalf of the Presbytery of Orkney expressing their loyalty and allegiance to Charles II. He returned to Scotland in 1653, settled in Edinburgh, and remained there until 1660. In 1677 he was elected and consecrated bishop of Murray, Scotland, and in 1680 was translated to the see of Galloway. He died at Edinburgh, Oct. 28, 1687.

Atkins, James (2), an English Wesleyan missionary, was born at Salisbury, Wiltshire, in 1808, and became a member of the Church at the age of seventeen, under Isaac Bradnack. In 1830 he received an appointment to Pembroke, and afterwards to Tenterden and to Ipswich. In 1834 he went to Jamaica, W. I., where he labored energetically and successfully until his death at Kingston, Jan. 24, 1854. See Minutes of the British Conference, 1854.

Atkins, John W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Mount Vernon, Me., Dec. 17, 1807. He experienced conversion in 1824, and in 1827 received license to preach and entered the Maine Conference. In 1852 he retired from the active ranks and settled at Saco, where he remained until his death, May 27, 1858. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1859, p. 111.

Atkins, Richard, a Christian martyr, was born in Hertfordshire, England. He was often known to rebuke the popish priests, and to advise the young of the Romish Church not to worship idols, but to pray to the true God. On one occasion, at the celebration of mass in a church, he threw down the chalice with the wine and snatched the cake from the priest's hand, for which some worshippers rose and beat him sorely. He was taken and sent to prison; while there, he was often visited by many Englishmen, who tried to persuade him to recant; but he told them they were in the wrong way, and not he, and he wished that they would, instead of trying to get him to forsake his faith, pray for the salvation of their own souls. While on his way to the place of execution, being almost naked, he was often burned with torches by four men who walked on either side of him. When he reached the place, they burned his legs off first. Although his sufferings were great, he did not cease to exhort the people to come to Christ. He was burned at Rome in 1581. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 742.

Atkins, Samuel G., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Salem, Mass., about 1798. He experienced religion early in life, and in 1822 united with the New England Conference, in which he served the Church faithfully until his death at Dorchester, Mass., Feb. 27, 1826. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1826, p. 509; Methodist Magazine, ix, 159.

Atkins, Thomas, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman, began his ministry in 1864 as rector of Christ Church, Dresden, Me. In 1866 he removed to Gardiner, Me., where he resided without regular work until his death, which occurred Jan. 22, 1868. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1869, p. 109.

Atkinson, Christopher, an English Methodist preacher, was born at Sheffield, Dec. 24, 1782. He was brought up in the Church of England, but was converted at a Methodist revival when quite young. He joined the New Connection soon after it was formed, and became a useful local preacher. He entered their ministry in 1807, and continued his labors with acceptance and success for forty-nine years. Age and weakness made him a supernumerary in 1855, when he settled at Hunslet, Leeds, and for eleven years labored as he had strength. He was pious, humorous, earnest, useful, and died in peace, May 15, 1866. See Minutes of the Conference; Tyerman, Oxford Methodists, p. 371.

Atkinson, Miles, an English divine, of whose birth, early life, or entrance on the ministry we have no record, officiated in the parish church of Leeds nearly fifty years. The congregation which steadily attended his preaching was one of the largest in the kingdom, and is supposed to have consisted of several thousand persons. He died in February, 1811. As a minister he declared the whole counsel of God, as a pastor was most diligent, and as a Christian humble and faithful. See (Lond.) Christian Observer, April, 1811, p. 271.

Atkinson, Thomas (1), a Canadian Wesleyan Methodist minister, was a native of Ireland, and emigrated to Canada when very young. In early life he united with the Wesleyan Methodist Church at Newburg, Ont., and was received into the ministry in 1855. He spent the greater portion of his life west of the city of London, and died at Maitland, Ont., Dec. 29, 1874. Atkinson was a man of glowing zeal for the salvation of men. With one exception, he held a camp-meeting on every circuit he travelled. The work of God engrossed all his time and energies, and he was only happy when actively engaged in it. See Carroll, Case and his Contemporaries (Toronto, 1867-77, 5 vols. 12mo), v, 249; Minutes of the Canada Conference (Toronto), 1875.

Atkinson, Thomas (2), D.D., LL.D., a Protestant Episcopal bishop, was born about 1808, and consecrated bishop of North Carolina Oct. 17, 1853. He died at his residence in Washington, D. C., Jan. 4, 1881.

Atkinson, Timothy, a Congregational minister, son of Rev. Charles Atkinson, was born at Ipswich, England, July 4, 1806. After engaging in business in London, he turned to the ministry, and was educated at Homerton College. In 1832 he was ordained pastor at Hounslow; two years after was pastor at Halstead; in 1837 went to Canada under the auspices of the Colonial Missionary Society and organized a Congregational Church in Quebec. On account of the severity of the climate, he removed to Lowell, Mass., in 1845, and in the following year organized the High Street Church, of which he was installed pastor, where he remained, however, only until June 28, 1847. From 1850 to 1853 he was acting pastor of Bridge Street Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.; from 1853 to 1855 was secretary of the American Congregational Union; in 1856 was installed pastor of the Church at Westport, Conn., from which he retired in 1864; from 1864 to 1867 he was acting pastor of an Independent Church at Nahant, Mass.; and from 1867 to 1870 occupied the same relation to the Second Church, Orange Valley, N. J. At Norton, Mass., he officiated from 1872 until the date of his death, June 29, 1875. See Cong. Quarterly, 1876, p. 419.

Atkinson, William Mayo, D.D., a Presbyterian minister, was born at Powhatan, Va., April 22, 1796. He graduated at the College of New Jersey in 1814, and returned to Virginia and began the practice of law. He was licensed in 1833, served for several years as agent of the Virginia Bible Society, became pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Winchester in 1839, and agent of the Education Board of the Presbyterian Church in 1846, and died in 1849. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, iv, 777.

Atla, in Norse mythology, was a giant maiden who, with her eight sisters, sleeping on the sea-coast, was surprised by Odin. By him the sisters became the joint mother of the god Heimdal.

Atlaibos, in Slavonic mythology, was a domestic god of the heathen Poles.

Atlantides were the seven daughters of Atlas by his wife Pleione, after whom they were also styled Pleides ("sailing"), because they were supposed to be favorable to navigation. Their respective names were Sterope, Celano, Electra, Alcyone, Maia, Merope, and Taygete. They were each in great reputation for wisdom and justice, and on this account were adored as goddesses. With their mother they were pursued five years by Orion, till Jupiter, prevailed on by their prayers, took them into the heavens, where they form the constellation called Pleiades. Some authors claim that the Pleiades were daughters of Lycurgus, born at Naxos; and that they were translated to heaven for their good offices in the education of Bacchus.

Atma, in Hindû mythology, was the surname of Brahma, the all-penetrating spirit of the world. All souls come from Atma; they occupy the heart in the body, and are the cause of all sensual and voluntary functions, and therefore are rewarded or punished for the good or evil which the human being did during life.

Atmore, HENRY S., a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was born in Delaware County, Pa., Jan. 23, 1822. He was brought to Christ in his fourteenth year through the instruction and example of his pious mother. In his seventeenth year he received license to preach; and in his twenty-first was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference. His sentiments and sympathies led him to the Church South in 1854, and he joined the Virginia Conference, wherein he continued until his decease, in January, 1862. See Minutes of Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church, South, 1862, p. 389.

Atocha, OUR LADY OF, a name given to the Virgin Mary, under which she has a chapel dedicated to her at Madrid. She is represented in the dress of a widow, with a chaplet in her hands; and on festival days she is crowned with the sun, decked out with the finest garments, and adorned with the richest jewels. See MARIOLATRY.

Atochians were heretics of the 13th century who held that the soul died with the body, and that all sins were equal. See Cent. Magd. 13th cent. cap. v.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.

Atomists, a sect of philosophers in ancient Greece, usually ranked as atheists. The system seems to have originated with Leucippus, and to have been carried to a more systematic form by Democritus. The fundamental principle of the system was the eternal existence of matter in the form of an infinite number of atoms in infinite space. See DEMOCRITUS; EPICURUS; LEUCIPPUS.

Atonement, THEORY OF. The moral grounds or explanations of Christ's death on behalf of sinful man usually assigned are two—namely, the demands of justice, which could only thus be satisfied, and the claims of authority, which could only thus be adequately maintained. Both of these essentially resolve themselves into one—namely, the requirements of the divine government, which, it is supposed, would be endangered by pardoning the sinner without the infliction of the prescribed penalty upon a substitute. This position, plausible as it seems, is, however, based entirely upon the human point of view, and regards the atonement as a transaction in which the Almighty is affected by exterior considerations altogether such as apply to earthly rulers and mundane affairs. It may reasonably be doubted whether we have a right to assume that the Divine Being is thus hampered, or whether we present the atonement in its most favorable and impressive aspect by this course of reasoning. Such statements may be profitable by way of illustration of the divine method of procedure; but they are hardly satisfactory as a logical exposition of the reasons operative in the divine mind in the case. We should, of course, speak cautiously in all such premises; but if we speculate at all upon the subject, we should do so in such a manner as to justify adequately the ways of God.

We apprehend that the final cause of this central feature of the redemptive scheme is to be found not so much in any considerations of vindictive or governmental policy or necessity as in its remedial power. Scripture gives the true key to its economy in the words of Christ himself: "God so loved the world that he gave his Son," etc. It was suggested by divine love in the person of the Father, and it was carried out by the same self-sacrificing, uncalculating love in the person of the Son. That impulse to make other beings happy beyond the godhead, which prompted the original creation of man, likewise induced the yearning to restore man to happiness after he had fallen. This is the only Biblical and tenable view of the subject in its ultimate theodicy.

If now it be further asked, Why was the particular method of substitutional redemption adopted? we reply, in like manner, Because divine love chose to suffer itself rather than see the object of that love suffer. Such is the nature of all true love. It rushes spontaneously to the rescue, and interposes itself between the danger and the victim. There is no cool balancing of probabilities, risks, or advantages. It was not simply nor properly because there would be a gain in the suffering of one in place of many, nor because the infinite Sufferer was more able to endure than the finite race. Such a quantitative analysis of the transaction belittles it to a mere commercial affair. Nor does disinterested love stop to inquire whether its devotion will be altogether successful. It freely offers itself if there be the least hope or opportunity of thereby averting the doom of the beloved. It begs the privilege, and will only be restrained by insurmountable obstacles. The only real difficulties in this case would be the refusal of the judge or that of the culprit himself. The former is obviated by the fact of the unity between the persons of the Trinity, which makes them necessarily consentaneous in purpose and concurrent in act [see MEDIATION]; the latter, by the conscious guilt and helplessness of the penitent sinner, who accepts this as his only possible mode of escape. See VICARIOUS SUFFERING. The final cause of Christ's atonement thus appears in its moral effect upon the will of the subject of redemption, by awakening any susceptibility of compunction and gratitude left in his nature. The spectacle of the Divine Sufferer on the cross was the last resort for winning back the erring (John xii, 32). Dying love alone has power to constrain to penitence and fealty.

On the other hand, the strictly governmental view of the atonement falls short as an ultimate vindication of its morale in at least three essential respects. First, as such it is a signal failure in point of fact. Christ's atonement has not, as a rule, restrained mankind at large from sin, either prophylactically or punitively; but, on the contrary, has rather led to the extension of crime, partly by protracting human probation, and partly by inducing a general sense of direct impunity. Secondly, and more conclusively, as a purely governmental device, the atonement violates the most fundamental principle of all jurisprudence by proposing to excuse the guilty and punish the innocent. Thirdly, as a magisterial act it expiates offences twice over—once in the person of the Mediator, and again in that of the finally impenitent. All that we can justly say in behalf of the so-called governmental theory of atonement is, that as a secondary or subordinate design its most important advantages are indirectly subserved by the remedial economy. But we cannot consistently regard God as shut up to its adoption by the exigencies or results of his own sovereignty.

Once more, should it be inquired, If the love of God be of such an all-constraining character, why might it not have been more fully indulged by refraining from all punishment whatever? we answer, This is substantially the fact, when the word punishment is properly defined and understood in the case. Christ was not "punished" at all: he suffered indeed, but his anguish was not penal; it was voluntarily undergone for the sake of its effect upon others. Nor is the final and eternal sentence upon the impenitent sinner so much a positive and direct infliction as a deprivation of privilege and a relinquishment to the natural consequences of his own moral abandonment. He simply lies down in the bed of woe which his own hands have made. The inherent power to sin carries with it its own penalty. God undoubtedly could, at man's creation, have constituted him incapable of either sin or misery; but he chose to confer upon him this tremendous capability because (as we reverently conceive) the virtue of resistance is necessarily greater than that of impassivity, and the glory of redemption transcends even Edenic innocence. In a word, confirmed (because voluntary and tested) conformity to the divine will is, in truth, the only perfect happiness in the universe—and by reason of God's own nature this must be the case; and this means only that supreme love to God is the sole unalloyed bliss. All who fall short of this, therefore, whether in this world or the next, are proportionately miserable by the very constitution of their being. The atonement sprang from the pure love of God, and is calculated to restore a reciprocity of it in the human breast. Its eventual failure in any individual is final perdition.

God, we repeat, doubtless could have obviated the consequences of man's fall by some less costly means, or he might, we presume, have arbitrarily prevented man's sin altogether; but we see no way by which he could so effectually have exhibited his intense and ceaseless love for the race as by sending his Son to die for its salvation. At all events, this is the method of redemption which he has actually chosen, and we feel compelled to believe that he selected this in order to manifest the full extent of his interest in his fallen creatures. The catastrophe, we suppose, was permitted in order that the remedy might be possible; and both illustrate the magnanimity of the divine nature in the highest conceivable degree.

We are not deterred from this explanation of the atonement by the Socinian abuse of it, which represents Christ as dying, like a mere hero, for the sake of example to his fellows. Nothing short of self-sacrifice on the part of God will satisfy the conditions of our view. The offended and injured parent must himself intervene for the rescue and recovery of the contumacious and ruined child. The undying love of the Creator only can save the lost creature. It is this sublime devotion alone that can conquer the rebel and reform the depraved. The God-man is essential no less as a crowning attraction upon the cross than as a model in the pathways of life. The atonement extends from the manger to the sepulchre; and it is divinity that lends it all its commanding lustre.

Nor in the above view of God's fatherly feelings towards the sinner do we overlook his hatred of sin. But this latter we regard as rather an emotion of grief and regret (humanly speaking) than of resentment or indignation, as directed towards the person of the offender. We can only arrive at a just notion of the divine sentiments by comparing them with those of an earthly parent respecting a disobedient child. The sin is hateful, but the sinner is still loved with pity and benevolence. The temper and bearing of Jesus in his entire earthly career most beautifully illustrated this combination.

ATONEMENT, THE DAY OF, Modern Observance of. In the treatise Hilchoth Tshuvah, c. 1, 2, we read, "At this time, when there is no temple and we have no altar, there is no atonement but repentance. Repentance atones for all sins; yea, though a man be wicked all his days, and repent at last, none of his wickedness is mentioned to him (Ezek. xxxiii, 12). The Day of Atonement itself also atones for them that repent (Lev. xvi, 30)." Without considering the contradiction contained in this statement, we will mention the fact that the rabbins, in spite of repentance and the Day of Atonement, have felt the need of something more, which would a little better resemble real sacrificial atonement; and hence has arisen the custom of sacrificing a cock on the eve of that solemn day. The following account of this custom is given in the קדלה שלמה: "Order of the Atonements. On the eve of the Day of Atonement the custom is to make atonements. A cock is taken for a man, and a hen for a woman; and for a pregnant woman a hen and also a cock, on account of the child. The father of the family first makes the atonement for himself—for the high-priest first atoned for himself—then for his family, and afterwards for all Israel." The order is as follows: He takes the cock in his hand and says these words:

"The children of men that sit in darkness and the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron; he brought them out of darkness and the shadow of death, and brake their bands asunder. Fools, because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted. Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat, and they draw near unto the gates of death. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saveth them out of their distresses. He sendeth his word and healeth them, and delivereth them from their destructions. Oh, that men would praise the Lord for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men (Psa. xvi)! If there be for him an angel, an intercessor, one among a thousand, to show unto man his uprightness, then he is gracious unto him, and saith Deliver him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom" (Job xxx, 23).

While moving the atonement round his head, he says,

"This is my substitute. This is my commutation. This cock goeth to death, but may I be gathered and enter into a long and happy life, and into peace."

He then begins again at the words, "The children of men," and so he does three times. Then follow the various alterations that are to be made, when the atonement is for a woman or another person, etc., and there is added "as soon as one has performed the order of the atonement, he should lay his hands on it, as the hands used to be laid on the sacrifices, and immediately after give it to be slaughtered." At the synagogue the usual service commences with the so-called Kol-Nidre (q. v.). The ritual for that day contains a series of confessions of sin to be made, which are frequently repeated. Besides these confessions and other prayers, the historical record of the manner in which the high-priest discharged the duties of his office before the destruction of the second Temple is read and heard. For the four collects which the high-priest offered on that day, see POETRY, HEBREW (Post-Biblical), § i. The other parts of this historical record are fully given in the treatise Yoma. When the concluding prayer is finished, the ram's horn is blown as a signal that the duties of the day are over, and the ceremonies of the day close with the words "Next year we shall be in Jerusalem." (B. P.)

Atri, in Hindû mythology, were certain deities emanating from Brahma, whom he invested with the power of creation.

Atrôpos, in Greek mythology, was one of the Parcae, or Fates; and it is she who cuts the thread spun by the other two sisters, Clotho and Lachesis—the bringer of death. She is generally represented as a woman with a pair of scissors. See PARCÆ.

Attabeira, in the mythology of the Antilles tribes, was worshipped by the ancient inhabitants of Hayti as the mother of the omnipotent, unseen Being. Her servants were protecting spirits of the seasons, of hunting, of health, of fisheries, etc.

Attacanti (or Atavanti), Giacomo, an Italian ecclesiastic, was a Servite and of a noble family in Florence, and distinguished for his genius and acquirements. Cosmo de' Medici made him professor of theology at Pisa, and the pope appointed him general of his order. He collected a library of more than three thousand volumes in his convent at Pisa, and died at the age of eighty-one (in 1607), leaving many works still in MS., both in Italian and Latin; among them an immense work in twenty-five volumes, called Ager Domini, containing the treasures of wisdom and divine knowledge.

Attacanti (or Atavanti), Paolo, an Italian writer, was a monk of the Order of the Servites, born of a noble family of Florence, who entered the order in 1427. He acquired early a high reputation, and taught theology at Sienna; was made provincial of the province of Tuscany; and was charged by Pius II with the direction of the Hospital of the Holy Spirit at Rome. He quitted this employment and retired to Florence, where he died in 1499, aged eighty. His works are, Dialogus ad Petrum Medicem, de Origine Ordinis Servitorum (1471):—Vita B. Joachimi et Francisci, Senensium, Ord. Serv. MSS.:—Breviarium Decr. Decretali, Sexti, etc.:—Thesaurus Concinatorius (Milan, 1479), Lenten sermons:—*Comment. in XII Prophetas Minores, et in Apocalyp. S. Attala (or Attalas), St., second abbot of Bobbio (Bobium), was born in Burgundy. He first entered the Monastery of Lerins, and afterwards that of Luxeuil, where his friend St. Columbanus presided, whose fortunes he followed. In the year 612 Columbanus founded the Monastery of Bobbio, in the Milanese, and became the first abbot; and, upon his death, Attala was elected to succeed him. Many of his monks, finding the strictness of his rule to bear heavily upon them, withdrew; but several were induced to return by the miserable death which had overtaken some of their fellow-recluses. He died March 10, 627. See Baillet, March 10.

Attalia. The situation of this place made it a natural port of the adjacent region, and hence Paul readily found here a vessel coasting to Antioch, in Syria. See Lewin, Life and Letters of St. Paul, i, 155.

Attalus, St., one of the martyrs of Lyons in 577.

Attardi, Bonaventura, an Augustine monk, was born at St. Philip of Agire, in Sicily, and became professor of Church history in the University of Catania. In 1758 he was made provincial of his order in Sicily and Malta.

Attardi, Pietro, a learned priest of the Oratory, was born at Girgenti, in Sicily, in 1645. He was a man of intense application to study, taking no other sleep than he could get with his head resting on his books. His vast abilities and learning, and extraordinary memory, caused him to be much employed by his bishop in difficult matters. He died in 1714, leaving, among other works, Lectiones et Antiphonæ SS. Gregorii et Gerlandi, Episc. Agrigentinarum, a S. C. Rituum approbatæ et laudatæ.

Attenborough, THOMAS BEARDSLEY, an English Congregational minister, was born at Ilkestone in March, 1810. He had not the advantages of Christian nurture, and underwent many trials in his attempts to serve God. Against the wishes of every relative he had, in his seventeenth year he openly professed Christ, connected himself with the Wesleyan Church, and began to preach. In 1840 he adopted Congregational views, and did his first pastoral work at Hope Chapel, Wigan. He first settled at Sedburgh, and removed to Brampton, where he was ordained. In 1848 Mr. Attenborough accepted the pastorate of the Church at Winslow, Bucks, where he labored nine years, and then removed to Newark-on-Trent. Here he devoted his best powers to the Church until stricken down by paralysis. Mr. Attenborough died Sept. 25, 1874. He was a man of catholic spirit; a special friend of the humbler classes. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1875, p. 310.

Atthakathá is the title of a commentary on the sacred books of the Buddhists among the Singhalese, which, until recently, was regarded as of equal authority with the text. The text was orally preserved until the reign of the Singhalese monarch Watagamani, who reigned from B.C. 104 to B.C. 76, when it was committed to writing in the Island of Ceylon. The commentary was written by Budhagósha, at the ancient city of Anurádhapura, in Ceylon, A.D. 420. See Hardy, Eastern Monachism, p. 1, 167, 171, 187.

Attiret, JEAN DENIS, a French Jesuit and painter, was born at Dole, July 7, 1702. He studied at Rome, and had already produced some good pictures when he entered the Society of the Jesuits at Avignon. In 1737 he went to Peking, China, at the solicitation of the French Jesuit missionaries stationed there, and was employed by the emperor Kien Lung. He died at Peking, Dec. 8, 1768.

Attis (or Atys), a beautiful Phrygian shepherd and priest of the goddess Cybele, who was deified after his death and worshipped as the sun. Julian calls him the great god Attis, and Lucian mentions a golden statue of Attis placed among those of Bendis, Anubis, and Mithras, who were all adored as the sun. He is frequently joined with Cybele in ancient monuments, and is sometimes pictured alone, holding a pastoral pipe in his right hand and a crook in his left.

Atto, the Blessed, was a native of Badajoz, Spain, according to some, or of Florence, according to other writers, general of the Order of Vallombrosa, and raised to the see of Pistoja in 1133. After governing the Church for twenty years, he died in 1153. He wrote, Life of J. Gualbertus, the founder of his order (Madrid, 1612 [?]):—Life of St. Bernard, Abbot of St. Salvus, Bishop of Parma and Card.:—Quæ S. Bernardus, etiam Cardinalis Existens, pro sua Religione gesserit:—Letters:—On the Translation of the Relics and of the Miracles of St. James the Apostle. See Antonio, Bibl. Hisp. ii, 16; Negri, De Script. Florent. p. 72.

Atto (Acton, or Hatton), an Italian prelate, who was made in 945 bishop of VERCELLI, in Piedmont, and died about the year 960, is the author of Statuta Ecclesiæ Vercellensis, Collectio Canonum:—De Pressuris Ecclesiasticis:—Polypticus (πολύπτυχος, so called from its various contents);—a Commentary on Paul's Epistles:—Letters and Sermons. Some of these writings were published by D'Achery in his Spicilegium; a complete edition was published by count Buntont del Signore (Vercelli, 1768, 2 vols. fol.). Attributes of God are the several qualities or perfections of the divine nature. Some distinguish them into the negative, and positive or affirmative. The negative are such as remove from God whatever is imperfect in creatures; such are infinity, immutability, immortality, etc. The positive are such as assert some perfection in God which is in and of himself, and which in the creatures in any measure is from him. This distinction is now mostly discarded. Some distinguish them into absolute and relative; absolute ones are such as agree with the essence of God—as Jehovah, Jah, etc.; relative ones are such as agree with him in time, with some respect to his creatures—as Creator, Governor, Preserver, Redeemer, etc. But the more commonly received distinction of the attributes of God is into communicable and incommunicable ones. The communicable ones are those of which there is some resemblance in men—as goodness, holiness, wisdom, etc.; the incommunicable ones are such as there is no appearance or shadow of in men—as independence, immutability, immensity, and eternity.—Buck. See those different articles in this work.

Attwater, HENRY S., a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Kansas, was born at Blanford, Mass., in 1798. He was ordained by bishop Hobart in 1829; labored faithfully and acceptably in the churches at Malone, Little Falls, and Mount Morris, N. Y., and in those at New Preston, Bethany, Kent, and Poquetannock, Conn. He died at Cedar Vale, Dec. 28, 1879. See Whittaker's Almanac and Directory, 1881.

Attwood, THOMAS, a musical composer, was born in London in 1767. After receiving some elementary instruction, he was sent abroad to study at the expense of the prince of Wales, in 1783. He studied two years at Naples, and then proceeded to Vienna, where he became a favorite pupil of Mozart. On his return to London he became one of the chamber musicians to the prince of Wales. In 1795 he was chosen organist of St. Paul's, and the year following he became composer to the chapel royal. His court connection was further confirmed by his appointment as musical instructor to the duchess of York and afterwards to the princess of Wales. For the coronation of George IV he composed the anthem The King shall Rejoice. In 1821 king George appointed him organist to his private chapel at Brighton. Soon after the establishment of the Royal Academy of Music, Attwood was chosen one of its professors. He wrote the anthem O Lord, Grant the King a Long Life, which was performed at the coronation of William IV; and he was composing a similar work for the coronation of queen Victoria when he died, March 24, 1838. His services and anthems were published in a collected form, after his death, by his pupil Walmesley, and are frequently used in cathedral worship. See Encyclop. Brit. (9th ed.) s. v.

Atum (or Atmû) was the Egyptian deity of the setting sun, or darkness. He was called "the Sun who reclines himself," and was represented as an erect human figure wearing a crown composed of an expanded lotus, surmounted with four upright feathers, like those on the crown of Amen-Ra. He was specially adored at Heliopolis in Lower Egypt. He is also called TUM (q. v.).

Atwater, HORACE COWLES, a Presbyterian minister, was born at Homer, Cortland Co., N. Y., March 14, 1819. He studied for three years in the Yale Divinity School, and during these three years, being a licensed preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, preached in Westville and other neighboring places. He then spent twelve years in ministerial work in connection with the Methodist denomination in southern New England, being ordained at Fall River, Mass., April 3, 1847. In 1857 he went to the West, and was employed for some years in evangelistic work under the auspices of the Congregational churches. His longest settlement was in Alexandria, O., from 1861 to 1867. He labored chiefly in North Carolina and Tennessee under the direction of the Presbyterian Church, and in 1870 settled in Elizabethtown, Tenn., as stated supply of the Church there, but, after the presidential election of 1876, was dismissed from this relation as a penalty for his vote for president Hayes. He died at Elizabethtown, Feb. 7, 1879. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1879.

Atwater, JASON, a Congregational minister, was born in Mount Carmel Society, Hamden, Conn. He studied theology in the seminary of Yale College, and was ordained as pastor in Middlebury, Conn., Oct. 20, 1830. In October, 1845, he was dismissed from this charge. After this, he resided for several years in Newtown and Southbury, Conn., preaching to the Congregational churches in those towns. The latter days of his life were spent in West Haven, in the town of Orange, Conn. He died April 1, 1860. See Obituary Record of Yale College, 1860.

Atwater, Noah, a Congregational minister, was born at New Haven, Conn. He graduated at Yale College in 1774, where he was a tutor from 1778 to 1781. He was ordained pastor of the Church in Westfield, Mass., Nov. 21, 1781. His last sermon was preached on the twentieth anniversary of his ordination, and was published. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, i, 537.

Atwater, William W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Burlington, Vt., Feb. 15, 1814. He experienced conversion in 1832, received license to exhort and preach in 1841, and in 1842 united with the Troy Conference. In 1850 he located in his native town, and for six years followed printing. He published a Vermont Directory and the Vermont Courier, a newspaper. In 1856 he was again admitted into the Conference, and continued to serve in the pastorate until 1871, when, being appointed secretary of the Vermont State Temperance Society, he retired to Burlington and commenced the publication of the Vermont Witness. He died Aug. 3, 1878. Mr. Atwater was a man of tireless activity; he had a passion for work; was honest, fearless, pronounced, persistent, a champion in the temperance reform. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1879, p. 44.

Atwell, James, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Montville, Conn., June 11, 1797. He experienced religion early in life, and in 1826 entered the travelling connection of the Oneida Conference. In this relation he labored until his death, Feb. 7, 1860. Mr. Atwell excelled as a pastor; visiting the lowly, warning the ungodly, comforting the poor and distressed, and enlightening the doubting. He was a man of warm affections, sound common-sense, and well versed in theology. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1860, p. 167.

Atwell, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Grafton, N. H., March 26, 1788. He experienced conversion in early life, and in 1810 entered the East Maine Conference, in which he labored faithfully until 1859, when he became superannuated, and retired to Orono, Me., where he died, May 30, 1868. Mr. Atwell was a practical, diligent, devout, fluent, acceptable minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1868, p. 142.

Atwell, Paul P. M.D., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Haverhill, N. H., March 28, 1801. He experienced religion at the age of twenty-three while pursuing a medical education; received license to preach in his twenty-eighth year; and in 1843 entered the Troy Conference, which he served faithfully for a number of years, and then, taking a supernumerary relation, resumed the practice of medicine. In 1870 he retired to Schuylerville, where he died, June 13, 1873. Mr. Atwell was a good man, true to God and his Church. He was an able minister, and much beloved. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 65.

Atwill, William, a Protestant Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Western New York, was for a number of years a missionary in Bradford, N. Y., and parts adjacent. From 1866 he was rector of St. John's Church, Catharine, N. Y., which position he held until about 1870, when he returned to Bradford as rector of St. Andrew's Church; but in 1875 he removed to Dresden, N. Y., as rector of St. John's Church. About 1877 he removed to Elmira, N. Y., and in 1878 went to Dallas, Tex. His death occurred at San Antonio, Tex., April 19, 1879, at the age of eighty years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1880, p. 170.

Atwood, Anson S., a Congregational minister of Connecticut, was born at Woodbury, Aug. 1, 1790, and graduated at Yale in 1814. After spending some time in home missionary labor, he accepted a call from the Church at South Mansfield, where he was ordained in 1819. This was his only pastorate—one of almost forty-three years. During this period, he had seven revivals, and received into the Church four hundred and twenty-one persons. He died at East Hartford, July 22, 1866. Mr. Atwood was firm in his convictions of duty and in his opinions, a faithful preacher and laborious pastor, with a slight dash of eccentricity in his manner. See Cong. Quarterly, 1866, p. 389.

Atwood, John, a Baptist minister, was born at Hudson, N. H., Oct. 3, 1795. He was a graduate in the theological class connected with Waterville College in 1822. For two or three years subsequent to his graduation he preached as a supply in Readfield, Me., and in New London and Pittsfield, N. H. His ordination took place in New Boston, N. H., May 18, 1825. Here he remained as pastor eleven years. Subsequently he became pastor of the Church in Franconstown, and held the office one year; then removed to Hillsborough, where his ministry covered a period of seven years. About the year 1847 he was elected State-treasurer, and was in office six years, during a part of which time he served as chaplain of the State-prison. The Democratic party in New Hampshire, in 1851, nominated him as their candidate for governor of the State. Having given offence to the party by the utterance of his free-soil sentiments, he was abandoned by them. For about twenty years he lived on his farm in New Boston, occasionally preaching, as opportunity presented, until his death, which occurred April 28, 1873. Mr. Atwood was highly respected for character and talent. See Supplement No. 1 to the Colby University Obit. Record, p. 6. (J. C. S.)

Atwood, Thomas, a Baptist minister, was born at Plymouth, Mass., not far from the year 1810. In early life he followed the sea, and became first officer of several merchant-ships. Soon after the excitement connected with mining in California commenced, he went, in 1849, to the Pacific Coast, with a company made up of persons residing in the Old Colony, and there he remained for ten years. While there he was ordained to the work of the ministry, and spent several years in this capacity at Stockton, and labored as an evangelist among the miners. In 1859 he came back to the East, and for nearly twenty-five years he devoted himself, with but little cessation, to his ministerial work. His settlements, during this period, were in each of the New England states, Vermont and Maine excepted, and in the State of New York. He met with abundant success as a preacher of the Gospel, and witnessed repeated revivals of religion. He died at Marshfield, Mass., in the summer of 1880. See The Watchman, Sept. 16, 1880. (J. C. S.)

Aubermont, Jean Antoine, was a Dominican of the Low Countries, who took the habit at twenty years of age, in 1632, at Ghent. He studied at Cologne, and taught philosophy at Louvain, where he took his doctor's degree in 1652. Afterwards he was made apostolic missionary in Holland. He died suddenly in 1686, leaving many works, among them, Oratio Panegyrici in S. Thomam de Aquino (Louvain, 1650, 4to):—Doctrina quam de Primatu, Auctoritate, ac Infallibilitate R. Pont. tradiderunt Lovanienses, etc. (Liege, 1682, 4to):—Responsio Historico-theologica ad Cleri Gallicani de Potestate Ecclesias Declarationem Parisiis, 1682, factam, etc. (Cologne, 1683, 8vo):—a new edition of the Life of St. Rose of Lima, by P. Leo (Louvain, 1688, 12mo), etc.

Aubert, St. See AUDEBERTUS.

Aubert, bishop of AVRANCHES, lived in the early half of the 8th century. He founded Mont St. Michel, with which, according to the custom of the time, a legend is connected. Here he at first established canons; then the Benedictines. The body of St. Aubert was interred at Mont St. Michel. Being discovered more than three hundred years later, these remains attracted numerous pilgrims, among others Louis XI, who established on this occasion the Order of St. Michel. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aubert, Augustin, a French portrait, historical, and landscape painter, was born at Marseilles in the year 1781. His principal subjects are from sacred history, and are held in considerable estimation in France.

Aubert, François, Canon Regular and French scholar, was born in Paris in 1709, and died in 1770. He wrote, Entretiens sur la Nature de l'Âme des Bêtes (Colmar, 1756; and with a new title, Basle, 1760):—Refutation de Bélémire et de ses Oracles (J. J. Rousseau, Voltaire, etc.) (ibid. and Paris, 1768). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aubert, Michel, a Parisian painter and historical engraver, was born in 1700. He died in 1757. Some of his principal plates are, The Circumcision, after Ciro Ferri:—St. Francis, after Guido:—The Reconciliation of Jacob and Esau, after Jeurat.—Portraits: Elizabeth, Queen of England; Charles Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy; Charles Stuart.

Aubery, ANTOINE, a celebrated French parliamentary advocate, died in February, 1695. He published, a General History of the Cardinals (vol. i, 1642). In the following years he published four other volumes, and dedicated all to cardinal Mazarin, who, in return, granted him a pension. In 1649 he published a work on the pre-eminence of the kings of France over the emperor and the king of Spain:—A Life of Cardinal Joyeuse (1654):—A Life of Cardinal Richelieu (1660):—A Treatise on the Dignity of Cardinal (1673):—A Treatise on the Regule (cir. 1678):—and A Life of Cardinal Mazarin (1695). See Biog. Universelle, iii, 5; Dupin, 17th Cent.

Aubespine, GABRIEL DE L', a French prelate, was born in Paris, Jan. 26, 1579. He was the son of Guillaume d'Aubespine, baron of Châteauneuf. In 1604 he succeeded his kinsman, Jean d'Aubespine, in the bishopric of Orleans. He inherited a talent for negotiation, and was so successful that many affairs were intrusted to him. He assisted at the assembly of the bishops of the province of Sens in 1612, and there signed, with regret, the condemnation of the famous book of Richer. He died at Grenoble, Aug. 15, 1630. He wrote, De Veteribus Ecclesiæ Ritibus (1623):—De l'Antienne Police de l'Eglise sur l'Administration de l'Eucharistie:—Notes upon the canons of the several councils collected by Labbe:—also Notes upon Tertulian and upon Optatus of Milevia. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aubin, St., bishop of ANGERS, was born at Vannes, Brittany, in 469. He retired to the Monastery of Cincillac, since called Tintillat, of which he afterwards became abbot, and held that office for twenty-five years. In 529 the people of Angers almost forcibly compelled him to become their bishop, in which capacity he attended several councils; and signalized himself by his zeal against incestuous marriages, especially at the third Council of Orleans. He died in 550, and was buried first in the Church of St. Peter, but was afterwards translated to the Church of St. Stephen, thenceforward called St. Aubin's. He is commemorated March 1, the day of his death, and June 30, the day of his translation. See Baillet, March 1.

Aubin, Gabriel Jacques, a Parisian historical painter and engraver, brother of Augustin, was born in 1724. He engraved some plates from his own designs, the principal of which are, Six Statues of the Christian Virtues:—View of the Louvre Exhibition of Paintings in 1753.

Aubin, N., a French writer and Protestant minister, was born at Loudun near the middle of the 17th century. He took refuge in Holland after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes; and published a translation of the Life of Michael Ruyter, by Brandt, in 1698:—Dictionnaire de Marine (Amsterd., 1702):—Histoire des Diables de Loudun; ou, De la Possession des Religieuses Ursulines, et de la Condamnation et du Supplice d'Urbain Grandier, Curé de la même Ville (ibid. 1693). This subject, which met with a great deal of success, was afterwards published under the titles of Cruels Effets de la Vengeance du Cardinal de Richelieu (ibid. Roger, 1716), and Histoire d'Urbain Grandier (ibid. 1735). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aubrey, THOMAS, a Welsh Wesleyan minister, was born at Cefn-coed-y-mer, near Merthyr-Tydvil, May 13, 1808. He was received into the ministry in 1826; soon took a prominent place among the most popular preachers of his native land; was appointed chairman of the North Wales District in 1854; continued in that capacity for eleven years; devised the North Wales Chapel Loan Fund for the relief of encumbered Church property; became a supernumerary in 1865; and died at Rhyl, Nov. 15, 1867. "He was truly a great man, a mighty preacher, a faithful, wise, and loving pastor. His mental faculties were vigorous, penetrating, inventive, and logical. His application to study was intense, and of theology and philosophy he had a clear and comprehensive knowledge. God had endowed him with a remarkable gift of eloquence—an eloquence sometimes calm and subdued, at other times vehement and elevated. His native language he studied, its genius he admired; he discovered much of its neglected wealth, and wielded its oratorical force with ability and success. His sermons were prepared with care, elevated in conception, full of original thought, and delivered with emotion and energy." See Minutes of British Conference, 1868, p. 11.

Aubriot, JEAN, a French prelate, belonged to the family of the provost of Paris, Hugh Aubriot, and was raised to the bishopric of Châlon-sur-Saône at the commencement of the year 1336. He gained great favor with the duke Eudes of Burgundy, who greatly approved the counsel of this prelate. Eudes, who died in 1349, had made Aubriot the executor of his will. Aubriot died about 1351. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aubry, JEAN BAPTISTE, a French Benedictine of the Congregation of St. Vannes, was born at Deyvillier, near Épinal, in 1886, and became prior of the house of Commerce. He died about 1809. His works are, Questions Philosophiques sur la Religion Naturelle:—L'Histoire des Auteurs Sacrés et Ecclesiastiques:—and Questions Métaphysiques sur l'Existence et la Nature de Dieu.

Auch, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Auscense), was a council of the province called by Hugo the White, legate. It was ordered that all the churches of Gascony should pay a quarter of the tithe to the cathedral, St. Orens and a few others being exempted. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 1195.

Auchmuty, SAMUEL, D.D., a missionary of the Church of England, was born in Boston, Mass., in 1721. His father, Robert Auchmuty, a Scotchman, was a lawyer, and for several years a judge in the Court of Admiralty. Samuel received his education at Harvard College, graduating in 1742. Five years after he was ordained deacon by the bishop of London, and received an appointment as missionary from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. He became assistant to Dr. Barclay, rector of Trinity Church, New York city; and, also, was catechist to the colored population, entering upon his duties March 8, 1748. St. George's Chapel in Beekman Street being opened in 1752, Mr. Auchmuty and the rector supplied the two churches. In August, 1764, he succeeded Dr. Barclay, deceased; and shortly after his induction St. Paul's Chapel was opened for public worship. When the Revolution opened, he espoused the cause of the royal government. The American army having taken possession of the city of New York, April 14, 1776, he removed with his family to New Brunswick, N. J., where he remained until the British army, under general

Howe, regained possession of New York, in September following. Being anxious to reach the city, on account of loss of property by a fire, he vainly sought to pass the American lines. Compelled to escape by night, his health suffered from the exposure; and this was eventually the cause of his death, which occurred in New York city, March 4, 1777. See Sprague, Annals of the Amer. Pulpit, v, 127.

Auctor, a bishop, of whom nothing further is known, is commemorated as a saint in Bede's Martyrology on Aug. 9.

Auda, ANGELO, an Italian theologian, native of Lantosca, lived in the middle of the 17th century. He was secretary for the province of Romagna. He wrote, Octavarium Exercitiorum Spiritualium (Rome, 1660):—Commentarius in Regulam S. Francisci (ibid. 1664):—Bollarium Romanum Novissimum ab Urbano VIII usque ad Clementum X (ibid. 1672). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Audactus. See ADAUCTUS.

Audard, St. See THEODARDUS.

Audax (saint and martyr) was originally a magician, but is said to have been converted by St. Anatolia, a Roman virgin, and suffered for the faith by order of Faustianus, governor of the country of the Sabines, who had wished to employ him against that saint. See Baillet, July 9.

Audebert, ANN, a martyr, was taken, on her way to Geneva, and brought to Paris; and there, by the council, adjudged to be burned at Orleans, in 1549. When the rope was put around her neck, she called it the wedding girdle wherewith she was to be married to Christ. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 405.

Audebertus (Ausbertus, Autpertus, Aubert, or Haubert, probably the same originally as Albert), St., bishop of CAMBRAY and ARRAS in 663, is said to have been very charitable and religious. He founded many churches, and died in 668. He is commemorated on Dec. 16.

Audenaerd (or Oudenaerde), ROBERT VAN, a Flemish painter and engraver, was born at Ghent in 1663, and died there in 1743. He studied first under Francis van Mierhop, and subsequently with John Cleef. When quite young he visited Rome, and studied with Carlo Maratti, under whose instruction he became a reputable historical painter. He painted several pictures for the churches of Ghent, among which is the great altar-piece in the Church of the Carthusians, representing St. Peter appearing to the monks of that order, considered his best work. In the Church of St. James is a picture of St. Catharine Refusing to Worship the False Gods. The following are some of his principal plates: Portraits—Cardinal Sacripanti (1695); Cardinal Turusi; Cardinal Ottoboni. Subjects after different Italian masters—Hagar in the Desert; The Sacrifice of Abraham; Rebecca and the Servant of Abraham; David with the Head of Goliath.

Audentius, a Spanish bishop and theologian, probably lived in the second half of the third century. According to Gennadius, he wrote a treatise De Fide adversus Hæreticos, in which he vindicated the Trinity against the Manichæans, Sabellians, Arians, and Photinians. See Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Audhumbla. See AUDUMLA.

Audience, a court formerly held by the archbishops of either province of England; that of Canterbury was removed from the palace to the Consistory Place of St. Paul's. All cases, whether contentious or voluntary, which were reserved for the archbishop's hearing were tried here; and the evidence was prepared by officers called auditors. When the court was no longer held in the palace, the jurisdiction was exercised by the master and official of the Audience. He is now represented by the vicar-general, official of the Arches and Audience, whose court was held in the hall of Doctors' Commons.

Audifax (saint and martyr), was the son of Sts. Marius and Martha, also martyrs. He is commemorated on Jan. 20.

Auditor, in ecclesiastical phrase, is (1) a judge of the tribunal of the Rota at Rome; (2) of the Apostolic Chamber at Rome (Auditor Camere Apostolicæ); (3) of the court at Rome.

Auditory. (1.) A parlor. (2.) The alley of the cloister in which the Cluniacs and Cistercians kept the school of novices.

Audley, EDMUND, an English prelate, was educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, and in 1463 took the degree of A.B. In 1471 he became prebendary of Farendon in the Church of Lincoln, and in October, 1475, attained a like preferment in the Church of Wells. In the same year, on Christmas-day, he was made archdeacon of the East Riding of Yorkshire; in 1480 he was promoted to the bishopric of Rochester, and in 1492 was translated to Hereford; thence to Salisbury in 1502. About this time he was made chancellor of the Most Noble Order of the Garter. In 1518 he gave four hundred pounds to Lincoln College, and bestowed upon the same house the patronage of a chantry, which he had founded in the cathedral church of Salisbury. He contributed also to St. Mary's Church in Oxford. He died Aug. 23, 1524, at Ramsbury, in the County of Wilts.

Audradus MODICUS, chorepiscopus of Sens, lived in the 9th century, and is chiefly celebrated for the visions which he claimed to have had relating to the suspension of the intestine hostilities then prevalent in France. He visited Rome on that errand in 849. He was deposed, together with the other Gallican chorepiscopi, by a Council of Paris. His prophecies, or visions, were committed to writing, and will be found in Duchesne's Collection of French Historians, and in the Collection of Dom Bouquet, vii, 289. See New General Biographical Dictionary, p. 333; Hoefer, Nouvelle Biographie Générale, s. v.

Audran, Benoit, a French engraver, was born at Lyons in 1661, and was the second son of Germain Audran, from whom he at first received instruction. He afterwards studied under his uncle, the celebrated Gérard Audran. He was a member of the Academy of Painting, and was appointed engraver to the king. He died in 1721. The following are some of his principal religious subjects after various masters: The Baptism of Jesus Christ; The Rape of Dejanira; Moses and the Brazen Serpent; The Saviour with Martha and Mary; St. Paul Preaching at Ephesus; The Elevation of the Cross.

Audran, Charles, a Parisian engraver, brother of the elder Claude, was born in 1594. He visited Rome, when quite young, for improvement. He afterwards returned to France and settled in Paris, where he had wonderful success. He died in 1674. The following are a few of his principal sacred subjects after different masters: The Baptism of Christ; The Stoning of Stephen; The Conception of the Virgin Mary; The Virgin Mary and Infant Jesus Treading on the Serpent.

Audran, Claude, a French painter, third son of Claude, Sr., was born at Lyons in 1644, and died at Paris in 1684. He was employed by Lebrun in several sketches. His principal sacred pictures are, The Beheading of John the Baptist, and The Miracle of the Five Loaves. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Audran, Gérard (or Girard), a celebrated French engraver, the son of Claude the elder and the nephew of Charles, was born at Lyons in 1640. He probably studied under Carlo Maratti. He resided in Rome three years, and executed a portrait of Clement IX, which gained him so much reputation that the great Colbert, himself a liberal patron of the arts, invited Audran to return to Paris. After his return, he was appointed engraver to the king. He may be said to have carried the art to its highest perfection, especially in his large historical plates. He died in 1703. The following are a few only of his principal plates: Portraits and subjects from his own designs—Pope Clement IX, of the family of Raspigliosi; Andrea Argolus, S. Marci Eques.; St. Paul Preaching at Athens; Wisdom and Abundance, above two genii with a banner inscribed "Louis le Grand." Subjects from different masters—Moses and the Burning Bush; St. Paul Beaten by Demons; The Temptation of St. Jerome; St. Peter Walking on the Sea; The Woman Taken in Adultery; The Descent of the Holy Ghost. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Audran, Jean, a French engraver, was born at Lyons in 1667. He was the brother of Benoit, and the second son of Germain Audran. In 1707 he was appointed engraver to the king, with apartments in the Gobelins. He gained a high reputation, and died in 1756. The following are some of his chief sacred works after various masters: Our Saviour in the Bark Preaching; The Infant Saviour Regarding the Cross Presented by Angels; The Miracle of the Loaves; The Resurrection of Lazarus; The Resurrection of Christ; The Descent from the Cross; The Disciples at Emmaus. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Audran, Louis, a French engraver, third son of Germain, was born at Lyons in 1670. He first studied under his father, but finally under his uncle Gérard. He died at Paris in 1712. His chief sacred work is The Massacre of the Innocents. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Audry. See ALDRICUS.

Audry (or Etheldreda), saint and virgin, queen of Northumberland and abbess of Ely, was the daughter of Anna, king of the East Angles, who was slain in battle by the pagans in 654. Although twice married—first to Tumbert, a king of the East Angles, and secondly to Egfrid, king of Northumberland—she preserved, it is said, her virgin state, and obtained leave of her second husband to retire into the Abbey of Coldingham. She afterwards built a monastery on the Isle of Ely, in the river Ouse, which had been granted to her by Tumbert. Thomas of Ely, in his Historia Eliensis, says that this took place in the year 673, and that St. Audry collected both monks and nuns, and was made first abbess by St. Wilfrid of York. She died June 23, 679, and was honored by the Church of England as a saint within a short period of her death. See Baillet, June 23; Anglia Sacra, i, 594; Godwin, De Præs. Angl. p. 247.

Audry (St.) OF SENS. See ALDRICUS.

Audumla (or Audhumbla), in Norse mythology, was a cow which arose when the ice in Giunungap, the Northern Chaos, thawed. This cow licked the salt icebergs and thus created the first god, Bur. The latter produced Bór, who was the father of Odin. The giant Ymir was nourished by her milk.

Audur, in Norse mythology, was the son of the dark Not (night) and of Naglfari (air or ether). It is unknown in what relation his name, Audur (matter), stands to the doctrine of the creation.

Auer, JOHN GOTTLIEB, S.T.D., a missionary bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church for Cape Palmas, Africa, and parts adjacent, resided, in 1865, in Gambier, O., and the year following removed to Philadelphia. In 1867 he was appointed missionary to Cape Palmas; in 1870 was a missionary at Cavalho, Africa, and while in this station was elected, in 1872, bishop of the African Mission. He was consecrated in St. John's Church, Georgetown, D. C., April 17, 1873. He died Feb. 16, 1874, aged forty-one years. See Prot. Episc. Almanac, 1875, p. 144.

Auerbach, David, a Lutheran theologian of Germany, was born at Limelna, Sept. 2, 1599. He studied at Leipsic and Wittenberg, was in 1624 bachelor of theology, and in 1639 professor extraordinary. In 1640, when he was called as superintendent to Borna, he received the degree of doctor of divinity, and he died April 14, 1647. He wrote, Dissertatio Theolog. de Religione non Cogenda (Lipsiæ):—De Traditionibus non Scriptis Pontificiorum (ibid.):—De Votis Christianorum Oppositis Votis Monasticis (ibid. 1624):—De Dicto Habac. ii, 3 (ibid. 1639):—*Refutatio Tractatus Calviniani quem M. Auerbach, Isaac Levin, a Jewish rabbi of Germany, was born at Inowracław, in the duchy of Posen, about the year 1785. His primary education he received, according to the custom of the time, in the Talmudic schools of his country. At an early age he went to Berlin in order to acquire a more liberal education. For a long time he stood at the head of a Jewish girls' school at Berlin, and for over forty years was the leader of the Brüder Society. He was one of the first to introduce regular preaching into the German synagogues, and for over a quarter of a century he acted as preacher of the synagogue at Leipsic. He died at Dessau, July 5, 1853. He published, Sind dei Israeliten verpflichtet, ihre Gebete durchaus in hebräischer Sprache zu verrichten? (Berlin, 1818):—Die wichtigsten Angelegenheiten Israels, erörtert und vorgetragen in Predigten (Leipsic, 1828, etc.). See Fürst, Bibl. Jud. i, 72; Kayserling, Bibliothek jüdischer Kanzelredner, i, 19 sq.; Philippson, *Biogr. Augendus, a Carthaginian (Cyprian, Ep. 41) who joined against Cyprian in the faction of Felicissimus. In Epistle 42 he is excommunicated by bishop Caldonius, along with Repostus, Irene, Paulus, Sophronius, and Soliassus. Possibly the same Augendus (id. Ep. 44) reappears as a deacon of Novatians sent to Carthage with the presbyter Maximus. In this case he would, after his excommunication, accompany Novatus to Rome and join Novatian, and return, as Novatus did, to push the Novatianist cause against Cyprian.

Auger, EDMOND, a French Jesuit, was born in 1530 at Alleman, in the vicinity of Troyes. He became a Jesuit at Rome under St. Ignatius. He taught classical studies in Italy, and went to France in order to devote himself to the conversion of the Protestants. He was arrested at Valencia by the baron Des Adrets, and condemned to be executed, but was finally saved on account of his eloquence and power. One can but admire his zeal at Lyons in the midst of the pestilence. He became confessor and preacher of king Henry III, after whose death his superiors sent him to Italy. He was very fierce against the Huguenots, whom he tried to convert by all means. That he converted 40,000 Huguenots near Lyons is more than exaggeration. He died at Como, June 17, 1591. He wrote, Le Pédagogue d'Armes à un Prince Chrétien pour entreprendre et achever heureusement une Bonne Guerre Victorieuse de tous les Ennemis de son État et de l'Église (Lyons, 1568):—Des Sacramens de L'Église Catholique (Paris, 1567):—Catechismus Parvus, h. e. Summa Doctrinæ Catholicae, Græce et Latine (Lyons, 1852):—Metanalogie sur le sujet des Pénitents (Paris, 1584):—Breviarium Roma- Augmentation is a term in Scotch ecclesiastical law denoting a portion of the ancient tithes placed under the superintendence of the Court of Session, and granted by them to an incumbent, as they shall see cause. The ordinary way of obtaining it is to raise a process before the courts.

While impropriations were in the hands of monks and other ecclesiastical persons or bodies, the bishop had power to augment the endowment given by such impropriators to the vicarages of churches where they held the tithes and profits; nor is there any reason to doubt that the bishops in the present day possess the same power over impropriators, both lay and clerical. Such was the opinion of the law officers given to Morton, bishop of Durham. See Watson, p. 140, 305; Johnson, Clergyman's Vade-mecum, p. 82; Kennet, On Impropriations, p. 145.

Augsburg, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Augustanum). Augsburg (Augusta Vindelicorum) is a city of Swabia, and capital of a principality belonging to Bavaria, situated at the junction of the Wertach and the Lech, thirty miles north-west of Munich. Two councils were held there.

I. Held on Aug. 7, 952. Twenty-four bishops from Germany and Lombardy were present at it, among whom Uldaric, bishop of Augsburg, was the most illustrious. They made eleven canons. It was forbidden to all the clergy, from the bishop to the subdeacon, to marry, or to have women in their houses, or to keep dogs or birds for sporting, or to play at any game of chance. The sixth canon orders that all monks shall submit to the bishop of the diocese and receive his correction. See Labbe, Concil. ix, 635.

II. Held Nov. 12, 1548, by cardinal Otho, bishop of Augsburg, at Dillingen, on the Danube. Thirty-three regulations were drawn up relating to discipline and morality. Among other things, it was ordered that open sinners should be proceeded against canonically, and that those who were found incorrigible should be handed over to the grand-vicar; that the deans of chapters should watch over the conduct of the canons, and be careful to punish those who were guilty of drunkenness, gaming, debauchery, fornication, etc.; that those who were possessed of many benefices should resign all but one within a year; that those of the monks who neglected their rule and were guilty of drunkenness or immodest conduct, or who were suspected of heresy, should be corrected; that nuns and other female religious should not leave their nunneries, nor suffer any man to enter them unless for some absolute necessity; that preachers should not advance anything untrue or doubtful; that they should accommodate their sermons to the capacity of their hearers; that they should avoid all obscure and perplexing subjects; that one uniform order should be observed in the administration of the sacraments, and no money be taken for the same, according to the apostolical traditions, the ancient canons, laws, and usages; that none but serious tunes should be played upon organs; that everything profane should be entirely done away with in all solemn processions. See Labbe, Concil. xiv, 567.

Augulus (Augurius, or Augustus), an alleged martyr in Britain, bishop of Augusta or London, under Diocletian (Martyrol. Feb. 6).

Augur, an officer, among the ancient Romans, who performed divination by means of birds. Romulus is said to have appointed a college of augurs, three in number. To these Numa afterwards added two. The Ogulnian law, passed B.C. 300, increased the number to nine, five of them being chosen from the plebeians. In the time of the dictator Sulla they rose to fifteen, a number which continued until the reign of Augustus, when their number was declared unlimited except by the will of the emperor. An augur retained his office during life, and was distinguished by wearing a long purple robe reaching to the feet and thrown over the left shoulder. On solemn occasions a garland was worn upon the head. "The chief duties of augurs were to observe and report supernatural signs. They were also the repositories of the ceremonial law, and had to advise on the expiation of prodigies and other matters of religious observance. The sources of their art were threefold: first, the formulas and traditions of the college, which in ancient times met on the nones of every month; secondly, the augurales libri, books of the augurs, which were extant even in Seneca's time; thirdly, the commentarii augurum, commentaries of the augurs, such as those of Messala and of Appius Claudius Pulcher, which seem to have been distinguished from the former as the treatises of learned men from received writings." The college of augurs was finally abolished in the time of the emperor Theodosius. See DIVINATION.

Augurius, St. See AUGULUS.

Augustales, an order of priests instituted by the Roman emperor Augustus, whose duty it was to preside over the worship paid to the Lares and Penates. The same name was borne by another order of priests appointed by Tiberius to manage the worship paid to Augustus. They were chosen by lot from the principal persons of Rome, and were twenty-one in number. Similar priests were appointed to attend to the worship paid to other emperors who were deified after their death. The management of the worship was committed to the Sodales Augustales, while the sacrifices and other parts of the worship were performed by the Flamines Augustales.

Augusti, FRIEDRICH ALBRECHT (originally Joshua ben-Abraham Eschel), a Lutheran minister of Germany, was born June 30, 1691, at Frankfort-on-the-Oder. His Jewish parents educated him according to their custom. While yet a boy, he expressed a desire to go to Jerusalem. At that time a man by the name of Jecuthiel had come to Frankfort with a view of collecting money for his coreligionists in the Holy Land, who urged the boy's parents not to oppose his wishes. Permission having been granted, they both started for the Holy Land, but on the way our young traveller was attacked by a gang of Tartar robbers and made a slave. A coreligionist from Podolia redeemed him and set him free. From Smyrna he went to Poland, and continued his studies at Cracow and Prague. He returned to Frankfort before he undertook a journey to Italy; but in Sandershausen, on the night of Nov. 25, 1720, he was maltreated by a gang of robbers who had broken into the house in which he resided. On the following morning he was found, to all appearance, lifeless. He recovered, however, and during his continued stay at Sandershausen, he became acquainted with the superintendent of that place, the Rev. Dr. Reinhard, who finally became the instrument of leading Joshua to Christ. On Christmas-day, 1732, he was baptized under his new Christian name, his sponsors being the reigning princess and the prince Augustus of Schwartzburg-Sondershausen, the duke of Saxe-Gotha, the duchess of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel, and the princess-palatine Charlotte Christina. After his baptism, he decided on the study of divinity. He entered the gymnasium at Gotha, and in 1727 he commenced his theological studies at Jena and Leipsic. In 1729 he was appointed collaborator at the gymnasium in Gotha, and in 1734 minister of the parish of Eschberge, in the duchy of Saxe-Gotha, where he preached until his death, May 13, 1782. Augusti wrote Diss. de Adventus Christi Necessitate (Lips. 1794):—Aphorismi de Studiis Judæo- rum Hodiernis (Goth. 1731).—Das Geheimniss des Sam-buthion (Erfut, 1748).—Nachrichte der Karaiten (ibid. 1752).—Dissertationes Historicophilosoph. (ibid. 1753). His grandson was the famous theologian Johann Christian Wilhelm Augusti. The Life of Augusti has repeatedly been written by several writers and published in the form of a tract. See Delitzsch, Saat auf Hoffnung (1866); Axenfeld, Leben von den Todten (Barmen, 1874); The Life of Friedrich Albrecht Augusti (transl. by Macintosh, Lond. 1867); Barber, Redemption in Israel (ibid. 1844), p. 78 sq. (B. P.)

Augustin, CHRISTIAN FRIEDRICH BERNHARD, a Protestant theologian of Germany, was born at Gröningen, in Saxony, Nov. 28, 1771. He studied theology and history at Halle, and was at first teacher, then cathedral preacher, and since 1824 first cathedral preacher at Halberstadt. He was doctor of theology and philosophy, and a member of learned societies. He died at Halberstadt, Sept. 1, 1856. His Luther Collection was one of the finest libraries in the country, and the late king, Frederick William IV of Prussia, acquired it for Wittenberg, while his large archaeological collection was bought by the count Botho of Stolberg-Wernigerode. See Munsel, Gelehrten-Lexikon, vol. x-xxii; Zuchold, Bibl. Theol. i, 53; Allgemeine deutsche Biographie, s. v. (B. P.)

Augustine, a French martyr, was taken and examined at Bergues, in Hainault, and condemned to be burned at Belmont. Being tied to the stake, which was set on fire, he prayed heartily unto the Lord, and thus expired in 1549. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, iv, 391.

Augustine OF ALFELD, a monk of the order of St. Francis, flourished in the 16th century, and wrote many works, chiefly against Luther. Among them are, Liber quo, contra M. Lutherum, contendit Divino Jure Institutum hoc esse, ut Totius Ecclesiæ Christianæ Caput Romanus sit Pontifex (1520).—Pia Collatio cum Luthero super Bibliâ Novâ Alveldens. (Alvelde, 1528).—Pro Missa contra Lutherum.—De Communione sub utraque Specie, adversus eundem.—Expositio Cantici "Salve Regina," cujus Autor est Hermannus, a Membris Contractis, dictus Contractus, Monachus Ord. S. Bened. Seculi xi.

Augustine OF GAZOTHES, St., a Dominican and bishop of Zagrab, in Slavonia, and afterwards of Nocera, in Naples, was born at Trau, in Dalmatia, about 1259. He left his family and embraced the religious life in 1277 or 1278. In 1286 he was sent to Paris to complete his studies, where he gave himself up to reading in and meditating upon the Sacred Books, and to solitude, silence, and prayer. He soon became a successful preacher, and, in order to render this success more lasting, he caused to be erected monasteries in many parts of Dalmatia. Afterwards he passed into Italy, and thence to Bosnia, where he combated warmly the Manichæan errors. He also visited Hungary and arrested the progress of heresy and paganism in that distracted country. Pope Benedict XI made him bishop of Zagrab at a time when the northern countries were suffering from the incursions of the Tartars and all the evils consequent upon such a disturbed state. Augustine set himself to the work of reforming abuses and ameliorating the condition of his distracted diocese. He every year assembled a synod and visited on foot all parts of his diocese. In 1308 he was sent by pope Clement V, together with cardinal Gentili, to re-establish peace in the distracted Church of Hungary, and succeeded happily. He was present in the Council of Vienne in 1311, and in 1317 was translated to the bishopric of Lucera, in Italy. In this situation he conducted himself with the same piety, zeal, and humility, and died a holy death Aug. 3, 1323. He was canonized by pope John XXII, and is commemorated on Aug. 3. See Touron, Hommes Illust. vol. ii.

Augustine, MICHAEL OF SAINT, a Carmelite, was born at Brussels in 1621. He taught philosophy, and was the master of the novices, prior, and three times provincial of his order. He wrote, Introductio in Ter-rum Carmeli, etc. (Brussels, 1652; also in Dutch).—Institutionum Mysticarum Libri IV (Antwerp, 1671, 4to).—The Life of the Venerable Fr. Arnold.—and other works.

Augustine OF PAVIA (Ticinensis), a regular canon of the Congregation of Lateran in that city, died about 1520, leaving, Vita B. Monicæ, the mother of St. Augustine:—Elucidarium Christianarum Religionum:—Regula Sanctissimi Patris Augustini (all at Brescia, 1511). He is also said to have written Compendium Speculi Crucis, a commentary on the Psalm Deus in nomine tuo, and a Treatise on Learned Ignorance (Milan, 1603). His Chronicum Magnum remains unpublished. See Cave, Historia Literaria, ii, app. p. 224.

Augustine OF THE VIRGIN MARY, a Carmelite, was born at Léon, in Brittany, and took the vows at Rennes in 1640. He wrote, among other works, Theologiæ Thomisticæ Cursus (Paris, 1660, 6 vols. 12mo):—Privilegia omnium Religiosorum (Lyons, 1661, 8vo).

Augustine's Oak. CONFERENCES AT, between Augustine of Canterbury and the British bishops.

I. In A.D. 602 or 603, and probably at Aust on the Severn, or some spot near to it, with a view to induce the British bishops to give up their Easter Rule and to co-operate with Augustine in preaching to the Saxons. The first conference was only preliminary (Augustine, however, working a miracle at it, according to Bede) and led to

II. A more formal conference, shortly after, in the same year, at the same place, at which seven British bishops were present, with "many learned men," especially from Bangor monastery (near Chester), then under Dinoh as its abbot. On this occasion Augustine limited his demands to three, conformity in keeping Easter and in the baptismal rite, and co-operation in preaching to the Saxons; suppressing, if Bede's account is complete, all claim to the jurisdiction which Gregory the Great had bestowed upon him over the British bishops and saying nothing of the tonsure, but disgusting the Britons by refusing to stand up at their approach—a token, according to the words of a certain anchorite whom they had consulted, that he was not a man of God, and therefore was not to be followed. The conference accordingly broke up without any other result than that of drawing from Augustine some angry words, which unfortunately came true a dozen years afterwards, when he was dead, in the slaughter of the Bangor monks at Chester. The baptismal differences have been supposed to relate to trine immersion; by others to have referred to the washing of the feet, which the Britons are supposed to have attached to baptism; but both are conjectures only.

Augustinians (Augustiniani, Augustanenses), (1) the name given to those schools and divines who profess to follow the doctrine of St. Augustine on the subject of grace and predestination. They were divided into Rigid and Mitigated. See AUGUSTINIAN MONKS. (2.) Heretics of the 16th century, followers of the teaching of one Augustine, a sacramentarian. (3.) Disciples of Augustine Marlorat (q. v.), an apostate monk of the Order of Augustines.

Augustino (properly Augustin), Antonio, a Spanish prelate, was born at Saragossa, Feb. 25, 1516, of noble parents. He studied at various universities both in Spain and Italy, and acquired a high reputation in the civil and canon law, in languages, ecclesiastical history, and antiquities. Paul III made him auditor of the Rota, and in 1554 Julius III sent him as his nuncio into England. Paul IV made him bishop of Alifa, and in 1558 he became bishop of Lerida, in Spain. He attended the Council of Trent in 1562 and 1574, and in this last year was made archbishop of Tarragona, which see he governed till his death, in 1586. He is considered one of the greatest men that Spain has produced, and his piety and wisdom were equal to his learning. The following is a list of such of his works as relate to ecclesiastical subjects: III Antiquæ Collectiones Decretalium, cum Notis (Paris, 1610, 1631, fol.):—Constitutiones Provinciales et Synodales Tarraconensium (Tarragona, 1580, 4to):—Canones Penitentiales, cum Notis (ibid. 1582; Paris, 1641); this edition contains also the following work:—Epitome Juris Pontificis Veteris, in 3 pts. (Rome, 1611, 1614; Paris, 1641, 2 vols. fol.):—De quibusdam Veteribus Canonum Ecclesiasticorum Collectoribus Judicium ac Censura, contained in pt. ii of the preceding work:—De Emendatione Gratiani (Tarragona, 1586; Paris, 1672, 8vo, with the notes of Stephen Baluze):—Bibliotheca Ant. Augustini Librorum MSS. Græc. et Latin. Index (Tarragona, 1586, 4to):—Epistola ad Hieron. de Cæsar. Augustanæ Communis Patriæ Episcopis atque Conciliis, in cardinal Aguirre's work on the councils of Spain:—Notæ in Canones 72 ab Hadriano Papa I, etc., in the collection of Binius:—De Pontifice Maximo, Patriarchis, et Primatibus, etc. (Rome, 1617, fol.):—De Perfecto Juris Consulto et Episcopo (Paris, 1607, 4to):—Breviarium Horæ et Ordinarium Eccl. Ilerdensis:—Institutiones Juris Canonici:—A History of the Greek and Latin Councils. See Antonio, Biblioth. Hisp.; Nicéron, vol. ix.; Magna Bibl. Eccl. (Geneva, 1734), s. v.; Dupin, Hist. Eccl. Writers, iii, 743; Collier, Hist. Dictionary, vol. iv.

Augustino (or Agostino), Giuseppe, a Jesuit of Palermo, born in 1573, left Nucleus Casuum Conscientiæ, etc. (Palermo, 1638, 16mo), and two volumes of Commentaries on the Summa of St. Thomas.

Augustino (Agostino), Ottavio d', a priest of Palermo, doctor in theology and apostolic protonotary, was born in 1615. He refused the bishoprics of Lipari, Massa, and Ischia, but held, among other appointments, that of consultant of the Congregation of the Index at Rome. He died in 1682, leaving some works in Italian and Latin of no great importance.

Augustinus is the name of several Christian saints. (1.) Martyr at Nicomedia, commemorated May 7. (2.) Bishop of Canterbury and confessor, apostle of England, May 26. (3.) Commemorated at Rome Aug. 22. (4.) Bishop of Hippo, confessor, Aug. 28. (5.) Presbyter, Oct. 7. (6.) Bishop in Cappadocia, Nov. 17. See AUGUSTINE.

Augustinus Patricius (1), of the family of Piccolomini, bishop of Pienza in the 15th century, wrote the Life of Fabianus Bentius and an Account of the Reception of the Emperor Frederick III by Paul II at Rome, both of which are given by Mabillon in his Museum Italicum, i, 251. He also wrote a work on the ceremonies of the Church of Rome, entitled Ceremoniale Romanum, which Marcellus, archbishop of Corfu, afterwards attributed to himself. Mabillon gives this book also. See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, app. p. 193; Dupin, Hist. Eccles. Writers, iii, 75.

Augustinus Patricius (2), Cave makes to be the same with the last, but Dupin expressly says is different from him, and that he was secretary of cardinal Piccolomini. He flourished about 1480, and wrote a History of the Assembly of Ratisbon, where he was present with the cardinal whom Paul II sent to demand succor of the Germans against the Turks. He also wrote, at the desire of his master, a History of the Councils of Basle and Florence, which is given in Labbe, xiii, 1488. See Cave, Historia Literaria, Augustus, the name of several saints in various church calendars. (1.) Of Alexandria, Jan. 11. (2.) Martyr, commemorated May 7. (3.) Confessor, commemorated at Bourges, Oct. 7.

Augustus, St., was a priest of BERRY in France, who was crippled in his hands and feet. On this account he received much alms of the faithful, with which he built, in the village of Brives in Berry, a chapel in honor of St. Martin, and as a reward for this devout act is said to have been miraculously restored to the use of his limbs. Upon this, Augustus dedicated himself wholly to the service of God, and gathered around him a few others who were desirous to lead a religious life with strictness, upon the monastic plan. He became afterwards abbot of St. Symphorianus, near Bourges, and died in 560. See Baillet, Oct. 7.

Augutorrah Rhade Shaista (the eighteen books of divine words), in Hindû literature, is a commentary on, or explanation of, the holy books of the Hindûs. The Vedas, which recommend this work, were written about 3000 years B.C.; the Augutorrah about 1500 years later: and facts which are simply related in the former are allegorically revised in the latter.

Aulber, MATTHÆUS, a German theologian, was born at Blaubeuren in 1495. When he had completed his studies he went to Wittenberg, where he attached himself to Luther and Melancthon. The following year he preached at Reutlingen the doctrines of the Reformation, and induced the city to adhere to the Confession of Augsburg. In 1535 the duke of Wurtemberg made him Protestantizer of the duchy; then he preached at Reutlingen for twenty-nine years. He afterwards became preacher at the Cathedral of Stuttgart, but retired in 1562 because he did not recognise the real presence in the eucharist. He wrote Viu Compendiaria Reconciliandi Partes de Cæna Domini Controversantes, in the Acta et Scripta Publica Ecclesiæ Wurtembergicæ (Tübingen, 1720). See Hoefler, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Auld, Donald J., a Presbyterian minister, was a native of South Carolina. His classical education was received in Charleston, S. C., and he graduated at Charleston College in 1829. After graduation, he studied medicine, received his diploma in 1833, and went to Memphis, Tenn., with a view of engaging in the practice of his profession. He was attacked with disease and returned to Charleston. In 1835 he was converted and joined the Church, and, feeling it his duty to preach, he entered the theological seminary at Columbia, and graduated in 1839. He was licensed to preach soon after, and receiving a call from the Wapataw Church, near Charleston, was ordained and installed pastor; was afterwards pastor of Harmony and Brownston churches in Sumter District. In 1848 he resigned, and accepted the charge of Purity Church in Chester District, which he retained five years, then removed to Madison. He accepted a call from Tallahassee, Fla., and died in 1857. (W. P. S.)

Auld, J. T. W., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born June 13, 1816. He experienced religion in 1832, began preaching in 1834, and in 1836 entered the Pittsburgh Conference, of which he remained a member until 1842, when he was transferred to the Missouri Conference. In 1847 he was retransferred to the Pittsburgh Conference, and in 1853 to the Kentucky Conference, in which he labored one year and then located. He next went further south to recover his health and united with the Memphis Conference. In 1861 he joined the Kansas Conference, and labored with his usual zeal and fidelity until his death, in 1862. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1862, p. 23.

Ault, Horatio, an English Congregational minister, was born at Uttoxeter, Nov. 9, 1806. When about the age of twenty-four he joined the Independent Church at Lichfield, and began preaching in the neighboring villages. A few years later Mr. Ault removed to Derby, where he devoted himself earnestly to Christ's service. In 1835 he removed to Repton, and in the following year was ordained. Here he labored twenty years. In 1854 he was invited to Kilsley, where he remained fourteen years, only leaving it when his health failed. His death occurred on June 4, 1871, at Scaldwell, near Northampton, where he had gone in 1868 for rest and recuperation. See (Lond.) Cong. Year-book, 1872, p. 304.

Ault, William, an English Wesleyan missionary, was converted in early life, entered the ministry in 1808, and on Dec. 30, 1813, sailed as one of six missionaries who were to introduce Methodism into Ceylon. On the passage Ault's wife died, and her remains were committed to the deep. Mr. Ault was sent to Batticaloa, a small island on the east coast of Ceylon. His sufferings and privations on his passage thither severely shook his constitution. He labored, however, for eight months, when he sank under disease (April 1, 1815). "Possessing rare qualifications for the work he had undertaken, his success in raising a respect for and an observance of at least the external form of religion was truly remarkable. . . . By the establishment of eight schools for the education of Hindû children, and by his overcoming the prejudices of their parents so as to succeed in introducing the New Test. as the only school-book of the more advanced scholars, he has laid the foundation for the propagation of our faith" (Ceylon Gov't Gazette). See Harvey, Cyclop. of Missions, 1854, p. 234 sq.; Minutes of British Conference, 1816.

Aunacharius (or Aunarius), St., bishop of Auxerre, was of a rich and noble family of Orleans. After living some time at the court of Gunthram, king of Burgundy, he placed himself under the discipline of Syagrius, bishop of Autun. He made such advances in knowledge and piety that in 571 or 572 he was chosen to succeed St. Etherius, bishop of Auxerre. In 578 he convoked a synod of the abbots and priests of his diocese, in which forty-five canons of discipline were drawn up. He died Sept. 25, 605, on which day his festival is marked in the martyrologies. His remains were buried at Auxerre; but were afterwards disinterred and enclosed in a golden chest, which was plundered by the Hungarians in 1567. The relics, partially dispersed, are said to have been preserved in a hollow pillar in the crypt. See Baillet, Sept. 25.

Aundlang. The cosmogony of the ancient Norse people speaks of a threefold heaven. The lowest, in which the deities and heroes dwell until the destruction of the world, is called Asgard; the second is Aundlang, in which the Asas, as many as survive the great and frightful battle with the sons of Muspelheim after the great night Ragnarok, will dwell; and Gimle is the third and real heaven.

Auræ (the airs), a sort of aerial beings resembling the sylphs of modern poetry. Their chief discrimination is the veil they either hold in their hands or else wave over their heads. They usually occur on the painted ceilings of the ancients.

Aurand, HENRY, a Presbyterian and Reformed minister, was born at Reading, Pa., Dec. 4, 1805. He entered Princeton Seminary in 1824, and remained there a little more than one year; he then left and took a collegiate course at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., where he graduated in 1830. He next studied theology with Dr. George Duffield, of Carlisle. During the years 1831 and 1832 he taught in the Deaf and Dumb Asylum in Philadelphia. He prepared to labor in the German Reformed Church, and was licensed and ordained by the Classis of Zion. In 1833 he supplied the Presbyterian Church at Taneytown, Md.; in 1834 accepted a call to become pastor of the German Reformed Church at Carlisle, where he was installed, and labored fifteen years; in 1849 became pastor of what was termed the Benders and Bendersville charge, in Adams Co., Pa., consisting of no less than seven churches, scattered around so as to be about eight miles distant from each other. His usual Sabbath work for nearly seven years was a ride of about twenty miles and three sermons. In 1856 he removed to New Berlin, Pa., and for nearly two years had charge of the German Reformed Church at that place. About 1858 he began to preach in the Rivington Street Church in New York city. After preaching here nearly two years, he removed to Columbia, N. Y., and took charge of the Reformed Dutch Church, which he served until the spring of 1863, and then removed to Illinois. Here he had no regular field of labor, but filled vacancies here and there for a short time. In June, 1876, he went to Fulton County to supply several destitute places with the Gospel, expecting to be gone three months. He was soon taken ill, and returned to his home at the end of four weeks, and died Oct. 8, 1876. He was a true and faithful minister of Christ, and was never so happy as when preaching the Gospel. See Necrology of Princeton Theological Seminary, 1877, p. 20; Corwin, Manual of the Ref. Church in America, p. 168.

Aurbode, in Norse mythology, was a giantess, the wife of the giant Gymer, and mother of the most beautiful giant maiden Gerda, whom Freir chose as his wife.

Aurea (1), saint, virgin, and martyr, was a Spanish nun in a monastery near Cordova. Her parents, who were Saracens, themselves, in 856, carried her before the judge and accused her of being a Christian. For a moment she was frightened and promised everything, but quickly repented, and evinced the firmest determination to abide in the true faith; whereupon she was beheaded, July 19, 856. See Baillet, July 19.

Aurea (2), St., abbess of St. Martial at Paris in the time of Dagobert I and Clovis II. St. Eligius in 633 founded a nunnery at Paris in honor of St. Martial of Limoges, where he gathered together three hundred nuns and placed them under the conduct of St. Aurea, who governed them until the year 666, when, together with one hundred and sixty of the sisters, she died of the plague. Her body is preserved in the Church of St. Martial, which afterwards was dedicated in part under the name of St. Eligius and given to the Barnabites. Originally St. Aurea was commemorated on the supposed day of her death, viz. Oct. 4; but when that day was appropriated to the commemoration of St. Francis, she was transferred to the next day. See Baillet, Oct. 4.

Aurelia, saint and virgin, was a relative of St. Adrius, martyred at Rome in the year 257, who, having come to Rome from Greece, passed thirteen years in watching and praying, day and night, at his tomb, at the end of which time she died, and was buried with him. She is commemorated Dec. 2. See Baillet, Dec. 2.

Aurelian, St., bishop of ARLES, was born in that city in 499, and succeeded Auxanus in that see in 546. Pope Vigilius esteemed him so highly that he at once sent him the pallium without waiting for the request, and made him his vicar and legate in the kingdom of Childebert. Aurelian, with the king's aid, restored and maintained discipline in the Church, and built two monasteries at Arles, besides other religious houses. In 549 he attended the Council of Orleans, and died June 16, 551. He wrote two rules for the convents he had founded, which are found in the collection of Holstein and in the Annals of Le Coindre. A letter to king Theodebert is found in Freher and in the collection of Duchesne. Some writers erroneously confound him with Aurelian of Lyons, who lived at the end of the 9th century. See Baillet, June 16.

Aurelio, LUDOVICO, an Italian ecclesiastic, was a native of Perugia and canon of St. John of Lateran. He was considered by pope Urban VIII one of the most learned historians of his age. He published an abridgment of Turselin's Universal History in 1623, another of Baronius's Annals, and another of Bzovius's great work on ecclesiastical history (9 vols. fol.). He died at Rome in 1637.

Aurelius, saint and martyr, a Spaniard, was the companion of St. George the Deacon, and was martyred by the Saracens in the 9th century.

Aurelius, ST., bishop of CARTHAGE, was born in Italy or Gaul, and retired to Italy in order to give himself up more completely to the service of God. About the beginning of the year 392 he was elected to succeed Genethlius. He was the intimate friend of St. Augustine, to whom he wrote immediately after his election to demand his prayers and counsel. He assembled various councils, and labored much for the conversion of the Donatists and Pelagians. His death occurred in the year 425 or 426, and he is commemorated in the ancient calendar of the Church of Carthage on July 20. See Baillet, July 20.

Auremond, a French hagiographer, abbot of Maire, native of Channay (Poitou), lived at the close of the 6th and the commencement of the 7th century. It is said that St. Junien, first abbot of Maire, predicted his birth and destiny, regarded him as his son, and instructed him in religion and literature. Auremond was ordained priest, and in 587 succeeded St. Junien as abbot of the Monastery of Maire, and followed the example of his predecessor. He wrote the Life of St. Junien; the portion of which still extant is published with that written by Boëtius. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aureus Codex, a Greek MS. of the Gospels. The royal library at Stockholm has for a long time possessed this splendid codex, whose contents were not known until the year 1875, when J. Belsheim betook himself to the examination of the same, the results of which he published under the title Codex Aureus, sive quatuor Evangelia ante Hieronymum Latine Translata. E Codice Membranaceo partim Purpureo ac Litteris Aureis inter extremum quintum et inter septimum seculum, ut videtur, scripto, qui in Regia Bibliotheca Holmiensi asservatur. Nunc primum examinavit atque ad verbum transcripsit et edidit (Christianæ, 1878). This codex, as the title indicates, contains the four gospels (Luke xxi, 9-30 excepted) in a Latin translation before the time of Jerome. This is Mr. Belsheim's opinion. Mr. Gebhardt, however, in a review of this publication in Schürer's Literaturzeitung, 1878, p. 359 sq., is rather inclined to think that this codex belongs to a later date than Jerome's Vulgate; and, to make his assertion good, he quotes a number of passages in which the Codex Aureus agrees with the Vulgate. When and where the codex was written is yet an open question. After all, this publication is a valuable contribution to the text of the New Test.; and Mr. Belsheim's Prolegomena, comprising fifty-six pages, contain a great deal of valuable information. See MANUSCRIPTS, BIBLICAL, (B. P.)

Aurifaber (Germ. Goldschmidt) is a name common to a number of German theologians and scholars of the Reformation period.

1. ANDREAS, elder brother of Johannes (1), was born in 1512 at Breslau. He studied at Wittenberg, where he enjoyed the friendship of Melancthon. Having completed his philological studies, he betook himself to the study of medicine at Padua, and after his return was appointed in 1546 court-physician to duke Albrecht of Prussia, and professor of physical sciences and medicine at the Königsberg University. His influence upon the duke was very great, and he strongly influenced his lord and master in the Osiandrian controversy; and this the more so since he was the son-in-law of Andreas Osiander. When he was rector of the university in 1554, the professors were appointed from the rank of Osiandrians, and the opponents were deposed, even Melancthon's son-in-law, Sabinus, having to leave. Aurifaber was attacked by Flacius in 1555 in his Christliche Warnung und Vermahnung an die Kirche Christi in Preussen, who called him a dog's physician who treated the ministers of the Church at his pleasure. The more he was attacked, the higher he rose in the favor of his master; and when he suddenly died, Dec. 12, 1559, the Osiandrian party had lost its strongest supporter in Prussia. See Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.; Hartknoch, Preuss. Kirchengeschichte, p. 821 sq.; Baczko, in Ersch und Gruber, vi, 417.

2. JOHANNES (1) was born at Breslau, Jan. 30, 1517. He studied at Wittenberg, where he became greatly attached to Melancthon. Having taken the degree of master, he commenced lecturing in the philosophical faculty, and was appointed its dean in 1548. In 1550, at the recommendation of Melancthon, Aurifaber was called to Rostock as professor of theology and pastor of St. Nicolaus's. Before he went there, he received the degree of doctor of theology, having presented for his thesis Disputatio de Ecclesia. In 1554 he was called to Königsberg, a time when the Osiandrian controversy was in vogue. His position was a trying one. He strove to mediate between both parties, but in vain. At last he left Königsberg for his native city in 1565, where he soon was appointed pastor of St. Elizabeth's and inspector of the churches and schools. He died Oct. 19, 1568. Aurifaber was a man of great practical talent. See Baczko, in Ersch und Gruber, iv, 417; Corpus Reformat. vol. vi-x; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.

3. JOHANNES (2), a zealous Lutheran, and editor of Lutheran works, was born about the year 1519. Having studied at Wittenberg, where he attended the lectures of Luther, Melancthon, and Bugenhagen, he acted for some time as tutor of the count of Mansfeld (1540-44), and as chaplain during the French war. After his return, he became Luther's famulus, accompanied him to Eisleben, and witnessed his death. The position which he took after his master's death was not surprising. In the controversies which soon followed, he sided with the Flacians against the Philippists, Osiandrians, etc. In 1561 Aurifaber was dismissed, and was appointed in 1566 pastor at Erfurt, where he died, Nov. 18, 1575. The Lutheran Church is indebted to Aurifaber for the German and Latin edition of Luther's works which appeared at Jena, 1555-58. In 1562 and 1565 he published two volumes of German writings of Luther, which were wanting in the editions of Jena and Wittenberg; and in 1556 the first volume of Luther's Latin letters, which was followed by a second in 1565. In 1566 he also published Luther's Colloquia, or table-talk. See Motschmann, in Erfordia Literata (2d collection, Erfurt, 1730), p. 211 sq.; Erhard, in Ersch und Gruber, vi, 416; Bindseil, in his edition of Luther's Tischreden, edited in connection with Fürstemann, iv, p. xx sq.; Frank, Gesch. der protest. Theologie, vol. i; Preger, Flacius, vol. ii; Herzog, Real-Encyklop. s. v.; Lichtenberger, Encyclopédie des Sciences Religieuses, s. v. (B. P.)

Aurifex (or Aurifex, Ital. Buonfigli), NICHOLAS, an Italian theologian, was born at Sienna in 1529. He belonged to the order of Carmelites and distinguished himself as a preacher. In 1565 he taught theology in Florence, and in 1578 he became dean of the faculty, then provincial for all Tuscany. He died in 1601. Aurifex wrote, among other works, De Dignitate Vitæ et Moribus Clericorum (Venice, 1568; Cologne, 1610):

—Meditazioni di Diversi Dottori di S. Chiesa, Tradotte e Corrette (Venice, 1583, 1596):—Somma Aurifica (ibid. 1603). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aurillac, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Aureliacum). This is a town in Haute-Auvergne where two councils were held—viz. one in 1278, against exemptions (Martène, Thes. vol. iv), and the second in 1297, under Simon, archbishop of Bourges, to afford succor to the king (ibid. p. 214).

Aurinus, VICENZIO, an Italian theologian and Dominican, was a native of Aquila and lived in the latter half of the 17th century. He wrote, Del Corso de' Mortali all' altra Vita, e de' Novissimi Ragionamenti cinque (Vico, 1598). See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aurivillius, MAGNUS, a Swedish theologian, was born in 1673. He accompanied Charles XII to Pultowa and to Bender as chaplain, and was witness of the famous resistance which the Swedes offered to the Turks. He was also a member of the tribunal which condemned the baron of Görtz to capital punishment as the accomplice of Charles XII in his ambitious projects. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aurmt, in Norse mythology, is one of the streams called Elivagar enclosing the Poison River.

Aurnaud DE VERDALA, born of an ancient family of Carcassonne, and bishop of Maguelone (or Montpellier) in 1339, died in 1351, leaving a Commentary or History of the Bishops of Maguelone, printed by P. Gariol in his work on the bishops of Maguelone and Montpellier (Toulouse, 1665, 2 vols. fol.). See Cave, Hist. Lit. ii, ap. p. 36.

Aurogallus, MATTHÆUS, a German philologist, who died at Wittenberg, Nov. 11, 1543, is the author of, Compendium Grammaticæ Hebrææ et Chaldææ (Wittenberg, 1525, 1531):—De Ebræis Urbium, Regionum, Populorum, Fluminum, Montium et aliorum Locorum Nominibus (ibid. 1526; enlarged ed. Basle, 1539). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, s. v.; Steinschneider, Bibliographisches Handbuch, s. v. (B. P.)

Aurora (Gr. Ἑως), in Greek and Roman mythology, is the goddess of twilight, who brings up the light of day from the east. She was the daughter of the Titan Hyperion and his sister Theia, or his sister Euryphaessa. She was sister to Helios (god of the sun) and to Selene (goddess of the moon). She is the constant companion of the god of the sun, opening the golden door with rosy fingers and strewing roses in his path. By Astræus she was mother of the winds Zephyr, Boreas, and Notus, and also of Hesperus and of the constellations. Besides this, she favored four mortals and gave birth by them to children. The first was Orion, whose love she only had for a short time, as Diana slew him with her arrows; another was Clitus, son of Mantius, whom she brought to the place of the immortal gods because of his beauty; a third was Tithonus, the son of Laomedon, king of Troy; the fourth was Cephalus, whom she abducted from his wife Procris and later returned again, and by whom she had a son, Phaethon.

Ausbertus. See ASPERTUS; AUTPERT.

Auscense, CONCILIUM. See AUCH.

Auschend was a deity of the ancient Prussians and Lithuanians of whom little is known, but he is believed to have been implored by the sick for help.

Auska, in Slavonic mythology, is a goddess belonging to the attendants of Perun, or Perkun, the god of thunder. She personifies the morning and evening twilight, and with Breksta, the night, she forms the period of twenty-four hours which we call day.

Ausonius, Sr., first bishop of Angoulême, was a disciple of St. Martial of Limoges, and may be called the apostle of Aquitaine. He lived in the time of the emperor Gallianus, when Chrocus, king of the Germans, made an irruption into Gaul and martyred many of the faithful, among whom was Ausonius. He is commemorated June 11. See Baillet, June 11.

Auspices (Lat. avis, a bird, and specio, to look at), originally divination by birds, but subsequently all kinds of augury. See AUGURS. Among the ancient Romans, the singing of birds, the direction of their flight, the very motion of their wings, were viewed as having a meaning which was, in some cases, capable of being explained by all, but in others only explicable by the regularly authorized augurs. Auspices were taken on every occasion of importance, such as the entering upon expeditions, the celebration of marriage, the election of magistrates, the undertaking of war, and many others. At an early hour the augur went forth to an open place on the Palatine Hill, or perhaps in the Capitol, and, with his head veiled and a rod in his hand, he pointed out the divisions of the heavens and solemnly declared corresponding divisions on the earth. This augural temple, as it was called, was then separated into four parts—east and west, north and south. A sacrifice was offered, at the close of which a set form of prayer was repeated, when the signs were expected to appear. On his way home, if the augur came to a running stream, he again repeated the form of prayer and purified himself in its waters. Sometimes on a military expedition the auspices were taken from the feeding of tame birds in a cage. If on throwing them pulse they refused to eat, or uttered a cry, or fluttered with their wings, the sign was unfavorable; but if they ate with avidity, striking the earth quickly and sharply with their bills, the sign was favorable. A favorable omen was sometimes obtained by previously keeping the birds without food for some time. See DIVINATION.

Auspicius, Sr., bishop of Toul, was one of the most learned prelates of his time. He was the friend of Sidonius Apollinaris, who is mentioned in his Letters. He died in 474. The first volume of the collection of Duchesne contains an epistle in verse of St. Auspicius, addressed to the count Arbogastes, then governor of Treves. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Ausschweyt was one of the twelve deities of the ancient Prussians and Lithuanians whom they implored in time of poor harvests.

Aussigny, THIBAUD D', bishop of Orleans, lived near the latter half of the 15th century. He is the one, without doubt, who conducted Villon to the prison of Meung-sur-Loire. He wrote, Histoire du Siège d'Orléans et des Faits de Jeanne la Pucelle:—Diplomata de Processione pro Libertate Urbis Aureliana, which is found in the Library of the Vatican, No. 770. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Aurora.

Austen, Andreas, a Reformed theologian of Germany, was born at Dantzic, July 25, 1658. He studied at different universities, and in 1685 was appointed pastor at Möllenbeck, near Rinteln. In 1686 he was appointed professor of Greek and Oriental languages at Rinteln, and in 1690 was called to Elberfeld, where he died, Sept. 6, 1703. He wrote, Τριας Questionum: An Adamus ante Evam habuerit Uxorem, quæ Appellata Lilith? An καταλυσις Noachi fuerit Universalis an Particularis? An Moses fuerit Cornutus (Rinteln, 1688):—Samuel Personatus, sive Diss. de Apparitione Samuelis, ex 1 Sam. xxviii (ibid. eod.):—Diss. Philol. de Velamine Mulieris, ex 1 Cor. xi, 10 (ibid. 1690):—De Mortis Genere quo Judas Proditor Vitæ suæ Colophonem imposuit (ibid. 1688):—Theses Philolog. de Lingua Omnium Prima Hebræa (ibid. 1690):—and Continuatio I de Lingua Hebræa Appellationibus (ibid. 1690). See Jöcher, Allgemeines Gelehrten-Lexikon, suppl. s. v.; Strieder, Hessische Gelehrten-Geschichte. (B. P.)

Auster, in Roman mythology, is the Latin name for Nóros, the south wind; represented as son of Aurora and Astræus. See Notus.

Austin, Benjamin, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, was born in 1836. He received his theological training at Gambier, O., and was admitted to the order of deacons by bishop McIlvaine Aug. 4, 1850. Subsequently he was minister of the parishes in Mansfield and Painesville, O., after which he removed to Swansea, Mass., and became rector of Christ Church. Resigning his charge after a year's service, he accepted a call to the rectorship of St. James's Church in Amesbury, Mass., where he officiated for two years, and died Dec. 18, 1855. His character was marked by fervent piety. See Amer. Quar. Church Rev. 1855, p. 160.

Austin, David Rogers, a Congregational minister, was born at Bridgeport, Conn., Feb. 28, 1807. He graduated at Union College in 1827, and at Yale Seminary in 1830; was ordained at Ludlow, Mass., in 1833; dismissed Sept. 5, 1836; installed at Sturbridge, May 1, 1839; dismissed Oct. 1, 1851; installed at South Norwalk, Conn., May 18, 1853, and dismissed in 1866. After this he remained without charge, and died Nov. 8, 1879. See Statistics of Cong. Ministers, 1879.

Austin, James B., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Surrey County, N. C., Aug. 16, 1806. He experienced religion at the age of ten; received license to exhort in 1824, to preach in 1826, and in 1828 was admitted into the Ohio Conference. He became a supernumerary in 1848, in 1853 retired from active service, and finally settled at Logan, O., where he died, Sept. 27, 1857. Mr. Austin was a plain, practical man, uniform in piety, and an earnest, devout minister. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1858, p. 294; Simpson, Cyclop. of Methodism, s. v.

Austin, John, an English writer of the time of the Commonwealth, died in 1669. He published, The Christian Moderator; or, Persecution for Religion Condemned by William Birchley (1651):—an Answer to Tilotson's "Rule of Faith":—and other works. See Allibone, Dict. of Brit. and Amer. Authors, s. v.

Austin, Leonard, a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Randolph, Vt.; date unrecorded. He professed conversion when about fifteen; received license to exhort in 1831, and in 1836 was licensed to preach and admitted into the New Hampshire Conference. In 1852 failing health compelled him to retire from the active ranks, and he died in 1863. Mr. Austin was a successful preacher, though neither brilliant nor strong. He was eminently affable and kind, and spoke with a heart-melting pathos that led hundreds to Christ. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1863, p. 103.

Austin, Lyman C., a Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Macon, Mich., July 3, 1846. He experienced religion in his sixteenth year, and in 1869 entered the Michigan Conference. He died at Pewamo, Mich., Dec. 24, 1873. See Minutes of Annual Conferences, 1874, p. 107.

Austin, Richard Thomas, a Congregational minister and educator, was born at Waldoborough, Me., May 6, 1809. He graduated from Bowdoin College in 1831. After teaching some months in Thomaston, Me., he went to Boston in 1832, where he was for a year assistant in a private school. He then entered the Divinity School at Cambridge, but left after one term for want of funds. To obtain these, he took charge for a considerable time of the Cambridge Grammar-school, and, without neglecting the duties of the latter position, resumed his theological studies, which in 1836 he creditably completed. On Sept. 28, 1836, he was ordained as minister of the Church in Wayland, and after two years spent there he returned to Cambridge, where he became principal of the high-school. This position he was at length obliged to relinquish because of declining health. The last two years of his life were spent as pastor of the Church in Lunenburg, Mass., where he died, Jan. 18, 1847. Mr. Austin was a man whose piety shone out through all his actions. As a preacher, he was earnest and practical; as a teacher, eminently successful. See The Christian Examiner (Boston, 1847), xlii, 311.

Austin Canons are regular canons who assumed this title after the Council of Lateran, in 1139, when pope Innocent imposed upon them the rule drawn up by St. Augustine of Hippo in his 109th epistle. Lyndwood says some wore a linen rochet and black open cope; others white linen or woollen, and a close black cope and cross on it. Some, again, wore all white and a cross; and others wore boots like monks, or shoes like seculars. They were introduced in England in 1105 through the influence of Athelwolph, confessor to Henry I at Nostell. They held one hundred and sixty-one priories in England, including the cathedral of Carlisle, and the churches of Bristol, Hexham, and Christchurch, Hants; Oxford, Waltham, Dunstable, St. German, Lanercost, Cirencester, Cartmel, Dorchester, Oxon, Walsingham, Newstead, Worksop, Bolton, Dunmow, Bridlington, and St. John's, Colchester; Guisborough, Kirkham, Thornton, St. Bartholomew's, and St. Mary's Overy, London. Their naves were also parish churches and served by vicars. They held several cathedrals—Carlisle, St. Andrews, Milan, Palermo, Patti, Cefalu, Chiemeese, Tortosa, Pampeluna, Saragossa, and Salzburg.

Austin Friars (or Eremites). Volaterranus and Alvarez place the Augustinians after the Dominican and Franciscan orders; but Adrian of Ghent and Polydore Vergil give them the first rank. Their earliest appearance as hermits has been referred to a very early date; but, according to the most trustworthy authors, they were founded by William, duke of Aquitaine and earl of Poitou, about the year 1150, and were known as Williamites. Alexander IV gathered their scattered communities into a single order under a prior-general, and removed them into cities and towns. In 1254 they settled in England at London, where the nave of their church remains; and at Woodhouse, in Wales, in 1255, they left the wilds for towns. They wore a black robe and girdle, and observed the so-called rule of St. Augustine, which was adopted by all the other mendicant orders. They were famous in disputation, and the "keeping of Austins" formed a material part of the act of taking an M.A. degree at Oxford.

Austoo, James, a Christian martyr, was one of the five who were burned at Islington, Sept. 17, 1557, because he would not worship the images, and, by preaching, incited others to refuse likewise. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 405.

Austoo, Margery, a Christian martyr, was one of the godly five who were burned at Islington, Sept. 17, 1557, because she would not consent to the popish idolatry and superstition. See Fox, Acts and Monuments, viii, 405.

Austrebertha, saint and virgin, abbess of Pavilly, in Normandy, was born, in 633, in the territory of the city of Terouane, being a daughter of Badesfroir or Befroi, count-palatine, and of St. Frametille or Framense, who was also of royal blood. In 649, in order to escape marriage, she received the veil from St. Omer, bishop of Terouane. Afterwards she became abbess of Port; and in 672 first abbess of Pavilly, a nunnery founded by St. Philibertus, abbot of Jumièges. She afforded for more than thirty years an example of humility, contempt for the world, self-denial, and mortification, and died Feb. 10, 704. She is commemorated Feb. 10. See Baillet, Feb. 10.

Austregisilus (Austrille, or Outrille), Sr., bishop of Bourges, was born at that place, Nov. 29, 551. In his youth he was received into the house of king Gontram, who conceived a great liking for him, and he received the name Mapparius. While there, a man falsely accused him of a fault which he had himself committed; and, as no other means of arriving at the truth could be found, the king ordered them to decide the question by single combat. While Austregisilus waited for his enemy on the field, news came to him that the latter had been killed by a fall from his horse. In gratitude to God for this deliverance, Austregisilus resolved to withdraw from court, and repaired to Aunairius, bishop of Auxerre, who brought him up in his Church. He was afterwards ordained priest by Etherius, bishop of Lyons, who also made him abbot of St. Nizier. After twenty years spent in the discharge of this office, and in fasting, prayers, and mortification, he was made bishop of Bourges, Feb. 15, 612, and governed his diocese with piety and wisdom for twelve years. He died May 20, 624, on which day he is commemorated. See Baillet, May 20.

Austremonius (or Stremonius), Sr., apostle, and first bishop of Auvergne, was one of the seven illustrious missionaries sent into Gaul by the pope about the middle of the 3d century (A.D. 250, according to the Hist. of the Martyrdom of St. Saturninus). He confined himself principally to Auvergne, and is reckoned the first bishop of Auvergne, which see was afterwards transferred to Clermont. The Church of Auvergne honors him as a martyr on Nov. 1. See Baillet, Nov. 1; Gregory of Tours, i, 23, 29.

Austri, in Norse mythology. The cosmogony of the Scandinavians teaches that the visible firmament of the sky is nothing but the skull of the giant Ymir, which the sons of Bór—Odin, Vili, and Ve—placed there after they had slain the giant. They lifted this heaven with four corners above the earth, and on each corner placed one dwarf, Austri, Sudri, Westri, Nordri (East, South, West, North).

Austrudis (or Austrudis), saint and virgin, abbess of Laon, was the daughter of Blandinus Boson and Salabarna, his wife. She was born in the diocese of Toul about 634, and took the veil when twelve years of age in a monastery of the city of Laon, of which her mother was abbess. Upon the death of the latter, she, although so young, was unanimously elected to succeed her in the government of the house, which was a double monastery of monks and nuns, the latter amounting to more than three hundred. She acquitted herself of her charge with wonderful piety and fidelity, but she did not escape the calumnies and injustice of the world. She was accused of a state crime, and suffered much from the rapacity of the bishop of the diocese, Mangerius, who wished to take possession of her abbey. She died in 688 or 707. See Baillet, Oct. 17.

Ausweikis was a god of the ancient Prussians. He was their Æsculapius—gave health, and helped the sick and feeble.

Authentic is a term applied to the sounds connecting the final (in Gregorian music) with its octave, or a melody in which they only are employed, in contradistinction to those connecting the fourth below the final with its octave, the fifth above it, which were called plagal (q. v.). In Ambrosian music authentic scales only were employed, and of these only four: the Phrygian (D—d), Dorian (E—e), Hypolydian (F—f), and Hypophrygian (G—g) of the Greek system. The Æolian (A—a) and the Ionian (C—c), subsequently added to the number of the Church scales (tones or modes), were subjected to the same classification. Authentic scales are characterized by the harmonic division (6:4:3) of their octaves; e. g. C—g—c; the plagal by the arithmetical division (4:3:2); e. g. G—C—g. Authentic melodies are thought to have generally greater dignity and strength than plagal. A good modern example of the former is the well-known German chorale Eine feste Burg ist unser Gott, and of the latter the Evening Hymn, attributed to Tallis; and it would be difficult to find in pure melodic music better examples of the sublime and the beautiful. The relations of subject and answer in the modern tonal fugue (as when C—g are “answered” not by g—d, but by g—C) obviously grew out of the division of scales into authentic and plagal.

Authorized (ENGLISH) Version of the HOLY SCRIPTURES. The Anglo-American Revision.—This, as an organized effort, originated, after long previous discussions, in the Convocation of Canterbury, which, at its session May 6, 1870, took the following action, proposed by a committee which consisted of eight bishops, the late deans Alford and Stanley, and several other dignitaries:

1. That it is desirable that a revision of the Authorized Version of the Holy Scriptures be undertaken.
2. That the revision be so conducted as to comprise both marginal renderings and such emendations as it may be found necessary to insert in the text of the Authorized Version.
3. That in the above resolutions we do not contemplate any new translation of the Bible, or any alteration of the language, except where, in the judgment of the most competent scholars, such change is necessary.
4. That in such necessary changes the style of the language employed in the existing version be closely followed.
5. That it is desirable that Convocation should nominate a body of its own members to undertake the work of revision, who shall be at liberty to invite the co-operation of any eminent for scholarship, to whatever nation or religious body they may belong.

The report was accepted unanimously by the Upper House and by a great majority of the Lower House. A committee was also appointed, consisting of eight bishops and eight presbyters, to take the necessary steps for carrying out the resolutions. The Convocation of York, owing mainly to the influence of archbishop Thomson, did not fall in with the movement, and is therefore not represented in the committee on revision. But a favorable change is gradually taking place, and some of the most influential members of the Convocation, as dean Howson of Chester, are hearty supporters of revision.

The committee of bishops and presbyters appointed by the Convocation of Canterbury at its first meeting, the bishop of Winchester, Dr. Samuel Wilberforce, presiding, adopted a series of resolutions and rules as the fundamental principles on which the revision was to be conducted, and the individuals to be engaged in the work. Of these, the following regulations for the revisers are the most important:

1. That the committee, appointed by the Convocation of Canterbury at its last session, separate itself into two companies, the one for the revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Test., the other for the revision of the Authorized Version of the New Test.

VIII. That the general principles to be followed by both companies be as follows:

1. To introduce as few alterations as possible in the text of the Authorized Version consistently with faithfulness.

2. To limit as far as possible the expression of such alterations to the language of the Authorized and earlier English versions.

3. Each company to go twice over the portion to be revised, once provisionally, the second time finally, and on principles of voting as hereinafter is provided.

4. That the text to be adopted be that for which the evidence is decidedly preponderating; and that when the text so adopted differs from that from which the Authorized Version was made, the alteration be indicated in the margin.

5. To make or retain no change in the text on the second final revision by each company except two thirds of those present approve of the same, but on the first revision to decide by simple majorities.

6. In every case of proposed alteration that may have given rise to discussion, to defer the voting thereon till the next meeting whensoever the same shall be required by one third of those present at the meeting, such intended vote to be announced in the notice for the next meeting.

7. To revise the headings of chapters, pages, paragraphs, italics, and punctuation.

8. To refer, on the part of each company, when considered desirable, to divines, scholars, and literary men, whether at home or abroad, for their opinions.

IX. That the work of each company be communicated to the other as it is completed, in order that there may be as little deviation from uniformity in language as possible.

X. That the special or by-rules for each company be as follows:

1. To make all corrections in writing previous to the meeting.

2. To place all the corrections due to textual considerations on the left-hand margin, and all other corrections on the right-hand margin.

3. To transmit to the chairman, in case of being unable to attend, the corrections proposed in the portion agreed upon for consideration.

The following is a list of the persons appointed for the work in Great Britain in pursuance of the above action of the Convocation and the invitations working out of it as the two bodies of revisers were finally constituted, omitting the names of such as failed to serve, whether by reason of death, resignation, or otherwise.

On Dec. 7, 1871, the following constitution was adopted by the American revisers, having been already ratified by the British committee:

I. The American committee, invited by the British committee engaged in the revision of the Authorized English Version of the Holy Scriptures to co-operate with them, shall be composed of Biblical scholars and divines in the United States.

II. This committee shall have the power to elect its officers, to add to its number, and to fill its own vacancies.

III. The officers shall consist of a president, a corresponding secretary, and a treasurer. The president shall conduct the official correspondence with the British revisers. The secretary shall conduct the home correspondence.

IV. New members of the committee, and corresponding members, must be nominated at a previous meeting and elected unanimously by ballot.

V. The American committee shall co-operate with the British companies on the basis of the principles and rules of revision adopted by the British committee.

VI. The American committee shall consist of two companies—the one for the revision of the Authorized Version of the Old Test., the other for the revision of the Authorized Version of the New Test.

VII. Each company shall elect its own chairman and recording secretary.

VIII. The British companies will submit to the American companies from time to time such portions of their work as have passed the first revision, and the American companies will transmit their criticisms and suggestions to the British companies before the second revision.

IX. A joint meeting of the American and British companies shall be held, if possible, in London before final action.

X. The American committee to pay their own expenses.

The American companies held their first session for active work Oct. 4, 1872, and have been from time to time furnished with advanced copies (for strictly private use) of the revised texts prepared by the British companies. These they return with their own suggestions, and the views of the respective committees on both sides of the Atlantic are then interchanged until a general agreement is attained. A few points of difference will doubtless still remain, concerning which a statement will be made in an appendix to the final work. Each committee holds a monthly session of several days, in which every change is carefully and deliberately discussed, and a conclusion reached by vote according to the rules given above. The New Test. has thus been all gone over, and was published separately in England on May 17, 1881, and in this country three days subsequently. Immense editions were immediately sold, and more than a dozen reprints were issued with the greatest despatch. The general verdict of the English press was unfavorable on the ground of unnecessary changes, but American criticisms have been more lenient. The popular opinion, however, seems to be, on both sides of the Atlantic, that while, on the whole, great improvements have been made, yet the revisers have exceeded their commission by introducing many trivial changes, which in some cases are, moreover, inelegant and offensive. The prospect of the revision in its present form taking the place of king James's version for public use is not clear. The issue of the Old Test. will follow probably in 1884. When published, the entire Bible as revised will go forth on its own merits, but with the prestige of the highest scholarship and the most laborious criticism attainable for such a purpose from all the leading denominations of British and American Christianity. Its ultimate success time must determine. See Dr. Schaff's Revision of the English Version of the Holy Scriptures (N. Y. 1873).

Autographs of the prophecies, gospels, etc., are the identical or original documents written by the respective authors of the books of Scripture. Copies taken from these are termed apographs. None of these original MSS. are now remaining, nor could their preservation be expected, without the intervention of a miracle, during the space of nearly eighteen centuries. It seems exceedingly probable that divine Providence permitted them to be early withdrawn from public inspection, lest, like other relics, they should become objects of idolatrous veneration. It is even asserted by Peter, bishop of Alexandria in the 4th century, that an original of John's gospel was not only preserved, but worshipped, at Ephesus (Michaelis, Introd. i, 250). See MANUSCRIPTS, BIBLICAL.

Autos Sacramentâles, a species of tragedies acted in Spain on the occasion of the procession of the holy sacrament. They were performed in the public streets with torches, though in the light of day. The autos continued to be acted for an entire month, and closed the devotion of the sacrament.

Autpert (Ausbertus, or Ansbertus), AMBROSE, a Benedictine, was born in the south of France, probably Provence, in the early part of the 8th century. He was brought up in the court of king Pepin, whence he passed into Italy, and took the vows in the Convent of St. Vincent, on the Volturno, in the diocese of Venafrò, Italy, of which he was afterwards, about 777, made abbot; which office, however, was disputed with him by Poton, who had also been elected by the Lombards. The case was carried before pope Adrian for decision, who ordered both parties to come to Rome; but Autpert died on the road, July 19, 778. Tritheim (1546) had been able to find only the following of Autpert's writings: In Cantica Canticozum Lib. I.—Epistolarum ad Diversos Lib. I.—De Cupiditate Lib. I.—In Apocalypsin Joannis Lib. X. The Battle of the Virtues and Vices, included among the works of St. Augustine, and which goes under the name of St. Ambrose in some MSS., has been attributed to Autpert. He also wrote some Lives and Homilies, and a tract On Concupiscence, which is in the library of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in MS. But this second list has been almost entirely assigned, by Cave, to the abbot of Monte-Casino. See Dupin, Hist. of Eccles. Writers, ii, 39.—Landon, Eccles. Dict. s. v.; Smith, Dict. of Christ. Biog. s. v.

Autumn, in the mythology of the ancients, was represented as a young man with a basket of fruit in one hand and caressing a dog with the other.

Autun, COUNCILS OF (Concilium Augustodunense). This was one of the most ancient churches in France. Several councils were held here.

I. Held in 677. Six canons of this council have come down to us, one of which orders that all priests and others of the clergy shall commit to memory the Creed of Athanasius. See Labbe, Concil. vi, 535.

II. This council was convened in 1065 to consider the matter of Robert, duke of Burgundy, whom Hugo, abbot of Clugny, brought before the council and induced to make satisfaction to Haganon, bishop of Autun, and others whom he had plundered and otherwise injured. See Richard, Dict. Univ. i, 464; Labbe, Concil. ix, 1183.

III. Held by order of pope Gregory VII by his legate, Hugo, bishop of Die, in 1077. Several French and Burgundian bishops and abbots attended. Manasser of Rheims, who, having been cited, refused to appear, was suspended from the exercise of his office, having been accused of simony and of usurping that archbishopric. Certain other French bishops were brought to judgment at the same time. See Mansi, Concil. x, 360.

IV. Held Oct. 16, 1094, by Hugo, archbishop of Lyons and legate, assisted by thirty-two bishops and several abbots. They renewed the sentence of excommunication against the emperor Henry and the anti-pope Guibert; also, they excommunicated for the first time Philip of France for marrying Bertrade during the lifetime of his lawful wife; but Philip, by a deputation to the pope, averted the storm for a while, and obtained a delay in the execution of the sentence until the feast of All-Saints in the following year. See Labbe, Concil. x, 499.

Auvergne, COUNCIL OF (Concilium Arvernense), was held in 533, with the consent of king Theodebert, Honoratus of Bourges presiding. Sixteen canons were published.

3. Forbids to wrap the bodies of the dead in the consecrated cloths.

6. Forbids marriage between Christians and Jews.

7. Forbids to place the coverlet used to be laid over the body of the Lord upon the corpse of a priest.

12. Of incestuous marriages.

15. Orders the country priests to celebrate the feasts of Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide with their bishops in the city.

See Labbe, Concil. iv, 1084. See CLERMONT, COUNCIL OF.

Auvergne, PIERRE D', a French scholastic writer, lived at the close of the 13th century. He was canon of Paris, and had a great reputation as a philosopher. In 1272 the rectorate of the University of Paris being vacant, the legate of the pope chose Auvergne for the position. The time of his death is not known. He wrote Summa Questionum Quodlibeticarum. See Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.

Auvray, Félix Henri, a Parisian historical painter, was born in 1800, and studied under baron Le Gros. His best works are, St. Louis, Prisoner:—Gaucher de Châtillon Defending St. Louis against the Saracens:—The Spartan Deserter:—and St. Paul at Athens. The Art Union of Douai decreed Auvray a gold medal of honor. He died in 1833. See Spooner, Biog. Hist. of the Fine Arts, s. v.; Hoefer, Nouv. Biog. Générale, s. v.
